resort [C]. She had been informed by a kind of revelation, that she should be eminent, and get a deal of money; for she dreamed, that Venus appeared to her, to acquaint her with the arrival of some very rich customers [D]. The most illustrious Orators, and even the most austere Philosophers, fell in love with her. Every one knows, that Demosthenes made a journey to Corinth on purpose to lie with her; but the price discouraged him [E]. It is also well known, what a passion Diogenes the Cynic had for her [F]. He found her very complaisant, as poor and slovenly as he was, which is more to be admired than her great intimacy with the Philosopher Aristippus, who was a very genteel and polite man. It is said, that she did not love him, and he was his further account of the matter; for it is true, that Athenæus says, it was believed, that the prostitutes of Corinth had very much contributed to the safety of all Greece, by the prayers they put up to Venus, when Xerxes made his irruption. He adds, that the Corinthians promised Venus a certain number of those creatures, if they obtained the favours they begged of her, and that Xenophon, the Corinthian, made a like vow, if he carried the prize at the Olympic games. Having obtained the victory, he punctually performed his vow, consecrating twenty five young women to the service of Venus, and presenting them to this goddess, during the ceremony of the sacrifice he offered to her, after his return from the Olympic games. Nay, these twenty five girls began the hymn that was sung during the immolation of the victim. Concerning the whoredom of Corinth, see Erasmus's Adages (19), where he cites a notable passage of Strabo (20).

This is sufficient to make good my text, and at the same time to shew, that the Heathens could not say, that the abominations they published of their gods, were only poetical stories; for here is a most flourishing city, which testifies by its laws, and public worship, that it believes, that the courtizans by their prostitutions, did an agreeable service to Venus, and that their intercession with her was of the greatest efficacy to prevent public calamities. It is a sign they gave credit to the stories that were told of this goddess's adulteries.

[C] No courtesan had ever a greater resort. Of this Propertius (21) gives an express testimony.

Non ita complebant Ephyrææ (22) Laidos sedes,
Ad cujus jacuit Græcia tota fores.

Lais ne'er sent such siging crowds away,
Tho' at her doors all Greece enamour'd lay.

The expressions of Plutarch are as strong as can be. He says, that Greece was inflamed with the love of Lais, that two seas fought for this woman (23), and that she had an army of gallants (24). Ἦν δὲ δὴ πᾶν ἀπὸ τοῦ Λαίδας τὴν αἰσθητὴν ἐκείνην καὶ πολυήγορον ὡς ἐπὶ τῇσι πύλαις τὴν ἑλλάδα, μᾶλλον, δὲ ταῖς δυνάμειν ἢ περὶ αὐτῆς ἐβόωντο. Inaudivisti band dubie quid Laidi obtigerit. Nobilis illa & tam multis amata viris, quæ sui desiderio Græciam inflammavit, atque adeo de qua duo maria certaverant. See her epitaph in the remark [K].

Mrs Jacqueline Guillaume says, at the 77th page of her Dames Illustres (25), 'that one of the principal gallants of Lais, a public courtesan, erected to her a statue like that of Pallas, with this inscription: "To the divinity of Lais, for having triumphed over the wisdom of all the Philosophers, and the courage of all the conquerors." I wish she had quoted some good author, or at least some author, for it; for her own authority cannot well be depended upon.

[D] She dreamed, that Venus appeared to her to acquaint her, with the arrival of some very rich customers. It was Venus, firnamed Melænis, or the black, that appeared to her. She had a temple, with this title, in a suburb of Corinth (26). It has been thought, that this surname was given her because, generally speaking, men go about the multiplication of their kind by night (27), and not like beasts by day (28). If this reason of the surname Melænis was a solid one, it does not seem that Venus, as black, should have shewn herself in a dream to young Lais, who was not designed to mind the distinction of days and nights. However it be, this dream was mentioned by an Orator in one of his pleas: you need only read these words of Athenæus: ἡ καὶ Ἀρροδίτη ἡ ἐν Κορίνθῳ ἡ Μελανίς, καλεμένη, νυκτὸς ἐπιφαίνουμένη ἐμνήσεν ἐρασὺν ἐφ' ὅσον πολυτάλαντον. ἢ ὅτι περὶ δὲ νυκτὸς ἐν τῷ κατὰ Ἀριστοφάνους δευτέρῳ. Huic (Laidi) cum esset Corinthi, Venus Melænis five Nigella dormienti noctu se ostendit, & adventum prænuñciavit amatorum qui forent pecuniosissimi, ut memorat Hyperides Aitione secunda contra Aristagoram (29). — When Lais was at Corinth, Venus Melænis, or the black, appeared to her in a dream, and foretold the arrival of some very rich lovers, as Hyperides relates it in his second oration against Aristagoras.

[E] Demosthenes made a journey to Corinth on purpose to lie with her; but the price discouraged him.

This story has been very prettily dressed up in French by Mr le Pays (30). 'Aulus Gellius tells it thus (31): "Lais Corinthia ob elegantiam venustatemque formæ grandem pecuniam demerebat: conventusque ad eam ditiorum hominum ex omni Græcia celebres erant: neque admittebatur, nisi qui dabat, quod poposcerat. Poposcebat autem illa nimium quantum." Hinc ait natum esse illud frequens apud Græcos adagium, ἡ πάντων ἀνδρῶν ἐς Κόρινθον ἔσθ' ὁ πλεῖς. Quod frustra iret Corinthum ad Laidem qui non quiret dare quod poposceretur. Ad hanc ille Demosthenes clanculum adit; & ut sibi copiam faceret, petit: at Lais μισίας δραχμῶν ἢ τάλαντον poposcit. Hoc facit nummi nostratis denarium decem millia. Tali petulantia mulieris atque pecunie magnitudine iustus expavidusque Demosthenes avertit; & discedens, Ego, inquit, pœnitere tanti non emo! Sed Græcia ipsa, quæ fertur dixisse, lepidiora sunt, ex ἀνέμοις, inquit, μισίων δραχμῶν μεταβλήσας. — Lais earned a great deal of money by the elegance and beauty of her person; and many of the richer sort flocked to her from all parts of Greece. But her price was very high. Hence they say amongst the Greeks, so frequent among the Greeks, that it was not every man, that could make a voyage to Corinth. Demosthenes came privately to this lady, and asked the favour: but Lais demanded a whole talent. Demosthenes, struck with the insolent demand, went away, saying, I am not for buying repentance so dear.'

[F] It is well known what a passion Diogenes the Cynic had for her. She obliged him to the full; he kissed her gratis. This is what Aristippus's servant represented to his master, who lavished his estate upon that prostitute. But Aristippus answered him: I pay her well, not that others may not lie with her, but that I may do it. 'Ορεῖς δὲ μένος ὑπὸ οἰκίτῃ, ὅτι σὺ μὲν αὐτῇ τοσούτον ἀργύριον δίδως, ἡ δὲ προίκα Διογένης τῷ κυνὶ συγκυλίσταται. ἀπεκρίνατο, ἐγὼ Λαίδῃ χορηγῶ πολλὰ, ἵνα αὐτὸς αὐτῇ ἀπολαύω, ὃν ἵνα μὴ ἄλλος (32). Aristip-pus was the most obliging man in the world to his mistresses; he was not jealous of them, nor did he regard their bellowing upon others the same favours he received. This is what he declared to Diogenes, who told him (33), 'You lie with a prostitute; either leave her, or be a cynic as I am. Do you think it absurd, answered Aristippus, to lodge in a house, that has lodged many others, or to embark in a vessel, which has carried many passengers; No, replied Diogenes. Just so, said Aristippus, it is no ways absurd, to have to do with a woman, whom many others have known before (34). Here is a diverting description of the equipage, with which these two Philosophers rambled about Lais's house, if we believe Tassoni. 'Ma che bel vedere Diogene Cinico col Mantello di romagnuolo squarciato, e rappezzato, la barba squalida, senza camicia, e lordo, e pidocchio far dell' innamorato, passeggiando lungo la porta della famosa Laidè, dall' withstanding the pleasure she found in distinguishing herself by the great number of her admirers, she left Corinth, where she had always a crowd of galants, and went to Thessaly in quest of a young man with whom she was passionately in love [K]. The women of that country conceived so much jealousy against that beautiful woman, that they put her to a cruel death. They drew her into the temple of Venus, and there stoned her (c), or, according to others, killed her with the stools they found at hand. All authors do not agree, that she died in that manner [L]. I have said in another place (d), that she performed her apprenticeship under the Painter Apelles; and indeed, it seems that he got her maiden-head, if we may depend on the authors I have alledged. See (e) how he answered those, who laughed at him, under pretence, that he had chosen a novice: but if the matter be discussed, we shall have reason to doubt of this story [M]. ἐμοδὲν καὶ ἀδρα τῇ πόλει. ἔπειτα λαμπρῶς τῇ πόλει, καὶ πρὸς τῆς τήνης, ἥ ἐπειδὴ τὴν ἐργασίαν ὑπὸ χαλαρὰ ῥυτίδι κατέλυσεν, τὰς ἐν ηλικίᾳ παιδοτρύβει, καὶ τοῖς ἑξένοις ἀντικαθίστηεν. Nisi forte aliquid dicunt qui & sponsum nobis à matris genere verbis efferunt, genus ejus à famosa illa Laide ducentes. Nam Lais (dixit jam quidam historiarum scriptor) mancipium fuit Hyccaricum, emptum ex Sicilia, unde nobis venit illa pulchrorum filiorum mater quæ celebrem illum peperit. Et ipsa quidem olim scortum fuit Naucleri heri, deinde, Rheoris similiter heri, tertii deinde post illos conservi, & clam civitatis, deinde palam civitatis artique præfuit meretricis, à cujus opera postquam ob maturas rugas destitit, adulas jam puellas in ea instituit, hospitibusque pro se substituit (50). — Unless perhaps they say something who extol the bridegroom on account of his maternal descent, pretending to derive it from the renowned Lais. For Lais (a certain historian says) was a slave of Hyccara, bought from Sicily, whence we have that mother of a beautiful offspring, who brought forth this famous man. And she herself was formerly concubine to a master of a ship, next to a Rhetorician, in the third place to a fellow-servant, and privately to a whole city; afterwards she publicly professed the trade of a whore; and, when incapacitated by age, she instructed young women, who supplied her place with strangers. Here you see a woman, of whom it might be affirmed, that the last state was worse than the first; for her prostitution was less pernicious than her trade of procuring.

[K] She went to Thessaly, in quest of a young man, with whom she was passionately in love. What has been said (51) of the poverty, and procuring trade of Lais, does not agree with what Plutarch says of her; for he affirms, that when this courtesan left Corinth, she had there a great army of galants, and that the women of Thessaly killed her only for the envy they bore to her beauty (52). The Thessalian spark she fell in love with was called Hippolochus, if we believe Plutarch, but Athenæus calls him Pausanias (53). They both agree, that the temple of Venus, in which she was killed, had a surname given it, which denoted that crime; it was surnamed according to Plutarch, the temple of Venus Homicide, Ἀφροδίτης ἀνδροφόνου, and according to Athenæus, the temple of Venus Profaned, ἀνοσίτης Ἀφροδίτης. A tomb was built to Lais upon the river Peneus with this epitaph:

Τῆς δὲ πόδ' ἡ μεγάλανχος ἀνικητός τε πρὸς ἄλλην Ἑλλὰς ἐδολώθη κάλλος ἰσοθέη, λαίδος, ἣν τέκνωσεν Ἐρως, δρέψεν δὲ Κορίνθος, κεῖται δ' ἐν κλεινοῖς Θερταλικοῖς πεδίοις.

Hujus aliquando, magnanima, & fortitudine invicta Græcia, formâ deabus æquiparandâ, victa & in servitutum redacta est.

Laïdis, amoris filia, alumna Corinthi,
Quæ in nobilibus Thessaliæ campis sita jacet (54).

Here the fam'd Lais lies, in death's cold arms:
Greece felt the pow'r of her exalted charms,
Love gave her birth, and Corinth's walls a place:
The fields of Thessaly her ashes grace.

Athenæus confutes those, who said, that she was buried in a suburb of Corinth called Cranion. However it is true, that her monument was seen in that (suburb (55), and nothing hinders but that it might be there, and in Thessaly too: for, tho' the Corinthians had not her body, they doubtless erected a monument to her. They engraved upon it a lioness, whose fore-feet rested upon a ram (56). See Alcianus's Emblems (57). According to Pausanias, the galant, that Lais went to Thessaly in quest of, was called Hippostratus. For the rest, I do not think Geufius's conjecture to be solid. He believes, that the women of Thessaly sacrificed Lais to Venus, as having made herself odious to that goddess, by the ambition of equalling, and even eclipsing her. He grounds his conjecture upon their leading her to the temple of Venus, though they might have killed her in other places. ' Verifimile est, says he (58), quod hæc Lais ab invidis & furiosis istis feminis non simpliciter necata, sed tanquam piacularis victima ' Deæ Veneri in ejus templo immolata fuerit: quia forma sua & pulchritudine Veneris ipsius gloriam affectasse, imo obscurasse, & ita indignationem & iram ejus in se excitasse videbatur. Nam quare ipsam non in alio loco, in foro, platea, vel ædibus occiderunt? quare ipsam in Veneris templo lapidibus & scæmnis obruerunt, nisi propterea, ut Laida Veneris æmulam coram ipsa Veneri in sacrificium im-

[L] All authors do not agree, that she died in that manner. Some say (59) that she was choked with an olive-stone; and so her death was much like that of Anacreon. Others pretend, that she died in the venereal act (60). Which to one, who had devoted herself to the service of the goddess Venus, was a glorious death; she died in the bed of honour, and in signaling her fidelity; just as when a warrior is killed in a battle. Some body has said, that an emperor ought to die standing (60*); but, according to the principles of the Pagans, a courtesan, to die gloriously, ought to be in a quite different posture; and Lais, in her way, did what Vespasian advised emperors to do.

[M] We shall have reason to doubt of this story. Let it be remembered, that the birth of Lais ought to be placed in the fourth year of the LXXXIXth Olympiad, and that Apelles, being at sea, was forced by a storm to put in at Alexandria, under the reign of Ptolemy, the son of Lagos (61), which reign could not begin at farthest till the CXIVth Olympiad. The most convenient supposition for the authors of that story would be to say, that Apelles was but twenty years old, and that Lais was twenty five at the time they speak of, and that he put into Alexandria, the first year of Ptolemy's reign: and therefore he must have been born the first year of the XCIXth Olympiad. But then, would he not have been near ninety five years old, when Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, began his reign? And is it likely, that, at such an age, he would have been in a capacity of bearing the sea, and doing what he is supposed to have done at the court of Egypt? Would this great age have been passed over in silence by all the writers that remain? These difficulties cannot be removed but by extending the time of Lais's virginity longer, that is, by supposing, that this Painter, at twenty years of age, entertained her, when she was already forty or fifty five years of age. Now this is to suppose things quite contrary to probability, and to what we find in authors. It would be much more reasonable to suppose, that Apelles was twice as old as Lais. It is highly probable, that she began her filthy trade very early, and consequently, that Apelles did not debauch her. Note, that the fountain of Pyrene, from whence, it is said, he saw tezans called Lais [N], is grounded upon this, that every thing that is said of Lais cannot be understood of the same woman, without contradicting chronology. There is no probability, that she was the daughter of Alcibiades (f), or that she was an author [O]. We have a very pretty epigram of Aufonius upon the looking-glass her return, when he was struck with her beauty, was at Corinth. Wherefore, if this story were true, it must be concluded, that he made some stay in that town, which I do not believe any author has positively said.

[N] Some conjecture, that there were two courtezans called Lais. She I speak of was removed to Corinth, when Nicias commanded the Athenian army in Sicily, that is, the second year of the XCIII Olympiad. She was then seven years old, if we believe (62) Ad Plutarch. Aristophanes's Scholiast (62). Now, since Demosthenes durst not go to Corinth, but incognito, in order to lie with Lais, he could not be a young scholar, but a man of a great reputation. He must therefore be supposed to have been at least thirty years of age, and so Lais would have been then sixty seven years old (63). Therefore there is no probability, that Demosthenes would have been desirous to see her, or that she would have asked a great sum of him. It was therefore another Lais, who asked Demosthenes so much. There were therefore two courtezans called Lais. The difficulty would be very great, though we should suppose, that Demosthenes made this voyage to Corinth at about twenty years of age; for our Lais would have been then near sixty. I find, that many authors build upon a passage of Athenæus, wherein it is said, that Alcibiades was always attended by two concubines, namely Damafandra, the mother of young Lais (64), and Theodota, who took care of his funeral, when he was killed in a town of Phrygia. This passage of Athenæus is of some weight; for it supposes there was a woman, called Lais before her who was the daughter of Damafandra; nevertheless there remain great difficulties. In the first place, Athenæus, who says so many things concerning Lais, makes no distinction; he speaks all along as if there never had been but one Lais. Does a man express himself thus, when he is persuaded, that there are two, and intends to inform his reader of it? secondly, Plutarch speaking of Lais, the daughter of Alcibiades's concubine, says expressly, that she was a native of Hyccara in Sicily, and that she was brought a slave from thence. Ταύτης λέγουσι θυγατέρα γενέσθαι Λαΐδας, τὴν Κορινθίαν μὲν περὶ ἀγορεύειν, ἐν δὲ Τηκερῶν Σικελικῇ πολιματῇ ἀιχμάλωτον γεγονέναι. Hujus ferunt filiam fuisse Laidem, quæ dicta fuit Corinthia quum Hyccaris Sicilia oppidulo fuisset. (65) Plutarch. in Alcib. sub fin. pag. 213; D.

expressly (69). Note also, that Athenæus calls Lais's mother sometimes Damafandra, and sometimes Timandra, and ascribes to Theodota the care of Alcibiades's funeral; but Plutarch says, that Timandra was the mother of Lais, and that she buried Alcibiades (70).

[O] It is not probable, that she was an author. Pliny (71) mentions two things, which he had read in the writings of a woman called Lais. He names her the first time with Elephantis, and the second time with Salpe, and a little after he makes mention of a midwife, called Sotira. It is known, that Elephantis had written some books full of obscenities. See the remark [P] of the article HELENA, and Suetonius in the forty third chapter of the Life of Tiberius, and Martial in the forty third epigram of the twelfth book. Galen witnesses (72), that Elephantis had written a treatise of Cosmetics. I have observed, in another place (73), the meaning of that word. Salpe was of the isle of Lesbos (74), and had written a book of jests, or of sports and diversions; but there is no great probability, that Pliny alledged her with respect to that work. * Lais & Salpe, says he (75), 'canum rabioforum morsus, & tertianas quartanaque' febres, menstuo in lana arietis nigri, argenteo 'bracchiali incluso;' that is, according to du Pinet's version, 'Lais and Salpe, two very renowned courtezans, say, that, if we wrap up some menstrual blood in the wool of a black ram, and put it in a silver bracelet, it is good for the bitings of mad dogs, and tertian and quartan agues.' This is clearly to insinuate, that these two women had written a book of medicinal receipts. Father Hardouin affirms, that Salpe wrote De Remediis muliebribus (76). The other passage of Pliny, in which Lais and Elephantis are joined, intimates the same thing. * Quæ Lais & Elephantis inter se contraria prodidere de abortivis, carbone & radice brassicæ, vel myrti, vel tamaricis in eo sanguine exlincto; item asinas non concipere tot annis, quod grana hordei contacta ederint: quæque alia nuncupavere monstrifica, aut inter ipsas pugnantia: cum hæc fecunditatem fieri iisdem modis, quibus illa sterilitatem prænnunciaret, melius est non credere (77). That is, according to du Pinet's version, 'As to what the courtezans Lais & Elephantis say of the menstrual blood, and to cause a child to dissolve in the mother's belly and of the coals made of the roots of cabbage, myrtles, or tamarisks, and extinguished in the same blood, there is no reason to give any credit to it: for one of them contradicts the other. The same may be said of what they tell us, that a she ass will not conceive every Grecian for so many years, as she has eaten grains of barley stained with the same blood. These two courtezans say many monstrous things upon this subject, to which we ought to give no credit: for what one of them says helps propagation, the other holds to be proper against it.' This translator undertakes to decide a thing, which Pliny has not expressed. He says boldly, that the courtezans Lais is here spoken of; and doubtless he means her, who makes the subject of this article. If he had said this, in a marginal note, he would have shewn himself less rash; but he gives it as the true version of the words of the original, which is an inexcusable boldness. Father Hardouin has been infinitely more reserved; he confesses, that he does not know, whether Pliny cites one of the two courtezans called Lais, and he calls her Midwife, obstetrix, whom Pliny quotes (78). If I did not find remedies for the tertian and quartan ague, in Pliny's words, but only for barrenness, and receipts for abortion, I should be more inclined to believe, that he cites a book written by our Lais, or ascribed to that famous courtezans; for there are hardly any people so well skilled in what can promote or prevent conception, or cause abortion, as those of Lais's trade, a trade, that takes up the wretched art of doing a good turn to those, who are afraid of disgrace; a trade, in a word, which terminates in that, when age does no longer favour the other functions. But after all, I do not think it probable, that our Lais wrote books. However I would not deny, that those, which are mentioned glafs of this leud woman [P]. I forgot to say, that she was so much in love with Eubates, that she obliged him to promise her marriage [Q]; but he found a way of evading his engagement. As many charms as she had, she could not conquer the continence of the Philosopher Xenocrates [R]. She defended herself one day very artfully against Euripides, who censured her with reason [S]. mentioned by Pliny, and set by him in opposition to those of another leud woman, named Elephantis, were ascribed to her. I question, whether an honest matron, expert in secrets, and a Midwife by profession, would have been called Lais; for this name, like that of Chrysis and Thais, and the like, was bestowed upon the naughty tribe, in the works of the Poets. And it was doubtless in allusion to that custom, that a book was printed in France, towards the beginning of the XVIth century with this title, A Dialogue of Arcin, wherein are related the lives, manners, and behaviours of Lais, and Lamia, courtezans of Rome. Aristænetus calls his mistress Lais (79). By that word is meant not only a woman he loved (80), but also a woman by whom he was beloved and favoured, without any reserve; for he says, that her bones were almost flexible, and that the traits of his embraces remained imprinted on them, as much almost as on the flesh, which covered them.

(79) See his first Letter, wherein he gives a very particular description of the beauties of that mistress.

[P] We have an epigram of Ausonius upon the looking-glass of this leud woman. Ausonius does but translate an epigram of Plato, which is in the Anthologia. He has done it very well:

Lais anus Veneri speculum dico: dignum habeat se Æterna æternum forma ministerium,
At mihi nullus in hoc usus, quia cernere talem
Qualis sum nolo; qualis eram nequeo (82).

(82) Ausonius, Epigram. lv.

Veneri, this glass I dedicate to thee;
Useless, alas! the utensil to me;
My former face I can't, my present will not see.

This is to suppose, that Lais survived her beauty, and that her looking-glass became to her an useless, and even unpleasant utensil. This agrees with the authors, I have mentioned in the remarks [H] and [I], but not with Plutarch. See the remark [K].

You will find, in the commentaries upon Alcianus's Emblems, some Latin verses, in which Lais's complaints are prettily represented. They were grounded upon two reasons: the first was, that she found, herself impaired, when she consulted her glass; the second was, that she still felt the flames of lust; she complained, that she had all the lascivious desires of youth in a body almost decrepit. It was a sad thing.

Et tamen idem animus stimulos sub pectore eisdem
Et noto sensit fervida corda Deo;
Sic secum: Facie nimium vivacior, o mens,
Cur dudum hæc anus est, tuque puella manes (83).

(83) Emblem. Alcian. pag. 330. Edit. Patav. 1661, in 4to.

Still the same pow'ful deity she confess'd,
And the same passions warm'd her aged breast.
Then sighing, thus she said: how ill we see
A youthful mind, and an old face, agree!

The truth is, that an old courtesan of Venice was represented under her name. 'Accepi pridem à viris Italici soli, id scriptum fuisse in quandam meretricem Venetam, quæ ætatis lapso, seu decusso flore, quoties se in speculo conspiceret, fronte jam rugis obstita, misere contabescebat, & nihilo segnius ardore tentiginis premebatur (84).' Horace has afforded this thought:

(84) Ibid.

Dices, heu (quoties te speculo videris alterum)

Quæ mens est hodie cur eadem non puero fuit?

Aut cur his animis incolumes non redeunt genæ (85)?

(85) Horat. Ode X, lib. iv, ver. 6.

Ofst as in the too faithful glass you spie

That alter'd form, you with a sigh will cry:

O! that I thus had thought, e'er youth was o'er,

Or that these thoughts cou'd fleeting youth restore!

[Q] She was so much in love with Eubates, that she obliged him to promise her marriage. Her passion must needs have been very violent, since she was willing to submit to the laws of Hymen (86), which would not have permitted her to continue freely her prostitution. She discovered to Eubates the desire she had to marry him. He pretended to give his consent, fearing her ill offices; but he did not lie with her; he put off that affair till after the games, in which he was to dispute the prize. He obtained it, and thought no more of his promise of marriage. He returned to Cyrene his country, contenting himself to take along with him the picture of Lais. He thought, by that means, that he should be a man of his word. The wife he had at Cyrene thought herself obliged to recompense so noble a continence; for which reason she erected a statue to her husband. I am afraid, that Ælian (87), who relates this story, has lost all the wit of it. Clemens Alexandrinus relates it in fewer words; but he calls the man Aristotle, whom Ælian calls Eubates; and he quotes the book of Ister περί ιδρύσεως ἀδελφῶν, de proprietate certaminum. He does not agree with Ælian in all the circumstances. 'Ὅτε Κυρηναῖος Ἀριστοτέλης, Λαΐδα ἐρώσαν ὑπερέσχε μὲν, ὁμοιωθεὶς ἐν τῇ ἐταιρίᾳ, ἢ μὴν ἀπάγειν αὐτὴν εἰς τὴν πατρίδα, εἰ συμπράξειεν αὐτῇ τινα πρὸς τὰς ἀταγωνισίας, ἐπειδὴ διεπράξατο, χαλεπῶς ἐντελὴν τὸν ὅρκον, γράψαντος αὐτῆς ὡς ὅτι μάστιγα ὁμοιοτάτην εἰκόνα, ἀνέσχεον εἰς Κυρήνην. Et Cyrenæus Aristoteles amantem Laidem solus depexit. Cum meretrici itaque jurasset, se eam esse in patriam abducurum, si ei adversus decertantes adversarios in aliquibus opem tulisset, postquam id perfecit, lepide à se scriptum iurandum exequens, ejus quam simillimam Cyrenæ statuit imaginem (88).

[R] She could not conquer the continence of Xenocrates. Lais laid a wager, that she would oblige this Philosopher to divert himself with her at a game of love. She pretended to be frightened, and, under that pretence, took sanctuary in his house, and spent the night there; but he did not meddle with her. When she was required to pay her wager, she answered, that she had not laid it about a statue, but about a man. Thus an old interpreter of Horace (89) relates the story. Diogenes Laërtius ascribes this to the courtesan Phryne, and does not speak of the wager. He says (90), that she fled to Xenocrates's house, pretending, that some body pursued her; and as he had but one bed in the house, she intreated the Philosopher to let her have part of it. He consented to it. After that, she made other demands, which came to nothing. Whence it was, that when she was asked, how things went, she answered, she had lain, not with a statue, and with a man. Some say, that Xenocrates's disciples one day put Lais into his bed, and that he was so fully resolved to preserve his continence, that he several times suffered incisions to be made in his privy-parts, and fire to be applied to them. 'Ἐνιοὶ δὲ Λαΐδα φασὶ παρὰ κατακλίνειν αὐτὴν τῆς μάστιγος, τὴν δὲ ἑτοὺς εἶναι ἐγχεῖν, ὥστε καὶ τομάς καὶ καύσεις πολλὰς αὐτῇ περὶ τὸ αἰδοῖον. The Latin translation runs thus, Quidam vero discipulos Laidem illi iniecisse in lectulum tradunt, illumque adeo fuisse continentem, ut cum se ad libidinem incitari præfensisset, & scire & urere verenda sæpe pateretur (91). We ought not to be satisfied either with the Greek author or his translator. The latter adds of his own head, that Xenocrates found in him the rebellion was a famous master in that art; and yet neither Pliny, nor Pausanias, nor any other writer, make mention of him. I will make but one remark for the faults of Moreri, and those of some other Dictionaries [T]. There never was a more extravagant boldness, than that of Antony de Guevara. He has vented a thousand ridiculous falsities about Lais [U], as if he had found them in ancient authors. I had almost passed over in silence the adventure of the Sculptor Myron [X].

rebellion of lust (92); and as to Diogenes Laërtius, he does not tell us what became of Lais: he puts her in the Philosopher's bed, without saying what she did there, or how she came out again, and, instead of finishing the narration of this particular adventure, he falls upon a general thing; that is, upon the remedies, which Xenocrates had several times made use of, to be proof against love.

[S] She defended herself one day very artfully against Euripides, who censured her with reason. Euripides, with pen in hand, was going to compose something in a garden. Lais, seeing him in that posture, accosted him, and asked him (93) what he meant by some words, which he had used in one of his tragedies (94), to denote, in general, a man, who does filthy actions. He was surprized at the impudence of this question, and answered her, You your self are one of those I mean (95). She fell a laughing, and quoted a verse (96) in which he said, that an action was not filthy, unless he who did it thought it so. Τὴν αἰσχρὴν εἰ καὶ τοῖσι χρομένοις δοκῇ, Equid vero turpe est nisi qui utantur sic putent (97)? We are not informed, whether Euripides was confounded by this argument ad hominem, or whether he made any reply; but it is certain, Lais could not have more handsomely brought her self off, nor have more subtly perplexed her censor. This maxim would carry the Philosophical sin to the utmost point, and would be of dangerous consequence; for which reason the Philosopher Antisthenes (98) corrected it in this manner, Αἰσχρὸν τὸ γὰρ αἰσχρὸν καὶ δοκῇ καὶ μὴ δοκῇ. What is filthy is filthy, whether it appears so, or not, to those who do it. Stobæus ascribes this correction to Diogenes the Cynic (99), and not to Antisthenes, as Plutarch does (100).

There is reason to doubt of this conversation; for since Euripides died in the XCIII Olympiad (101), when Lais could not be above fifteen or sixteen years old, it is not likely, that he had any discourse with her upon this point, or any other. We shall be the more easily convinced of it, if we consider, that he spent his last years at the court of Archelaus, where no author says that Lais had ever been. Suppose, as much as you please, two courtizans of this name, you will never clear the matter; for the first must be she, who was sold, when Hecceara was plundered by Nicias. But, according to Aristophanes's scholiast, she was then but seven years old. By this Chronology that scholiast raises a very considerable difficulty on the mention that is made of Lais in Aristophanes's Plutus, a comedy, that was acted at a time, when Lais could not as yet be famous (102). The difficulty will vanish, if it be supposed, that it ought to be read Nais, and not Lais in that play. You will find this correction in Athenæus (103). It is certain, there was a courtizan named Nais, and probably many authors have confounded her with Lais. Perhaps it was with Nais, that Euripides entered into discourse.

[T] I will make but one remark for the faults of Moreri, and . . . some other Dictionaries. Moreri's first fault consists in saying that Lais lived in the 420th year of Rome. She must then have lived about the end of the CXIth Olympiad: judge whether this can be said of a person, who was removed from Sicily to Corinth, in the second year of the CXIst Olympiad. There is no recurring to the hypothesis of two Lais's, since, besides that Moreri speaks only of one, he expressly says, that he speaks of that Lais, who was a native of a little town of Sicily called Hecceara. This Lais is manifestly she, who was seven years old, when Hecceara, her native town, was taken in the second year of the CXIst Olympiad. II. It is not true, that Plutarch says, that it was believed, she was daughter to Alcibiades. Moreri cannot father this falsity upon Amiot; for it is plain, that in this phrase l'on dit que Lais . . . étoit sa fille (104), the word sa ought to be referred to Timandra, Alcibiades's concubine, and not to Alcibiades. There is no ambiguity in the Greek (105). How could Alcibiades be Lais's father, who went not into Sicily, but with Nicias? Was not Lais then six or seven years old? III. It is not true, that Lais went to Alexander's camp; she had been dead a long time before Alexander was born. Amiot has occasioned this fault: for, not understanding a passage of Plutarch (106), wherein some words are wanting, he translates it, that Lais, falling in love with Hippolochus . . . left mount Aircorinthus . . . and went to the great camp of Alexander.

Charles Stephens is mistaken, in saying, that Lais removed from Sicily to Corinth, that her prostitution might be more profitable to her. She was but seven years old, when she went to Corinth, and she went thither against her will, having been bought in Hecceara by a man, who carried her with him into Greece as a slave. This fault has not been corrected by Lloyd or Hofman. I can scarce believe, that Charles Stephens found in any good author what he says: I. That Lais, going into Thessaly, so gained the love of the young men of the country, that they poured out wine before her door. II. That the Thessalian women, out of envy, stabbed her, whilst they were performing their devotions in the temple of Venus, at which the men could not be present. III. That this action drew upon Thessaly a plague, which ceased not, till they had built the temple of Venus [ἀλλοστία] (107). Lloyd and Hofman have both of them these three particulars.

[U] Antony de Guevara . . . has vented a thousand ridiculous falsities about Lais. I will not stay to refute them, and shall only mention a small part of them. He says (108) that she was born in the Ille Bithrite in the confines of Greece; 'and, as the chroniclers have written of her, she was the daughter of a great priest of Apollo's temple, who lived at Delphos, a man greatly experienced in the art of Magic, by which science he foretold the ruin of his daughter. Now this amorous Lais, was at the height of her glory in the time of the renowned king Pyrrhus. . . . who, being a youth of sixteen or seventeen years of age, came into Italy to make war with the Romans. . . . This amorous Lais remained a long time in king Pyrrhus's camp, and with him she came into Italy, and returned with him from the war. . . . and retired to the city of Corinth, to make her abode there, in which place she was followed, and courted by many kings, Lords, and princes.' He afterwards relates the adventure of Demosthenes, and concludes with saying, that Lais died at Corinth at seventy two years of age. How can a man have the confidence to publish such gross falsities? There are above 130 years between the birth of Lais, and Pyrrhus's expedition against the Romans, and above forty betwixt the death of Demosthenes and that expedition. And yet this impostor has imposed upon men of sense, for it was after him that Brantome vented many fables concerning Flora (109). I say nothing of Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who tells us, that Lais was a long time in king Pyrrhus's camp in Italy (110). He had read this in Guevara, and took it to be true.

[X] The adventure of the Sculptor Myron. It is one of the ridiculous adventures of a grey-headed lover. Myron, venerable for his hoary head, went to Lais, to ask a night of her, but was sent back without so much as being heard. He thought he had found the reason of her slight, and hoped, that if he should offer himself with a brown head of hair, he should be admitted. He thereof changed the colour of his hair, and returned to Lais: What a fool you are said she, to come to ask a thing of me, which I have refused your father. Aufonius tells the story very prettily (111).

Canus rogabat Laidis noctem Myron:

Tulit repulsam protinus.

Causamque sensit: & caput fuligine

Fucavit atra candidum.

Fool that thou art, fondly to hope to gain
A favour, which your father ask'd in vain!

Costar has given a list of some witty sayings, ascribed to different persons; amongst which he has this answer of Lais: 'Spartian, says he (112), relates, that an old man, who was very grey-headed, having been denied some favour by the emperor Adrian, came to ask it again a few days after, having painted his hair of the finest black he could meet with. This prince, discovering the trick, wittily answered him, What you ask of me, I have already denied your father. Nevertheless, in Aufonius, it is the courtizan Lais, who makes this ingenious answer; and yet Athe-næus does not speak of it, though he has so carefully preserved to us all the notable sayings of that handsome lady.' If the conjecture of some moderns was right, we need not wonder that Athæneus says nothing of this witty repartee of Lais; for they pretend, that Aufonius invented it (113). I mean, that,

L AMBECIUS (PETER), one of the most learned men of his age, was born at Hamburg in the year 1628. He went early to study in foreign countries, at the expence of the learned Luke Holstenius, his uncle; and he made so great progress, that, at nineteen years of age, he published a book (a), which was extremely applauded. He staid eight months at Toulouse with the archbishop Charles de Montchal, and two years at Rome with Cardinal Barberini. He was made professor of History at Hamburg, the thirteenth of January, 1652, and rector of the college of that town, the twelfth of January 1660. He had taken his doctor of Laws degree some years before in France. He had a thousand vexations in his own country, as well because his scholars would not obey him, as because his enemies accused him of Heterodoxy, and even of Atheism, and sharply censured his studies and his works. The unfortunate marriage, which he contracted [A] in 1662, having compleated his misfortunes, he gladly listened to the proposals of the queen of Sweden, who advised him to retire elsewhere. He therefore left his wife and country, and took a journey to Vienna, from whence, having had the honour to wait on his Imperial majesty, he went to Rome, and there made public profession of the Romish religion. He had abjured the Lutheran long before [B]; tho' he made still profession of it. He returned to Vienna towards the end of the year 1662, and was very well received by the emperor, who made him first his sub-librarian, and afterwards his first librarian, with the title of his Counsellor and Historiographer (b). He continued in that employment to his death, and acquired [A] The unfortunate marriage, which he contracted.] It may be said of many learned men, that they behave themselves with respect to marriage, as Pomponius Atticus did with respect to Poetry. 'Attigit quoque poeticon: credimus ne ejus expert esset suavitatis (1). — He touched upon Poetry: that he might, I suppose, have a relish of it's sweetness.' They have a mind to try it, that they may know what pleasure there is in it. But I do not think, that Lambecius had such thoughts; for he married an old woman; and, as she was very rich, it is probable he hoped only for the pleasure of having a good estate. His hopes were greatly frustrated; the lady was so covetous, as not to suffer her husband to make use of her estate. She declared her mind so soon upon that point, that Lambecius had not been married above a fortnight, when discontented and weary of his condition, he left his house and his country, never to return again. Here follows my voucher. Ad hæc adversa postquam tædium Conjugii, inauspicato A. 1662. cum Vetula Divite, sed parca, atque avara (A. 1690. Hamburgi defuncta,) contraxi, accessi, baud difficulter à Cbrisina, knowing the emperor Hadrian's answer, he feigned that Lais made use of it, and made an epigram upon it. I believe this answer came rather from a woman, than from the emperor Hadrian; for one can hardly imagine any good reason, why an old man, after a refusal, should fancy, that, appearing as a man without grey hair, he should obtain from this prince what he designed to ask of him. It is easy to conceive why he might hope for such a thing, if he desired a love-favour from a lady. We may say then, that the writers of Hadrian's history, men of little judgment and exactness, have confounded with his witty sayings, those which he only recited. He had read somewhere, what Lais is said to have answered Myron: perhaps he had read, that this answer was made to some other old galant, by some other courtizan: he told the story before his friends; the thing going from one hand to another lost it's principal circumstances, so that at last Hadrian was looked upon as the inventor of it (114).

I will not end this remark without saying, that Mr Costar praises this witty sentence of Lais too much. I confess, the answer was smart, and fit to mortify the galant, and to give the courtizan the pleasure of laughing at the old man; but, in short, she reasoned very ill, and against the rules of her art. I have refused the son, much more should I refuse the father, is the principle of a woman of pleasure; her argument turns upon this hinge: but here, on the contrary, Lais supposes, that, since she has denied a decrepit old father, she ought to deny his son, a young man, full of vigour. This is forsaking one's principle and fundamental rules.

To conclude, Myron could not be young, when Lais was in her glory: he flourished in the LXXXVth Olympiad (115), seven or eight years before he was born.

He designed to continue this history to his own time; but he only published the second book. *Liber secundus rerum Hamburgensium ab A. his Animadversiones ad Codicem Originis Constantinopolitanæ, & ad Anonymi excerpta & ad Leonis Imp. Oracula. I say nothing of his orations, which he published in the year 1660, nor of some other books of his: I proceed to that vast work he compiled at Vienna, which the reader may form a just idea of by these words of Mr Baillet. 'Though the catalogue of the manuscripts of the emperor's library at Vienna be divided into eight volumes in Folio, it is not yet finished, the death of the author having deprived us of so curious and important a work. Lambertus had undertaken, in that great work, the explication of the manuscripts of that library, which he has done in a critical and historical manner; resolving to lay out upon it all his learning and industry; in which he has very much distinguished himself from all the catalogue-makers I have spoken of. It must be confessed, that there are abundance of very particular and curious things in this copious and splendid commentary: but the author might have included the substance of so many volumes in a narrower compass, if he had consulted rather the income and leisure of private persons, than the magnificence and majesty of his prince (7).'

[D] He died in April, 1680. I keep to this date, because herein I find Nesselius (8) more to be credited, than those who place Lambertus's death in September, 1679 (9). Perhaps we might easily reconcile Meibomius and Nesselius, as to the day; for the twenty fourth of March, according to the old stile, belongs to the month of April, according to the new. But these two authors differ very much as to the cause of the plague, the other that it was the dropy. *Henr. Meibomius Jun. Peste illum Viennensi Epidemia obisse perhibens, ad d. 24 Mart. A. 1680. LAMBERT, bishop of Liege, or rather of Maestricht. It is a common opinion, as I have shewn in another place (a), that he was killed by Pepin's order, at the suggestion of Alpaide; but the thing is not certain. This is what I shall discuss [A].

(a) In the article ALPAIDE.

So

[A] This is what I shall discuss. I shall make use of the proofs alleged by the baron le Roi in one of his books. He is of opinion, that neither Pepin, nor Alpaide, had any hand in St Lambert's murder, and he builds (1), I. Upon the silence of Godescalcus, a contemporary writer. Here then is a negative argument, on which Dr John de Launoi lays so much stress. Godescalcus assigns no other reason for the murder of St Lambert, than the murder of two brothers related to Dodon. These two brothers had used Lambert very ill; for which reason they were killed by two of his relations. Dodon, a potent lord, and of great interest with Pepin, would neither suffer this murder to go unpunished, nor revenge himself upon inconsiderable persons; he resolved therefore to make away with St Lambert, for whose sake his two cousins had been murdered. This was the only reason, according to Godescalcus, of this bishop's death. He says nothing of Pepin or Alpaide. II. Mr le Roi (2) observes, that the first, who imputed St Lambert's murder to Pepin, was a canon of Liege, called Anselme, who lived in the XIth century. This canon failed not to say, as well as those that lived before him, that Dodon caused St Lambert to be murdered, to revenge the death of his two relations; but he related also, as another tradition, what concerns Alpaide's resentment against this prelate. III. It is observed (3), that Siegbert (4) suppressed the ancient cause, mentioned by all authors, and spoke only of the new one, which Anselme began to publish. Thus you see how errors successively and gradually increase. The authors, who succeeded Siegbert, have said nothing of the ancient cause, or else they have confounded it with the new, and added a hundred circumstances to it, unknown to the first Historians (5). Baron le Roi cites very grave authors, who reject the new tradition, and answer the influence brought against Godescalcus's silence. They will have it, that the true cause of St Lambert's martyrdom was suppressed by him, to avoid provoking Pepin's successors. Father Mabillon answers, that, since they durst publish, that Charles Martel was damned, it might with the same boldness have been said, that his father had caused a bishop's death? 'Ut hæc ratio valuerit in Godescalco, inquit Mabillon, cur eam causam dissimulavit Stephanus, qui sub extremis Carolinæ stirpis regibus vivebat? Sane longe atrocior erat fabula de Caroli Martelli damnatione, quam tamen Hincmarus Remorum Archiepiscopus, Adrevaldus, alique Auctores, imperante Carolo Calvo Martelli abnepote, in vulgus jaculare non dubitarunt. Unde omnino incertum videtur an Landebertus ob increpuitum de pellicatu Pipinum cæsus sit, at vero alienum omnino videtur à tanti principis bonitate & clementia ut cædis illius fuerit auctor (6). — If this reason is of any weight in respect to Godescalcus, says Mabillon, why did Stephanus suppress that cause, who lived under the last kings of Charles's race? certainly, the fiction of Charles Martel's damnation was more odious, which nevertheless Hincmarus, archbishop of Rheims, Adrevaldus, and other authors, in the reign of Charles the Bald, great-grandson of Martel, made no scruple to spread among the vulgar. Whence it seems altogether uncertain, whether Lambert was murdered for reproving Pepin on the account of whoredom; and it even seems quite inconsistent with the goodness and clemency of that prince, to have been the author of that murder.' Father Jourdan, cited by Mr le Roi, makes no question, but that Pepin married Alpaide with all the usual ceremonies, after he had divorced Plestrude. It is true, that the Christian law forbade such divorces and marriages; nevertheless, human laws permitted them at that time even among Christians. These second marriages had nothing of shame or infamy in them (7). This Historian observes (8), 'That Pepin and Alpaide had been a long time parted, when Lambert was assassinated in the year 708. Alpaide, adds he, had no hand

So many authors have written his Life, that it is disfigured thereby [B]. I have only read that, which was printed at Liege in 1657, composed by the Sieur du Bosc de Montandr . The title of it is, Le Courtisan Chr tien, &c. The Christian Courtier sacrificed as a State Victim to the Passion of the Court: or St Lambert, bishop of Tongres and Martyr, sacrificed for the interests of Conjugal Honour.

in it, since she was parted from Pepin at the beginning of the century, and retired into a monastery. Ado was the first, who, 180 years after, imputed the death of that saint to Pepin and Alpaide. Hadrian Valefius, cited by the same Mr le Roi, observes, that, notwithstanding the canons, people married in those days a second wife, in the life-time of her that was divorced, and that Pepin made use of that custom. He says however, that others maintain, that Pepin never divorced Plectrude, nor married Alpaide, and that Beda favours this opinion. He is in the right to add, that it is probable, that out of flattery to Pepin's descendants, who reigned in France, Historians supposed, that Alpaide was married (9).

(9) Certe hand parum simile veri est finxist hoc in Principum suorum gratiam auctores, qui dominantibus Pipini posteris scripserunt, & Alpaide quae viva Plectrude iusta & legitima Pipini coniux esse non poterat, uxorem Pipini posterorem vocavisse, ne Carolus ex pellice susceptus crederetur, cui regio generi aliqua inde nota inureretur. Hadrianus, Rerum Francicarum, Tom. III, lib. xxviii, pag. 379, apud le Roi, ibid.

We find, in the supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, Mr Godesu's arguments against those, who on this subject follow Siebert's chronicle; but those arguments do but create confusion. One thing seems to me to be certain, that it is of no use as to the true cause of St Lambert's murder, to know whether Alpaide was married in form, or whether she remained a concubine; for since the church severely condemned marriages contracted after a divorce, bishop Lambert would not have failed to call Pepin's commerce with Alpaide, a concubinage, though Pepin had married her. Thus, by supposing the marriage, their opinion, who say, that Pepin was censured, remains still probable. And because a prince's mistress has generally more interest than a lawful wife, it is no ways necessary, that Alpaide should be married to Pepin, to apprehend, how she could prevail with him to put the bishop to death, who censured them. Father Jourdan's chronological reason is, in my opinion, the best that can be urged against Siebert.

[B] So many persons have written his life, that it is disfigured thereby. This is Father Mabillon's observation, which baron le Roi furnishes me with. 'Sanctus Landebertus plures habuit vitae suae scriptores, Godescalcum Diaconum Leodiensem supparem. Stephanum Episcopum Leodiensem ineunte saeculo X. Anselmum ejusdem Ecclesiae Canonicum, & Reinemum Monachum saeculo XII. Denique Egidium Aureae Vallis Caenobitam medio saeculo XIII. Felicius certe futurus si vel unicum eumque diligenter habuisset. LAMBERT (FRANCIS) a Franciscan Monk, born at Avignon, was one of the first Monks in France, who renounced his order, to embrace Lutheranism. He arrived at Wittemberg in the month of January 1523 (a). He taught Divinity, and began by explaining there the prophet Hosea. The Commentary he made on that prophet was printed at Strasburg in the year 1525, in 8vo. He dedicated it to Frederick duke of Saxony, and inserted in his Epistle Dedicatory an account of the martyrdom of John Castellanus, who had been burnt at Metz for having followed the Reformation. He added to the commentary on the fourth chapter of Hosea a treatise De arbitrio hominis vere captivo contra impios liberi arbitrii adsertores. He had published in 1524 his commentary on the Song of Songs; and in dedicating it to Francis I, he observes that he had already sent to that prince his treatise on marriage, de sacro & fidelis Conjugio, and that he had inserted therein a letter, in which he acquaints him with his reasons of abjuring Popery, and marrying (b): he published several other commentaries on the Scripture, and divers controversial writings [A], which have been a long

De Fidelium vocatione in Ecclesiam & ad Ministeria ejus, deque vocatione Matricae per sortem, in 8vo. Exegesis in Apocalypsin, at Basil, 1539, in 8vo. This edition of his Commentary on the Revelations, is not the first; for this is what Bullinger says: Mr Francis Lambert, a man of learning and great piety, has taken great pains on the Apocalypse, having publicly read that written by several authors; Godescalcus, deacon of Liege; Stephanus, bishop of Liege, in the beginning of the XIIth Century; Anselm, canon of the same church, in the middle of the XIIth Century; Nicolaus likewise, a canon, and Renierus, a Monk, in the XIIth Century; lastly, Egidius, a Monk of the Golden Vale, in the middle of the XIIIth Century. It would have been certainly much better for St Lambert, had but one author, and be a careful one, written his life: but it has happened to him, as to many saints, that whilst authors have successively endeavoured to illustrate and set off their actions, they have unskillfully obscured them with uncertain and fabulous accounts, and spoiled them by notorious mistakes. This is the origin of so many impertinent falsehoods. The multitude of panegyrics and lives will always produce this effect: no body is contented with the wonders published by foregoing authors; they therefore invent new ones, much more in favour of the book, and it's author, than in favour of the hero, who makes the subject of the book.

I must except the legends; for they have commonly more at heart the reputation of the saint, than any thing else; but the reason is, because the greater it is, the more it will encrease the number of devotees, and pious charities. Here follows a fine passage of Ludovicus Vives, wherein he condemns the false zeal, which has stuffed the history of saints with so many fabulous stories. 'Quae de iis sunt scripta, praeter pauca quaedam, multis sunt commentis foedata, dum qui scribit affectui suo indulget, & non quae egit divus, sed quae ille egisse eum vellet, exponit: ut vitam dicter animus scribens non veritas. Fuere qui magnae pietatis loco darent mendaciola pro religione confingere: quod & periculosum est, ne veris adimatur fides propter falsa, & minim  necessarium: quoniam pro pietate nostra tam multa sunt vera, ut falsa tanquam ignavi militum inutiles oneri sint magis, quam auxilio (11). (11) Ludov. Vives, de Tradenda Disciplina, lib. v, pag. m.  go Vice aliam, lib. ii, pag. 90.

— The accounts of them, some few excepted, are full of fictions, whilst the writer gives himself a scope, and sets forth, not what the saint did, but what he would have had him done: inasmuch that the author's fancy, not truth, dictates the life. Some have thought it great piety to lie a little for the sake of religion: which is a dangerous thing (since what is false may destroy the credit of what is true,) and by no means necessary: since there are so many things true, that false accounts, like idle or useless soldiers, are rather a burthen than a help.

a long time very little known. He was very much esteemed by Luther [B]. I do not very well know when he left Wittenberg; but I believe it was in 1526, and I know that he settled at Marburg, and that he was there professor of Divinity, and that he died there the eighteenth of April, 1530 (c). He was one of the principal instruments employed by the Landgrave of Hesse to introduce the Reformation in his dominions [C].

that book in the famous university of Marburg, and afterwards composed and published seven books of exposition, in the said town, in the year 1528 (1). Gessner mentions a commentary of our Lambert on Joel, and on St Luke's Gospel (2). The abridgment of Gessner specifies, Antithesis verbi Dei & inventorum Hominum. Confessio de Symbolo fœderis nunquam rumpendi quam communionem vocant, in qua spectari potest quid Marpurgensi colloquio effectum sit (3). De Prophetia, eruditione, lingua, deque litera, & spiritu. Commentarius de Causis excitationis multorum seculorum. In Acta Apostolorum, & libros Regum. De cœlibatu regni filii perditionis. De differentia stimuli carnis & Satanae nunciis.

[B] He was greatly esteemed by Luther.] That reformer speaks of him in these terms, in a letter which he wrote to Spalatin: 'Adest Joannes ille Serranus, vero nomine Franciscus Lampertus, imaginibus quoque nobilibus, inter Minoritas viginti annos versatus, & generali verbi (forte legendum est: Generalis) officio functus, ob perfectionem exul, & pauper factus. De integritate viri nulla est dubitatio: testes sunt apud nos, qui illum & in Francia & in Babilœa audierunt; tum Babilœensis suffraganeus ille Tripolitanus, cum pellicanus, dant illi pulchrum testimonium. Et quamquam nos abundemus Lectoribus optimis, tamen, si quid poterit, non abjiciemus: mihi per omnia placet vir, & satis spectatus mihi est, quantum homo spectari potest, ut dignus sit quem in exilio paupulum feramus & juvemus. Sed tu meam nosse facultatem, ut non sit opis meæ illum alere, qui ipse alienis vivo: videretur mihi Principi persuadendum, ut jam non perdat, sed in charitate Christo sceneret viginti aut triginta florenos, in eum collocandos, donec vel à suis tribulibus, vel proprio stipendio sese sustentet de labore suo (5). — Here is that Johannes Serranus, whose true name is Francis Lambert, of a noble family, who was twenty years a Franciscan, and guardian of his orders, but banished by persecution, and stripped of every thing. The bonesty of the man is unquestionable: we have here witnesses of it, who heard him both in France and at Basil; which testimony of his good character is confirmed by Tripolitanus, suffragan of Basil, and Pellicanus. And though we abound in excellent lecturers, yet, if possible, we will not lose him: I am thoroughly satisfied with the man, and think he deserves to be assisted. But you know my abilities, that it is not in my power to maintain him, who myself live upon alms. I think the prince should be persuaded to bestow twenty or thirty florins on him (which would not be money thrown away, but lent to the Lord,) till he be supported by his relations, or maintain himself by his own industry.' We learn from this passage, that our Lambert took the false name of Johannes Serranus, that he was of a noble family, that he had been a Franciscan twenty years, that he had been in office in his order, that he had staid some time at Basil, and brought from thence a good testimonial of his probity. Luther (6) composed a preface to a book, which this Ex-Monk of Avignon published, De Minoritarum Regula. It appears by another letter of Luther, that this profelyte, preparing to go to Zurich, to be nearer France, an attempt was made to procure him from the elector, the expences of his journey (7). If this letter of Luther was written to Spalatin in the month of August (8), 1523, we must believe, that Lambert changed his design, because they gave him a post in the university, and thus what Mr de Seckendorf adds, that he had nevertheless composed at Wittenberg, and dedicated to the elector, the exposition of some of the prophets, and of the Song of Songs, and St Luke's Gospel (9), would not be referred to its true time, and there would be in it a tamen a little misplaced. But it is probable, Luther wrote this in the month of August, 1526, whence we must conclude, that the tamen is very right, and that the journey to Zurich was put a stop to, because Lambert was called into the country of Hesse, as I am going to say.

[C] He was one of the principal instruments employed by the landgrave to introduce the reformation in his dominions.] He had been recommended to this prince as a man remarkable for his piety, wit, and learning, and able to confound and silence the Popish doctors. For this reason he deputed him to the synodical assembly, held at Hamburg, the twenty first of October, 1526. There Lambert exposed to public disputation, an hundred and fifty Lutheran propositions, and maintained them vigorously against the attacks of the guardian of the Franciscans of Marburg. The landgrave suffered every body to enter the lists, and caused the respondent's theses to be explained in German by his chancellor, when any one desired it. After the dispute, he ordered the Monks and Nuns to quit their convent; he appropriated their revenues to the support of the university of Marburg, and of the hospitals; he settled Lutheran ministers in the churches, and broke down the images. Lambert was chosen professor of Divinity in the university founded at Marburg, in 1527 (10).

LAMECH, a descendant in a right line from Cain, was of the seventh generation, reckoning from Adam. The Holy Scripture (a) observes, that he had two wives, one whereof was called Adah, and the other Zillah, and it is believed, that this observation has a mystery in it, since it serves to shew us the origin of Polygamy. It did not begin in the posterity of Seth, who feared God, but in the corrupt and depraved posterity of Cain, and by Lamech [A], who told his two wives, that he had killed a man. Such an origin, say they, must needs be scandalous. However it be, the marriage of this first transgressor of the law of Monogamy, established in the terrestrial paradise, did not bear the marks of reprobation, if we may judge of it by temporal blessings; for children proceeded from it, who had the skill of inventing in that respect. Lamech was the first, who made that bold step, with an heroic courage, without minding the difficulties that he was sensible of. He commented, not in words, but in actions, upon the text of the universal law, encrease and multiply; a law, which is a true commandment, and not a meer benediction (4). By this means he broke the ice, and gave a good example to those that came after him. Observe here how this poor author was bigotted in favour of Polygamy; it was his darling notion; he thought that the Scripture mentions the double marriage of Lamech as an excellent exploit; whereas divines maintain with reason, that it was with a design to brand Polygamy in it's birth.

[A] And by Lamech.] The author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix was a very odd man; he spent his estate and his life in maintaining the lawfulness of Polygamy, and yet one wife would have been too much for him (1). He mightily commends Lamech's resolution of marrying two wives (2), as an heroic action, and highly praises him, as being the first, who attentively examined that command of God, encrease and multiply, and who, having well considered it, made it his duty to obey it, according to the full extent of his strength, by marrying two wives (3). No body durst venture upon it before him; the remembrance of Eve's transgression, and the consideration of Adam's banishment, had made people timorous

venting many good things [B]. Now the inventors of arts were so much esteemed, that most of them have been placed in the number of the gods. It was therefore a great glory, and consequently a remarkable temporal blessing at that time, to have the wit that was necessary for invention; but it is no sign, that God approved of Lamech's Polygamy. The scripture mentions only four of this man's children (b); but, according to Josephus (c), he had seventy seven by his two wives. What he told his wives is a riddle to me [C]; I ingenuously confess, it is above my understanding. I have slain a man, said he (d), to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt; if Cain shall be avenged seven fold, truly Lamech seventy and seven fold. Many pretend, that he meant he had killed Cain [D], and Tubal-Cain; for there is a common tradition, that Lamech, who had been a great lover of hunting, continued the sport, even when by reason of his great age, he was almost blind (e). He took with him his son Tubal-Cain, who not only served him as a guide (f), but also directed him, where and when he ought to shoot at the beast. One day, as Cain was laid among the thickets, Lamech's guide seeing something move in that place, gave him notice of it; whereupon Lamech shot an arrow, and slew Cain. He was extremely concerned at it, and beat his guide so much, as to leave him dead upon the place. This, say they, is the way to make sense of his words, which run thus, according to the vulgar translation, Occidi virum in vulnus meum, & adolescentulum in livorem meum; wherein he distinguishes his way of killing the man (it was by a wound) from his way of killing the young lad, which was by bruises, that made his body black and blue. There are a thousand absurdities

[C] What he said to his wives is a riddle to me. It is no easy thing to know how the words of Lamech in the original ought to be translated. The Geneva version makes use of the future tense, I will slay, and represents Lamech as a man, who was to receive a wound before he should kill: but the Vulgar renders it, I have slain; and as for the wound, one cannot tell to whom it relates; for this phrase, Occidi virum in vulnus meum, is a barbarism, which means nothing in Latin, and may signify whatever we please, as soon as we depart from the rules of Grammar. Some interpreters, well skilled in the Hebrew language (7), translate it neither by the preter-tense, nor by the future, but reduce it all to a conditional proposition. I would kill a man with a wound, and even a young man with a cudgel, or with my fist, if they would attack me. Now what way is there of coming at the true construction of a period, which is as much in the future as in the preter-tense, and as much in the optative as in the indicative mood. But though we could get clear of the matter in the grammatical sense, we should not be far advanced; it would still remain to be considered, what Lamech meant, speaking to his two wives; which is no little difficulty. Nothing seems more remote from probability than the thought of those, who take all this to be arodomontade of Lamech (8): others take it to be a menace that he would kill his wives, if they continued to vex him by their bawling and disputes (9). But others, on the contrary, take it to be an interrogation, designed to remove their fears: they were afraid that some body would kill him: he bids them have a good heart, with these words, Have I slain a man, &c.

[D] Many pretend, that he meant he had killed Cain. A commentator (10), otherwise a very judicious and learned man, is mistaken here; for he thinks it is the most probable interpretation of Lamech's words. He brings two proofs for it. First, says he, Cain's posterity extended itself to the deluge, and yet Moses confines it to Lamech and his sons; of which doubtless there is no other reason than this, that Cain's life ended in the generation of Lamech, who killed him. Second, says he, the only reason why Moses has related the murder, committed by Lamech, is, to point out the miserable death of Cain. I could confute these proofs several ways. but I shall only say, that Pererius supposes a thing, which has no probability, viz. that it was Moses's intention to inform the world, that Lamech killed Cain. If he had had such an intention, would he have left such impenetrable darkness in the fourth chapter of Genesis? Had the death of Cain any thing mysterious in it, which ought to have been involved in such enigmatical expressions? In truth, if it could be proved, that Moses had a like intention, we ought to apply to him this verse of the gospel, never man spake like this man (11), and cry out, tacui, Domine, quia fecisti, I was silent, O Lord, because it was thou that didst it. That would be unpardonable in an author not inspired. For the rest, I pretend not to oppose, in general, the thought of those, who take for marks of inspiration, in the relations of Moses, certain singularities, which are of such a nature, that it is not probable an author would ever have made use of them, if he had directed his own work (12).

[E] There are a thousand absurdities in this story, and the circumstances that attend it. I. It is an ill-grounded supposition, to say, that Lamech was almost blind (13) with old age, whilst Cain, his grandfather's grandfather, was still alive. II. It is absurd to make him go a hunting at an age so decrepit, that he could not see his game, and stood in need of a guide to tell him when he was to shoot an arrow. III. It is absurd to suppose, that the reason, which induced him to talk in this manner to his wives, was their ill treatment of him at that great age; either because they could not resist his excessive lasciviousness, or because of the ill manners of his children (14). What probability is there, that, at so great an age, he could give occasion to his two wives to complain of his too frequent caresses? IV. It is absurd to say, that, when Lamech had been guilty of this double murder, his wives refused to lie with him, as believing that the race of Cain was to come to an end, according to the oracle, after the seventh generation (15): this, I say, is absurd; for God was so far from threatening Cain to destroy his descendants after the seventh generation, that he assured him, that whoever should kill him, should be punished sevenfold. It is still more absurd to say (16), that Lamech led his two wives to Adam, and that he desired him to catechise them, upon their refusal to lie with him, and that Adam, beginning to reprimand them, was interrupted in such a manner, as put him to confusion. Does it become you, said they to him, to teach us our duty? Let your censures fall first upon your self, since for so many years you have lived apart from your wife's bed. I omit the little confidence there is between the age they make Lamech to be of, and his eagerness to make his two wives hearken to reason, with regard to matrimonial enjoyment. I do not say, that the pretended recrimination would have been better imagined, if Adam had censured Lamech at their request, and upon the complaints of his two wives; but I say, that Adam and Eve's separation from bed, after Abel's death, having lasted, according to the idle fancies of the Rabbins, but 130 years, it is absurd to suppose, that Adam was reproached for it, as a thing that continued still, when Cain was killed. Isaac Vossius has, upon this subject, confounded Lamech, who had two wives at one time, with absurdities in this story, and in the circumstances that attend it [E]. Suidas will have Lamech to have killed two brothers of Enoch, and that he married their wives (g).

You will find a collection of many passages upon this in a thesis (b), that was maintained at Wittemberg in the year 1673, sub præsidio Jo. Wilhelmi Hilligeri.

with Lamech the father of Noah. 'Judæorum est fabella, says be (17), Lamechum de uxoribus conquestum esse apud Adamum, illum his iussisse ut ad maritum reverterentur ac sui facerent copiam. Itas respondisse Adamo ut ipse prius suæ satisfaceret conjugii, à qua jam per centum & triginta annos propter scelus Caini esset separatus. Verum quis adeo sit hebes ut non videat narratiunculam hanc esse ineptissimam? Ex ea sequeretur Lamechum qui à Setho septimus fuit diu fuisse antequam Sethus nasceretur. — The Jews tell a story, that Lamech complained of his wives to Adam, who commanded them to return to their husband, and obey him. That they replied to Adam, that he should first make satisfaction to his own wife, from whom he had been separated an hundred and thirty years, on account of Cain's wickedness. But who is so stupid, as not to see the folly of this tale? It would follow from thence, that Lamech, who was the seventh from Seth, lived long before Seth was born.' It is absurd to suppose, that Tubal-Cain being yet a young lad, was killed by his own father; how could he have been the inventor of divers instruments of brass, as the Scripture says he was? For the rest, Josephus says nothing of this pretended murder of Lamech; so that Tostatus, who cites him for this old tradition (18), has erred through want of memory.

LAMECH, the son of Methuselah, and father of Noah, was the ninth man from Adam inclusively (a). He lived 777 years. Isaac Vossius (b) complains, that Sigismund Gelenius has foisted into the version of Josephus a fact that is not in the Greek text of that Jewish historian, viz. that Adam was still living in Lamech's time. This critic, in censuring this fault, has committed another; he has confounded Lamech, the father of Noah, with Lamech sprung from Cain, as I have shewn in the last remark of the foregoing article.

LAMIA, a Roman family. It was a branch of the house of the Ælii [A], into which probably it entered only by adoption; for it is said to be descended from LAMUS (a) the son of Neptune, and king of the Læstrygones, who lived in a town, which was afterwards called Formiæ. This is the opinion of Horace [B]. So ancient a Genealogy as this, with which the Poet flatters his friend ÆLIUS LAMIA, is doubtless the reason why Juvenal, being willing to denote a lady of the first quality, made use of these words, quædam de numero LAMIARUM (b). It is very probable, that he, to whom Horace inscribes the seventeenth ode of the third book, and whom he mentions, in several other places, with marks of esteem, was the father of LUCIUS ÆMILIUS LAMIA (c), who died towards the end of the reign of Tiberius, in the 786th year of Rome, after he had been governor of Syria [C]; from whence he was recalled to be governor of Rome. He was honoured with the funeral rites of a censor (d). From him perhaps descended ÆLIUS LAMIA, the husband of Domitia Longina, whom Domitian took from him. He put him to death some time after [D]. There was also one LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA, who for having too zealously embraced Cicero's party against Piso, was banished. Afterwards he was made Ædile, and then Prætor, after the death of Cæsar, in the year of Rome 711. Some think it was he, who, being thought

(d) See the remark [C], citat. (23).

[A] It was a branch of the house of the Ælii. The Antonini, emperors of Rome, descended from that house; it contained seven or eight branches, that were all Plebeian; viz. the Cati, the Tiberones, the Galli, the Stilonæ, the Præconini, the Segani, and the Lamie (1). No one says, that the Ælii descended from Lamus king of the Læstrygones; but this was said of the Lamie; and therefore the latter must have entered by adoption into the family of the others.

Æli vetusto nobilis ab Lamo,
Quando & priores hinc Lamias ferunt
Denominatos, & nepotum Per memores genus omne fastos:
Autore ab illo ducis originem

Whence first arose the Lamian name:
From him your high descent you prize,
Who bade the walls of Formiæ rise;

And rul'd with wide-extended sway.

The antient Romans were as ridiculous in point of Genealogy, as people are at present. How many families did they not lay descended from a companion of Hercules, or some other person of the fabulous ages? Silius Italicus believed, that Lamus had reigned in Cajeta (3). See Bochart's Geographia Sacra (4).

[C] LUCIUS ÆLIUS LAMIA. governor of Syria.] He had only the title of it, and did not keep it long; the injustice done him upon that occasion proved glorious to him. 'Extremo anni mors Ælii Lamie funere censorio celebrata, qui ad ministrandæ Surie imagine tandem exsolutus urbi præfuerat. Genus illi decorum, vivida senectus; & non permilla provincia dignationem addiderat (5). — At the end of the year, the death of Ælius Lamia was honoured with such funeral rites, as belonged to the dignity of censor; who, having laid down his imaginary government of Syria, was made Præfect of the city. He was of an honourable family; enjoyed a vigorous old age; and the not permitting him to enjoy the province turned to his honour.' He had commanded in Africa (6).

[D] ÆLIUS LAMIA. Domitian put him to death some time after.] I speak of it in the article of DOMITIA LONGINA, where I cite the necessary authorities. Juvenal alludes to the death of this Lamia in the fourth satire.

Sed perit postquam Cerdonibus esse timendus Cœperat, hoc nocuit Lamiarum cæde madenti (7).

Tho' wet with slaughter of the Lamian name,

LAMIA, the daughter of Neptune. The Greeks said, that the Africans named her Sibylla; that she was the first woman that prophesied; and that Jupiter had a daughter by her, named Herophyle, who was one of the Sibyls (a). Others say, that Lamia was a handsome African woman [A], by whom Jupiter had some children, and that Juno destroyed them all out of jealousy; which threw the mother into such a furious grief, that she not only became ugly, but also so cruel, as to steal away children, and killed them (b). Hence doubtless came the popular tradition, which the Poets adopted upon the stage [B]. Lamia, or the LAMIAE, were spoken of under another notion; for it was said, that they could lay aside their eyes, and resume them when they thought fit. They took them out in their own houses, and put them in again, when they went abroad. It is the emblem of curiosity and self-love [C]. Philostratus represents them as very lascivious [D]. I know not whether the fish LAMIA [E] had its name from what the fables said of the Lamia, or whether the latter owed their name to that fish. Moreri's faults are not considerable [F].

Bochart (5) thinks, that the name Lamia is derived from the Punic word labam, or labama, which signifies still, among the Arabians, to devour.

[B] The popular tradition, which the Poets adopted upon the stage. It is upon this that Horace gives them good advice.

Philostratus says, that the Lamia were fond of human flesh (7). Among the old womens stories, in some countries, there are many, in which fairies are mentioned, as great eaters of children.

[C] It is the emblem of curiosity and self-love. Consult Plutarch (8), who says, that like Lamia, who was blind at home, and when she went out, took her eyes out of a box, in which she kept them, every man is very intent upon the faults of his neighbour, but makes no use of his eyes to discover his own vices.

(8) Plut. de

[D] Philostratus represents them as very lascivious. He says (9), that, out of a principle of lewdness, they enticed the men, whom they desired to devour, in a proper time and place; and that they especially delighted to eat handsome boys, when they were grown fat and plump. It was not easy methinks, to grow fat in the service of those lascivious creatures. Philostratus should have thought of this difficulty. Perhaps one might apply to the present subject, the explication, which some have given of the fable of Diomedes king of Thrace, who fed his mares with the flesh of his guests. The meaning of which is, according to some, that he forced them to satisfy the lust of his daughters, till they had nothing left but skin and bones. 'Diomedes Thraciae Rex cum aliquot haberet filias salacissimas, coegit hospites ut earum libidinem satarent; dictus ob id equas humanis carnibus pascere; equa enim & mulier solae animalium appetunt marem etiam prægnantes, unde equitendi vocabulum, ut ait 'Aristoteles', trahitur maledicto in feminas procares: comedunt verò carnes humanas, cum viros exsugunt, & coitu emaciatos ad tabem perducunt; ut recte Solomon † à mulierum consuetudine revocet adolescentescens, ne frustra gemere incipiant, posteaquam carnes suas consumperint (10). — Diomedes king of Thrace, having some very leud daughters, obliged his guests to satisfy their lust; whence he was said to feed his mares with human flesh; for a mare, and a woman, are the only animals, who desire the male, when pregnant; whence, according to Aristotle, leud women are said, by way of reproach, equine, to play the mare; and they devour human flesh, when they drain men, and waste them away through copulation; so that Solomon rightly dissuades young men from the company of women, lest they begin to lament in vain, after they have consumed their flesh.'

[E] The fish LAMIA. It is a fish of a prodigious bulk and voracity. Some times the whole body of a man has been found in its belly. See Mr Ray in his History of Fishes, and the following remark, wherein I censure Calepin.

[F] Moreri's faults are not considerable. I. Phavorinus, who is a modern author (11) should not have been cited. II. Much less ought he to be cited, before Suidas. III. Instead of saying, that the ancients gave the Lamia the name of Lares, he should have said Larvæ. IV. He ought not to have cited Rhodiginus, but Philostratus, from whom he took all that he has said of the Lamia (12). V. He should however have cited the twenty ninth, and not the forty ninth book; for his Antiquæ Lectiones contain only thirty books. VI. He should not have cited Pliny, since he has said nothing of the fish he calls Lamia (13); and yet Moreri wanted an author, who had considered the Lamia as extraordinary fishes. This puts me in mind of a false citation, that I have observed in Calepin; Pliny is cited there, Lib. 29. Cap. 24. immediately after these words: 'Lamia item piscis est (unde & Lamiarum strigum nomen, quod

we must take the advice, says he (31), of a courtesan, who was one of the most famous in former times, and very well skilled in her profession, viz. Lamia who said, &c. One Francis Voilleret, Sieur de Florizel, counsellor, notary, and secretary to the king, house and crown of France, published (32), as true matter of fact, all the follies he had read, in that Spanish author, concerning the three courtezans Flora, Lais, and Lamia. So true it is, that one bad author is enough to spoil many others.

[M] Moreri is very short upon this head, I have not many faults to charge him with. I. This expression, The Thebans consecrated to her the temple of Venus Lamia, is fallacious: it induces one to believe, that the Thebans had a temple of Venus Lamia, which they consecrated to Demetrius's mistress. Moreri should therefore have said, to avoid ambiguity, that the Thebans built a temple in honour of this mistress, and called it the temple of Venus Lamia. II. It is not true, that Plutarch makes mention of this; he should have cited Athenæus. Moreri had this false quotation from Charles Stephens (33).

[N] I am surprised at a doubt of Mr Menage. He questions whether the courtesan Lamia is the same Athenian lady, that was kept by Demetrius Phalereus. An eadem est ac illa nobilis femina quam amabat Pha-leræus (34)? in calling her a noble woman, he builds upon these words of Diogenes Laërtius: Ἀλλὰ αὖτ' καὶ εὐσεβὲς συνόχευε Λαμίαν τῇ ἐρωμένῃ. Verum urbana ac nobili amica Lamia urebatur quam amabat. If these words be pointed thus, one may very well deny, that Lamia, the mistress of Demetrius Poliorcetes, was loved by Demetrius Phalereus; for, the mistress of Demetrius Poliorcetes was only a player on the flute, and consequently was not of a noble family. Menage was in the right to censure Dalechamp, who has translated these words of Athenæus, Δημοκρίτης δὲ Πολιορκητῆς ἡ δαίμωνιος ἡγε Λαμίας τῆς εὐλαϊστῆς; thus, Demetrius Phalereus Lamiam tibicinem amavit perditiſſime; but he should likewise have censured Aldobrandin, who says, that the Thebans, out of complaisance to Demetrius Phalereus, built a temple to Venus Lamia, in order to honour the memory of his mistress Lamia (35). Aldobrandin cites Cælius Rhodiginus, l. 29. c. 5. Here are three things to be censured. I. It was not to please Demetrius Phalereus, but Demetrius Poliorcetes, that the Thebans built this temple. II. Aldobrandin should have quoted Athenæus, and not Cælius Rhodiginus. III. He should have said, that the Athenians had the same complaisance as the Thebans.

LAMPONIANO (JOHN ANDREW) descended from an illustrious family of Milan (a), was one of three domestics of Galeazzo Sforza, duke of Milan, who conspired against that prince, and killed him in St Stephen's church, the twenty sixth of December 1476. It was Lamponio that gave him the two first wounds. He pretended to remove the crowd, and to have letters to present to the duke. He was enraged against him on account of a law-suit [A], in which he could not prevail with this prince to interpose his good offices against his adversary; he hoped to find his account in a revolution of the state; and he wanted an after-game, for he had squandered away the greatest part of his patrimony, and found himself as vain, and as much addicted to luxury as before. His two accomplices were Charles Visconti, and Jerom Olgiate. The latter was engaged in this black conspiracy by the glory, which a School-master, who hated the duke, represented to him in the murder of a tyrant [B]. As

(a) Egnatius, Exempl. lib. iii, cap. ii, sub fin. fol. m. 95, ver. o.

[A] He was enraged against the duke of Milan on account of a law suit. The thing was thus, according to Paul Jovius: 'Ad audendum immane usque adeo & periculosum facinus vehementer incitabat illata sibi injuria à Castellione Comensium antistite, à quo sacri latifundii possessione contra jus interrupta locatione, se perinique spoliatum querebatur. Totum autem ejus injuriæ odiumque venenum vertebat in principem, qui à se suppliciter deprecante eam contumeliam, sæpe rogatus adversarium in extrahendum à lite præpotentem, neque advertere, neque mollire voluisset (1). — He was prompted to this great and dangerous attempt by the injurious treatment of the bishop of Como, who, as he pretended, had unjustly robbed him of large possessions. He turned his whole resentment of this injury against the prince, whom he had in vain petitioned against his too powerful adversary.' This puts me in mind of Philip King of Macedon, who was killed by a man (2) who could not obtain from him the revenge he desired for a bloody affront (3). He thought no longer of revenging himself on the author of that affront, but on the prince, who did not do him justice (4).

tyrant, and by that means restoring the liberty of his country. He extolled to the skies the merit of Brutus and Cassius. In a word, it was he, who, by his vehement exhortations, inspired him with the design of executing that horrid attempt (6). Olgiateum pend imberbem, levissimumque adolescentem inani spe parandæ gloriæ inflaverat Cola Montanus literarii ludi magister; si occiso tyranno patriam in libertatem afferret; sæpe Cassios & Brutos in schola magnis extollens laudibus, qui gloria ducti pulcherrimi facti consilium olim suscepissent (7). So true it is, that a bad lesson is able to do great mischief, and that princes themselves ought to take care not to be hated by considerable men. There are few such. Cola, being taken some time after, fell into the hands of Laurence de Medicis, who caused him to be hanged (8). The courage he inspired into Olgiate, in hopes of an eternal fame, did not fail him at the place of execution. Olgiate and his comrade made their escape, by reason of the confusion, which the assassination of the duke caused in the church: but because no body durst harbour them they were taken two days after. Their punishment was suited to their crime; and Olgiate expressed a great constancy: 'Olgarius ipse mirum visu audituque vesana constantia oblitum animum in conspectu carnificis gerens, seseque in ipsa morte confirmans hæc contumaci ore protulit verba; collige te, Hieronyme, stabit vetus memoria facti; mors quidem erit acerba, sed tormentum breve, atque ejus fama perpetua (9). — Olgiate, maintaining a most wonderful constancy in the sight of the executioner, and at the instant of death, spoke these obstinate words; Courage, Jerom! the fame of thy action will live for ever; death is indeed bitter; but the torment is but short, whereas the credit of it will be immortal.'

Great Milan's duke, unconquer'd in the field,
To private violence at last must yield.
He fell; attending servants naught avail:
To ward the blow e'en wealth and kingdoms fail.
Learn hence, there is no trust in human things,
Nor any safety for tyrannic kings.

[C] . . . as for Charles Visconti, he was moved to it by two powerful reasons.] In the first place he was provoked to see that the Sforzas had usurped the dominion, to the prejudice of his family. Secondly, he had a sister, whom Galeazzo had debauched, and afterwards imparted to a handsome young man, who was his catamite. Germanæ sororis probro quam Galeosus adamaret, atque subigeret, permovebatur: tanto indignantius quod eam decore adolescenti, qui ætatis florem principi fruendum dedisset, concitasse & communis suspicaretur (11). This prince was reckoned so leud, that not only his amours were talked of, but also his pimping (12). We have here an instance of female compliance. Francis Visconti's sister, not content to gratify the duke with the use of her body, satisfied also the lewdness of his catamites, when he pleased. Probably she had no great difficulty in giving this mark of complaisance to the duke, since it was in favour of a handsome young man.

[D] His corps, biting the ground.] I may use this phrase in the literal sense, since Paul Jovius expresses himself thus. 'Ipsius Lamponiani cadaver solum lingua & dentibus commorens jacebat (13). — The body of Lamponiano lay biting the ground with its tongue and teeth.'

[E] Peter Crinitus made some verses in praise of this assassin.] They are in the second book of his poems (14), and are intitled, De virtute Joannis Andree Lamponiani Tyrannicidæ. The six first run thus:

LANCELOT (CLAUDIUS), a Benedictin Monk, was a native of Paris (a). (b) Having studied very well in his youth, he was intrusted with the education of a young gentleman, and afterwards he retired to Port Royal des Champs, where he taught classical learning with great success. Some years after, he turned monk in the abbey of St Cyran, where he was in great intimacy with the late abbot Barcos; at whose death that society being dissolved, and the monks dispersed, Dom Claudius Lancelot was confined to the Lower-Bretagne, where he died two or three years ago (c). He composed many good books [A], but did not put his name to them, and they were ascribed in general to the gentlemen of Port-Royal.

[A] He composed many good books.] The New Methods for learning the Latin and Greek tongues: the Garden of Greek Roots: an Italian grammar: a Spanish grammar: a French translation of Phædrus's Fables;

And, whilst she bid the chosen victim dye,
Sacred to Mars, th' avenging deity,

We must not wonder, that Peter Crinitus praised this assassin: for we find an hymn (15) in praise of Balthazar Gerard (16), among the sacred poems of Leovinus Torrentius, bishop of Antwerp. Among other eulogies, this is to be found in it.

[F] The ladies of his court gloried in their gallantries.] The description, which Paul Jovius gives of the corruption of the women of that country, is horrible. They looked upon chastity as an obstacle to politeness; they thought, that the love of that virtue was not good breeding, and looked like the awkward air of a country-woman. In short, they did not believe that lying with a prince was an action contrary to virtue; they pretended, that the way to raise their husbands above others, was to make them wear golden horns. Galeazzo, who was a handsome vigorous young man, and of a leud temper, found his account in it. Paul Jovius's words are much better than mine, therefore I insert them here. His artibus quum boni, splendidissimique principis nomen tueretur, premebant ejus famam intemperantes vagaque libidines. Nam ea tum erat ex multo ocio luxuriantis seculi conditio, in ipsis præcipue nobilioribus matronis, ut totum pudicitie decus ab humanitate aulæ alienum profusus & subagreste putaretur, ideoque princeps ad licentiam libidinis proclinalus, & juvenæ vigore venustateque oris supra omnes spectatu dignissimus, procacibus scæminarum oculis & desideritiis cupidissimè deserviret. Erat enim tum vulgatum inter scæminas, nullam ex principis concubitu fieri impudicam, earumque maritos qui ineptis birici videri possent, ita excellere aureis cornibus, ut dignitate cunctos anteirent (17). This is, doubtless, the utmost degree of corruption; for if any thing prevents chastity from being banished out of the world, it is the annexing, with respect to women, an idea of disgrace to the contrary vice (18). It is the main barrier, to stop a little the progress of lewdness, and hinder it from overflowing all mankind like the waters of the deluge, which spared but few persons.

[A] It is one of the ten towns . . . which pretend to hold immediately of the empire. Mr Heils will explain this to us.

Haguenau, says he (1), is the first of the towns of Alsace dependant on the prefecture, the tribunal of which is established in the same town.

After the treaty of Munster, the king of France, in imitation of the landgraves of Alsace, his predecessors, retained this provincial council, in which his great bailiff, or lieutenant, presided. But, as it has been entirely ruined in the last war, the most Christian king has removed this council to Brisac. This town, as well as the other nine, at that time, acknowledged the king for protector, on the same terms as they acknowledge the emperor, and the princes of Austria, in that quality, without derogating from that immediateness, in virtue of which these ten towns pretend to continue free states of the empire. But, as they have been convinced of the right of sovereignty, with which the king of France has been invested, they have renounced this immediateness, and have entirely submitted to his most Christian majesty. The other nine towns are Colmar, Schlestat, Weisemburg, Landau, Oberkheim, Kaiserberg, Munster in the valley of St Gregory, Rosheim, and Turckheim. They had not yet submitted to this yoke in the year 1673. They were very far from it: you need only read these words of the duke de Navailles. 'Intending to go to Brisac, I passed through Colmar. I there found, that the inhabitants, as being near so considerable a place as Brisac, affected an extraordinary independence. Their town was filled with all sorts of warlike ammunitions and provisions; they appeared little disposed to receive, and submit to, the king's orders. They took no care, with regard to me, to shew a proper respect to those, with whom the king entrusted his authority. There were still in that country, Schelestat, Haguenau, and four other little Imperial towns; they were very much united, always kept deputies at the diet, and were ever taking liberties contrary to the obedience, they owed to the king. And when I arrived at Brisac, these seven towns, which pretended to be Imperial, sent deputies to me. Those of Colmar were at the head, and spoke for the rest. They harangued me in the same manner they had done my predecessors. They seemed to make use of expressions, which did not sufficiently shew the submission they owe to the king, treating him only as their protector: I answered them, that he had, with regard to them, a stronger title; that he was their guardian, and that it belonged to him to regulate their conduct. I spoke to them with so much force, that the intendant, who was present, said to me before them: Sir, if your predecessors had made them know their duty as you do, the king would have more authority in this province, and these gentlemen would not be at so great an expence in keeping deputies at the diet. These deputies were thunder-struck, and they fell upon their knees before me. I thought I ought to mortify them a little, I sent the next day five hundred horse to take the cattle at the gates of their towns. This opened their eyes, and shewed them their error in pretending to be independent of France. They came a second time to speak to me;

but I would not hear them, and I sent them word, that I must be going to Philipsburg (2). A little after, he tells the king, that he had a fair opportunity to put Colmar, and the other towns, which call themselves Imperial, on the proper footing (3). The king immediately profited by this advice; for, going into Alsace, he seized on the towns of Colmar and Schlestat (4). The other towns surrendered upon a bare summons, on pretext, that the king had a right to those places as great bailiff of Haguenau, and that he seized year 1673, pag. 479.

them, to prevent the Imperialists from taking advantage of two such convenient posts, as those two towns were (5).

I remember there was great reasoning about the reduction of these places, and that there were some, who said, it was folly to pretend they could still keep their liberty. It was not impossible, they said, that they might be at once under the form of a commonwealth, and under the guardianship of the landgrave of Alsace, as long as this landgrave was a German; but, when he was king of France, there was a kind of necessity that they must, sooner or latter, fall under his full authority. This followed from the order of political affairs, and the natural course of human things.

A town could not be free, and at the same time acknowledge for its protector, or guardian, a king, who might be at war with the emperor, or the empire. Can clients declare against their patrons? If they cannot lawfully, the prefecture of Haguenau must necessarily side with France in those wars; and if it cannot justly do this, as being a part of the Germanic body, it must either declare against France, or desire a neutrality. In the first case, the king of France had just as much right to subjugate Colmar and the other Imperial towns of Alsace, as the four foret-towns. In the second case, it must be considered whether the towns of the prefecture of Haguenau were really desirous to observe a neutrality, or only pretended to desire it, with the sole view of putting themselves into the hands of the emperor's troops. If this be the sole motive of their desiring a neutrality, they must expect to be treated as a concealed enemy, who, in point of prudence, must not be allowed time to discover their ill designs. But, supposing that they sincerely desire to be neuter, it remained to be examined, whether they could maintain themselves against the German troops, who would endeavour to oblige them to receive a garrison. It is plain, they were not strong enough to support themselves in a neutrality; and thus order will have it, that the king of France should not suffer the Germans to have places of arms there, especially considering that the Spaniards were at that time masters of Franche Comté. The protector or guardian must support his title, that his pupil may not declare against him. If this title obliged him to hinder any one from using the towns of Alsace ill, it authorized him to hinder any one from arming them to his prejudice; for it would be strange indeed, if a monarch were obliged to protect a state, which thought it self obliged to declare war against him. The mutual obligations both lie under contradicts this; and, consequently, those who should yield to France the protection of the Imperial towns of Alsace, would necessarily open a door to a full authority over them. The incompatibility of titles began from

They were yielded to France by the peace of Munster to belong to it in the same manner as they had belonged to the house of Austria; but by degrees all restriction has ceased (c). Some have pretended, that the citizens of Landau have not been cavaliers, and that they maintained their town at a time when the others were pillaged (d). This seems to me to imply, that, during the long war, which ended by the peace of Munster, and in other such like times, they were not unreasonably obstinate in resisting the strongest. They gave an instance of this compliance in the year 1634, as may be seen in Puysegur's Memoirs (e). Another writer (f) observes, that they have not been subject to intestine dissensions, and that they have always forbore provoking, by words or actions the neighbouring princes, and that, in 1552, the troops of Henry II, king of France, and those of Albert of Brandenburg, did them a great deal of mischief. The Sieur de Val affirms, that the wine of Landau is the best Rhenish wine that can be drunk (g). This town was but moderately strong at the time of the peace of Ryswic, in 1697, but, soon after, it was fortified with all imaginable care. The famous Mr de Vauban employed his whole skill in it. The Imperialists, under prince Lewis of Baden, blocked it up in the month of April 1702, and opened the trenches the seventeenth of June following. The place was surrendered by capitulation the tenth of September. The king of the Romans arrived in the camp the twenty seventh of July [B]. What the news-writers published concerning this siege will give me occasion to make some remarks [C], yet without expecting they will prove useful to those gentlemen that time to be propagated; and, if the emperor had established places of arms at Colmar and Schefflad, in order to make irruptions as far as Dijon, and Lyons, no one would have commended France for suffering these towns to enjoy all their privileges, but would rather have laughed at her imprudence and simplicity.

People reasoned almost after the same manner, when she seized on Strasburg; a town, which neither would, nor could, always preserve its neutrality, and which surrendered its bridge to the German armies toties quoties. It was a thorn in the foot, too big to be left there. One of two things must be, either that Strasburg sincerely desire a state of neutrality, and religiously observe it, or that it be capable of making a resistance, when any one would oblige it to declare for one side. Now nothing of this was true, said these reasoners. I believe they might be easily refuted by those who teach the Civil-law in the universities.

[B] The king of the Romans arrived in the camp the twenty seventh of July. The news-writers of his party gave out, that the count de Melac, governor of Landau, sent a trumpet to him, the same day, to compliment him, and to desire him to let him know where he intended to fix his quarters, that they might not fire upon them; but that the intrepid monarch, having thanked him for his civility, sent him word at the same time, that he might fire where he pleased; that his quarters were every where (6). An officer of the garrison of Landau relates this piece of news as follows (7).

(6) Mercure Hist. August, 1702, pag. 159.

(7) Journal of the Siege of Landau, pag. 112, 113, Paris Edit. 1702.

(8) It belonged to an officer, who had been taken prisoner in a folly of the siege.

(9) Lewis XIV.

The count de Melac sent a trumpet, the thirty first of July, at eight of the clock in the morning, to the enemy's camp . . . to demand of the prince of Baden, where were the king's quarters: this prince informed the king of the Romans of it, who answered, 'that his quarters were at Inphling; that he thanked him for the sword he had sent him (8); that he might fire every where, serving his king as he had hitherto done.' It is certain, that, in this, the count de Melac acted as has been practised for a long time towards kings, who assist at a siege. The besieged governor pays them this compliment. As to the answer of the king of the Romans, we must observe two things; the one, that the accounts of the two parties are not extremely different at the bottom; the other, that, being always gallant, it is especially so, the first time it is used; for, when a king is informed, that another has made use of it, he thinks himself bound in honour to imitate, and, if possible, go beyond him. It is no longer a matter of choice, but a kind of necessity. I have been told, that the late William III, king of England, made use of this answer, when the governor of a place paid him this compliment. I know not whether it is true; but I know very well, that he never besieged any place, the governor of which acknowledged him as king. Be it how it will, he was not the first author of this answer; for, to say nothing of those, who may have made use of it before the year 1667, there is a printed proof, that it was used that year at the siege of Lille in Flanders. Read what follows: As soon as the count de Broûay, governor of the place, was informed, that his majesty (9) was arrived in the camp, judging rightly that there was no farther room for feint, he made the citizens take an oath of fidelity, more than ten thousand of whom protested they would perish sooner than surrender. He then sent a compliment to his majesty, offering him his choice of the finest houses within one league round Lille, and even whatever he wanted for his household from out of the city, during the siege; and desired to know, where he would fix his quarters, that he might give orders not to fire that way; but he added, that he entreated his majesty not to take it ill, if he defended that place with the utmost vigour, for the service of the Catholic king, his master. His majesty, after having thanked the count de Broûay for his compliment, returned only this answer, that his quarters were all over his camp, and that the more obstinate his resistance was in opposing this conquest, the more glorious would be the success of it to his majesty (10).

The king of the Romans gained great esteem during this long siege; this first campaign was very much to his honour. The count de Melac, who saw him, the eleventh of September, received from him great honours and great praises (11). He supped the same night with prince Lewis of Baden, who paid him a (11) Journal of thousand civilities, and told him, that it was believed, in the Imperial army, that he dealt with the devil (12), to which the count de Melac replied, 'that he dealt with him just as much as he, but that the prince's correspondence was the better, since the devil had served him best (13).'

(12) Compare what is said in remark [P] of the article AGRIPPA, num. 1.

[C] What the news-writers published concerning this siege will give me occasion to make some remarks. Those of France continually said, that it did not advance, that the garrison repulsed every assault, and occasioned the slaughter of an infinite number of Germans: the news-writers of the other party said, on the contrary, that they easily carried every thing they attacked, that the Imperialists scarce lost a man, and that the mines of the besieged were always countermined, or that, if they were not, the enemy set fire to them so improperly, that they occasioned no loss. The author of the Mercure Galant reasoned much on the consequences, which might attend the conquest of this place. He pretended, that it cost the emperor at least five or six millions (14), and that the number of troops, which perished before Landau, must amount at least to 15000 men (15). I believe, adds he, that, were I to calculate the loss, which the Germans confest in the journals they commonly make, I should find, that it amounts to much more, though these journals are not faithful. I know not what journals of the Germans he means; but I can scarce believe that he saw any other than those, which they sent to the Dutch news-writers, and which we see printed in the Historical Letters, and in the Mercure Politique of the Hague. Now by these journals it does not appear, that the Germans had more than 800 men killed, from the beginning of the siege to the beginning of September. We have not seen in these books the particulars of the following days to the capitulation of the place; but we may judge, that it would not contain above forty killed. The number of the wounded is incomparably greater according to these journals; and yet some gentlemen, or cure that fond credulity they know so well how to inspire. They forgot

Dutch Gazettes, affirm, since the capitulation, that the number of the wounded was but double that of the slain. The latter amounted to a little more than 700, and the former, (of whom the most part were cured) to a little more than 1400. It is difficult to reconcile this with what the same Gazettes had said, that, for want of infantry, they were at last obliged to make the dragoons serve, and, as most of the wounded died, it was believed, that the besiegers made use of balls of a particular quality; but it is not my business here to reconcile the Gazettes with themselves; it would be almost as difficult as to reconcile the Gazettes of the two parties; the question is only to know, whether the journals of the besiegers acknowledge the great loss, which Mr de Vizé speaks of. Let us observe, by the way, that a prisoner, whom the garrison of Landau took the thirty first of July, affirmed, that the Germans had already lost near 2500 men, and that every one of them said, the balls of the besiegers were all poisoned, because none of the wounded recovered (16). The other news, which he told, is so false, that we ought to give very little credit to what he says concerning the loss of the Germans.

Mr le Noble maintains, that they lost, in this siege, 4 princes, 286 officers, and 12000 soldiers or thereabout (17). I believe, in respect to the 4 princes, he was deceived by this passage: 'The young prince of Bareith died the first of this month of the wound he had received before Landau, at the assault of the sixteenth to the seventeenth of August. He is the fourth prince that the war has deprived us of in a very short time, and whose death I am obliged to give notice of in this month only (18).' A little more attention would have informed Mr le Noble, that the author there means the duke of Holstein, the prince of Commercy, the count of Soissons, and the prince of Bareith; but the first lost his life in Poland, the second in Italy, and the fourth recovered of his wound, as he might have learned by the author's own retraction, which I suppose he misunderstood (19). Judge, I pray you, whether an author, who so grossly mistakes as to the number of princes killed at a siege, deserves much credit in what he says concerning the number of officers and soldiers, who perished at it.

One cannot sufficiently wonder at the ignorance, which the Paris Gazetteer, and the author of the Mercure Galant, have discovered of the state of the siege (20). Those who should trust to their relations, would swear, that, at the beginning of September, the affairs of the besiegers were no farther advanced than at the beginning of July, and that they were even in a worse condition by the frightful slaughter, which the garrison made the twenty fifth, twenty sixth, and twenty seventh of August, in repulsing the attacks of the Germans. These are three imaginary attacks. We see the following words in a Mercure Galant dated the fourteenth of August (21). It is an unheard of thing, that, after a siege of two months and a half, a great army should not have yet taken any of the outworks of Landau. This author might have talked after the same manner a month after, in reasoning upon his own accounts, and those of the Paris Gazette, which had said nothing of any progress of the besiegers since the above-mentioned date of the fourteenth of August. What is more surprising is, that the Paris Gazette of the sixteenth of September, the day on which the surrender of Landau was known at Paris, went on talking in the same tone; inasmuch, that it prepared infinitely less for the news of the capitulation of the place, than that of the raising of the siege. We may ask hereupon, did these public news-writers know what passed before Landau, or did they not? If they believed the accounts they published, their ignorance was very gross and inexcusable; for from the first days of the month of September, there were private persons in the provinces, who knew very well, that Landau could not hold out longer than the tenth at the farthest. We have seen in Holland letters which have expressly mentioned this piece of news. Is it not shameful, that public news-writers should know less of the state of a siege, than a meer country tradesman? Is it not a reproach to them, to have no other lights than the report of deserters, whose business it is to please by agreeable lies, and to gain by it an advantageous reception? If these news-writers were well informed of all that passed at Landau, their insincerity was monstrous and inexcusable. Why did they so disguise things? did they fear to cause an insurrection in the provinces by a faithful account? This fear, which perhaps would be reasonable in other countries, was ridiculous in that in which they wrote. I know not then to what to impute the perplexity they threw themselves into by the necessity of finding some solution, when at last they were obliged to publish the unforeseen news of the capitulation. They were so severely handled (22) on the subject of the taking of Namur in 1695, that it is strange they did not profit by it. I am of opinion, that the siege of important places will always be a troublesome rock for the news-writers (23). I would have them always remember, that the taking of a place is not subject, like the gaining of battles (24), to historical Pyrrhonism, and that therefore it is better to prepare the readers for it by degrees, than to overwhelm them with it all at once, when they least expect it. Tela prævijsa minus feriant. The disgust at being imposed upon aggravates the chagrin they feel on the sudden news of a capitulation, which overthrows the hopes they had conceived. I say nothing of the insulting raillery they are exposed to, when at last they are obliged to confess the surrender of a place, before which the news-writers had made the enemy dance attendance, without allowing them to have made any progress. They become the jest of the news-writers of the opposite party (25).

Here is another very surprising thing. It was not known at the court of the elector of Bavaria what passed before Landau, and this may make us think, that Catinat knew no more of it. The garrison beat the champagne the ninth of September (26), it was reduced to the utmost extremity, and the governor had remonstrated to the council of war, from the fourth of September, that it was time to capitulate (27). It is pretended (28), that, about the twenty second of August, he had sent a man (29) to the marschal de Catinat, to inform him, that he could hold out but eight days. Nevertheless the French envoy at the court of the duke of Bavaria imagined, the ninth of September, that the taking of the town of Ulm would oblige the enemy to raise the siege. His electoral highness, he wrote word that day (30), does not doubt but this will oblige them to abandon Landau. . . . when the junction of his troops with those of France shall be once made, we shall cut out so much business for the king of the Romans, and prince Lewis of Baden, and so dangerous in this country, that they will not think Landau of importance enough to detain them on the other side the Rhine. The elector of Bavaria wrote to the king of France, 'that a person, whom he had sent to the Imperial camp before Landau, had brought him word, that that place could yet hold out fifteen days, so that it might be still succoured in time, after the surprize of Ulm (31).' If these words may serve by way of consolation or excuse for the news-writers of Paris, I shall think my self happy in having produced them.

Some of those, who suffered themselves to be deceived by the fabulous relations, which came from Alliance, have themselves undeceived the public, whom they had led into mistakes; for we find what follows in a work of the author of the Mercure Galant. 'As for the chimerical accounts, which have been spread about, of pretended sallies, in which it was affirmed that we had killed two or three thousand men, and of furious assaults made on the out-works of the place, in which they no less magnified the enemy's loss, who gave these assaults with thousands of men, no action of this nature really passed. The garrison was not numerous enough to make such kind of sallies, and the enemy had not enough damaged the place, to give such assaults: thus the situation of affairs at that time is a sufficient answer to those, who published these accounts, and were but too ready to believe them. None of all these actions, in the journal you have been reading, deserve the name of battles (32).'

Let us conclude with this passage of the same author (33): 'It is indisputably true, that no peace will be made, unless the emperor be obliged to give up this place (34), in case it be not retaken before that got not to reflect on it's long continuance [D]. The fourth article of the capitulation, has been thought very extraordinary, since the governor demanded in it, that the inhabitants

'that time. Whenever the king has been willing to grant peace, this prince has given up, in confirmation of that same peace, the places which he had on the other side the Rhine, and it has been contented to at the same time, that he should keep all those, which he was in possession of on this side; and this has been taken for a rule, because the Rhine forms a kind of barrier.' I am surprized, that an author, who talks thus, should not know, that, by the peace at Nimeguen, France remained in possession of Brisac and Friburg two important places on the other side the Rhine. I might add, that the peace of Munster left her mistress of Philipsburg, as well as Briac. Where is then the rule this author speaks of?

[D] The news-writers did not fail to make reflexions on the long continuance of the siege of Landau. I need only produce the words of a very witty writer. He will afford us, not only a comment on my text, but likewise an illustration of the foregoing remark. 'This siege is so far advanced, that we daily expect the news of a capitulation: the French reproach us with the slowness of this conquest; but I know not whether it be not more disgraceful to her than to us. The prince of Baden wisely judged that he ought to be sparing of his men. With this judicious precaution, this able prince has not followed that furious and murdering way, which destroys so many brave men, and sometimes the whole flower of an army. If Landau be surrendered, the troops of the Upper Rhine would have suffered no extraordinary fatigue, and would march out of the trenches as out of an encampment, still fresh and ready for a new expedition. But, since the prince of Baden has by no means hastened the execution of his design, it follows, that he has given the enemy all the necessary time to succour the place: how comes it then, that they have not stirred? Does it not seem as if the prince of Baden affected to act without precipitation, the better to shew the weakness of France? This slow conduct in that general looks as if he would defy any one to prevent his striking the blow. It were to be wished for the honour of marshal Catinat, or rather his master's, that the place had been taken in a few days. The siege is protracted; in the mean time the marshal, who ought to endeavour a succour or a diversion, keeps at a distance, entrenches himself, as if the noise of the cannon of the besiegers affrighted him, and quietly suffers the town to be taken . . . The French readily allow, that the length of the siege of Landau proceeds from the moderation and prudence of the prince of Baden. As they make a merit of every thing, and turn even their losses to the encrease of their reputation, they pretend, that this duration of the siege is solely owing to the vigorous defence of the besieged. Will you believe their news-writers? The besiegers fall before Landau like the leaves of a tree shook by a strong wind towards the end of autumn; they lose a thousand men at the attack of a work, which they do not carry: if, the next day they become masters of the post, they are driven from it the third day: you will see at last, they will talk of raising the siege . . . Can any one advance such gross untruths? But can any thing be more injurious to the public, than to suppose them capable of acquiescing in such wretched impertinence (35)?' Thus does this witty author reason, in his news of the month of August 1702: let us produce what he says in that of the following month.

'The town of Landau has at length changed its master (36). . . . An ill omen of what was to follow. In France, they took all possible precautions to lull the people asleep, and make them believe this disgrace would never happen. The news-writers never tired themselves so much as on occasion of the siege of Landau. If all that they published about the besiegers were true, their army was but some broken remains, and nothing would be more astonishing than the surrender of the place. The Imperialists were knocked on the head without gaining any advantage; or, if they had the good fortune to carry a post, they were presently driven from it. These falsehoods at present do no honour to the count de Melac, or his garrison. How did this

'brave governor all at once spoil his fine defence? What panic seized him? Should he not have crowned his valour, and tried the patience of the Germans to the utmost? A good commander capitulates only to avoid a general assault, and it is affirmed these besieged had lost nothing. Now that the town is taken, how will they gild the pill, that the people may swallow it, without perceiving it's bitterness (37)? . . . Let us not imagine, that the tranquillity, with which France has suffered Landau to be taken, takes off any thing from the glory of this conquest. It cannot be denied, that the besieged made a vigorous resistance: the long continuance of the siege proves it. If the French are to be believed in this matter, the weakness of the garrison alone obliged them to submit. His most Christian Majesty was told, that if the count de Melac could have been reinforced with 1500 men, the place would have escaped. A melancholy consideration, and which serves only to aggravate the misfortune! But how does this agree with the pretended good fortune of the besieged in losing but few men upon every attack? Was the garrison then so small? this would be an unpardonable neglect in a fortress of this consequence. Let us compromise the matter. Both sides were equally vigorous: if the Imperialists attacked the town with great courage and resolution, the French answered them with no less valour and intrepidity, with this circumstance, that the prince of Baden, willing to spare his troops, marched sleep by sleep, sure to conquer, and defying all obstacles (38).'

Let us make some remarks on the ingenious thoughts of this author, and say, in the first place, that, in the situation things were in, it were to be wished, for the common good of his Imperial majesty, and his allies, that the town of Landau had been taken after a siege of three weeks. Prince Lewis of Baden might have executed, after this, whatever he pleased: the French would not have been in a condition to cross any of his designs: but the measures, which the length of the siege suffered them to take, broke those of the Imperialists in such a manner, that prince Lewis of Baden could execute nothing after the surrender of the town of Landau. The length of the siege gave France the advantage: the governor of the place received a letter from marshal Catinat, the tenth of August, in which he was directed to hold out as long as he possibly could, to prevent the enemy from making other attempts during the remainder of the campaign; that this would be the most signal service he could do the king (39). Thus, the loss which the besiegers would sustain of a great number of soldiers and officers, in vigorously pushing on the attacks, would be made up with interest by the designs they might put in execution before the end of the campaign.

I say, in the second place, that the thought of our news-writer, to wit that it would be disgraceful to the count de Melac to have behaved in the manner the French accounts relate, is very just. This governor would have imitated the poets, who do wonders in the four first acts of a tragedy, but succeed very ill in the last, wherein good poets principally exert their genius, and for which they reserve the most exquisite strokes (40). It cannot be denied, that the whole world saw with extreme surprise the conclusion of this siege. Even those on the side of the besiegers believed that it would be very bloody, and that the last assault would be fatal to many brave officers. On the contrary, it was found to be the easiest thing in the world, and they knew not what to think of it, nor what would be the unravelling of the affair. The news-writers have said many things on this occasion not worth repeating. What is most probable, is, that the garrison was too weak to stand the last assault. We learn by the journal of this siege, that, from the fourth of September, the count de Melac represented, that there were many brave men in the garrison; that it was for the interest of the king to preserve them; that they wanted the most necessary things, as money, medicines, and provisions; that these six days they had made broth for the sick of horse-flesh, not reckoning the want of ammunition (41). The same journal relates (42), that, when the enemy gave

the last assault, the besieged were retired to the half-moon, near the bridge of communication. Hence it was that the besiegers met with little or no opposition.

In the third place, let us consider these words; was the garrison then so small? this would be an unpardonable neglect in a fortress of such consequence (43). As soon as it was known, that the place was invested, the Dutch Gazetteers strove to out-do one another in publishing, that the garrison was very small, and that it wanted many necessaries. I know some, who blamed these gazetteers for thus lessening the glory of prince Lewis of Baden. They will remedy this one time or other, replied another fort; be in no pain about it; for, when the place shall be surrendered, they will not fail to publish a large list of ammunition and provisions found therein by the Imperialists: neither will they fail to give out, that the garrison was very numerous at first, but that the greatest part had perished by the sword, or the fire of the Germans, by desertions, and by sicknesses. It is not yet time to confess, that the place is well provided; the business is to make the readers expect that it will be soon taken.

I have wondered at the silence of the officer, who drew up the journal of this famous siege. He should have told us the number of the garrison, when the place was invested, and when it beat the chamade; but this he has not done. Those, who find a mystery in every thing, pretend, that thro' a political flattery, he chose rather to lessen the glory of the garrison, than to take off in the least from the king's prudence. If he had said, that the place was not provided with necessaries, or a good garrison, he would have accused the king his master of a prodigious neglect, and given great honour to the long resistance of the besieged. Now it was better that these should lose part of the praises due to them, than that their common prince should be exposed to censure. This, say some, occasioned this officer's silence. Others say, there was a way to have injured no body, which was to have observed, on the one side, that the garrison and provisions were very insufficient, and, on the other, that the king had very wisely judged them sufficient, since, for reasons capable of entirely satisfying political prudence, he had believed, that the elector of Bavaria would declare himself time enough to frustrate the design of taking Landau.

I have read in a news-writer, that the garrison of this place consisted of 2200 men, when it marched out; and that the French say, they lost but 412 men, in the siege (44). If this be true, it must have consisted, at first, of but 2612 soldiers, a number infinitely too small for the defence of such a fortress.

(44) Lettres Hist. Octob. 1702, pag. 432.

Let us not forget the remark of a news-writer of Paris (45). The besiegers 'had still much way to make, and many assaults to give, before they could become masters of it in form; and they would have had still more to do, and have lost more men than they did, had it not been for the treachery of an Engineer, who came to their camp, and discovered to them several mines: thus the treachery of this Engineer, and the want of necessaries in the place, were the cause that the Germans became masters of it.' The Dutch Journalists agree, that the fugitive Engineer did great service to the Imperialists (46); but what they added appeared to be groundless, to wit, that 'he was intercepted attempting to return to the town, after having taken an exact survey of the works of the besiegers. The prince of Baden would have had him hung up upon a tree without form of process; but this Engineer having offered to dry up the ditches of the place, and to perform other services, if they would give him his life' general Thungen remonstrated, that it would be good to try that which he promised to do; and this opinion prevailed. Presently he was put in irons, and informed, by the hang-man of the army, that he had nothing to do but to think in earnest of executing his promises, in which if he failed, 'he should be hung upon a gallows, which was shewed him (47).' It is not at all probable, that he had the least intention of returning to Landau; he knew too well, that he should be there condemned to the most ignominious punishment. The journal of the siege informs us, that, on the twenty sixth of August, 'Mr de la Rouffillaine, captain of the gates, had orders from the count de Melac to deliver to the executioner the orders of Ladoder (48), and to cause the effigy of the said Ladoder to be hung on a gallows by the executioner, at the bottom of which was written: The unworthy Engineer Ladoder, a traitor to his king and country. A gallows was erected at the fort, in the half moon of the attack, where he was hanged in effigy (49).' The count de Melac was so incensed against him, that, when he was to receive the hostages of the prince of Baden for the capitulation, he ordered, that, notwithstanding they had laid down their arms, if Ladoder appeared, they should fire an hundred musket shot at him; but the hostages said, that he had been wounded the evening before in the arm by a musket ball (50).

The news-writer, who has observed, that the diversion caused by the surprise of Ulm did not hinder the king of the Romans from taking Landau (51), forgot dates. How could the taking of Ulm, which was not known when Landau capitulated, retard the reduction of Landau?

(51) Merc. Hist. January, 1703, pag. 6.

[E] The governor demanded, that the inhabitants should be maintained in the exercise of their respective religions, and that the Roman Catholic religion should be preserved in it's purity? This article was obtained with this restriction, conformably to the treaties of Munster and Ryswick. The two points of the demand are surprizing, when one reflects that the king of France, who gives up Landau, and the emperor to whom he surrenders it, are two princes, who have shewed a great zeal for the extirpation of the Protestants, and the propagation of the Catholic religion. Was it necessary to demand of such an emperor, that he should maintain the Catholic religion in this place? Is it not a superfluous care? Was it proper besides to tie up his hands, to prevent him from abolishing hereby? He might do it in a conquered town; for the law of arms permitted him this, unless the contrary were stipulated and agreed to by the articles of the capitulation. If his Imperial majesty does not endeavour so effectually to re-unite this whole town entire to the body of the Papacy, as to re-unite it to the body of the empire, will not this be the fault of the king of France, who has made himself protector of the Heretics of Landau, by inducing the emperor solemnly to promise, that they shall not be troubled in the exercise of their religion (52)? He was in hopes, say some, that the place would be given up to him by the first treaty of peace. Are they aware, that, to avoid disparity, and to act consistently with his passed conduct, he must rather wish to recover Landau entirely Catholic, than to recover it mixed with divers religions? and consequently he ought to leave the Imperialists full liberty to make converts there by the best means they could. If he thought, that he ought not to allow them this liberty which might prove very inconvenient to the heretical inhabitants; if, in a word, he desired to procure an advantage to those inhabitants, what becomes of his zeal as a converter? What unequal, what irregular, conduct would not this be? But, at the bottom, his disquietudes would be a little superfluous; for he ought not to fear, in the present situation of things, that the emperor should harass the Protestants of Landau: his Imperial majesty has too great obligations to the whole party, and too much interest in keeping fair with it, to introduce the converting spirit into conquered places. One cannot therefore comprehend the motive of the fourth article of the long capitulation presented to the besiegers.

(52) The author of the Nouvelles des Cours de l'Europe, has pursued this story finely in his month of September, 1702, pag. 320, 321.

Some persons, who, by dint of refining, plunge themselves into visionary notions, venture to say, that the court of France has so expressly stipulated the preservation of the Romish faith, in order to shew that the Catholics of Landau stood in need of protection, under the dominion of an emperor devoted to the Protestants. What chimeras!

As to the purity, in which it is demanded that the Romish religion shall be preserved, I have met with none who could explain to me what it meant; for, to pretend, that it was designed to prevent the introducing of Jansenism, or, on the contrary, the introducing of the superstitious practices and loose maxims, with which the Jesuits and Monks infect religion, gion, this in truth would be the conceit of a visionary. Did they then apprehend a kind of Samaritanism? Were they desirous to guard against I know not what mixture of Lutheran or Calvinistical opinions with the points decided in the council of Trent? I am clearly of opinion that this is chimerical; but I know not which way to determine about it.

LANDO (HORTENSIO) a Physician, born at Milan, lived in the XVIth century. He is the author of several books, and he loved to publish them under false names. He is thought to be the author of a dialogue, published under the name of Philalethes, against the memory of Erasmus. That conjecture seems to be well grounded [A]. He wrote two dialogues, which have been falsely ascribed to Cardinal Aleander [B].

[A] That conjecture seems to be well grounded. Here I shall perform a promise, which I made in the remark [C] of the article ERASMUS, by setting down the import of the Memoir which I have quoted in that place. Herold believed, that a Physician, born at Piacenza, whose name was Bassiano Landi, or Lando, concealed himself under the name of Philalethes. For my part, I rather believe it was Hortensio Lando, a Milanese, and a Physician too, and a man of parts, who wrote several Latin and Italian books, in which he always affected to appear in a disguise. He took the same name, Philalethes, in a dialogue, intituled, Forcianæ Questiones, in which he examines the manners and genius of the several nations of Italy. It is true that, in this last dialogue, he calls himself Philalethes Polytopienfis, whereas, in the dialogue against Erasmus, it is Philalethes Utopienfis, or ex Utopiâ civis. Which, so far from expressing any real difference, shows, on the contrary, that both these books are the productions of the same genius. He also called himself sometimes Hortensius Tranquillus; which Simler, the abridger and continuator of Gesner, has not observed, speaking of Hortensius Tranquillus, and Hortensius Landus, as two different writers. We have a book of this Lando, intituled, *Un Commentario delle più notabili e mostruose cose d'Italia, in 8vo. A diverting book; to which having not prefixed his name, he supplies that with a little advertisement at the end, where he says: Godi, lettore, il presente Commentario nato del costantissimo cervello di M. O. L. detto per la sua natural mansuetudine il Tranq. Who sees not that these three letters M. O. L. signify Messer Ortenzio Lando, & Tranq. Tranquillo. Next to this there is, *Un Catalogo de gli inventori delle cose che si mangiano, e delle bevande ch'oggi si usano; at the end of which are these capital letters SUI SNETROH SUDNAL ROTUA TSE. Which being read backwards, according to the order of the words make: HORTENSIVS LANDVS AVTOR EST. In the same manner at the end of his Paradoxes, printed at Venice in 8vo, 1544, SUI SNETROH TABEDUL, that is, HORTENSIVS LUDEBAT. It is therefore very probable, that it was not Bassiano, but Hortensio Lando, who was the author of the dialogue, which Herold answered: and what confirms me in this thought, is, that Hortensio being to prove in one of his Paradoxes, that it is no dishonour to be a bastard, alledges, the example of many men of letters. Peter Lombard, Giason Maino, Longelius, Celio Calcagnini, and Erasmus, speaking of the latter in these words. O quanti letterati hannoci ancora dato i furtivi abbracciamenti, &c. hannoci dato un Erasmo di Roterodamo, e per opra d'un valente Abbate ce lo dettero.

I must not forget the Collection of Letters, which he printed at Venice, apresso Gabriel Giolito, in 1548, in 12mo. It is intituled, Lettere di molte valorose donne, nelle quali Chiaramente appare non esser ne di eloquentia ne di dottrina alli buomini inferiori. There is at the end of it a short advertisement (1) of Bartholomæus Pestalofia, Rhetus, which intimates that Hortensius Lando collected these letters into one volume, at the request of Octavianus Raverta, 'Qui ob infirmam animi pietatem Terracina Pontifex designatus est (2). — Who, for his remarkable piety, was nominated to the bishopric of Terracina.'

[B] He wrote two dialogues, which have been falsely ascribed to cardinal Aleander. The following passage was communicated to me by the author the foregoing remark. 'The two dialogues, one whereof is intituled, Cicero relegatus, and the other Cicero revocatus, were not written by Jerom Aleander, but by Ortenzio Lando, a Milanese, surnamed Tranquillo. They are dedicated to Pomponio Trivultio; and because the inscription of the epistle dedicatory is thus expressed, Pomponio Trivultio, H. A. S. D. Henry Lewis Chasteignier, bishop of Poitiers, thought that the letters H. A. signified Hieronymus Aleander. But they have been put there without any reason for it; or perhaps, by an equivocation, H. A. have been put for H. L. A. that is Hortensius Landus, the true name of the author. Simler, the continuator of Gesner, attributes these dialogues to Hortensius Tranquillus Mediolanensis, whom he erroneously distinguishes from Hortensius Landus; for Landus and Tranquillus are one and the same writer. He loved to disguise his name, and yet desired nothing more than to be known. L'Autore della presente opera, says he under the name of Paulo Mascranico, in an advertisement to the reader, at the end of his Paradoxes, il qual fu M. O. L. M. † detto per soprannome il Tranq. At the end of his Commentario d'Italia, in another advertisement to the reader, under the name of Nicolo Morra, he speaks thus. Godi Lettore, &c. (3). At the end of his Sermoni funebri delle bestie, he names himself at length, and without any disguise in the foregoing, Hortensio Lando ditto † il Tranquillo. Now this Lando, or Tranquillo, owns, in his last paradox, the dialogue, Cicero relegatus, to be his work. 'Non dubito certamente, says he, che molti non si habbino da maravigliare che ancora fatto non habbia la pace con M. Tullio, qual gia sono poco meno di dieci anni † chio mandai con suo gran scorno in effiglio — I doubt not but many wonder I have not yet made peace with Cicero, whom, ten years ago, I sent into shameful exile.' And lower, 'Quando scrissi il dialogo intitolo Ciceroe relegato. — When I wrote the dialogue intituled in 1534, Cicero relegatus.'

LANGIUS (PAUL) a German Monk, would scarce have been known by the chronicle he composed, if he had not inserted in it some complaints against the vicious lives of Ecclesiastics, and bestowed praises upon Martin Luther (a). Which has been the reason, why the Protestants have cited him a thousand times. He was born at Zwicka in Voigtland, and became a Benedictin Monk in the year 1487, in the monastery of Bozau, near Zeits in Misnia (b). The abbot Trithemius sent him, in 1515, to rummage all the convents in Germany, in order to make a collection of all the manuscripts that might serve to illustrate the history, or to enlarge the catalogue of ecclesiastical writers (c). Langius laboured also for himself in examining the libraries; for this was of great use to him, when he wrote his chronicle (d) [A]. It begins, according to Vossius, of the same words. Nor are those of Rivet better, Le Moine Citique, The Citique Monk. See their passages in the remark [C]. Foreigners have great reason to complain, that the French do so disgrace pro-

Vossius, in the year 1468; but he is mistaken [B]. Coëffeteau made use of a poor evasion [C], when he answered the Mystery of Iniquity, wherein some words of Langius were alleged. But here the mischief does not consist only in figuring the name of a town, but in something worse; for, under pretence, that Langius composed the chronicle of a cathedral, he has a name given him, derived from that church. Now that name does not suit him.

[C] Coëffeteau made use of a poor evasion. Du Pleffis Mornai does not forget the praises that Langius bestowed on Martin Luther. 'Paul Langius, a Monk of Citique, and a disciple of the abbot Trithemius, at the time that Luther began to appear; though he did not leave his monastery, yet he was very much moved, and gave him an incredible testimony: "This Martin, says he, was a consummate, profound, and incomparable divine, who endeavoured to restore the holy Theology to the dignity of its original, and to the first purity and innocence, sincerity and simplicity of the gospel, deriding all "secular Philosophy." . . . In another place, under the year 1503, adding to him Carlostad and Melancthon: "They handle, says he, and teach the "holy Theology, giving the wheat of the word of God, without any chaff; that is, without mixing "it with Philosophy and syllogisms. They above "all kept to the gospel of Christ, and to the apostle "St Paul, whom they take for their patron and founda- "tion; and to the study of learning, they add the "fear of God, and the seeds of all virtues, which they "sow in the hearts of their disciples, by words, ex- "amples, and books." And least it should be re- "pined, that it was before Luther had opposed the "Pope, see how he speaks of him under the year 1520, "after having discoursed of the abuses and excesses of "indulgences. "This man, says he, by his doctrine "and admirable preaching, brought all indulgences to "nothing. He dissuaded the people from buying them, "asserting, that they are no ways necessary to sal- "vation, and do not procure the remission of sins, "but make people careless of repentance, and of all "good works, and even are an incentive to vice." He further says, "That the merits of Christ and "his saints are not a treasury of indulgences; since in "the primitive church, and for above a thousand years "after, there was nothing written of them by the "holy men and doctors of the orthodox church. So "far were they then from entertaining so great an "opinion of them, as they do now, from a desire of "wealth, which accrues from them. Moreover, he "asserted and proved, that the church of Rome is not, "of divine right, the first, nor the head of other "churches, &c. And therefore, says he, they hither- "to persecute him as another Athanasius, especially "for having maintained this position, and some other "important doctrines, which not only the Romans "continue to impugn, but also very many learned "men, especially the Thomists; and yet this Martin, "who is undoubtedly the first and wisest divine of "our age, has not been hitherto vanquished, confirm- "ing and proving his doctrine by the testimonies of "the gospel, and of the apostle St Paul, and even "by the original texts of the ancient orthodox fa- "thers (3)." Do Pleffis does not forget the corrective, added by Langius to so many bold propositions. 'And "thus, says he, this Monk speaks, non assertivè, sed "admirativè, not to affirm any thing, but out of ad- "miration, suspending his judgment, like many o- "thers, till the matter be decided in a general coun- "cil." I put Langius's words in the margin (4). They fully shew, that he was a Catholic.

tique, and a disciple of the abbot Trithemius, shews the sincerity of the Protestants, and their fairness in the publication of authors. For they make Langius say several things concerning Luther, which are entirely contrary, not only to the doctrine, which Langius constantly professed to his death, but also to what he wrote in the same chronicle, wherein are inserted the praises of Luther. Possibly the Protestants fancy they can make us believe, that this author was both a Lutheran and a Papist, a Heretic and a Catholic. Otherwise, certainly, they cannot reconcile what they make him say, with his first writings. And let no body be deceived by the name of Pistorius the publisher, for though he turned Catholic, it was some time after, and he was still a Protestant, when he published this chronicle, with some other works of the German writers. Nay, he says, that he had it from Henry Petreus, who lived at Basil among the Heretics. Moreover, those who were guilty of the imposture, were fully persuaded, that it would be difficult to believe, that Langius spoke so advantageously of the person and doctrine of Luther; for which reason they added a poor and insipid subterfuge, making him say, that what he had written about it, was not assertivè, but admirativè, not to affirm any thing but out of admiration, suspending his judgment, &c. One would think that Langius was in quest of a mallet, and was yet unresolved, what religion to embrace (5). This is a poor answer, and it were better to say nothing at all, than to use it. Father Gretier gave it up, and thought it more to the purpose to suppose, that good Langius, being extremely desirous to sport with a woman, looked upon Luther as a hero, that was to destroy celibacy. Let us see how the apologists for du Pleffis answered this pleasantry, and Coëffeteau's subterfuge. 'Paul Langius, a Monk of Citique, gives such a noble and great character of Luther's doctrine, that our Monk cannot bear it, and accuses the publishers of his work of having added to it all that is produced out of it upon this subject, measuring their corn by the bushel of the Papists, who corrupt, with additions and mutilations, all the writings that come into their hands. And yet it has pleased God to remove that objection, in that it was published by a man, who was then brooding the apostacy, which he at last hatched: namely, Pistorius, who would not have failed to discover afterwards this artifice, if he had done it, or any other that he knew of. Gretier, who might have asked him some questions about it, had not the impudence, though it be a predominant quality in him, to accuse the publishers of any imposture. He chose rather to abuse this poor Monk in these words. "It is this Langius, whose feet itched, at the first "hearing of the Lutheran gospel, to run from his "monastery, thinking that the acceptable time was "come, in which it should be lawful for the Monks "to throw off their cowls, and marry the nuns." At that time the Monks knew well enough how to lie with them, without marrying them, had they had no other itch. Coëffeteau is not ignorant, that they want no opportunity of scratching it elsewhere (6). These last words manifestly shew, that the common places, the missionaries make use of on account of the marriage of the reformers and Monks, who embraced the Protestant religion, are not so favourable to them as they imagine. It affords them a large field for declamation; they make an odious description of the sensuality of those profelytes: but they are easily answered, because it is but too true, that those, who make a vow of celibacy, do not always observe it; and common sense teaches, that, if the ministers of the church have not the power to abstain from women, it is better they should allay their heat with their own wives, than those of other men.

[D] I do not think that to be a solid reflexion, which Andrew River made. We have seen, that he pretends, that Pistorius would have discovered his fraud, when he turned Papist. I believe he is mistaken. If Pistorius had interpolated Langius's manuscript, he would would never have boasted of it. Such a confession would have procured but an inconsiderable advantage to the church of Rome. Whether Langius praised Luther in the year 1520, or whether he dispraised him, or did not mention him at all, is but a trifle at the bottom. But Pistorius could not have discovered his cheat, without making himself contemptible to the Papists, and exposing himself to the insults of the Protestants, who would have found, in his own confession, wherewithal to convict him of being a wicked man. People are not willing to own such faults: they are too material.

[E] The faults of Moreri are not considerable. He should have called Langius's native place Zwickau, and not Zwickau (7). His monastery was called Bozau, and not Bozan. The mistake of Pastorius, instead of Pistorius, is corrected in the Dutch editions. It should not have been said, that his chronicle begins in the year 1468; it is a mistake of Vossius, which I have already censured, and which Zeillerus has copied (8).

(7) In the Moreri of Holland it is called Zwickau.

LANGIUS (RODOLPH) a gentleman of Westphalia, and provost of the cathedral church of Munster towards the end of the XVth century, distinguished himself by his learning, and his zeal for the restoration of polite learning. He studied first at Deventer, after which he was sent by his uncle, the dean of Munster, into Italy, and followed the greatest masters of literature, Laurentius Valla, Mapheus Vegius, Francis Philolphus, and Theodore Gaza. By this means he acquired a good taste of the Latin stile both in verse and prose, and confirmed himself in it by several compositions. He took this journey in company with Maurice count of Spiegelberg, and Rodolph Agricola; and, after their return into Germany, they all three laboured to drive out barbarism, and were the first, who, by their example, and their exhortations, brought into credit the best way of writing Latin, and of teaching that language. Langius, being sent to the court of Rome, by the bishop and chapter of Munster, under the pontificate of Sixtus IV, acquitted himself very well of his commission, and returned with the letters of that Pope, and of Laurence de Medicis, which gained him still greater esteem with those who deputed him; and this put him in a condition the better to execute the design he had of making polite learning flourish, and banishing from the schools the barbarisms that reigned in them. He was forced to struggle some years with those who patronized it [A], and who pleaded, that it was dangerous to introduce a new method of teaching: but at last he overcame these obstacles; and he prevailed on his bishop to found at Munster a school, the direction of which was given to able persons. He pointed out to them the method of instruction, and the books they were to explain, and gave them access to his fine library. This school, being thus established a little before the end of the XVth century, became very flourishing, and served Germany as a nursery of literature till the revolutions, which Anabaptism caused at Munster in the year 1534. Langius died in the year 1519, aged eighty years. He published some poems, which prove, that, before Conrad Celtis, Germany produced some famous Latin Poets (a) [B].

Rodolph

(a) Taken from David Chytraeus, in Saxonia, lib. iii, pag. m. 80, etc. See also his Speech, de Veteris Saxonie Provincia amplissima quae Westphalia hodie nominatur, pag. m. 108, etc.

[A] He was forced to struggle some years with those who patronized barbarisms. The university of Cologne opposed the commendable design of Langius; but he had in his favour the suffrages of the Italians; and this was an authority, which fully determined the bishop of Munster. You will see more particulars in these words of Chytraeus (1). 'Causam bonarum literarum & emendationis studiorum doctrinae barbarae, passim in omnibus Collegiis & Scholis regnantium, majore cum fructu egit (Langius) tametsi aliquot adhuc annos reluctantibus veteris Barbariei patronis, ac nominatim Academia Colonienfis, quae datus ad Conradum Rithbergensem Episcopum, qui Henrico Swartzburgensi successerat, & summum Collegium, literis, usitatum tot seculis instituendae adolescentiae & docendi rationem & libellos, in scholis retineri, & mutationes novas, & studii & disciplinae periculosas, faveri flagitabant. Esi autem erudite & gravior Consilii sui causas Rodolphus explicabat: tamen ad Italorum doctorum judicia ipsi provocare necesse fuit. Qui cum emendationem doctrinae in scholis usitatae necessariam esse & Langium recte, Lovanienfes (2) perperam judicare, in responsis ad Episcopum suis pronuntiassent; Episcopus qui Italorum, apud quos olim vixerat, censuram magni faciebat, facultatem aperiendae novae bonarum literarum scholae Collegio dedit. — Langius more successfuly pleaded the cause of polite learning, and a reformation of those barbarous studies, which prevailed in all the colleges and schools, though for some years he met with opposition from the patrons of the old barbarity, particularly the university of Cologne, which, by letters to Conrad Rithbergensis, bishop, and successor of Henry Swartzburgensis, and to the supreme college, earnestly intreated them to patronize the ancient method of instruction in the schools, and to discountenance these innovations so dangerous to study and discipline. And although Rodolph with great learning and earnestness explained

(2) As the author had not spoken of the university of Louvain, but of that of Cologne, perhaps he should read Colonienfes, and not Lovanienfes; but perhaps he had forgot to say, that the university of Louvain wrote also to the bishop of Munster, to thwart the designs of Langius.

the reasons of his undertaking, yet he was forced to appeal to the judgment of the learned Italians; who, in their answers to the bishop, having pronounced, that a reformation of the learning of the schools was necessary, and that Langius had judged right, but the university of Louvain wrong; the bishop, who paid a great deference to the opinion of the Italians, among whom he had formerly lived, gave the college power to open a new school of humanity.'

[B] He published some poems, which prove, that, before Conrad Celtis, Germany produced some famous Latin poets. Let us cite the same evidence once more: 'Primus autem Germaniae Poeta, ipse Rodolphi Agricola judicio, avorum aetate, aliquot ante Conradum Celtis annis celebris, hic Rodolphus Langius fuit, editis, de excidio Hierosolymae postremo, de obsidione Novesium, de Paulo Apostolo, de Maria Virgine, Poematis clarus. De quo condiscipulo & aequali suo Hegius cecinit:

Jam ferre Poetas

Barbarie in media Westphalia ora potest.
Langius hanc decorat majorum sanguine clarus
Monasteriaci lausque decusque soli
Primus Melpomenem qui rura in Westphala duxit Cum caneret laudes, maxime Paule, tuas.

— But the first German Poet, in the opinion of Rodolph Agricola himself, in the time of our ancestors, some years before Conrad Celtis, was this Rodolph Langius, famous for his poems, on the last destruction of Jerusalem, the siege of Neus, the apostle Paul, and the Virgin Mary. He was school-fellow and equal of Hegius, who thus celebrated him.

Westphalia, which barbarity o'er-runs,
Can now produce Apollo's tuneful sons.

Langius

Rodolph Agricola dedicated to Langius his Latin version of the Axiochus of Plato (b).

*Langius exalts her glory, whose great name
To rising Munster gives immortal fame.
He first a temple to the Muses rais'd,
And in Westphalian verse the great apostle prais'd.*

Note, that Chytræus, in making use of the word editis, declares that these poems were printed. Nevertheless the abridger of Geiner's Bibliothecæ (3), who mentions some other poems of Langius, insinuates some doubt; for he says, that Herman Hamelman, who acknowledges to have seen them, does not specify whether they were manuscripts, or printed works.

LANGIUS (JOSEPH) a native of Keisersberg (a) in the upper Alsace, and professor of Mathematics, and the Greek tongue at Friburg in Brisgaw, was writing his Elementale Mathematicum (b) in the year 1612, which was not printed (c), according to Vossius, till five years after (d). Isaac Habrecht, a Philosopher and a Physician, enlarged it, and adorned it with notes and figures, and published it (e) in the year 1625. Langius had printed, at Strasburg, in 1598, a Florilegium [A], in 8vo, which was followed some time after, by a book in Folio, intituled Polyanthea Nova [B]. He lived several years in the Protestant communion, and then he embraced the Romish faith (f). I give the titles of his other books [C].

[A] A Florilegium. It is an alphabetical collection of sentences, apothegms, comparisons, examples, and hieroglyphics. Such a book is of use to scholars, in dilating upon a theme. It might be also serviceable to learned men, if all the citations had been well collated with the originals; but little care has been taken of that. Our Langius was contented to transcribe the modern compilers, and among others Thomas Hibernicus (1), whose book, Flores Doctrinarum, abounds with faults.

[B] Polyanthea Nova. The author, in this book, has followed the same method, as in the Florilegium. The Index of Spain corrects some places in it, and gives an account of the books intituled Polyanthea. I think it will not be amiss to give the substance of that account. The first Polyanthea was printed in 1512 (2): it is the work of the Monk Dominicus Nanus Mirabellius, author of the Monasticon Evangelio-rum. The second was compiled by a Bookseller of Cologne, called Maternus Cholinus, and published in the year 1585 (3). He added to Mirabellius, all that he thought proper to be copied from three books, that had been published, I mean from the collection of Bartholomæus Amantius, and from the Sententiarum opus absolutissimum ex probatissimis au-thoribus excerptum (4), and from an anonymous book printed at Lyons. Cholinus, besides, inserted his own collections. The third, intituled Polyanthea nova, is the work of our Joseph Langius, and was printed at Geneva in 1600, at Lyons in 1604, at Francfort in 1607, and several times since. The fourth, called Polyanthea novissima, is divided into twenty books, and differs from the third only in some additions. The fifth, called Florilegium magnum, seu Polyanthea floribus novissimis sparsa, was published at Francfort, in 1621. What is new in this book, is owing to the industry of Franciscus Sylvius Insulanus. I have mentioned elsewhere (5) Gruterus's Supplements: they contain two volumes; so that the Florilegium magnum contains three volumes: the first is Sylvius Insulanus's; the second and third, printed at Francfort, in 1624, are Gruterus's.

LANGLE (JOHN MAXIMILIAN DE) minister of the gospel, was born at Evreux in 1590. He was made minister of the Reformed church at Rouën in 1615, being then but twenty five years of age. He discharged all the functions of his ministry for fifty two years with great reputation, piety, and eloquence. We have two volumes of his sermons, one upon the eighth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, the other upon several texts of the Scripture, and a dissertation, by way of a letter, in defence of Charles I, king of England. Seven years before his death, he fell into a palsy, which occasioned an impediment in his speech; notwithstanding which, his ingenious and pious conversations were both pleasing and edifying. He died in 1674, in the eighty fourth year of his age, leaving several children behind him [A], who inherited his merit and his virtue (a).

(a) I publish this article just as it has been communicated to me.

[A] He left several children. SAMUEL DE LANGLE, his eldest son, was born at London, and was carried into France being one year old, where he constantly lived, till the last persecution obliged him to retire into England. He was a minister almost in the same year of his age as his father, and jointly officiated with him in the church of Rouën, for twenty three years. He was afterwards invited to Paris in 1671, to serve the church that met at Charenton, and was very much esteemed in both places for his gravity, his solid learning, and consummate prudence, being an intimate friend of Mr Claude. The persecutions of France, and particularly that which deprived fathers of their children, obliged him to retire into England. The university of Oxford made him doctor of Divinity, without his asking it: and king Charles II gave him, as a testimony of his esteem, a prebend in the abbey of Westminster. He was born in 1622. He fell sick in the seventy first year of his age, in June 1693, of a violent distemper, which lasted eight days, but hindered him not from preserving all the strength of his parts, continually making excellent discourses to his relations and friends, and especially to his children, to whom he had given the same education he received from his father. The public has yet seen no other writings of his, besides a letter upon the differences between the Episcopallians, and Presbyterians in England. Dr Stillingfleet, the present bishop of Worcester (1), printed it at the end of one of his books upon the same subject; but they have found, among his manuscripts, a treatise concerning the Christian truth, which he began some years before, and finished a little before his death. It is hoped, that Mr de Langle, his eldest son, and a minister too, will publish it in a little time. He also made many critical observations upon several places of the scripture, and particularly on the Psalms, which it is believed he would have published himself, if he had lived long enough to put them in order as he designed them (2).

LANGUET (HUBERT), a native of Viteaux in Burgundy (a), became famous for his ability and virtue, in the XVIth century. Having read a book of Melancthon in Italy, he was so desirous of knowing that great man, that he went to visit him in Germany. He contracted a very strict friendship with him [A]. He charmed him with his fine conversation; for he had a very good memory, and an exquisite judgment (b). He was a long time one of the chief counsellors to Augustus elector of Saxony (c); and, if we may believe Thuanus, he did not leave that court [B], till he was suspected of being one of those, who advised Gaspar Peucer to publish an exposition of the doctrine of the Eucharist, agreeable to the Geneva confession. This historian adds, that, having left the court of Saxony, he retired to the prince of Orange, and was employed in great affairs, and that, whilst he applied himself to them, he fell sick, and died at Antwerp, the thirtieth of September 1581, being sixty three years old (d). He had a great share in the esteem of Mr du Pleffis Mornai [C]. He is thought to be the author of the speech, which was made to Charles IX, the twenty third of December 1570, in the name of several princes of Germany [D]. The famous treatise,

[A] He contracted a very strict friendship with Melancthon. All that I have said about this, is afforded me by Joachim Camerarius, in his life of Melancthon. Hunc (Languetum) lectio libri cujusdam in Italia ubi tunc ipse degeret, a Philippo Melancthone compositi cupiditate incendit videndi autorem illius, & ea stimulos perpetuo admoveens perpulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret, & Wittenbergam se conferret (1). Languet came to Wittenberg in the year 1549 (2), and kept so close to Melancthon, that, excepting some journeys from time to time, he never left him. Neque ab ipso discessit, nisi interduum per intervalla quadam peregrinationum, quibus mirifice delectabatur, donec Philippi Melancthonis vita in terris duravit (3). Languet's conversation was admirable. He spoke learnedly of the interests of princes, and was thoroughly acquainted with the history of illustrious men (4). His memory never failed him as to the circumstances of time, or proper names; and he had an extraordinary sagacity at discovering the inclinations of people, and foreseeing the event of things. He, who gives him this testimony, was particularly acquainted with him. Neque ego, says he (5) audio ullum alterum, qui tam prudenter & certo, & plane, dilucide, disertè, exponeret, quicquid narrare instituit. Non ille in hominum nominibus falli, non indicis temporum errare, non confundere rerum negotiorumque seriem. Erat autem in eo singularis sagacitas in notandis naturis hominum, & conjiciendo, quo quisque suapte ingenio deferretur, & quæ esset voluntatis inclinatio. (6) Quo tempore narrat in Philippo Melancthonis Vita Joachimus Camerarius eleganti illius & multiplici eruditione referti de anima libri à Melancthone non ita pridem scripti lectione Languetum tanta videndi auctoris cupiditate incensum fuisse, &c. Philib. de la Mare, in Vita Languet, pag. 10.

means a first, and not a second journey. Perpulerat tandem ut in Germaniam veniret (8). Lastly, it is strange, that, if Languet had been Camerarius's disciple and his boarder at Leipzig in 1548, Camerarius should say, that he did not come into Germany till 1549, out of a desire of seeing Melancthon, which proceeded from his reading a book of his in Italy. Either he, or Mr de la Mare, must be mistaken. In all likelihood Camerarius's account is right; for Languet (9) himself tells him, that, having read in Italy Melancthon's common-places, in the year 1547, and not thinking him sufficiently clear about the Eucharist, he resolved to go and consult the author, and that he saw him in 1549. Would he have spoke after this manner, if he had embraced the Protestant religion at Leipzig in 1548, and if Camerarius had been his professor and landlord in the same year in the same town?

(8) Camerarius in Vita Melancthi. pag. m 334.

(9) Languet, Epistol. xv, ad Joach. Camerarius. pag. m. 27.

[B] If we may believe Thuanus, he did not leave that court, &c.] Thuanus speaks of it too generally. The exposition of the doctrine of the Eucharist came out in the year 1573. Languet was not then at the court of Saxony, but at that of the emperor; and did not leave that employment till 1577. A letter which he writ from Prague the first of March 1577 (10), informs us, that he had obtained leave from his electoral highness of Saxony to retire whither he pleased. Ever after he held a great correspondence with that elector, tho' he applied himself to the affairs of prince Casimir, or of the prince of Orange. All this is proved by his letters, published in the year 1699.

(10) It is the twenty eighth of those he wrote to Camerarius the son.

[C] He had a great share in the esteem of Mr du Pleffis Mornai. That appears from this passage (11): 'At his arrival at Antwerp, Mr du Pleffis found his wife and children sick: and a son whom God had given him, died immediately in his absence; besides he found Mr Languet, his particular friend, dead, whom Madam du Pleffis, tho' sick her self, had attended to his last breath. His last words were: That the only thing he was sorry for, was, that he could not see Mr du Pleffis again before he died, to whom he would have left his heart, if it had been possible. That he had desired to live to see the world grow better; but since it still grew worse he had nothing more to do with it; that the princes of this time were strange people; that virtue bad much to suffer, and little to gain by them; that he very much pitied Mr du Pleffis, who would feel a good deal of it, and would have a bad time to go through; but that he should not despond, and God would assist him: he entreated her to request one thing of him, that, in the first book he should publish, he would make mention of their friendship.' This Mr du Pleffis did, not long after, in a short preface at the beginning of the Latin version of his book concerning the truth of the Christian religion. What he says in praise of Hubert Languet in that preface, has been carefully collected by Voëtius (12). The epitaph alone is worth a panegyric. You will find it in the same Voëtius. Note, that Languet expressed a very great affection for Mr du Pleffis at the time of the Paris massacre (13).

treatise, intitled VINDICIÆ CONTRA TYRANNOS, is ascribed to him [E]. The Latin letters, which he wrote to Sir Philip Sidney, were printed at Frankfurt in 1633 (e). Those he wrote in the same language to the Camerarius's, father and son, came out in 1646, and were reprinted with some others (f) in 1685. The fine preface (g), prefixed to those letters, contains a noble encomium upon him.

A large collection of those he wrote to the elector of Saxony, his master [F], during the course of his negotiations, was published at Hall in 1699. I must not forget what Thuanus relates of a conversation he had with him in 1579 [G].

Some say, he is the author of the book de Furoribus Gallicis (15), but without any good grounds (16). It was believed in his family, that he wrote the famous apology for the prince of Orange; which they inferred from his sending a copy of it to each of his relations, as a thing of his own writing. Nevertheless Grotius (17) ascribes this apology to another Frenchman, who was called Peter de Villiers (18).

[F] They have published a large collection of letters he wrote to the elector of Saxony. Mr Ludovicus, professor in the university of Hall, procured that edition. We should have been still more indebted to him, if he had added an Index to it, and if he had taken care, that the faults of the Printers, or transcribers, in the proper names, had been more carefully corrected. It is a wonder he put no preface to that book, and that the editions of Germany being generally valuable for the indexes there should be none in Languet's letters, which wanted it more than many other books; because each letter contains several particular facts, which have no connection with a general subject. Here is the title of that book: Arcana seculi decimi sexti. Huberti Langueti, Legati, dum viveret, & Consiliarii Saxonici Epistolæ secretæ ad Principem suum Augustum Sax. Ducem & S. R. I. septemvolum. Ex APXELIO. Saxonicis descriptis primus à Musæo edit Jo. Petr. Ludovicus. The abbot Nicaise assured me, that the life of the author, written by Mr de la Mare, would be prefixed to it; but that did not prove true. It was published by itself in the town of Hall in 1700, in 2mo. If it had come to my hands soon enough, this article had been better and fuller. I refer you to Mr Bernard (19), who gives a very large and exact account of that piece: it is well written, and very curious.

[G] We must not forget a conversation, which Thuanus had with him. He became acquainted with Languet at the Baden waters, in the year 1579, and was so charmed with the carriage and fine discourses of that worthy man, that he thought he never could part from him. This is the encomium he bestows upon him; which I relate, because neither Voësius nor Mr Teissier have mentioned it. 'Argentina Badam ventum, ubi Thuanus Languetum vacuum nactus ita mordicus per triduum ei adhæsit, ut ab eo divelli non posse putaretur. Ita candor hominis illum ceperat, insigni probitate, judicio non solum in literis, sed in publicis negotiis, quæ tota vita sub variis principibus magna fide gesserat, præditi, ad hæc rerum Germaniæ callentiss. ut Germanos ipsos res patrias suas doceret. Toto illo tempore cum eo assiduus, nisi quantum aquis sumendis impendebat, cum multa didicit, tum breviculum manu ipsius perscriptum, quod & nunc servat, postquam hinc discessit, ab eo accepit, quo generalis Germaniæ status, sicut hodie est, comitorium jus, circulatorum nemerus, consiliorum ordo describitur (20). From Strasburg he came to Baden, where Thuanus, finding Languet at leisure, stuck so close to him for three days, that it was thought he could not be parted from him: so taken was he with the candour of the man, his remarkable probity, and his judgment, not only in matters of learning, but also in public affairs, which he faithfully transacted, during his whole life, under various princes: add to these his thorough knowledge of the affairs of Germany, in which he was able to instruct the Germans themselves. He spent that whole time with him, excepting as much of it as was employed in drinking the waters; during which he not only learned many things, but likewise received from him a small manuscript, which he still keeps, describing the present state of Germany, the rights of the Diets, the number of the Circles, and the order of the Councils.' He says, that Languet shewed him a German lord, who was at a window with his wife, and afterwards asked him with a smile, If it was in your choice, would you prefer such a handsome woman before the archbishopric of Cologne? Thuanus, not knowing what was the drift of his question said nothing. Languet explained to him the mystery, telling him, that this German lord was the count of Issemburg, who had lately resigned the archbishopric of Cologne to marry Joan de Lignes, sister to the count of Aremberg. He added, that the suppression of celibacy in Germany was inconvenient to the great Protestant lords; for whereas in the time of Popery, they made their daughters Nuns, with a certain prospect of seeing them some time or other raised to the dignity of an abbess, in some very rich convent, they were obliged to marry them in a country where people multiply very fast (21).

LANSBERGIUS (PHILIP) a Mathematician of the XVIIth century, was born in Zealand (a) in 1561 (b). He was minister of the word of God at Antwerp in 1586, and afterwards at Ter-Goes in Zealand for several years [A]: and at last being declared emeritus, he retired to Middleburg (c), where he died in the year 1632. The titles of his works will be seen below [B].

[A] He was minister for several years. Voësius (1) at page 237, says he was minister at Ter-Goes thirty nine years more or less, but at page 341, he says only twenty nine years. This is doubtless an error of the press; but I confess, it is uncertain whether it consists in the subtraction or addition of X. It is one of the two.

[B] The titles of his works will be seen below. Chronologia sacra libri VI. printed in 1626. Prognosticata Astronomiæ restitutæ, printed at Middleburg in 1629. Triangulorum Geometricorum libri IV. printed at the same place in 1631. Uranometria libri III. printed at the same place the same year. Commentationes in motum terræ diurnum & annum, & in verum aspectabilis cæli typum, wherein he openly declares for the system of Copernicus, and even pretends to perfect it. He wrote this work in Dutch; but it was translated into Latin by Martin Hortensius, and printed at Middelburg in 1630. Fromondus, a doctor of Louvain, confuted it in his Ant-Aristarchus, five orbis terræ immobilit. Lansbergius, who lived not long enough to reply, left a son, who answered Fromondus, and at the same time Morinus, Regius professor at Paris, and a Dane called Peter Bartholinus. This answer, intitled, Jacobi Lansbergii Medicinæ Doctoris Apologia pro commentationibus, &c. printed at Middelburg in 1633, was confuted by a new book of Fromondus printed in 1634, with the title of Vesta, or Ant-Aristarchi Vindex. I think the dispute stopped there.

LARROQUE (MATTHEW DE) in Latin Larroquanus, one of the most famous ministers the Protestants have had in France, was born at Leirac a little town of Guienne, near Agen in 1619. The misfortune he had to lose his parents just before he came of age, who for their rank and virtue were among the most eminent of their town, was followed soon after by the loss of his patrimony, nor is it known by what accident, or by whose fraud it happened. This was so far from discouraging him, that it animated him more vigorously to seek consolation in his studies, and to add to his classical learning, the knowledge of Philosophy, and especially of Divinity. He made a very great progress in them, and was admitted minister with applause. He was obliged to go to Paris two years after his admission into the ministry, in order to oppose the cavils of those who endeavoured to ruin his church. He could not overcome them; but he met with favourable conjunctures on other accounts. He preached sometimes at Charenton, and was so liked by the dukes de la Trimouille, that she chose him to be minister of the church of Vitre in Bretagne, and afterwards gave him many marks of a particular esteem. The same did the prince (a) and the princess of Tarente, and the dukes of Weimar (b). He served that church about twenty seven years, and applied himself to the study of the fathers with unparalleled ardour. He quickly gave public proofs of the progress he had made in it; for the answer he published to the motives of conversion of a certain minister (c), who had changed his religion, was full of their testimonies. The books he afterwards printed, extremely raised his reputation [A]. He contracted a very close friendship with Mr Daillé and his son, which was kept up by a frequent correspondence of letters. The journey he made to Paris, procured him the acquaintance of several learned men [B]. The church of Charenton resolved to call him thither in 1669; but the envy of some false brethren was so violent, that they used all artifices to prejudice the court against him, inasmuch that his majesty enjoined that church to lay aside their thoughts of him, notwithstanding the deputy-general of the Protestants (d) offered to be answerable for the good conduct of Mr de Larroque. It was a very great concern to him to be slandered; but the testimony of a good conscience was his remedy. He was invited to be both minister and professor of Divinity at Saumur. He accepted the first employment, but refused the latter, as judging it prejudicial to the study of ecclesiastical history, which was his favourite passion. He was preparing for his journey to Saumur, when the intendant of the province (e) forbade his undertaking it. He appealed

[A] The books he afterwards printed, extremely raised his reputation. He published in 1665, an answer to a book of the gentlemen of Port-Royal, intitled L'Office du St Sacrement, &c. the office of the holy sacrament, or the tradition of the church concerning the Eucharist, collected from the holy fathers, and other ecclesiastical authors. This answer was very much esteemed: 'Mirā cum solertiā nimis Catholicorum virorum, qui ut legentibus fucum facerent SS. Patrum textum vel mutilaverant, vel pravo commento inquinaverant, pias fraudes vel impias dicam nescio, rexit. Mirati sunt omnes nihil inter respondendum illum fugisse, nihilque vindicandum intactum fuisse, tantā sagacitate ac diligentia unum quodque expendens officium, ut in ejus mellesem nemo pedem, vel Spicilegii causa intulerit (1). — He with amazing sagacity detected the pious, or rather impious frauds of the Catholic writers, who, to deceive their readers, had either corrupted the text of the holy fathers, or perverted it by their false comments. It was universally admitted, that in his answer, nothing should escape him, or be left untouched, which wanted vindication, while he discussed every particular with such uncommon industry, and ability, as to leave no room for any one so much as to glean after him.' As much as this book deserved admiration, it did not come up to the excellent work which this author published some years after, with this title, Histoire de l'Eucharistie. There were two editions of it in less than two years, and it was translated into English. The author did not put his name to the first edition; but he did to the second, which is that of 1671. It is true, it appeared there under some disguise by the Bookseller's fault, who undoubtedly mistook a g, for a q, in the author's manner of subscribing his name (2). From whence it has happened that several controversialists of the Romish communion have named him Larroque, instead of Larroque. He printed at Geneva in 1670, two Latin dissertations, de Phostino & Liborio, wherein, among other things, he shewed some errors of Petavius concerning the epocha of Photinus's condemnation. He confuted in a third dissertation what Mr David had urged against the first. After this he engaged in the defence of his deceased friend Mr Daillé against two learned Englishmen: That book is intitled, Observationes in Ignatianas Pearsonii

Vindicias, nec non in Beverigii Annotationes. — Observationes on Pearson's Vindication of Ignatius, and on Beveridge's Annotations. He had almost finished his reply to Dr Beveridge's answer, but being desired by some of his friends to drop that dispute, he readily complied with their request. His book concerning the conformity of the discipline of the reformed churches of France with that of the primitive Christians, came after those I have mentioned, and was followed by a treatise on the communion in both kinds, in answer to a book of the bishop of Meaux. This is what we find in the life of the author prefixed to a posthumous book published by Mr de Larroque his son in 1688. We find no mention there of the tract concerning the nature of the church, nor of that concerning the Regale; which two pieces must be added to the foregoing books. As to this posthumous book it is intitled, Matthæi Larroquani Adversariorum sacrorum libri tres. Opus Posthumum. Accessit diatriba de legione fulminatrice in qua expenduntur Veterum testimonia quibus hæc historia vera habita est. Authore Daniele Larroquano M. Filio. — Sacred Observations, in three books, by Matthew Larroque. A posthumous work. To which is added a dissertation on the Thundering Legion: wherein are considered the testimonies of the ancients upon which this history has been founded, by Daniel Larroque, the son of Matthew. Mr de Larroque the son, who had already given proofs of his knowledge and ability, is the author of the dissertation De Legione fulminatrice. He informs us that his father had undertaken an ecclesiastical history, and had finished the three first centuries, and begun the fourth. It is to be hoped the public will some time or other be obliged with that excellent work.

[B] The journey he made to Paris, procured him the acquaintance of several learned men. Among others Mr Justel, Mr Amproux (3), and Mr Conrart. They, and Mr Daillé and his son, and Mr Allix were the Protestants he had the greatest affection for. He made himself known also to several learned men of the Romish communion, particularly to the abbot de Marolles and Mr de Launoi. Several letters of these two gentlemen, and especially of the latter, were found among his papers (4).

appealed against that unjust prohibition: the church of Saumur earnestly solicited the necessary permission, and obtained it; however, he did not think proper to make use of it, nor to enjoy a place in spite of the intendant. He continued therefore at Vitré, where his pen was not idle. Three of the principal churches of the kingdom, that of Montauban, that of Bourdeaux, and that of Rouën, desired him for their pastor. he accepted only the invitation of Rouën, where he ended his life, at sixty five years of age, the thirty first of January 1684, after having established his character not only as a learned man, but also as an honest man, and a good pastor (f). He had united all these different characters [C], which are but too often divided. See his eulogium in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, in the fifth article of the month of March, 1684.

LASCARIS (CONSTANTINE) left Constantinople, his native place, in 1454, and retired into Italy. He was one of those who restored in the West the knowledge of the Belles Lettres. He taught this first at Milan, whither he was invited by Francis Sforza. After them he went to visit cardinal Bessarion at Rome, from whom he received several marks of friendship. He went afterwards to Naples, where he taught Rhetoric, and the Greek tongue with applause. At last he went to Messina, where he remained till his death. He drew a great concourse of scholars thither, and among others Peter Bembo, who was promoted to the dignity of a cardinal, by Clement VII. He left his library to the senate of Messina: It was composed of excellent books, which he had brought from Constantinople. The senate had honoured him (a) with the right of freedom, and his funeral was ordered at the public charge. His marble tomb in the church of the Carmelites, has been ruined by the injuries of time, and never was repaired (b). Our Lascaris is author of some books [A].

(a) In 1465.

(b) Taken from Jerom Ragusa, in Elog. Sculorum.

[A] He is author of some books. They concern the Greek Grammar: Aldus Manutius printed them with some other small pieces of the same nature in Greek and Latin. Besides these, Lascaris made a collection of the learned men, who flourished antiently in Sicily (1).

(1) The Jesuit Jeron Ragusa has inserted it in his Elogia Sculorum, printed at Avignon, in 1690.

LASCARIS (JOHN) surnamed Rhyndacenus (a), was of the family of Lascaris, which has produced some emperors of Constantinople. He took sanctuary in Italy, after the destruction of the Eastern empire in the XVth century, and was very kindly received by Laurence de Medicis. This great favourer of learned men thought him proper to be employed in making a collection of the best books which were in Greece, and to that end deputed him to the Sultan [A]. This deputation had a happy success,

(a) Perhaps from a town called Rhyndacus between the Hellespont and Phrygia, mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus.

(1) Paul Jovius is here mistaken; for it was not Bajazet II, but his father Mahomet II, who caused Bandini to be arrested, and sent him to Laurence de Medicis in the year 1478. See Guillet's History of Mahomet II, Tom. II, pag. 310, & seq. and pag. 439. Note, That Mr Wicquefort is very much mistaken in this matter: See his Traité de l'Ambassadeur, Tom. I, pag. m. 269.

[A] Laurence de Medicis deputed him to the Sultan. Twice, if we may believe Paul Jovius, who adds that this Sultan loved Philosophy, and had a particular esteem for Laurence de Medicis. It is necessary to set down the words of that historian; for I must compare them with those of Varillas. It is a point of criticism. * Is (Laurentius Medicus) tum absolvendæ Bibliothecæ studio tenebatur. Ob id * Lascarem, ad conquirenda volumina Byzantium cum legatione ad Bajazetem bis misit: nec defuit honesta petenti, nunquam Barbarus Imperator, quippe qui erat totius philosophiæ studiosus, Averroisique sectator eximius, & de Laurentio privatim tanquam de illustri cultore virtutis, optimè sentiret, quum paulò ante Bandinum percussorem fratris, fuga in Asiam elapsum in catenis ad supplicium tradidisset (1); singulari quidem religionis, atque justitiæ exemplo; quod ille immane scelus in templo ausus, merita poena plectendus censeretur. Itaque Lascaris tuto abdita Græciæ percrutatus, quum patriæ opes victoribus cessissent, nobiliora divitiis antiquæ dignitatis volumina collegit, ut in Italia servarentur (2). (2) Jovius, Elog. cap. xxxi, pag. m. 74. * He (Laurence de Medicis) was then intent on completing his library. For this purpose he twice deputed Lascaris to Constantinople to Bajazet, nor did the Sultan discourage the well intended errand, being himself addicted to the study of Philosophy, and a celebrated follower of Averroës, and having also a particular regard for Laurence's virtuous character, to whom he had a little before ordered Bandini to be delivered up in chains who had fled into Asia, for the murder of his brother; an eminent instance of religion and justice, in giving up an offender to condign punishment, for so horrid a crime committed in a church. Therefore Lascaris being permitted to ransack the hidden treasures of Greece, though the riches of his country had been swallowed by the conquerors, yet he collected volumes of antiquity much more valuable than cefs, for the Grand Seigneur permitted Lascaris to search all the libraries, by which means an infinite treasure of rare learning was transported into Italy. After that Lascaris went into France, where he had the esteem of Lewis XII, who sent him to Venice, in quality of ambassador [B]. He went from thence to Rome in the pontificate of Leo X, and

'than richer, in order to their being deposited in Italy.' Varillas thought this narrative of Paul Jovius was too dry, and therefore he has embellished it with abundance of circumstances, as if, instead of faithfully translating another man's work, he had been employed to turn it into a romance. Here is his account (3): 'Laurence de Medicis received Lascaris with open arms; and committed to him the care of his library: one day as they discoursed about the means of enriching it, Lascaris recollected that Bajazet II, emperor of the Turks had an inclination for Philosophy, and having caused Averroës's commentaries upon Aristotle to be explained to him, would probably not be unwilling to have the Peripatetic writings preserved from the wreck of learning. Laurence de Medicis promised to furnish him with all things necessary for a voyage to Constantinople, if he would engage in that design. Lascaris took him at his word, and embarked without any other credentials, than what Laurence de Medicis gave him to his factors. However, he found access to the Grand Seigneur, and was introduced to his highness, who received him much better than he expected. They had a very long conversation, and Bajazet expressed to him all the esteem, an infidel was capable of, for the virtue of Laurence de Medicis, and permitted him (on his account) to buy up all the manuscripts which were to be sold in his empire. His highness appointed persons to conduct him to the places where he knew there had been libraries, and to prevent those who had plundered them, from selling the books too dear. Thus Lascaris had the conveniency of going through all Greece, and collecting those rare volumes, which are still preserved, in the king's library. However, he brought only one half of them in the first voyage he made: because the pleasure of shewing his patron the authors he had recovered, and which were supposed to be lost, would not let him stay from Florence any longer than two years. But Laurence de Medicis sent him back three months after, desiring him to continue his search, wherever there had been learned men. Lascaris waited again upon Bajazet, and received from him new civilities. He searched all Peloponnesus, and returned as it were in triumph, in a vessel laden with the remainder of the spoils of the Greek tongue. But he had not as yet placed his manuscripts in the sumptuous building designed for them, when Laurence de Medicis died, and left Italy in a calm, which was not of long continuance. The French army entered Florence, and plundered the books as well as the other effects of the house of Medicis.' Here are not only many circumstances, which Varillas has forged to embellish and enlarge his story, but also some falsifications; for he supposes, I. that Lascaris had no credentials to the Grand Seigneur. What is then the meaning of these words of Paul Jovius, Byzantium CUM LEGATIONE ad Bajazetem missi? II. That the rare volumes collected by Lascaris, are in the French king's library, the French army having plundered the books and other effects of the house of Medicis, in the time of Charles VIII. To confute this historian in this particular, we need only put him in mind, that he himself says in another book (4), that the house of Medicis was plundered by the Florentines, before the troops of Charles VIII, entered into Florence. He says expressly, that the Florentines plundered the prodigious collection of statues, pictures, BOOKS, and medals, which foreigners came to see with admiration in the palace of Medicis. Note, that the books of this library, which may have been brought into that of the French king, were conveyed thither by another channel than the expedition of Charles VIII. This removal is more modern; see Father Jacob in his treatise of libraries: he will inform you that Catherine de Medicis brought among other things to Henry II, her husband, the manuscripts of the famous library of Medicis, which were put into the royal library, where they are still preserved (5).

When it shall be proved that Varillas had any other authority than the eulogies of Paul Jovius, for what he says of Lascaris in his Anecdotes de Florence,

I will see, whether I am wrong in accusing him of being the inventor of most of the circumstances he has mentioned. If he had met with what Jovius remarks, in another book, he would have given us a relation yet much more paraphrastic: this would have been a scene full of decorations. Jovius relates that the basha Cherseoglis got leave for John Lascaris to search all the libraries of Greece, when, by order of Leo X, he went in quest of old manuscripts. 'Nec illud quidem erga literarum studia eximia benignitatis officium prætermittendum videtur, quod Lascaris, quem supra memoravimus Græcorum nobilissimo, pariter atque doctissimo antiquos codices jussu Leonis decimi conquiriti, cunctas Græciæ bibliothecas imperato ad id regio diplomate, liberè excutiendas aperuit (6). — Nor must that good office of his to the Republic of Letters be forgot, in procuring for Lascaris, that noble and learned Greek, whom I before mentioned to be sent by Leo X, to search for ancient manuscripts, the Grand Seigneur's leave to examine all the libraries of Greece.' This historian had been saying that this basha having turned Mahometan out of spite, preferred in his heart the Christian faith, and had a crucifix concealed in a closet, which he worshipped in the night, when no body could discover him. He shewed his crucifix to John Lascaris, who afterwards related all these particulars to Jovius. The disgust which induced him to an outward abjuration of Christianity was this. He was going to be married to a great beauty, when his father falling in love with her, resolved to take her from him, and marry her himself. This injury so enraged the son that he retired to the neighbouring garrisons of the Turks, and afterwards to Constantinople, where Bajazet gave him a very kind reception, and promised him one of his daughters in marriage. The young man turned Mahometan, quitted his name of Stephen, and took that of Achomat, and Cherseoglis, and became son-in-law to Bajazet (7). What paraphrases and flourishes should we not have seen in the Anecdotes of Florence, if Varillas had come to the knowledge of this Latin passage? Nam, ut ceteri ferè omnes à prima pueritia per delicias Christianis parentibus erepti, sed jam pland vir (Cherseoglis) ita à majorum religione discessit, ut nunquam ex arcano veræ pietatis oblivisceretur. Is Cherseobii reguli in Illyrico, ad montem Nigrum filius, quum adamata ei sponsa quæ erat à Stirpe Serviciæ Despoti, ad paratas nuptias duceretur, concupivit eam illico, quod esset egregiæ venustatis: proci oculis improbus pater, omnemque pudorem superante libidine, sibi statim impotenter excluso filio nuptias celebravit, frustra reclamantibus propinquis, qui id facinus filio contumeliosum patrique & domui infame detestabantur. Itaque juvenis tantæ injuriæ indignitate commotus, præcæpitque adus desperatione, &c (8). I leave others to examine whether Jovius has not confounded the voyages which John Lascaris made by order of Laurence de Medicis, with the voyage he supposes that he made into Greece under Pope Leo X. Bajazet died before the pontificate of Leo X, and I question much whether Cherseoglis had any great interest with the succeeding Sultan; and it is certain, he was never in so great a capacity of serving John Lascaris, as in Bajazet's reign.

[B] Lewis XII. . . . sent him to Venice in quality of ambassador.] I find he sent him thither in 1503, and 1505. See Peter Bembo in the History of Venice (9), where he mentions the occasion of those embassies, and the substance of the ambassador's speech. Vianoli (10) affirms, that in 1507, the republic hearing of the league of Cambray, dismissed Lascaris ambassador to Lewis XII, but how could this league be then known, which was not concluded till December 1508? See the margin (11).

What Mr de Wicquefort says of this embassy, is not very complainant. The Pope, says he (12), 'knew, when it was too late, the fault which he had been guilty of, in making choice of an impetuous and ridiculous minister. John Lascaris, whom Lewis XII, sent on an embassy to Venice in the year 1503, was not much better. He was descended from a family which had formerly given great princes to the empire of Constantinople, and was very learned, but knew nothing and made another voyage into Greece, from whence he brought some young gentlemen to be educated in the college which was founded on mount Quirinal, in order to preserve the right pronunciation of the Greek tongue (b). He returned into France in the reign of Francis I [C], and having staid there some time, he went to Italy again, and died at Rome of the gout, being about ninety years of age. He was buried in the church of St Agatha. Tho' he had no settled income, he had always wherewithal to supply his expences, and yet he was intirely regardless of his domestic concerns, and loved to live great. His indolence did not suffer him to compose many books (c) [D]. He understood Latin very well, and did not think it beneath him to be corrector of the press [E]. I must examine Gyraldus's relation [F]. I omitted, nothing at all of the affairs of the world. Besides, he had a very mean presence, and lived to very low and sordidly, that instead of appearing like an ambassador, and doing honour to the king, his master, he affected to imitate the false modesty of those who giving themselves up intirely to contemplative Philosophy, profess an affected poverty and something of the manners of a Cynic. His commission was the more difficult to execute, because he had orders to borrow money, and to make an alliance, at a time when the inclinations of the senate were not at all in the French interest; because the affairs of that king were not in a very good condition in Italy. Laurence Suarez de Figueroa, ambassador from Ferdinand the Catholic king, who did not fail to make his advantage of the discontent of the republic, which could not bear that king's sending them a pedant instead of an ambassador, said in full senate, that they might judge how the king of France would use them, if after the conquest which he pretended to make of the kingdom of Naples, he gained his ends, and could tyrannize over Italy as he pleased; since in his very troubles and necessities he despised the senate so much, as to send them a Greek Philosopher, who was just come from the college.

Paul Jovius says nothing of it, which is the reason why Varillas said nothing of it neither. His paraphrase on that historian imports, that Lascaris not knowing what to do, engaged himself with Charles VIII. And that being a man fit for business, he had an embassy, given him to Venice, which he honourably discharged in the reign of that monarch, and of Lewis XII, his successor. At last, Leo X being made Pope, invited Lascaris to Rome to be one of his council (13). This, according to Varillas, was Lascaris's last employment; which is a manifold mistake; for this Pope did not make him his counsellor, but director of a Greek college (14), and afterwards this learned man had some employment at Paris. I take it to have been that of the king's library-keeper, which I ground upon a letter, wrote by James Tufanus to Angelus Lascaris, the son of John, in which are these words (15). 'Jani patris tui excellentem in Romana lingua, nedom veitra, peritiam pluribus hic verbis ne fusius persequar, illud certe dicam: Græcæ literaturæ quantum usu, quantum scientia præcellat, ex hoc intelligi vel maxime posse, quod cum ex cunctis vestri generis hominibus de sententia doctissimorum delectum princeps noster Franciscus accersendum esse censuerit, ut Museo, quod in hac urbe longe omnium principe multo celeberrimum speramus excitatum iri, propediem, velut alter Apollo præficeret. — I shall not mention particularly your father's great abilities in the Latin, much less in your own language, but cannot forbear observing, that his superior knowledge in the Greek learning may be even most certainly demonstrated from hence, that out of all your learned men our king Francis made choice of him to preside like another Apollo over the library which is going to be established in this great city.' Here follows a passage, which though not free from faults, will however serve for a proof of this matter: it is taken from James du Breul's Antiquities of Paris (16). Emanuel Chrysoloras had Budæus, as the same author testifies, were the first, at whose solicitation king Francis I, founded his library of Fontainebleau, and afterwards appointed royal professors, as the same author says. Lascaris & Budæus authoribus, Franc. I. Bibliothecam Fontenablaem instruxit, indeque anno 1530. linguarum & mathematicum professores. Nam ceteri sunt adscriptitii. There are many things to be censured in this passage. I. Tifernas was called Gregory and not Angelo. II. He died in the XVth century, how then could he come to Paris in 1523? Father du Breul had been saying that Chrysoloras, who died at Constance the fifteenth of April 1415, had taught him Greek. This was sufficient to shew, that he did not live till the reign of Francis I. III. It is absurd to pretend that John Lascaris, a native of Greece learned the Greek tongue of an Italian (17). IV. It is a gross ignorance to say, that in 1523, he and William Budæus were young scholars. Budæus was then fifty six years old, and was looked upon as the most learned man, and the greatest Grecian in France. V. Genebrard's passage cited by du Breul signifies that John Lascaris came into France after Tifernas, and after the death of Laurence de Medicis. He who cites it, did not understand it. Note, that Lascaris returned into France in the year 1518 (18), and that he continued there in 1528 (19). Which shews that Moreri is guilty of a gross fault, for he says that he died a little after Leo X, was made Pope.

[E] He understood Latin well, and did not think it beneath him to be corrector of the press.] The passage of Erasmus, which I have quoted in another place (22), shews, that John Lascaris was master of the Latin tongue, Jovius gives him the same commendation. 'Valebat Latina facundia, ita ut versus, qui extant percriberet (23). — The verses he has published prove him master of the Latin tongue.' Besides these two testimonies, and that of Tufanus (24), I could add some others, if it were necessary. Note, that Lascaris was not pleased with the commendation given him by Erasmus, in the dialogue intitled Ciceronians. He joined with the malecontents, who wrote satirical verses at Paris against the author of that dialogue (25). He was too exceptionous and angry without reason; for these are Erasmus's words: 'De Jano (Lascaris) quoniam adhuc superest, dicendum est parcius. Morum comitate generis nobilitatem præ se fert, acri judicio vir, multæ in Epigrammatibus argutiæ: poterat inter Ciceroniani cognominis candidatos numerari, ni crebræ legationes ac Regum negotia revocassent hominem à Musis (26). — As to John Lascaris, since he is yet living we must say the less of him. His great complaisance shews his noble birth; he was a man of great judgment, and a fine writer of epigrams; and had not his frequent embassies and state employments diverted him from his studies he might have been reckoned amongst the candidates for the Ciceronian honours.'

As for his being corrector of the press, read these words of Henry Stephens (27): 'Quid verò dicturos (27) Henr. M. illum Musurum & Janum Lascarin putamus, in quibus primis Græciæ reviviscere cepit, & qui principes in pandendo nobis ad linguæ Græcæ adyta itimelovendum de nere fuerunt? quid, inquam, dicturos remur, si, Vitis Stephan. quum ipsi tantum honoris arti typographice detule- rint ports, that the family of Medicis being expelled Florence, Janus Lascaris wandered about for some time, till Leo X, sent for him to Rome, that after the death of this Pope he was sent for into France by Francis I, who having made use of him in the foundation of a college and library, deputed him to Venice, where he continued a long time; and that at last, after the death of Clement VII, he was persuaded to come to Rome by the promises of Paul III, where he died soon after, leaving a son who was called Angelo (29). I observe here first a great omission. Gyraldus says nothing of the embassy to Venice under Lewis XII. I further observe, that he supposes Francis I sent Lascaris to Venice, in the quality of Legatus (Ambassador). I believe he is mistaken. Note lastly, that he did not know this learned Greek was at Rome in the year 1532, under the pontificate of Clement VII. See the twenty eighth letter of Bunel, wherein he says, that he saw John Lascaris at Rome in that year (30).

LASICIUS (JOHN) a Polish gentleman (a), made himself known in the XVth century by the productions of his pen [A]. Genebrard has given him a very indifferent character. He makes him a perfect Proteus, a weather-cock in matters of religion. 'This man, says he (b), favoured the Trinitarians about the year 1565: but soon after became a Calvinist, and after this a Bohemian or Picard brother [B], and

[A] He made himself known by the productions of his pen.] It is said in Gesner's Epitome (1), that he composed a book in his mother-tongue, wherein he learnedly and effectually confuted the new Samofatenians and Arians, and also wrote a treatise against their errors in Latin, addressed to Duditius. The Oxford Catalogue takes notice of his book de Diis Samogitarum, cæterorumque Sarmatarum & falsorum Christianorum: item de Religione Armeniorum & de initio regiminis Stephani Batorii, at Basil, 1615, in 4to. His Historia de ingressu Polonorum in Valachiam anno 1572, & Dantiscanorum clades anno 1577, at Basil, 1582. His veræ Religionis Apologia & falsæ Confutatio, printed at Spire, in 1582, with Collectio variorum Autorum de Russorum, Muscovitarum, & Tartarorum Religione, Sacrificiis, & Nuptiarum, ac Funerum ritu. This is the work Genebrard speaks of. It is proper to take notice, that there is to be met with in it, a Latin translation which Lasicius made of a manuscript given by the great duke of Muscovy, in the year 1570, to a Protestant divine, who accompanied the king of Poland's ambassadors (2). 'Qui (Johannes Rokita) Anno Christi 1570. jussu seniorum suorum, Serenissimi Regis Poloniæ Legatus in Moscoviam comitatus, ipsi à sacris fuit Concionibus. Hic cum ipso Magno Moscoviæ Duce, Basilio (vocatus in arcem Moscoviensem die 10 Maii) colloquium habuit, & in magna Procerum gentis ejus frequentia fidei suæ rationem reddidit. A quo etiam (die 18 Junii) Librum Ruthenicis characteribus (quorum illic usus est) enarratum, accepit, quo summa Religionis Moscovitiæ continetur. Qui liber à Domino Johanne Lasitio Latio donatus Spiræ Nemetum Anno 1582 typis editus est, una cum Responsionibus, quibus Errores Moscovitarum deteguntur & refutantur. — Who (John Rokyta) in the year 1570, was appointed to attend as chaplain to the king of Poland's ambassadors to Muscovy. Here he had a conference with the great duke himself, Basilus, being called into the castle of Muscovy, on the tenth of May, and gave an account of his faith before a large assembly of the grandees of that nation. From him he also received, on the eighteenth of June, a book written in Runic characters, which are there made use of, containing the sum of the Muscovite religion. Which book has been translated into Latin by John Lasicius, and printed at Spire, in 1582, together with an answer in confutation of the Muscovite errors. Regenvolius has said the same thing. 'Hanc fidei Confessionem, à se, mandato Principis Moschi, conscriptam, Rokita toti Senatui ipsius, eo præsentem

Colloquium hoc; & Quæstiones ultrò citroque inter Moschovitarum Principem, & Rokitam Ministrum habitas, descripsit Latino idiomate, Joh. Lasicius, in Theologia Moschovica, Spiræ Nemetum, An. 1582 editâ: cum refutatione superstitionum Russicarum, & Evangelicorum, atque ipsius Lutheri defensione (3). — Who, at the command of the great duke of Muscovy, drew up this confession of faith, and, in his presence, presented it to the whole senate. The author of this history saw the very book in the library of a certain eminent patron of learning. This conference, and the arguments which passed between the Muscovite prince and Rokita the divine, have been published in Latin, by John Lasicius, in his Muscovite Divinity, printed at Spire, in 1582; together with a confutation of the Muscovite superstitions, and a defence of Lutheranism. In the following remark will be mentioned another work of Lasicius.

[B] A Bohemian, or Picard Brother.] The preface before his history of the Bohemian Brothers, informs us (4), that at first he embraced the reformation according to the Zuinglian opinion, upon the lesser Poland, being reformed by some divines from Zurich; that afterwards having heard that the churches of the greater Poland, which had shaken off the yoke of Popery, had some of them received the confession of Augsburg, and others that of Bohemia, he enquired very particularly into the reasons of this difference; that he made a visit to the greater Poland, and after that to Bohemia, Germany, and France, where he examined every thing with great exactness; that no doctrine, or confession of faith, pleased him so much as that of the Bohemian brothers, and that finding this subject had never been yet treated of, he undertook the history of it; that he employed himself in it several years, and composed a work divided into eight parts, and intitled Origo, Progressus, Reliquæ tam prosperæ quam adversæ nec non Mores, Instituta, Consuetudinesque Fratrum Bohemicorum. — The rise, progress, prosperity, and adversity, manners, institutions, and customs, of the Bohemian brothers. That about the year 1585, he sent it to the churches in Bohemia, and desired and in 1582, in a book he printed at Spire on the religion of the Muscovites (c), he declares himself a Lutheran. It is to be feared, that the weight of his sins will be so great that he will next year turn Mahometan, and afterwards Atheist. To this tends what he observes in p. 16. of that book, that there are a great many variations in the Hebrew, Greek and Latin manuscripts of the scriptures, the Heretics having expunged some things and corrupted, altered, and added others, which he proves from the fine testimonies of Erasmus, Beza, Castalio, Francis Lucas, and Francis Junius. He is strangely incensed against those who hold Mahomet to be Anti-christ, and appropriate to him the number 666 mentioned in the thirteenth chapter of the Revelations. He declares himself the defender of all sorts of intemperance (d): at which those who had once seen him would cease to wonder, for his gross bulk shews him born only for his belly, if he were the same I had some knowledge of at Paris, and whom I furnished with arguments against those of the Trinitarians, about the year 1567. This is what Genebrard says; but it will deserve very little credit, if we consider with what severe calumnies, he treated those who were not Catholics. Lasicius travelled very much, and had the character of envoy of Stephen Battori, king of Poland. He was living in the year 1599. These last particulars will be proved in the remark [B].

desired them to publish it, after having made such alterations and additions as they should judge necessary: that not finding his expectations answered, he sent a more correct copy of his work, in 1599, to the baron Charles of Zerotin (5), humbly beseeching him to make use of his authority and purse, in printing that manuscript; but that all this had no effect. At last, one of the Bohemian brothers published the eighth book of this history of Lasicius, in 1649, with an abstract of the other seven. This is the title of that edition: Johannis Lasicii nobilis Poloni Historie de Origine & Rebus gestis Fratrum Bohemorum

The happy genius which was observed in him procured him the liberty of being instructed together with his young master; by which means he grew so learned, that being enfranchised, he obtained of the archbishop of Granada, the mastership of the grammar-school, belonging to the church of Granada. He worthily discharged that office for the space of twenty years and as he was no less esteemed for his virtue than for his parts, he met with a very advantageous match [B]. He published several poems (b) [C]. Some say, that Cle-

He says so himself, in an inscription which is given us by Don Nicolas Antonio (1). Hæc Joannes Æthiops Christianicola ex Æthiopia usque infans advectus excellentissimi & invictissimi Gonfali Fernandi à Corduba Ducis Sueffæ, Gonfali magni Hispaniarum Ducis Neopitis servus, ab ipso infantie lacte simul nutritus, cum ipso à rudibus annis liberalibus artibus institutus & doctus, & tandem libertate donatus, Granatæ ab illustrissimo pariter & reverendissimo Petro Guerrero Granatensi Archiepiscopo extra omnem aleam doctissimo, S. [C] He published several poems. One upon the battle of Lepanto, another on the death of Pius V, and a great number of epigrams. Their titles are: Aufriados libri II, five de victoria navali Joannis Austriaci ad Echinadas Insulas. De obitu Pii V, ejusque in Philippum regem studio. De augusta regali corporum ex variis tumulis in unum regale templum Escorialis translatione, atque illinc in Granatensē Regiæ Joannæ, Epigrammatum, five Epitaphiorum libri II. a Granada 1576. — The Aufriad in two books; or, the Naval Victory of Don John of Austria, at Lepanto. Of the death of Pius V, and his affection for king Philip. Of the august translation of the royal bodies from their several sepulchres, to the royal church of the Escorial, and from thence to queen Joan's church at Granada. Epigrams, or Epitaphs, in two books. At Granada, 1576. The inscription, which I have inserted in the first remark, is taken from this last book; and as the author observes, that he was then fifty eight years old (8), one might expect to conclude from hence, the year of his birth. A man who is in his fifty eighth year, in 1576, must have been born in 1518. But we must take care how we reason in this manner; for though Latinus's epigrams and epigrams were published at Granada, in 1576, it does not follow that the inscription we speak of, was made in that year. This consequence would not hold, though we were sure he was then alive; but it will be much less conclusive, if we suppose he died in 1573, as his epitaph imports (9). This we may be certain of, that since he died in 1573, that inscription could not be made after that year; and consequently the author must be at least fifty eight years old in that year, and could not be born after the year 1515. Nicolas Antonio would deserve censure for not having mentioned, if he could have done it, the year, in which Latinus said he was fifty eight years old. I could wish, for the rarity of the thing, that our Latinus had found a place among Mr Baillet's Poets.

- [D] Some say, that Clenard brought him from Ethiopia into Spain. The author of the Academie des Sciences (10), tells us, that Clenard, departing from the court of Fez, 'was only followed by an Ethiopian, his disciple, with whom arriving at Granada, in 1542, he wrote an elegant letter to the emperor Charles V, and died the same year, and left his Ethiopian disciple (known by the name of John Latinus) so well instructed in learning, that he composed a fine Latin poem upon the victory at Lepanto.' I have several reasons to believe, that here are some falsities. I. Latinus says he was but a child, when he was brought from Ethiopia into Europe (11). This could not be true, if he came from Africa to Spain with Clenard, in 1542. He was then at least twenty seven years old. II. He says, that from his childhood (12) he was educated and instructed with Gonzales Fernand de Corduba, his master, who at last gave him his liberty (13). Would he have spoken in this manner, if he had been indebted for all his learning to James Clenard, as Mr Bullart supposes? III. He says nothing which has the least relation to Mr Bullart's account. My third observation persuades me, that Aubertus Miræus is mistaken in saying (14), 'Discipulum reliquit (Clenardus) Joannem Latinum Æthiopem (quod prodigii simile est) Rhetorem Illiberitanum, cujus Poëma exstat panegyricum de navali Joh. Austriaci ad Echinadas Insulas victoria.' He (Clenard) left a disciple, John Latinus, a Moor, (which is almost a miracle) schoolmaster at Granada, whose panegyric poem on the naval victory of Don John of Austria, at Lepanto, is now extant. Doubtless Mr Bullart was deceived by this passage of Aubertus Miræus; but he has added to it a fault of his own, in supposing that Latinus was brought into Europe by James Clenard, in the year 1542. His error probably proceeded from this. Clenard says (15), that being sent to Braga to set up a school there, he produced his three Moorish servants before his scholars, and commanded them in Latin to perform certain postures. These Moors had learnt, by his family conversation, Latin enough to understand what he commanded them in that tongue. 'Erant mihi Servuli tres, quos supra (16) nominavi, non sane periti Grammatici, verum domestica consuetudine tantum consecuti, ut me perciperent, quicquid dicerem, & contra Latine responderent, licet identidem peccantes in Priscianum. Hos in ludum productos, dialogos agere jussi, spectantibus discipulis, & cum eis multis de rebus sermonem miscbam, attentissimo auditorio, adeo miraculi loco fuit, quod Æthiopes loquerentur Latine. Hæc, Dento, inquam, falsa, &c.' From this story it might easily be concluded, that John Latinus was a disciple of this learned Grammarian.

[E] Moreri's faults are very gross. I. It is not true that Gonzales Fernand de Corbuba made our Latinus a slave, when he was still in his cradle. The inscription abovementioned (17), clearly intimates, that he and Latinus were almost of the same age; and therefore Gonzales, whilst he was in his cradle, must have made expeditions into Africa, or by sea, if it were true, that he made Latinus a slave. I would fain know why Moreri did not faithfully translate his originals. He had the book of Don Nicolas Antonio before his eyes; why was he not contented to say, that Latinus was a slave to Gonzales Fernand de Corduba? does this signify, that Gonzales himself had taken this Ethiopian, and afterwards (18) brought him into Spain? II. Latinus's employment at Granada was not merely to teach the young scholars of the cathedral. He publicly taught the Latin tongue to all comers; which was the custom of the schools of cathedral churches, as Mr Joli shews in one of his books. III. It is a great piece of ignorance to tell us of a poem, intitled Aufriados (19). This can admit of no excuse from the original, since Nicolas Antonio does not use the genitive case Aufriados, without adding libros duos.

LAUDICE, sister and wife of Mithridates, deserves a place in the list of persons of unhappy memory. Her husband meditating a vast design, stole from his court in order to view incognito, with a very small attendance, the situation of the places where he had determined to make war. Laudice hearing no news of him, fancied that he was dead, and would return no more; and instead of afflicting herself, gave her self up to the most filthy pleasures. The return of her husband gave her great uneasiness; she found it necessary to conceal her irregular conduct, and could contrive no better way of doing it, than by poisoning Mithridates. She was preparing for it, but one of her servant-maids betrayed her, and discovered the whole affair. Mithridates made no scruple to put such a wife to death (a). A modern author (b) falsely affirms, that this monarch was actually poisoned by his wife; but that being accustomed to his antidote, he recovered, tho' not without difficulty. Those who puzzle themselves with what Justin says, that Laudice had lain in, in her husband's absence [A], raise scruples out of nothing. I have spoken elsewhere (c), of another LAUDICE, sister to this, and still more wicked than she. Justin is unjustly said, to contradict himself in speaking of these two women [B].

[A] Laudice had lain in, in her husband's absence. This lying-in was regular: Mithridates could not be offended at it; the computation of time allowed of his being father of the child which was born of Laudice in his absence. What makes me say so is, that Justin observes, that this prince was congratulated at one and the same time, both for his return, and for the birth of a son (1). No body durst have complemented him on a scandalous and notorious proof of his being a cuckold. Whence then, some will ask, came Laudice's uneasiness? probably she was with child, or afraid of being so, from her having had commerce with her gallants after her lying-in. Here is the reason, that, to conceal her adulteries, she endeavoured to destroy her husband. 'Laudice cum perisset cum crederet, in concubitus amicorum projecta, quasi admissum facinus majore scelere tegere posset, venenum adveniienti paravit (2). — Laudice having given up herself to her gallants, upon a supposition of her husband's death, to conceal one crime by a greater, prepared to poison him on his return.'

[B] Justin is unjustly said to contradict himself. Freinshemius charges him either with this, or with confounding history egregiously. Aut contradicit sibi auctor, aut historiam mire confundit (3). His reason is, that Justin relates in other places: I. That (4) Laudice, the widow of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, was killed by her subjects, for poisoning five of her children. II. That (5) Laudice, widow of Ariarathes, king of Cappadocia, was married to Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, whilst her brother Mithridates was preparing to succour her against the same Nicomedes, usurper of Cappadocia, in prejudice of Ariarathes, son of the deceased king. This accusation of Freinshemius is without foundation; for Justin speaks of two Laudice's queens of Cappadocia. The first had married one Ariarathes, who died in the war of Aristonicus, about the six hundred and twenty second year of of Rome. The second was sister to Mithridates, and wife of Ariarathes, who succeeded the former. Here is therefore neither contradiction, nor confusion. Note, that Justin has been censured in some places where he is right, and passed over in silence, in a great many others, where he is wrong. The commentator, in insum Delphini, has renewed Freinshemius's accusation.

LAUNOI (MATTHEW DE) one of the most violent Leaguers in France, had been several years minister of the Reformed church; but having committed adultery, and despairing of a relaxation of discipline on his behalf, he returned to the communion of Rome. I dare not affirm, what I have read in some famous authors, that he was a priest when he turned Protestant [A], but if he was not then one he certainly became such, after his renouncing the communion of the Reformed. Though he had been branded at Sedan, for his adultery in the most ignominious manner [B], yet he was received with open arms by the Catholics. They made collections for him (a), they gave him a canonry in the cathedral of Soissons, and the cure of St Mederic at Paris (b). He made use of his tongue, his pen, and all the industry he was master of, to foment the rebellion of the Parisians (c); and made himself so considerable in the horrible faction of the fixteen, that he presided in all the assemblies which were held to consult the death of Barnabas Brisson, president in the parliament of Paris [C]. If he had not very narrowly escaped, he had kept company with those whom the duke of Mayenne caused to be hanged for having promoted the execution of that great man (d). He retired into Flanders (e), where I believe he spent the rest of his days. He published some books of controversy, and among others one concerning the motives of his changing his religion [D], and an answer to the calumnies, he pretended the ministers had spread against him. He is very weak in his answer to the accusation of adultery [E]; and in the ninety fifth book (2), with a very considerable addition: for in enumerating the reasons, which had induced this man to leave the Protestants, the punishment he had to fear, on his being convicted of adultery, is not forgotten. He returned into the pale of the church, says Thuanus; whether he repented of his errors, or was weary of his wife, or feared the punishments which the Protestants inflict on those who were convicted of adultery. Rursus seu penitentia ductus, sive uxoris pertæsus, & adulterii poenam, cujus convictus fuerat, metuens, ad sacerdotium reuersa uxore redierat (3). I shall by and by mention another passage in Thuanus, where the same things are partly repeated. I pass by these words of Du Verdier Vau-Privas (4): 'Matthew de Launoi, first a priest, afterwards a minister of the pretended Reformed religion, is now returned into the pale of the Christian and Catholic church.' Thuanus's authority is sufficient to prove what I advance. Let us see whether there is any room to doubt that Matthew de Launoi was a priest when he turned Protestant. The scruple I make, is built upon the silence of the man himself upon an occasion, where one would think he ought to have mentioned his priesthood. I do not regard, says he (5), what they say of my calling, before they drew me out of the bosom of the Christian and Catholic church, and of my deserting my former office. For I have been always in public office and authority ever since I finished my studies; and notwithstanding my youth, which was then very raw, and far from maturity, I behaved myself with credit and honour, to the satisfaction of those with whom I was concerned, till some ministers, and others of their sect, turned my head with their illusions and dreams. And the esteem they had for me was such, that as soon as I was listed in their party, which was in the year 1560, they forced me to accept of an employment among them, in which they were so hasty, as not to give me any time to consider of it, they were so afraid of losing me. Nay, they obliged me to make but one probation sermon; and even, as soon as they heard me enter upon the subject, being content with my beginning, they ordered me to stop, and admitted me among them, to send me into Champagne.

The same thing is repeated

[B] He had been branded at Sedan, in the most ignominious manner.] The Memoirs of the League say (6), (6) Tom. VI, that being convicted of having got a cousin of his with child at Sedan, where he exercised the holy ministry, he was hanged there in effigy.

[C] He presided in all the assemblies . . . which were held to consult the death of Barnabas Brisson, president in the parliament of Paris.] See the Chronologie Novenaire of Peter Victor Cayet (7), where you will find a more particular account than in these words of Thuanus: 'Matthæus Launæus qui olim Presbyter, postea egerata majorum religione Minister uxorem duxerat, ejusque pertæsus ad sacra redierat . . . principem locum in its conciliabulis semper tenuit (8).'

[D] He published some books of controversy, among others, one concerning the motives of his changing his religion.] It is intitled, The Declaration and Confutation of the false Suppositions and perverse Applications of some texts of the holy Scriptures, which the ministers make use of in these latter times to divide Christendom; with an exhortation to the said ministers, to re-unite themselves, and to bring their auditors to the Catholic, Apostolic, and Romish church, from which they ought not to have separated . . . by Matthew de Launoi, and Henry Penetier, late ministers of the pretended Reformed Religion, and at present returned into the pale of the Christian and Catholic church: the whole digested, and divided into three books, by the said de Launoi. The Epistle Dedicatory (9) to king Henry III, tells us, that these two ministers met in the borough of Guines, in the re-conquered country, the first of June twenty ninth of 1576. Penetier being returned thither from England some time before, and the other newly come from Holland. It was there, say they, that they drew up this work, and resolved to make an open abjuration of their heresies.

(9) It is dated from Paris the twenty ninth of September, 1577.

[E] He is very weak in his answer to the accusation of adultery.] He owned himself a frail man, and liable to fall into that sin (10). He does not confess the fault he is accused of; but alledges, in his justification, only some little cavils. 'My accusers, says he (11), are wrong as to the time for want of a good memory;

and as his conduct in the time of the league made him appear to be a profligate man, no credit ought to be given to the stories that he published against the Protestants [F].

mory; for in 1574, I was in Holland. They involve themselves in several inconsistencies, adds he, they say, it was a young woman, who had been intrusted with me, by honest people, and fearing God; and afterwards they say, she was a servant maid. Now there is a great deal of difference between the one and the other. For when a young woman is given in trust, this supposes she is of a good family, and has wherewithal to live, so that she is not a servant maid of six or seven livres a year. Besides, they had a mind to aggravate this pretended fact: for it would be a greater crime to corrupt a young woman of a good family, intrusted to one's care, than if it was a meer servant maid, who hires herself for wages, to serve and stay as long as her service is liked, or till some other occasion makes her leave her place. This is but a sorry defence: I have cited an author above (12), who says that Launoi got his own cousin with child. It was probably a young woman sent to him during the persecutions of France, for then several Protestants fled to Sedan. Now as Launoi was not very rich, and his refugee had not perhaps wherewithal to pay for her board, it is probable enough that by reason of her domestic services, she was to him instead of a servant maid; and so without any contradiction, some might say, that he had lain with his servant maid, and others that he had lain with a young woman, that was intrusted to his care.

Here is another pretended contradiction. 'They say, that being convicted of the fact before the consistory, I confessed it to three or four of them; they are uncertain as to the number (13). But they do not say how I was convicted: It was not, adds he (14), by being surprized in the fact, by the judge himself, attended with his sergeants, and others of his court. It was not by unexceptionable witnesses, for people do not call witnesses on such occasions. It was not by a violent presumption; for if they had had any, they would have very much transgressed, according to their own discipline. A presumption is grounded either upon the too great familiarity of the parties, or upon the woman's being with child. If they grounded their presumption upon familiarity, they should have given us notice of it, in order to preserve us by good remonstrances from falling into sin: so that they would be greatly to blame, for having suffered the evil to run on, without interposing by a brotherly charity, or requisite censures. If they grounded their presumption upon the maid's being with child, it is not sufficient to accuse me, much less to condemn me. It would be a fine law, if a servant maid should commit a folly in her master's house, and be got with child, that the master should be guilty of it. What reason is there for that? Fathers and mothers cannot sometimes preserve their own daughters, though they keep them close. How then should a master be accountable for a servant maid's being with child, whom he cannot always have under his eye? It would be much better to be one's own servant. Such a presumption therefore is of no force. But when they saw that young maid of a good family, with child, as they say, they should have sent for her, and examined who had got her with child, and then they had known the truth. But they forgot to do it; and therefore they cannot alledge a presumption, without condemning themselves: and after all, it would be of no force. It would be easy to shew the weakness of this defence, would one be at the pains; but the thing not deserving it, I only say, that though he had put this maid out of the way, they might have had convincing proofs of her being with child; so that he could take no advantage of her not being confronted and interrogated.

The following pretended contradiction is not much better than the former. 'They say, that I have been convicted before their consistory, which according to them, was composed of seventeen ministers, and thirteen elders, who make thirty persons. Now they maintain, that I was convicted by that confession, which, say they, I made before three or four: It was not therefore their consistory; for there would be twenty six or twenty seven persons wanting (15). A vain and childish cavil. It was not pretended that he had confessed his fault before the whole consistory; but that without confessing it before this assembly, it had been proved upon him; and it was added, that he had confessed the charge in particular to three or four persons.

He complains (16) that they equally condemned them both of adultery; and to the same penalties. Now adultery, as distinguished from fornication, is committed between, or by, married persons; and yet they say, she was a maid; she did not therefore commit adultery in that sense. This is a pitiful argument; for to commit adultery, properly speaking, there is no need that both the parties should be married, it is sufficient that one of them be so.

The last thing he objects, is the respect of persons (17): he pretends, that they had shewed great indulgence to the like faults; he names the persons and places; and whether he was willing to find a greater conformity between the crime he was accused of, and that whereof he accused some of his brethren, or whether he had other reasons, some servant maids appear almost always in his recriminations. He names a minister, whose name was prefixed to some fine books, and who was called in Holland the Stroon Predikant (18); if we may believe him, this handsome minister made himself formidable to his landladies, by his attempts upon their servant maids, and admirably made use of the maxim of a Roman Poet.

Ne sit ancillæ tibi amor pudori (19).

Blush not to love an humble maid.

I shall observe in the following remark, that Launoi was not a man honest enough to injure the persons he slandered.

Let us make a little digression. Either clergymen should be permitted to marry, or forbidden to keep young servant maids; for the prodigious concubinage of priests, which hath scandalized the public for so many ages, owes its original to the permission of having women about them, to manage their houses. The intention of the superiors was, that they should confine themselves to the business of servant maids; but they easily suffered themselves to be persuaded to serve to some other purpose: the office of a concubine seemed so convenient to them on all accounts (20), that their masters had not much trouble to bring them to it. Since Luther's reformation, the priests have by degrees, grown less scandalous; but still at this day their maids, unless they be very old, are very much suspected to serve them doubly. Generally speaking, in all religions, if any leud business happens, which occasions complaints against unmarried churchmen, it is almost always on account of their maids. The reason is plain: the temptations on both sides, and the opportunities of sinning, offer themselves more readily and conveniently: and hence it is doublets, that the easy casuists do very much extenuate the sin of a maid got with child by her master. The Latin of the lower age, furnishes us with a term in this case, which is very expressive. At first, the word facaria was taken in a good sense; it signified a woman or a maid, who served in the house, and dressed her master's diet; but afterwards it was made use of only to signify the concubines of the clergy (21): the reason was, that most of their maids continued indeed to be their cooks, but besides that also lay with their masters. Let us conclude, that it ought to be a rule of discipline in all countries not to permit young unmarried clergymen to keep young maid servants.

[F] No credit ought to be given to the stories he has published against the Protestants. Though we should pass over the horrible crimes he committed during the League, we should have reason to charge him with forgery, in regard to many things he relates of the ministers, as being very remote from probability. He says (22) that the ministers who fled to Neuchâtel in Switzerland, being resolved to ruin a young man, who had preferred the study of Physic to that of Divinity, accused him of many false doctrines; but that one of the most famous amongst them, opposed their ill design: that they continued however, to prosecute this Physician: 'Some calling him a Sorcerer, others an Anabaptist, others an Atheist. Others said to him. How? Dare you say, that you do not believe the doctrine of Mr Calvin, by whose mouth we all speak? He answering, that Calvin was a man subject to error as well as others: they immediately cried out, O cursed Philosophy! O execrable blasphemy! For to speak against Calvin's doctrine, and against the intention and will of these venerable doctors, is in their opinion to speak against God, and lie against the Holy Ghost; and they make no conscience of prosecuting a man for it to death, if they can come at him (23).' What he makes these ministers say concerning Calvin (24) is so far from the spirit and maxims of the Reformed church, and so inconsistent with the title of the Protestants, that there needs nothing more to convince us, that he himself forged, and that very grossly, the slanders which he published. So that it can be no prejudice to the memory of those concerned, if I take the liberty of inserting here the following scandalous story. 'The eldest Capel had, a little before, plaid such another mad trick to a lady of a good family, who coming to Sedan upon business, did not care to be known. However, his over curiosity made him so bold, as to use the name and authority of the duke and dukes of Bouillon, to get into the chamber of the same lady, and to see her. At the same time, he plaid another prank, which discovered the height of his leudness, as well as madness. For coming out of church, moved with an odd sort of devotion, he took a young gentlewoman by the arm, who was very handsome and modest, and of an honourable family, and desired leave to speak one word to her. This being granted him, he whispered her in the ear, Madam, being charmed with your good qualities, as well of body as of mind, and especially with your wit, I take the liberty to beg a favour of you; but I would not by any means be denied. The lady answering, that she could grant nothing, before she knew what he designed to ask; he said to her, I would beg one hour of amorous diversion with you: we can easily meet in a place, where there shall be no body but you and I. The poor gentlewoman perfectly ashamed and amazed at the instruction given her by this reformed Philosopher, just coming from sermon, ran in haste to her mother, to whom she declared the whole matter: which the mother, by way of complaint, told me the same day (25).'

[G] That which relates to two pretended demoniacs is the most ridiculous. This is the story in short. Matthew de Launoi was a celebrated minister in 1562. Some Merchants of the Low-Countries heard him preach with so much satisfaction at Aî in Champagne, that they detained him at their houses, as he was preparing to go for England. They admired both his language and diligence, for he often preached in six different places within the space of twenty four hours. They made him their minister at Tournay. Whilst he was there, it was reported that the exorcisms of the Catholic church had delivered several people possessed by the devil. This displeased the Calvinists: they feared their sect would be decied, if their ministers had not the gift of driving out devils, which was conspicuous in the Apostles, and was still to be seen among the Papiists. They therefore suborned two persons, a man and a woman, and engaged them to pretend to be demoniacs, for a certain sum, and a pension for life. These two persons plaid their part very well; and hereupon Matthew de Launoi, who knew nothing of this contrivance, was desired to go and undertake their relief. He went, and his prayers and sermons proved so effectual, that these two demoniacs, after a great many fetches, managed according to direction, declared that the devil was gone out of their bodies. The miracle was published in all places, and procured de Launoi a very great veneration. The cheat was discovered some time after; because the two persons who had played the farce, not receiving the promised reward, brought their action against the seducers. A Weaver, and a Rope maker acquainted de Launoi with this in Holland in the year 1574 (26). This was the motive of his conversion, if we believe the Franciscan Sedulius, who has inserted this story at length in his answer to the Alcoran of the Franciscans, printed in 1607 (27). He says, that Matthew de Launoi being still alive at Brussels, and writing several books against the Calvinists, could vouch the truth of it (28). Spondanus has inserted the substance of this fine story in his Annals (29). There is no need of shewing the absurdity of it; since all the world knows, that the Protestants professedly decry all the miracles of the latter ages, and maintain that they were by no means necessary to justify the reformation. Apply here what I have said in the remark [T] of the article CALVIN.

LAUNOI (JOHN DE) in Latin Launoius, doctor of Divinity in the university of Paris, was born in a little village of Normandy near Coutances. He performed his studies in Philosophy and Divinity at Paris with so great success, that he became a formidable disputant. He was admitted a priest and doctor of Divinity in the year 1636 [A], nor did he make any use of these two characters to get money, and beg benefices [B], he had no other aim but to become learned; and to this end, he continued

[A] He was made a priest and doctor of Divinity in the year 1636. I have not followed Moreri, who affirms, that John de Launoi entered into holy orders in 1634, and took his doctor's degree in June the same year. My reason is this. In the elogy of this doctor it is said that he began his course of Divinity in 1633, and made such a progress in it in two years time, that he exceeded some persons of great parts and learning, and was exceeded by no body. It is added that he was promoted the following year to the priesthood, and to his doctor of Divinity's degree. Studium Theologicum ingressus est anno trigesimo tertio supra millesimum & sexcentissimum, illudque biennio integro ita percurrit, ut multos ingenio & eruditione præstantes vinceret, & a nemine vinceretur. Ad ordinem sacerdotalem anno insequenti, & ad Theologiæ Magisterium egressus (1). I thought it proper to place this following year, after the two years of his study of Divinity; for if it be put immediately after the year 1633, it would follow, that this doctor had studied Divinity one year as a scholar, after he had been admitted doctor. I would not however in this claim any preference of Mr Moreri: for the author of the elogy did not perhaps pretend to much exactness in these chronological punctilios. Has he not said (2), that after John de Launoi had spent five or six years in the study of Philosophy and scholastic Divinity, he began his course of Divinity, and spent two years in it? Is this expressing ones self according to the strict rules of exactness. But however negligent he may have been, have preferred his authority to that of Moreri.

[B] ... nor did he make any use of these two characters to get money, and beg benefices. This requires a remark; for a person exempt from avarice and ambition, is so rare to be found, even amongst doctors of Divinity, that when we meet with one, the public ought to be particularly acquainted with it. Such examples ought to be consecrated: all possible care should be taken to do them justice: this will prove an excellent instruction to the public; for it shews that providence does not entirely deliver up mankind to corruption. I say then that John de Launoi expressed from his youth a great indifference for the things of this world; which excellent disposition did not change, when he grew older; for he then gave up to his brothers and nephews all his pretensions to his father's estate (3), and would never hearken to the advice of his friends, who put him upon asking for prebends and livings. To get rid of their friendly solicitations, he declared to them that he found himself neither qualified for singing nor preaching, and that he would not enrich himself with the wealth of the church, whilst he could not do her any considerable services by the functions of his ministry. tinued to pursue his studies with extreme industry. He did not content himself with reading all sorts of books; but resorted to the most learned divines [C], in order to consult them upon all the difficulties he met with (a). He received the most considerable improvement from the learned conversations of Father Sirmond [D]. It was not for his own particular satisfaction, but for the use of the public, that he heaped up such a vast treasure of learning; for there are very few divines who have published a greater number of books [E]. He made no scruple to attack several false traditions [F], and was one of the strongest supporters of the privileges of the Gallican church. He extended his criticisms even to subjects of devotion: and some saints would

*Shou'd a'rice once distract the poet's head,
He still may write, but never can be read.*

I must not forget John de Launoi's will. The preface of it was very remarkable. After the common form, In the name of God, &c. it went on thus, I shall quickly make an end of this will, for I have but little wealth (6). Mr Menage has not mentioned all; it also gave the reason why the testator left but little wealth, that God had given him to understand that it was much harder for a Christian to make a right use of riches, than to go without them (7). It is observable, that Mr de Launoi left more money behind him than he ever dreamed of his being found master of: an evident sign of his little concern for riches. He never took the pains of counting his money: and sometimes forgot where he had laid it. (8) Certum illum (9) fecit Launoius, plus penes se post obitum signatæ pecuniæ repertum iri, quam præstandis legatis requireretur; & revera longè plus repertum est, plique quam Launoius ipse repertum iri crederet. Sed id tantum abest ut ei vitio verti possit; quin potiùs laudi duci debet, cum illud omne quantumcunque fuerit, non avara manus asservasset usquam, sed contemptor opum animus domi projectum oblivioni penè dedisset. — Launoi assured him he would find more money at his death, than would pay the legacies he should leave, and indeed there was a great deal more found, than even Launoi could have imagined himself worth. But this was so far from being a fault, that it was rather a virtue, since the wbole sum, how great soever, had been carelessly thrown by out of contempt, and not heaped up out of avarice. We have here a proof that an indifference or extreme fondness for riches, may each produce the same effect: for there are some misers who hoard up so much wealth, that they themselves know not the extent of it (10).

[C] He resorted to the most learned divines.] Nor was he contented with that; but consulted, by way of letters, the learned men who lived in other parts of France, or in foreign countries (11); and when he went to Rome, it was not to see the antiquities, but to get acquaintance with the Litterati. Those he most conversed with there, were Lucas Holstenius, and Leo Allatius (12). Iter etiam suscepit in Italiam, non quidem ut fluvios inspiceret & maria, non ut urbes lustraret, non ut vetera artium monumenta, novæ ædificiorum moles mirabundus intueretur, sed ut consuetudine frueretur eruditum (13).

[D] He received the most considerable improvement from the learned conversation of Father Sirmond.] He proposed his doubts to him; and was answered without heat or passion. That contentious way of disputing about the sciences, too common among the learned, was not the character of this Jesuit. ‘Suam seu percontationem, seu sententiam, de maximi momenti capitibus proponentem benigne audiebat perspicacissimus & cordatissimus senex, mentem ei suam candide aperiebat, & cum esset ab omni quæ in scholis viget rixandi consuetudine alienus, abstinerebat à contentione & pugna verborum, locoque indicabat concilliorum aut patrum, quibus innixus ita fentiret (14).’ — This most humane and understanding old gentleman gave him leave to propose his doubts, and opinions on subjects of the greatest moment, and then returned his own sentiments with all imaginable candour, and being himself an enemy to noisy methods of disputing in schools, he, without making any words or controversy, freely pointed to the councils or fathers whereon his sentiments were founded. He readily discovered to his friend the authorities of the fathers and councils, upon which he grounded his opinions. Mr de Launoi examined them with great exactness, and went again to visit Father Sirmond, who hearing him discourse upon these matters, answered him; At first I understood these things better than you, but now you are much more master of them than I (15). No Jesuit had a greater share in his intimacy than de Launoi, which did not please the fraternity. ‘Cam nullum haberet inter sodales suos Sirmondus quocum fidentius loqueretur, de quo & ipsi nonnunquam conquesti sunt, crebrius invisi vehementer optabat à Launoi cui nihil erat quod minus crederet quam sibi (16).’ — Sirmond having none of his own society, so much in his confidence, which they would all sometimes complain of, was extremely pressing upon Launoi to visit him the oftner, to whom he loved to communicate every thing he knew. The Menagiana has this passage. ‘Father Sirmond said of Mr de Launoi, that when he heard him say any thing that was good he went to write a book (17).’

[E] There are very few divines who have published a greater number of books.] See the catalogue of them in the history he published of the college of Navarre in 1677. His Bookeller had often printed it by itself. The following nice remark seems to deserve a place here. ‘This (18) was his greatest favourite of all his books, whether it was that he took pleasure in this glorious testimony he had given the public, of his gratitude to that college of the faculty, which, he considered as his mother: or whether he was not altogether insensible of the pleasure of seeing all his own works particularized in this book: For he had inserted in it the catalogue of all his writings, which he chose to do himself as well to make it more exact, as to explain more readily the titles, and subjects of his smallest books, and of all his letters in particular, wisely judging, that any body else would be easily discouraged with their great number, and the large amplification of their titles (19).’

[F] He boldly attacked several false traditions.] As the arrival of Lazarus and Magdalen in Provence; the apostleship of Dionysius the areopagite in Gaul; the cause of the retreat of St Bruno the founder of the Carthusians; the vision of Simon Stoch; the privileges of the Sabbatin bull. They whose interest it was to maintain those opinions raised terrible outcries against him. He was, according to them, an enemy to religion. ‘Credi vix potest quantam initio invidiam his scriptis in se conflagavit: licet enim antiquam atque adeo genuinam traditionem propugnaret, ejusque fidem, ut ipse sæpe ad locum Tertulliani alludens dicere solebat, ex temporibus afferret, tamen qui historias quas expungebat à tenacis annis imberant, would have been struck out of the Kalendar, if his arguments had been admitted. It is worth observing what Guy Patin said upon it [G]. It was a favourable subject for berant, quive illas credulæ plebi non sine aliquo commodo suo ingerebant, eas sibi eripi ægre patiebantur, nec qui id tentasset mitius inculcabant quam si firmissima religionis fundamenta convellere decrevisset (20). — It is scarce possible to conceive what a load of envy these writings at first drew upon him: for tho' he was a defender of the ancient, and consequently the genuine, tradition, and as himself often used to say, in allusion to a passage in Tertullian, vindicated it's authority from the times; yet they who had believed from their youth the legends he had expunged, or who found their account in imposing them upon the credulity of the people, could not bear the loss of them with any patience, but cried out as violently against all attempts of this kind, as if the most important fundamentals of religion had been attacked. He was not in the least affected with their clamours, but went on still, and undeceived not only the learned, but also some of the vulgar. Vicit tamen inextinguibili constantia Launoius hominum imperitum, & male feriatarum importunas inofficiosasque querelas, & aniles eorum fabellas ita revocit, ut nullum jam patronum inveniant inter eos, qui aliquâ curâ veritatem indagant, multo pauciores quàm antea apud vulgum, & apud eos qui ne literas quidem norunt (21). He vigorously attacked the Monks in two other points (22); for he demonstrated the falsity of the pretended privileges, by virtue whereof they refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of bishops; and confuted the arguments on which they ground their claim to the administration of the sacrament of penance. Here follows what the abbot de Marolles said of him. He found the art of discovering the most hidden truths: and the lovers of them are as much pleased with him for it, as those who are unqualified to discover or value them, are uneasy at his having made such glorious conquests. However they can reproach him with nothing; and it has not hitherto been possible for his adversaries to convict him of the least falshood, or of one wrong inference from the testimonies of the writers concerning the points he has examined. It is true, what we have seen of him, is inconsiderable in comparison of what we ought to expect from him, applying himself as he does to the most serious studies upon important subjects: but the most learned will always benefit themselves by the reading of his works, either by his method, or the certain discovery of truths, for which pure religion will have no less reason to glory, than in famous superstition to be concerned at it (23).

[G] It is worth observing what Guy Patin said upon it. 'I give you notice, that I have delivered a little packet to a young man of Lyons . . . You will find in it, among others, Mr de Launoi's book, wherein he undertakes to prove, that there never was such a saint as Renatus, nor any bishop of Angers of that name. It is the same who has writ against Dionysius the Areopagite, asserting that he never came into France; and against the scapulary of the Carmelites, and against Magdalen, pretending that she never came into Province. He is a doctor of Divinity, a Norman, a man of a mean look, but learned, and especially in ecclesiastical history. Some here call him a desperate and damned spirit, whom all should avoid; who turns every year a saint out of paradise, and it is to be feared will at last expel God himself. Yet hitherto no body has answered him. One of his friends told me that he had long been a pensioner in the college of the Jesuits (24), who made use of him to approve their books; but that at last, they had discarded him, for refusing to give his approbation to a new doctrine they had a mind to publish (25). What follows, is curious; I have it from Mr Menage, and it is he who speaks (26). Mr de Launoi, doctor of Divinity, of the faculty of Paris, pretends that several of our saints never existed: which occasioned Mr Feramus to say of him *

Tu quoque, Launoi, veri indagator & index
Addita qui falsis Numina falsa doces.

In search of truth, Launoi knows no restraint,
Nor spares his pen one Legendary saint.

I made this Greek epigram upon it,

Τὸν Λαυνοῖον ὄρεε, δὲ σύρρετον Οὐρανίωνων
Ῥίψε, ποδὶς τεταγῶν ἀπὸ βηλῆ Θεσπεσίους.

Launoi kicks down the scoundrels from above,
As Vulcan once was serv'd by Homer's Jove.

They say this last verse is taken out of Homer, speaking of Jupiter who kicked Vulcan out of heaven. But that is the very beauty of my epigram; it would be ridiculous, were this verse my own: And I dare say it is thought very pretty for that application, on which Mr Dailly, the father, who was particularly conversant with Homer, has often congratulated me. The abbot Faydit has not observed that it is only the last verse which Mr Menage has borrowed from Homer: he has quoted part of the first, as if it was to be found in the Iliad; and which is worse, he pretends that Jupiter turned out the whole rabble of the gods. His words are these (27). 'Rome could not without indignation bear that Mr de Launoi, as learned as he was, should uncanonize five or six unknown saints, who in the times of ignorance had been introduced into the Breviary; and that like Homer's Jupiter, who turned out the whole rabble of the gods, with one kick on the breech, from heaven to earth, this doctor should with one dash of his pen discard from the throne of glory some saints whom Rome had too hastily placed there.

— — — Ὁ πέρυτον ἱερώνων
Ῥίψε πόδους τεταγῶν ἀπὸ βήλῃ Θεσπεσίους (28).

She has cried out against this attempt, as the most horrid sacrilege. His books have been delivered up to the Inquisition, not being able to drag the author thither. She has decried him as a man of a suspected faith, and an enemy to the saints. It is certain that Homer says no more than, that Jupiter taking Vulcan by the foot, threw him down from heaven (29). If Mr Menage said in conversation the same thing as the abbot Faydit, we must conclude from it, that he had not considered matters so narrowly, as when he took pen in hand for the public, or that he flourished on that adventure in order to make it more agreeable, and more capable of the parallel. However it be, here is a passage out of the continuation of the Menagiana, wherein Homer is made to say what he has not said. (30) Mr Godefroy the Historiographer going abroad very early in the morning on New-years-day, met in Harp-freet Mr de Launoi, who was going to the Sorbonne. He accosted him, and saluting him, said, a good morrow and a happy new year to you, Sir; what saint will you discard from heaven this year! Mr de Launoi, surprized at this question, answered him; I discard no true saints from heaven whom God and their merit have placed there; but such as the ignorance and superstition of the people have undeservedly introduced thither, and without the approbation of God, and of the learned. This answer was the occasion of the epigram I made upon Mr de Launoi, wherein I compare him to Jupiter in Homer who cleared heaven of the whole rabble of false gods, who had crept in amongst the true ones, and who giving them a kick on the breech threw them headlong from his throne, and down from the stars to the earth (31).

If it was not for fear of making too many digressions, I would say that it were to be wished that several learned men were suffered to do what Mr de Launoi has done. The sham saints are no less multiplied than the pretenders to nobility; so that as princes from time to time issue out commissions of inquiry, in order to reduce the usurpers of quality to their proper Plebeian state, the clergy should appoint some commissioners, as rigid as Boisseau (32), to examine the titles and patents of saintship. If the troops of the church triumphant should come to muster before honest commissioners, there would be found a great many Fagots, not amongst the soldiers but amongst the great officers, I mean among the saints who are daily invoked. The Kalender wants more to be reformed on that account, than with respect to the procession of the equinoxes: and whereas a bare defalcation of ten days was sufficient for this last reformation, the other would require a subtraction by hundreds and thousands. It is a long time that the year has been unable to afford a day for each saint; they must be heaped one upon another in the same places, so that we may now say with Juvenal,

I would have this understood, without prejudice to the esteem which is due to their learned compilers.

I must even acknowledge, to their honour, that they reject a great many fables, and that their sincerity exposes them every day to the same complaints which were made against Mr de Launoi. See Father Papebroch's answer (36) to the Exhibitio Errorum of Sebastianian of St Paul, a Carmelite; you will there find that this Jesuit has cashiered many intruders out of the kalender, and that upon very solid reasons. These intruders are not saints of a modern, but very ancient date. Cardinal Bessarion, seeing at Rome the canonization of some persons, whose lives he thought none of the best, cried out, that these new saints made him call in question the old ones. Assè che questi santi moderni mi fanno assai dubitare delli passati (37). But we may say, that there is infinitely more certainty in the modern, than in many of the ancient saints. We cannot doubt but the former lived on earth; and we have almost demonstrative proofs, that the latter never did. A witty man said the other day, in good company, that if he was to address to the saints, he had rather chuse the new comers, Capistran, for instance, or Thomas de Villeneuve, than St Catherine, or St Alexis. See the remark of the article P E R E Z (JOSEPH). I shall observe below (38), that the work of the Jesuit Papebroch incurred the displeasure of the Inquisition.

A canon of Passaw, a good preacher, and professor of divinity in the XVth Century, said in one of his sermons, that if there were as many holy-days as minutes, the year would not afford one for each saint, and he quotes Durandus, bishop of Mande, who observes, that there are above five thousand saints for every day. 'Tanta (inquit ille) est Sanctorum numeritas, quod totum tempus anni non sufficeret etiam si singulis horis, etiam singulis minutis, ageremus festum unius Sancti; deinde Durandum citat. Quia sicut dicit (inquit) Guillelmus in rationali pro quolibet die plura quinque millia Sanctorum concurrerent (39).' The author, who quotes the sermon of the German canon, adds, that All-Saints day was appointed to supply the want of days in the year, and to prevent the displeasure of those saints, who might be angry for having no honour paid them. Quocirca quum Pontificiorum Divorum tanta illis autoribus fere infinitio sit, in supplementum cultus Sanctorum festum omnium Sanctorum excogitatum est. Quoniam humani cultus illos appetentes esse somniant, & in suos cultores prolixos, ne omittis & preteritis Divis Stomachandi ulla causa sit, quod suo cultu orbentur: sic omnibus minutis etiam & manipularibus Divis, & non solum Patriciis & majorum Gentium, hoc omnium Sanctorum festo & Suplemento satisfactum esse putant. Atque hoc Guillelmi illius Mimatenfis Episcopi est, quasi salutari hoc pharmaco omnium divorum repulsæ & offensæ placari debeant. Durandi verba hæc sunt. Prop-ter ipsorum inquit multitudinem festare de illis specialiter non valemus. Ergo ut antea idem ait propter omnium (inquit) festorum suppletionem institutum esse festum omnium Sanctorum (40). — Therefore since the saints of the Pope's canonization are grown infinite, All-Saints day is contrived as a supplementary worship of them. Because, as they are supposed to be very fond of being worshipped, and to have a particular regard for their votaries, that there may be no room left for any of them to resent the not being taken notice of, this feast of All-Saints is esteemed a supplementary worship, not only of the bigger, but also of the lower, and every particular class of saints. And this, according to the same William Durandus, bishop of Mande, is a sort of expiatory commemoration, necessary to appease all the saints who have not been particularly recorded. These are his words. Their number is too great to allow of particular holidays for them; and therefore, as the same author has observed before, in order to supply the want of these (says he) the general feast of All-Saints was instituted. Those who make it their business to draw parallels, will not fail to remember, upon this occasion, the precaution of the Athenians, who consecrated an altar to the unknown gods (41), because they were afraid of neglecting the worship of some revengeful deities, whose names and qualities they were ignorant of. They thought they had lately suffered for it; so that to play a sure game (42), they resolved to pay their homage even to the deities unknown to them. This was the way to forget none of the gods.

[H] He furnished so many pleasant stories, that several other persons diverted themselves with relating merry stories on that subject.] Here is one of Mr de Vigneul-Marville: it is as good as that I have mentioned out of the Menagiana. 'Mr de Launoi was a terrible Critic, formidable both to heaven and earth; he has unshrined more saints, than have been canonized by ten Popes. He suspected the whole martyrology; and examined all the saints, one after another, as they do the quality in France. The curate of St Eustachius in Paris, said, "When I meet Dr de Launoi, I make a very low bow to him, and I speak to him with my hat off, and with the greatest reverence, for fear he should take away my St Eustachius, who has nothing to depend upon (43) (§ a)." These last words are very true; and here is a passage of the Valefiana, which confirms them. 'The life of St Eustachius is likewise a heap of fables; and I am very much surprised that the largest parish of Paris should have parted with the name of one of the most famous and illustrious martyrs we have, to take that of an unknown, and very suspicious saint (44).' Mr Ancillon heard Mr Daillé say, 'that one day meeting him in Mr Cramoisy's shop, a Bookseller in Paris, they expressed a great friendship and esteem for one another; and that as they parted, Mr de Launoi told him, Sir, "I strike every month one saint out of the Breviary, do you strike an error out of it (45)." If Mr de Launoi spoke in that manner, it was only in jest; for the number of saints he pretended to degrade, will bear no comparison with the months of his life. But he might, without any exaggeration, have affirmed the saints who are doubtful or fabulous, to be as numerous as the minutes of his long life. See the excellent History of the Church, published by Mr Bagnage, in 1699, in two volumes in Folio. There (46) we find so many fabulous saints and martyrs degraded, that in comparison of that ocean, Mr de Launoi's attempt is no more than a rivulet.

munities of the monks, without creating himself a great many enemies. He experienced in his latter years that he had offended a formidable party. He was forbid holding assemblies in his chamber (b) [K], as he had done for a long time once a week; and his Printer was brought into trouble [L]. He patiently bore those insults, and ceased not to labour for the public: it may be said that he died with his pen in his hand (c); for he not only had a book in the press during his last sickness [M], but also corrected the proofs the day before he died. He was buried in the church of the Minimes, as he had ordered in his will; but the epitaph which was composed the evil, in confusing the immunities the Monks pretended to, he thought it necessary to lay down this important truth, that the Pope can do nothing against the canons of councils. He wrote several letters upon that subject, which have been so well approved in England, and thought so proper to mortify the Ultramontains, that they have been reprinted at Cambridge (47). He principally attacked Bellarmine; the following account is given of his conquest over this great champion of the Pope's. 'In eo vero adversarium inter alios nactus est Cardinalem Robertum Bellarminum, qui absurdissima quæque Romanæ curiæ placita defendenda susceperat. Si quæ porro in eorum confirmationem desumpta ex sacris libris te-stimonia adduxit, clarissimè demonstravit Launois, fuisse ea in pravam detorta sensum, & aliter intellecta quàm ex sanctissimi quique patres intellexerint, & quorum sensu in exponendis Scripturis recedere, nihil aliud est quàm fidelissimos duces, & à Triden-tina Synodo datos aspernari, & in errores omnes seipsium conjicere. Si quos etiam canones aut patrum textus laudat Bellarminus, eos plerumque interpolatos ostendit Launois, & mala fide relatos. Sicque homi-nem armis Scripturæ & traditionis nudatum exponit, velut nutritum in philosophica palæstra tyronem, qui adversus invictam castrorum aciem irrito ridendoque conatu digladiatur; & tela ab Aristotele desumpta juveniliter vibrat (48). — Upon this subject he found, among other adversaries, cardinal Bellarmine, who had undertaken to defend the most absurd maxims of the court of Rome. Launois clearly demonstrated, that the testimonies he had alledged out of scripture, in confirmation of them, were all mis-interpreted, and taken in a quite different sense from what all the Fathers had understood them in; & the receding from whose authority in expounding the scriptures, was despising the most faithful guides, authorized by the council of Trent, and plunging head-long into all kinds of error. The quotations Bellarmine had made out of the canons and fathers, Launois also proved to be interpolated and unfaithful. So that he stripped his adversary of all his armour borrowed from scripture and tradition, and exposed him naked, like a freshman in the university, ridiculously disputing with a most able Professor, and brandishing Aristotle's weapons with a child's hand.' Reiserius, a Lutheran minister (49), published a book, in 1685, which, strictly speaking, is only an abstract of our Doctor's Letters.

He has put two titles to it, which are both to our purpose. The running-title is, *Job. Launoii Theol.
Paris. Anti-Bellarminus*. But the title prefixed to the book is, Johannes Launois Theologus & Sorbonicus Parisensis testis & confessor veritatis Evangelico-Cat-holicæ in potioribus fidei capitibus controversis adversus Robertum Bellarminum & alios quosdam Sedis Romanæ Defensores egregius & luculentus, nunc post obitum contra Christianum Lupum Lovaniensem, Imma-nuèlem à Schellstrate Antverpiensem, Natalem Alexan-dram Parisensem, Dominicum Galefium, & Franciscum Marchesium Romanos, vindicatus. The author of this book pretends, that John de Launois is a person fit to be put in the appendix to Illyricus's Catalogus reptum veritatis. Mr Cousin has taken it in his head, a little too late, to speak of this book of Reiserius, in his Journal des Savans; the first mention he has made of it, is in the journal of the 30th of July, 1696, and in that of the 6th of August following. These two extracts are very proper to acquaint us with Mr de Launois's character.

[K] He was forbid holding assemblies in his chamber.
Nothing was more innocent than those assemblies;
the conversation run only upon learning; however he was told, that the king desired they should be discontinued (50). The archbishop of Paris was thought to be the author of that affair, and there were some who took occasion from thence to speak ill of him. Mr de Launois neither took that liberty himself, nor would suffer this charge to be laid upon the archbishop in his presence; though he could not forbear saying, that if the accusation were just, he must be guilty of the greatest ingratitude. Hos animorum motus utcumque sedabat Launois, reique acerbiter, benigna ut poterat interpre-tatione leniebat. Absinebat ipse semper ab omni atrocitate verborum, Archiepiscopum nec incusabat ipse, nec incusari ab aliis, carpire coram se patiebatur. Sed tamen cum vir esset candidissimi pectoris, disiteri non poterat, quin si id præstitisset Parisiensis præsul, laboraret vehementer in-grati animi vitio, quo cætera omnia facile continetur (51). (51) Ibid. pag.

[L] His Printer was brought into trouble. This happened in the year 1675; he was printing his book concerning Simony, wherein, amongst other things, he writes against the Annates, and confutes the Jesuit A-zorius, who wrote a book towards the end of the XVth Century, to clear them of Simony. The copies of this work of Mr de Launois, were seized at the Printer's; those which could be found were carried away, and he was forbid selling the rest; but for a fine of fifty livres, that prohibition was taken off (52).

[M] He had a book in the press during his last sickness. Let us see what Mr de Vize (53) says of him. 'It may be said, that he died in a manner
' with pen in hand; since the day before he corrected
' the proofs of a book he had written in defence of ' the king's interests. It is an answer to an Italian ' writer, who some time before had printed a treatise
' in opposition to the right of secular princes, con' cerning the impediments to matrimony. Mr de Lau-
' noi had before maintained the quite contrary doctrine
' in a book published in 1674, wherein the rights of ' the king, and of all secular princes, are so solidly ' established, that this work may be looked upon as ' one of the most useful to the state. It was answer' ed in Italy, and as this answer took from secular
' princes their essential right, which they have to ' capacitate or incapacitate their subjects for con' tracting matrimony, this great man was not silent,
' but was taking care, when he died, of the impres' sion of what he had wrote to confute the errors
' of the Italian author. Thus all his time was em' ployed, either for the church, or for his prince; (54) It should be
' and he may be called, not only the vindicator of inferred from
' the king's rights, but also the defender of the just thence, that Mr not agree with the Mercur Gallant, with respect to lume of the the book which was then in the press. It was not, *Mélanges Critique cardinal Bentivoglio in the library of the Dominicans, and proposed to him this argument. If princes have had the power to make laws concerning the obstacles to marriage, they have it still, unless it has been taken from them. But they have had it, and it cannot be proved that it has been taken from them. Therefore. The cardinal desired Mr de Launois to write upon this subject, and to explain this argument. See the margin (54). The book was small at first, but before it was published, in 1674, it grew very large.

Dominic Galefius, bishop of Ruvo, in the kingdom of Naples, wrote against it. Mr de Launois had no sooner read the book of that prelate, but he undertook to refute it; he had scarce finished that confuta-tion (55), but he undertook to answer Father Alexander (56). His answer was almost finished, when he was seized with the distemper of which he died in a few days. This last work was already in the press.

composed for him was not permitted to be put upon his tomb [N]. I forgot to observe that he died at the Hôtel d'Etrée [O], the tenth of March 1678, being above seventy seven years of age (d). He was a man, to whom the public is greatly indebted. Had he only published the book De autoritate negantis Argumenti, he would have done great service to the Republic of Letters; for he has given a thousand fine hints in that book, to distinguish truth from falsehood in historical matters. He had disputes with several, and among others with father Nicolai a Dominican [P] and Mr Thiers (e).

He drew upon him the whole order of St Dominic, for having so freely attacked the reputation of Thomas Aquinas. The marks of respect, which his prudence and gravity made him intermix with his censures, did not prevent the resentment of the Dominicans; for after all it could not be dissembled, but that the angelical doctor was guilty of great ignorance, or insincerity, in the notation of several passages designed for the confutation of heterodoxy. Father Baron endeavoured to justify Thomas Aquinas but was not very successful in his attempt. I shall take occasion on this head to make several observations [Q]. Father Alexander laboured with much greater success to shew,

Hence it appears, that Mr de Vizé, and the elogist do not agree concerning the book which Mr de Launoi had in the press when he died.

[N] The epitaph which was composed for him, was not permitted to be put upon his tomb.

Mr de Launoi had made his will eleven years before he died, and he had desired Mr Camus, first president in the court of aids, his old and intimate friend, to be his executor. Mr le Camus faithfully discharged that trust, and desired Mr le Clement, an ancient counsellor of the same court, to write an epitaph on the deceased (57). The Minimes having read and examined it, produced a letter from their general, signifying, that this epitaph could not be admitted, since it complimented de Launoi with having always maintained orthodoxy; and some time after they declared, that both the royal and ecclesiastical authorities had enjoined them not to suffer any inscription in praise of Mr de Launoi. 'Ubi illam (inscriptionem) expendunt, attulerunt præpositi sui generalis literas, quibus renunciabatur, nec probari nec recipi à se posse inscriptionem, quâ Launio laus defensionis perpetuo veritatis, & optimæ famæ, maximæque venerationis apud probos quæritur tribuatur. Postea veritum sibi prædicarunt regia simul & sacræ auctoritate, ne ullum apicem in capella sua extare sinerent, quo Launio nomen commendaretur (58). See the Nouvelles de la République des Lettres (59), and particularly a Letter to a prelate of the court of Rome, upon the decree of the Inquisition of the seventh of December, 1690. I shall quote a passage out of it, which may be of use in the history of our doctor. The abbot, who wrote this letter, takes notice, that the court of Rome maintains it's rights with greater policy than the court of France: he observes, that the former recompenses very magnificently those that write in it's favour, but that the latter takes no notice of those who assert the privileges of the Gallican church.

(58) Elog. Laun. pag. 38.

However, says the author of that letter, if I might advise, posterity should know by some mark of honour, the esteem which has been paid their merit, and the gratitude which has been shewn to their works. But you know how far this has been observed, with respect to one of your friends. We have not had a man of greater zeal for the doctrine of the clergy of France, nor more indefatigably studious to illustrate and defend it, than honest Mr de Launoi, who besides was remarkable for the strictest impartiality. What has been done to the honour of his memory? you very well know; they would not so much as suffer on his tomb, the few compliments his friends would have paid to his merit, and the services he had done to the church of France. Nay, they did in a manner stop his mouth some years before he died, by forbidding him to continue certain conferences upon this subject in his house, where it may be truly said, more were instructed to become defenders of our liberties, than in all other places beside. Nay, it is a kind of miracle, that we have what he printed in his life-time, upon the superiority of councils, and against the infallibility of Popes, and upon other subjects of this nature; and we owe it to his particular contrivance, which was to give it piece-meal in letters, which he wrote to different persons, by that means avoiding the intolerable slavery of the censure of certain doctors of his time, without whose approbation, no book could be licensed, and who seemed as if hired to put a stop to all good books, and to put their authors into despair.

[O] He died at the Hôtel d'Etrée. The Cardinal d'Etrée, when he was only bishop of Laon, had in some measure ingrossed Mr de Launoi to himself. See Mr de Marolles (60).

[P] He had a dispute with . . . Father Nicolai a Dominican. The Journal des Sçavans, mentions three works of this author. I. His two dissertations De concilio plenario quod contra Donatistas baptismi questionem definit (61). II. His book De Jejunii Christiani & Christianorum abstinentiæ vero ac legitimo ritu juxta veterem Ecclesiæ universalis usum (62). The first of those three pieces is intirely against Mr de Launoi, who pretended that St Augustin meant the council of Arles, when he said that the error of the Donatists about the nullity of the baptism of Heretics, was condemned in a general council. Mr de Launoi drew from thence a great many consequences against the Ultramontains. The second book of the Dominican does not concern him; it is a work of which the Protestants of France took advantage, because it contains a formal condemnation of those who force Infidels to be baptized. The third work of this Monk, is against Mr de Launoi. Here is a passage out of the continuation of the Menagiana. 'I once told Mr de Launoi, that he had offended all the Jacobins by his writing against Father Nicolai, and that all of them would write against him. He answered me un luckily. I fear their penknife more than their pen (64).'

[Q] Father Baron endeavoured to justify Thomas Aquinas, but was not very successful in his attempt. I shall take occasion on this head to make some few observations. Unprejudiced persons would form this judgment of the success of his dispute, by only comparing his first piece with that of his adversary. Much more would they do so by comparing Mr de Launoi's first and second Reply, with the answer of Father Baron.

I shall only mention the pieces of this controversy. A letter of Mr de Launoi to Mr Faure (65), is that wherein he censures Thomas Aquinas. Father Baron's answer is contained in three paragraphs of the second section of the first book of his apology for the Dominicans (66). Mr de Launoi's Reply is in a letter to Mr Fortin (67). I have not seen Father Baron's Reply; but I know that his adversary refused it in a letter dated from Paris the first of August 1667 (68). I know not whether this dispute went any farther.

To give a small specimen of the judgment which the Monks formed of the genius of this Sorbonne doctor, I shall recite a few lines of Father Baron. 'Quisquis hominem privatim, seu publicis scriptis intimus noverit, etiam ex amicis, non abnuet meum de illo judicium, aut verius votum. Optandum plane, ne mores ingenuos corrumperet nimio fardum cogitationum amore, & alios jure, vel injuria carpenti, in naturam inducâ consuetudine. Unde ad minus, ut cetera omittam, illud incommodi accidet, ut magnum potius, quam bonum nomen videatur ambire, & doctiores viros voluisse innumbrare, neque, ut conveniebat sapienti Theologo, satis cordi fuerit

(60) You will find, in page 159, of his Memires, printed in 1656, the following words: His esteem for Mr de Launoi, doctor of Divinity, one of the greatest men of this age for his learning and probity, is a sign of his judgment. And indeed, such a man with him, he cannot be too careful of him: it is an inestimable treasure.

(69). — Whoever has had any intimate acquaintance, either with his person, or writings, even the best friend he has, must join with me in my judgment, or rather wish, concerning him. It were much to be wished, that a too great fondness for his own notions, and an ill habit, which was grown natural to him, of censuring others right or wrong, had not so far corrupted his great parts. From whence arose this mischief at least, to mention no more, that he seems to have been ambitious of a great, rather than of a good, name, and desirous of eclipsing men of superior learning, without having sufficiently at heart that maxim of the Physicians, which a wise Divine will never forget, alter not a wrong method which has succeeded right. For he has had the assurance to attack some traditions generally received by the faithful ever since the primitive times, which, without contradicting their creed, were even subservient to their piety, and this he has done on far slenderer grounds, than those on which they were founded; purely for the sake of getting himself a name by his great censoriousness, and taking away that of others, who are much better intitled to it, at least according to the most likely opinion. In the next leaf he opposes the character of Thomas Aquinas to that of this Sorbonist, and declares that Thomas would have made a scruple of conscience, and been ashamed of those things, which Mr de Launoi gloried in. The angelical doctor, adds he, would never have disturbed the French in their belief, that St Dionysius the Areopagite was their first apostle; he would never have robbed the inhabitants of Provence, of the glory they claim from the arrival of St Magdalen; nor the Carmelites of their descent from Elias, and of the scapulary of Simon Stock, nor the monasteries of their exemptions. He had better things to write; and even tho' he had met with some doubts, and a want of probability in these matters, he would have let them alone, and paid a due respect to those traditions which promote piety, without doing prejudice to religion. 'Habebat meliora scribenda (Divus Thomas) & subodoratus etiam, ut erat enunciat naris, aliquid incerti, aut minus verisimilis, ex medicorum præcepto, malum bene possum noluisset primus movere: atque ista longa traditione rata & firma, quæ nihil obstat fidei, profunt etiam pietati, in disputationem revocare, credidisset pertinere ad illius generis questiones ab Apostolo damnatas, quæ lites generant, non ædificationem (70). — Disputes of this kind, he would have referred to those condemned by the apostle, which produce strife and not edification.'

Pag. 121.

If all the circumstances set forth by this Jacobin were true, there is no doubt but John de Launoi was deservedly condemned, as one, who, to make himself talked off, and to satisfy his ill nature, would oppose many general opinions, which had obtained time out of mind, to the advancement of piety, without detriment to faith, and were grounded upon proofs of infinitely more weight than his objections. This last circumstance alone would be sufficient to condemn an author, let his motives on other accounts be ever so just; for, undoubtedly, a long possession deserves too much respect, as to oblige us to maintain it, every thing else being equal. But if it be just to maintain it, when it's title is not inferior to the pretensions of the innovators; how much must it be more so, to forbear all attempts to overthrow it, when it's reasons are by far the strongest? But this is not the case of our Sorbonne doctor: the traditions he opposes, have no good title, and his arguments against them are unanswerable. Now in this case, it is plain, there is all the right in the world to bring the most general and ancient opinions to a trial, especially when their falsity keeps up a criminal devotion. I desire it may be observed, that the reasonings of this doctor were of such force, as to undeceive abundance of people: but yet the abuses have not been removed: things remain still upon the same foot in Provence, and elsewhere.

They tell you still the same stories they told your ancestors, and you see there the same worship, and the same ceremonies. This proves the difference there is betwixt private persons and the public. Particular people are most of them one time or other undeceived, and yet the practice of the public remains the same. Cicero says there was not an old woman so silly as to give credit to the stories, which were formerly believed concerning hell; and he makes use of this remark to prove that fabulous traditions vanish away in time, but that true doctrines, and such as are grounded upon the nature of things, are confirmed by age; and that this was the cause of the long continuance and increase of the worship of the gods. 'Videmus cæteras opiniones fictas, atque vanas diuturnitate extabuisse. Quis enim Hippocentaurum fuisse, aut Chimæram putat? quæve anus tam excors inveniri potest, quæ illa, quæ quondam credebantur, apud inferos portenta extimecat? Opiniones enim commenta delet dies, naturæ judicia confirmat. Itaque & in nostro populo, & in cæteris, Deorum cultus, religionumque sanctitates existunt in dies majores, atque meliores (71).' Juvenal also complains, that the ancient doctrine concerning hell, was no longer believed.

Thus you see a great change in the opinions of private persons, and yet the public worship was still the same, both in Juvenal's and Cicero's time. There were still the same feasts, processions, and sacrifices, not only in honour of the celestial gods, but also in honour of Pluto and Proserpine, and the other infernal deities. This sort of inconsistency on one hand, and constancy on the other, will always be more or less observable. Some doctors of quicker sight, and greater courage than their brethren, will undeceive abundance of private persons, and yet cause no change in the public ceremonies. The ritual will last longer than the faith on which it was built. Too many people will find it their interest to maintain it, and will be industrious enough to succeed, though they can give no better reasons for it, than those alledged to Cotta in Cicero's book before cited. Among other things they urged to him the apparitions of some deities; and to prove the truth of these apparitions, they alledged the foundation of some temples, a decree of the senate, a proverb. I expected some arguments, replies he, and you bring only popular stories. 'Tum Lucilius: An tibi, inquit, fabellæ videntur? Nonne ab A. Posthumio ædem Castori & Polluci in foro dedicatam, nonne S. C. de Vatiens vides? Nam de Sagræ, Græcorum etiam est vulgare proverbium; qui quæ affirmant, certiora esse dicunt, quàm illa quæ apud Sagram. His igitur auctoribus nonne debes moveri? Tum Cotta, Rumoribus, inquit, mecum pugnas, Balbe: ego autem à te rationes requiro (73). — To this Lucilius: 'What can you esteem these things fables? Do not Nat. Deorum, you see a temple in the Forum dedicated to Castor and Pollux by A. Posthumius, and a decree of the senate concerning Vatiens? And as to Sagræ, the Greeks have a common proverb among them, who when they would assert a thing, say it is more certain than anything in Sagræ. Are not these authorities therefore sufficient to convince you? To which Cotta: 'O Balbus, says he, you fight me with popular stories; but I expect you will give me reasons.' Mr de Launoi might have made use of the same answer, and of several others; but as I have already said, there were too many people interested in opposing the innovation, and maintaining the common tradition. It looks as if they

they had well weighed the consequences of the principle which Cicero has put into the mouth of one of his speakers: I mean that they seem to have learned how to prove the truth of a tradition, from its standing the test of time, and maintaining its ground for so many ages. It is laid down in Cicero, that an opinion ill-grounded can never grow old (74). * Quid enim est hoc illo evidentius? quod nisi cognitum, comprehensumque animis haberemus, non tam stabilis opinio permaneret, nec confirmaretur diuturnitate temporis, nec una cum sæculis ætibusque hominum inveterare potuisset. Etenim videmus cæteras

* opiniones fictas, &c (75). — For what can be more certain than this? which if it had not been fully known and understood, could never have prevailed so long, as an established opinion, nor been confirmed by length of time, and grown old, together with the several ages and successions of men. For we see other opinions which are false, &c. Doubtless, the monks are led by some weightier motive than what this argument supplies, to oppose John de Launoi, and those like him. Note, by the by, that the argument drawn from antiquity, is made use of in Cicero to prove a falsity, for it is there alleged to maintain the reality and existence of the false gods of Paganism. It is therefore a principle which may lead into error; and yet the maxim, Opinionum commenta delet dies, might have been long since urged against the false worship of the ancient Greeks and Romans, since there has been no country for many ages, wherein their religion, their Jupiter and their Juno, their Venus and their Neptune, &c. are acknowledged and adored. And thus their cause is lost when once it is supposed, that, sooner or later, time will destroy false doctrines. You may please to observe, that this principle can never be admitted as a certain proof, without first determining the duration sufficient to distinguish truth from error. If a thousand years suffice, every opinion which is a thousand years old is true; but if no time be fixed, it is in vain to conclude, that a doctrine which has lasted four thousand years must be taken for certain: no body knows what is to come, or whether the fifth millenary may not put a period to what has resisted the four preceding ones. A thought of Horace is applicable to this subject.

Scire velim, pretium chartis quotus arroget annus, &c (76).

(76) Horat. Epist. I, lib. II, ver. 35.

How old then must a piece be, to be good?

I have one thing farther to observe. There is no likelihood that those who follow the steps of John de Launoi can do any service whilst things are only carried on by way of a literary dispute. The patrons of false devotion will never recede; they find their account too much not to abate an ace, and they are powerful enough to secure themselves from any violence. The court of Rome will second and support them. The Romish church seems to have adopted the religion of the god Terminus of the Roman republic. This god never yielded a title, no not to Jupiter himself: which was a sign, said they, that the Roman people should never recede, nor yield an inch of ground to their enemies (77). If any Pope should be willing to sacrifice something to the reunion of the Schismatics, some insignificant devotions, some superannuated traditions, he might apprehend as great a murmur against him, as the Heathens made against the scandalous peace of the emperor Jovian (78). The Jesuits, with all their power, have not been able to hinder the Inquisition of Toledo from condemning several volumes of the Acta Sanctorum; and it is certain that storm was raised only by the solicitations of the Carmelites, and other Monks, who were angry with Father Papebroch, and his assistants, for having rejected several acts, and old traditions, as apocryphal. They are to be commended for having merited this thunder-broke, and will do well to deserve others. The character of a Capanus (79) in this respect would be a very good one,

But by these sort of encounters with the inquisitors, they will render themselves unserviceable with respect to the reformation of public abuses; their criticisms, were they much more severe, could be of no farther use than for the instruction of private persons. The disease is past cure. You see Father Mabillon has laid down some very good rules concerning the worship of some saints, and the judgment to be made of relics (81). What did he get by it? he was answered, Physician, heal thyself. Reform first the worship paid, in some houses of your order of St Benedict, to saints as dubious as any. He was told of the injury he did to the church, and the advantage he gave the Protestants (82). Is not this shutting the door against all his good designs? Mr Thiers sets up against false relics, he examines where the bodies of the martyrs lie, he publishes some dissertations upon the holy Tear of Vendôme, and upon St Firmin. All this is lost labour. The king's council suppressed his book about St Firmin, as the bishop of Amiens had condemned a letter, which he had published upon the same question. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (83), and the third part of the Bibliotheca volante. The fruits of a discreet zeal are destroyed in the bud. They build upon this principle, that it is dangerous to abrogate old customs, that boundaries ought not to be removed, and that, according to the old proverb, we should leave the minister where we find it (84). The prosperity of the Christian Rome, just like that of the Pagan Rome, is founded upon the preservation of ancient rites (85). Consecrations must be complied with, religion will allow no alteration in them. Sed illa mutari vetat religio, & consecratis utendum est (86). In our days, said a sub-prior of St Antony, let us beware of innovations (87).

[R] Of all his antagonists, none had less regard for him than Father Theophilus Raynaud. You need only read his Hercules Commodianus, where you will meet with all the passion imaginable. Those who will not be at the pains of reading it, but shall only consider the following quotation, will easily perceive that our doctor was never so grossly abused. * Infanti vir ingenii Joannes Launoyus, cui nihil adeo sacrum fuit, quod non scelerat scriptione aliqua petulant ac plusquam censoria. Cælitibus ipsis non pepercit, imo in hoc non semel conisicavit. . . . Is cum in me quoque incurrisset, urgente quodam infomnio Marfya, qui sua deliria, imò aperte hæretica commenta, contacta extremis propè digitis in eo Antemurali, ægrè tulit, ex persona amici ac civis nostri S. Theologiz D. castigatus est: patefactis primum ejus fragoribus, quibus Herculem prætulit: Tum mendaciis, calumniis, loquacitate, scurrilitate, aliisque feminini generis maculis, quibus satyra verius quam scriptio ab eo in nos exarata, dehonestabatur: ita ut Commodi exemplo, Hercules simul terrificus, & femina, non nisi pellacis ac dolis armata, apparere voluisse in ea lucubratione videatur. Quæ causa fuit, cur Herculis Commodiani appellatione visus sit insigniendus (88). — Launoi was of so pragmatical a turn, that no thing was so sacred, which he did not pollute with his saucy, and more than satirical pen. He did not spare heaven itself, but has even here entered the lists more than once. . . . The attack he thought fit to make also upon me, at the instigation of a certain conceited Marfya, who was offended at my just touching in that out-work, upon his extravagant, and even heretical positions, has been revenged by a dollar in Divinity, my friend and fellow-citizen, after having first exposed all that blustering with which he pretended to be another Hercules; and then the lies, calumnies, tautologies, scurrilities, and such other female ill qualities, with which his piece, or rather satire against me was stained, so that in that work, after the example of

will not pass over in silence (b) that he had struck out of his calendar St Catherine virgin and martyr, and said, that her life was a fable, and to shew that he gave no credit to it, every year on this saint's day he said a mass of Requiem (i). I must observe also, that his labours against the worship established upon fabulous traditions have been of no service as to the public (k). I shall mention the judgment passed on him by Mr de Vigneul-Marville [8]. Which will give me occasion to relate a particular not much known, and which does not well agree with the little friendship there was between this doctor and the Jesuits, and with his affection for Mr Arnould. The fact is, that his opinion concerning Grace, was contrary to the doctrine of St Augustine (l).

Commodus, to have designed acting the part of a terrible Hercules, at the same time with that of a woman armed only with female falsehood. Which was the cause of his being called Commodus's Hercules. This Jesuit in another place compares him to Ithamel. Homo Ithaelita, cujus manus contra omnes, Joannes Launoy (89).

n. 73, pag. 70.

[8] I shall mention the judgment passed on him by Mr de Vigneul-Marville. Whatever esteem I have for Mr de Launoi, it must be confessed, that he had the predominant fault of critics, which is to observe no measure, and to defend the worst causes with obstinacy. His books of Extream-Union, and of Aristotle's fortune, and some others, are good pieces; but it may be said in general, that this doctor in all his writings shews much more learning than judgment and good reasoning. Commonly the principal subject is not what he handles best; but it is in incidental matters that he is so admirable, by which he frequently deceives the unattentive reader (90).

(90) Vigneul-Marville, Mémoires d'Hist. & de Littérature, pag. 267.

The author of the Journal des Sçavans, has affirmed (91), that Mr de Launoi 'can be charged with nothing less justly than defending bad causes with obstinacy. His particular character was to love truth above all things, to seek it without any prejudice, and freely to communicate it, when he had found it, &c.' Mr de Vigneul-Marville has answered (92) that there are two ways of loving truth; the one is to love it for its sake, the other, to love it in regard to oneself. . . . That St Augustine loved it for its own sake. . . . that it is quite otherwise with the generality of critics, who only love truth either for the glory it gives to those who first discover it;

LAURENS (ANDREW DU) in Latin Laurentius, professor of Physic in the university of Montpellier [A], chancellor of the same university, and first Physician to Henry IV, died the sixteenth of August 1609, as we learn from Guy Patin (a), with some other particulars, which are mentioned in Moreri's Dictionary, and which I therefore will not repeat. I content myself with supplying the defects left in that Dictionary. No particular mention is there made of the writings of Andrew du Laurens. I shall therefore observe that he published several, which were very much esteemed, particularly his Anatomy [B], which has passed a great many editions, and was dedicated by [A] Professor of Physic in the university of Montpellier. It is remarkable that before he was allowed to act as professor, he was obliged to pass thro' all his exercises again in order to take his doctor's decree a second time. 'Cum Regio diplomate Montpelii Medicinæ publicæ docendi munus obtinisset, admitti tamē non potuit, donec iterum factus fuisset primò Med. Baccalaureus, deindè Licentius, tandemque Doctor, & toties iterum de Medicina respondisset, quoties in Academia ex illius instituto opus fuit (1) Altho' he had obtained the king's grant of the Physic professorship, yet he could not be admitted till he was again made first Batchelor of Physic, then licentiate, and lastly doctor, and had gone quite thro' all the disputations required by the constitutions of that university.' Riolanus confirms this. The Seur du Laurens, says he (2), being a doctor of Avignon, was obliged to wait at Montpellier, and there read a lecture, and commenced doctor over again, at one but newly admitted.

Patin was undoubtedly not acquainted with this particular, which he would certainly otherwise have mentioned with the following remark. 'Du Laurens. . . . came to court with the counts of Tonnere, by recommendation he was made one of the king's four Physicians, and Regius professor at Montpellier, against the laws and statutes of that university, by an arrêt of privy-council, which he had much ado to get verified at Toulouse (3).' Note that he founded a physic garden near one of the gates of Montpellier, where he placed this inscription, Argus est non Briareus. — Prefer the eyes of Argus to the arms of Briareus (4). [B] He published several pieces which were much esteemed, particularly his Anatomy. It was re-printed at Paris in folio in 1600, and at Francfort also in folio, the same year. These two editions were followed by three others at Francfort, in 8vo, in 1602, 1615, and 1627. It is intitled, Historia Anatomica humani Corporis & singularum ejus partium, multis controversiis & observationibus novis illustrata (5). — The Anatomical History of the Human Body, and all its parts, illustrated with many new controversies and observations. The word novis shews that the Paris edition was not the first. It followed that of Lyons in 1593, in 8vo, which is not half so large. I have seen two French translations of the Paris edition: one by Francis Sizé and printed at Paris, in 1610, in 8vo: the other by Theophilus Gélée Physician at Dieppe, and printed at Paris in folio in 1613, together with several other pieces of du Laurens (6), translated by the same hand, or which had been before published in French by the author himself (7), or which had been collected from his lectures read publicly to the Chirurgiens in the university of Montpellier, in the years 1587, 1588. These last pieces are on the gout the leprosy, and the small pox. All the French pieces just mentioned have also appeared in Latin; they may or which is more commonly the case, out of a capricious humour getting an ascendant over them.' I will not say, continues he, that Mr de Launoi was one of those adventurers, who go in quest of truth, as knights errants formerly did of noble exploits. But then it must be confessed that a great many very learned men did sometimes look upon him as a critic who overshot himself, and did not always discover the truth he was so fond of. This will readily appear by casting an eye on the learned, who have attacked him, or wrote severe replies to him. One might have seen him covered with the dust of his daily combats, and with the bruises that he had received in the fight (93). Nay, this author adds, that in Mr Arnould's opinion he was not always orthodox: he declared himself too freely for a Divine so much inferior to St Augustine, of which the Protestants of the Arminian party, pretended to take great advantage. This gives us to understand that he did not approve the hypothesis of St Augustine about Predestination; but his opinion concerning that doctrine will be much better understood from the preface of a treatise which is not yet published; Mr Simon has inserted it in one of his letters (94), and informs us that Dr de Launoi in that work condemns the opinion of St Augustine. This letter is not very advantageous to the doctor, and gives us a very mean notion of his learning. See the Journal des Sçavans of the fourteenth of November 1701, pag. 723, Dutch edit: and the Journal de Trevoux, of August 1703, pag. 1313, edit. of France. The Journal de Trevoux of January 1702, article I, speaks of a defence of St Augustine by Father Daniel against the dissertation ascribed to Mr de Launoi.

him to Henry IV, in 1599. It is a mistake to say he improved by his conversation with Aquapendente [C]. His country has not been rightly mentioned in Lindenius renovatus [D]. ANTONY DU LAURENS, his youngest brother, was an advocate in the king's council, and died in 1647, at eighty three years of age. He married Anne Robert, the daughter of Anne Robert the advocate, who was living in 1662 be seen in Tom. II, of Laurentius's works, published at Francfort in 1621, in folio, with the Annotaciones in artem parvam Galeni, & Consilia Medica. The piece on Crises had been printed separately in Latin at Francfort in 1596, and 1606, in 8vo (8). Lindenius renovatus takes no notice of the Latin edition of Laurentius's works published at Paris in two volumes in 4to, in 1627, by Guy Patin, author of the Latin translation of some pieces written by Laurentius in his mother tongue.

The French translation of the Anatomy, printed at Paris in 8vo in 1610, has no figures, but that of Gélée, in folio. The Printer gives this among other reasons, for his suppressing them, that Laurentius ordered them to 'be added only to oblige some particular readers, not that he judged them necessary, but rather conducting to divert than instruct. Besides, he himself declares, that he left the Printer of the Latin edition to take the figures from those to be met with among common Anatomists, such as those of Paré and Guillemeau, Chirurgeons to our Most Christian kings, or of Charles Stephens doctor of Physic in the same university, which are in every body's hands: so that if there be any faults in his figures, he desires they may be imputed to the Painter and Engraver, and says, he has explained himself sufficiently in his Anatomy, so as to need no assistance from figures; nothing further being required than a view of the annual dissections, without which it is impossible to become a perfect Anatomist (9). These particulars relating to the history of that work of du Laurens, I thought the reader would not be sorry to find here.

I must add, that altho' this Physician was an excellent Anatomist, yet he could not help leaving room for criticising. Read the following words: 'All that is contained in the questions of Laurentius relates only to that part of Anatomy, which is truly physiological. In his Anatomy he has committed great errors, not such as Collado and Laurembergius have taken notice of, which are in his questions, but in facts, and in the text of his Anatomical History; which is so plainly proved, that every one who is the least skilled in Anatomy must own he is not to be defended (10).'

This Collado, or rather Colladon, has carried his censure too far; for he pretends that there is nothing at all good in Laurentius's Anatomy. John Sperlingen professor of Physic at Wittemberg has animadverted on this excessive passion. 'Hæc & plura ejusmodi Collado, says he, quæ non hic saltem, sed ubique contra Laurentium magno ferebre scriptit. Ubi ita se gerit, ut oculati videant omnes, non tam amore veritatis quam antiquitatis cordato huic contraxisse viro. Sed non abjicienda nova omnia, aliàs & ipse hic Colladon liber è medio tollendus & è bibliothecis foret exterminandus. Quem tamen multa bona, multa acutè excogitata continere, non imus inficias. Interim etiam non omnia in Laurentio falsa, sed plurima vera, plurima non absque insigni legentium commodo scripta sunt. Fallit Collado, cum inquit: Laurentii Anatome tota mendis scatet, ut de eâ verè Prophetæ querimoniam possis queri, omnis princeps ægrotat, à vertice ad plantam pedis, & non est in corpore toto sanitas: adeo omnes libri partes inlucubilibus errorum maculis imbutæ sunt, ut nescio, quâ creta aut cimolia abstergi purgarique possint. Fallit & cum scribit: Docere vis, quæ non intelligis, quomodo id præstabis? Non per te sanè, non enim potes dare, quod non habes, sed κατὰ συβιβανδον, insular duræ & stupide cotis, acutum redere quæ ferrum valet, exors ipsa secandi. Non facies sanè tuorum librorum lectores doctiores, imò si tibi fidant indoctiores: sed tum deprehenâ doctrinæ tuæ falsitate jussu perciti zelo, veræ & genuinæ medicinæ auxiliatrices manus afferent, præmium clarioris scientiæ eruncatis tuis ex suo aliorumque animis erroribus perniciosissimis metent. Ne quid nimis, Collado! Amicè tractandi publici boni causa qui laborant. Nævus si habent, & tegendi, & de- tegendi illi. Errare humanum sed errata stylo atro-

ci & lingua virulenta notare, ac è musca elephantem facere inhumanum (11). — These and a great many more of the same kind, which Colladon not only here, but every where else, objects against Laurentius with great heat. Discovering to all attentive readers by such behaviour, that he has contradicted this judicious author, more out of love to antiquity than truth. But all new things are not to be rejected, otherwise this very book of Colladon's must be self-condemned, and banished from all libraries, which yet, we do not deny, contains many good and shrewd observations. Nor at the same time is all that Laurentius has written false; there are a great many things true, a great many by which the reader may be very much improved. Colladon deceives us when he says: Laurentius's Anatomy abounds every where with errors, that we may apply to it the complaint of the prophet, every prince is sick, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, and there is no health in the whole body: all parts of his books are so full of spots of so deep a dye, that no Fullers-earth in nature can never take out. He also deceives us when he writes: you undertake to teach, what you yourself do not understand. But how is this to be done? Not by your own instruction, for you cannot give, what you have not, but by accident, like a hard and stupid whetstone, which can give an edge to steel, tho' it has none of it's own. Your books will never make the readers wiser, but on the contrary, if they credit you, more ignorant: till by discovering the falsity of your doctrine, they become influenced with a proper zeal to go over to the side of the true and genuine Physic, they obtain the prize of perfect science, by eradicating out of their own and others minds your most pernicious errors. You harp, Colladon, too much on this string! They who labour for the public good, ought to be kindly treated. If they have any faults, they ought to be corrected, but not exposed. To commit errors is natural, but to magnify them, and censure them, in a harsh style, and rude language, is unnatural.

[C] It is a mistake to say he improved by his conversation with Aquapendente. We shall clear up this from an extract of a letter of Guy Patin. Mr Hofman (12) . . . remarks somewhere that Laurentius has published a discovery in Anatomy, which he would never have thought of, if he had not learned it from Fabricius Aquapendente, at whose table he eat for some years. But this is very false; for Laurentius never studied any where but at Paris under Duretus seven years. . . . So that he never was at Padua, as I am very well assured by being Physician for these twenty three years last past, to the family of Messieurs du Laurence, who are both counsellors, and one of them master of Requests, whose father was the younger brother of Andrew Laurentius, and died not above ten years ago of a quartan ague, at eighty seven years of age, from whom I had the opportunity of meeting with all the information I could desire (13).

[D] His country has not been rightly mentioned in Lindenius renovatus. The words of the author of that book are Natus in Academia Montpelienfi (14), that is born in the university of Montpellier. This expression would be improper, even tho' the mother of Laurentius had been delivered of him in a college of Montpellier. But I am in doubt whether he was at all born in Montpellier. The author (15) quoted by Freherus affirms it. And it is no conclusive argument to the contrary, that he had a brother (16) born at Arles, for it is no extraordinary thing, that the children of the same father should be born in two different places. We must wait therefore for a clearer proof of this point, as also of these words in Lindenius renovatus, obit in patria, which mean that Laurentius ended his days at Montpellier; but in the mean time I have some suspicion that he was born at Arles, since Guy Patin has intitled him Arletensis in his edition published in 1627.

LAURENTIO (NICHOLAS), commonly called Cola di Rienzo, was, in the XIVth century, one of those men whom the providence of God makes use of, from time to time, as a sort of theatre, whereon is exhibited to view a representation of the vicissitudes and uncertainties of human life [A]. He was the son of a mean Vintner, and a Laundress. His application to study in his youth, and the natural strength of his parts, made him very eminent. He became exceedingly eloquent, and had by heart all the fine passages of Cicero, Livy, Julius Cæsar, Valerius Maximus, and Seneca. He was extremely fond of antient inscriptions, and understood the reading of them perfectly well. He obtained a Notary's place, which was at that time so well esteemed, that gentlemen did not think it below them to execute it. The commissaries of the several districts of Rome having deputed him to Pope Clement VI, who resided at Avignon, he harangued him so eloquently that he gained the esteem and favour of that Pontif, and the admiration of his court. This encouraged him to declaim against the great lords of Rome, who oppressed the citizens. Cardinal John Colonna resented it; but having better considered the matter, he desisted from doing him ill offices with the Pope. Laurentio grew still hotter and hotter against those petty tyrants of Rome; and one day he harangued in the Capitol with so much freedom against them, that he received, as soon as he had done, two boxes on the ear. One was from a lord of the house of Colonna, who was then chamberlain of Rome, and the other from Thomas Fortificocca, secretary to the senate. He dissembled the matter, and continued still to harangue in the Capitol, and in several churches, and to devise emblems, all tending to shew the ill administration of justice. The persons concerned took this for sport, especially when they saw that his orations were mixed with jests, and that he threatened some of them with capital punishment. In all likelihood they thought that he could do them no prejudice by reason of his extravagances, but they were mistaken: for taking advantage of Stephen Colonna's absence, who was marched out of Rome with his soldiers, to bring in provisions, he assembled the people, harangued them, made laws, expelled all the grandees out of the city, assumed the power of judicature, and was declared tribune august, and deliverer of the people in 1346. The faction of the exiles was incapable of withstanding him, by reason of the little union there was among them; so that he disposed of all things at his pleasure, and saw himself at the head of a new Roman republic, in whose name he wrote to other states, to the emperor, and to the Pope himself. The better to confirm his authority, he condemned a great many people to death, and among others, he caused Martin de Porto, one of the petty tyrants of Rome, to be hanged. He received embassies from several princes and republics, and boldly summoned the Pope to come and reside at Rome, with the college of cardinals. He was so successful in the war he undertook against the faction of the nobles, that he surpressed it intirely. But then he became like most of those, who make insurrections under the fair pretence of liberty. It is not the tyranny they hate, but the tyrants; they cannot bear, that any should exercise the sovereign power but themselves. Laurentio had no sooner overthrown the tyranny of others, but he became a tyrant himself; upon which he was treated, as he treated others. He was forced to make his escape, and they hanged him in effigy at Rome as a traitor. After concealing himself for some time, he went to the emperor, who permitted him, but without advising him to it, to go and pay his duty to the Pope. He was at first ill received, but after some months imprisonment, he followed the Pope's legate to Rome. He there raised his party to such a height

a height as to be just ready to commence war again with the Colonna's: but his severity to the people, and his exactions, rendered him so odious, that they mutinied against him. He thought his eloquence would calm that tempest, as it had many others; but he was mistaken: for notwithstanding his shewing himself to the people, and haranguing them at his windows, they set fire to his palace. He attempted to escape in a beggar's habit, and was almost out of danger, when a certain little man discovered him. Another run him through the body with a sword. They gave him a thousand wounds; they dragged him through the streets, and hung him up by the feet (a). He was two days in that situation, after which the Jews burnt his corps in the fields (b). Some of his writings are still remaining [B].

[B] Some of his writing are still remaining. The letter he writ to those of Viterbo is to be found in a book intituled, Prose antiche di Dante, Petrarca, Boccaccio & altri nobili & virtuosi ingegni. Which contains also the harangues, that Pandolfus Francus, and Francis Baroncelli, his envoys to the republic of Florence, LAZZARELLI (N.), a native of Gubio in Italy, was a very good poet. He was some time auditor, or judge in the Rota of Macerata, and afterwards dedicated himself to the church, and became a priest, and provost of Mirandola. He died in 1694, above eighty years of age. He published a book intituled la Cicceide, which has something in it very singular. It is a collection of sonnets, and of some other kinds of Poetry, in which he cruelly abuses one Arrighini (a), a native of Lucca, who had been his colleague in the Rota of Macerata. He treats him as a person wholly composed of genitals (b). His versification is wonderfully easy, natural, and fluent: his imagination furprizingly fruitful in fine and lively thoughts; but the subject is so obscene, and treated with so much malice, and sometimes prophaneness, as may justly give offence. The preface of his book contains some apologies which I shall mention [B].

[A] A book intituled la Cicceide hath something very curious in it. I have only seen the second edition of it (1), published in 1692. This is the whole title; la Cicceide legitima: in questa seconda impressione ordinatamente disposta, notabilmente accresciuta, e fedelmente rincontrata con gli Originali dell' Autore. It contains two parts: the first called le Tespicolate, the second le Sghinazzate. The person reflected upon in that work, is described by the name of Don Ciccio. Note, that Ciccio is a word the Neapolitans make use of, to signify Francesco. The Romans instead of Ciccio say Cecco. The chief design of the author is to prove, that Don Ciccio is a Coglione. All the 318 sonnets, which compose the first part of the Cicceide, terminate in that. It is the center of the sphere of it's activity; I believe the second part will make up the complement of the number 360, which is the common division of a circle. There is nothing wanting in that sphere of slander; it has all it's degrees, and they all terminate in the same point. Lazzarelli, with whatsoever he begins always ends with the Coglioneria of Don Ciccio. This is the burden of all his songs. This is going too far, even beyond what Voiture could do in complimenting the great prince, to whom he wrote, You who are a true Caesar in wit and learning, a Caesar in diligence, vigilance, and courage, &c per omnes casus Caesar, you have deceived the opinion, &c (2). Our poet turns his Ciccio on all sides, and shews him every way, and makes a Coglione of him per omnes casus. He traces him from the moment of his conception to his death, and goes still farther; for he jests upon his coffin, his burial, his epitaph, &c. He pursues him as far as Charon's boat, and engages he will be ferried over gratis; and even that he may go over without being ferried. He supposes Charon speaking to him thus:

E' privilegio a pari tuoi concesso
Il poter senza imbarco, e pagamento

Mentre un tondo C.... gonfio di vento
Galleggiando leggger, può da sè stesso
Andar di là dal fiume a salvamento (4).

He left out of the second edition the sonnets which had been judged the most prophane, and had occasioned the putting his book into the Index. They concerned Ciccio's baptism, confirmation, extrem-unction and some other ticklish subjects. I have a manuscript copy of them, and am advised to insert one here at least; that they who cannot see the Cicceide, a piece but little known on this side of the Alps, may form an idea of Lazzarelli's genius. I have pitched upon the sonnet concerning extrem-unction (5).

L'oglio santo.

Da la febre, da l'asma, e da l'uscita,

[B] The preface of his book contains some apologies, which I shall just mention. It seems to have been made by one of the author's friends, who protests, that he was very sorry for the first impression of this book, and that he had much ado to consent to the second, though it was in a better condition. His scruples were grounded upon some allusions to the ceremonies of the church, and upon the opposition, that might be found between the duties of charity, and a slandering book. He adds, that this book is only a heap of flashes of wit, and a poetical rapture, notwithstanding which the writer is really orthodox; that he submits all those compositions to the censure of his superiors, and that he detests whatever they shall judge blamable: that he hopes from the reader's equity, a just distinction between witty conceits, and an intention of offending; and lastly, that though he writes somewhat licentiously, his actions are unblameable. This is only an imperfect account of his apology, and therefore I shall set down his own words (6). 'E à dire il vero è l'uno, e l'altro degli accennati motivi son degni di un animo, che professa esattamente i dettami del Cristianesimo, nel quale si pregia l'Autore di vivere, protestando, che questi suoi componimenti sono un mero

LELAND (JOHN), a native of London, so industriously applied himself to the search of the English antiquities, and was thought so qualified to succeed in it, that king Henry VIII gave him a very good pension, and the title of his Antiquary. That employment began and ended with him. That he might well discharge the duties of it, he went through all the counties of England, he examined all the ruins of old monuments, he perused the manuscripts of convents and colleges; and having spent six years in his travels, and collected as many memoirs as was possible, he undertook several considerable works [A]: but he had not time to finish them, nor even to forward them. The court did not pay him the stipend that was due to him; and whether for this, or some other reasons, he fell into a deep melancholy, which distracted him [B]. He died in that sad condition. His manuscripts are in the Bodleian library. They are undigested materials [C], that shew however his great capacity. But it is more clearly known by a book to which he put his last hand [D], and which deserves to be printed (a). Camden has been accused of having made great use of Leland's manuscripts (b). Dr Smith has confuted that accusation.

I ought not to omit, that he studied at Paris under Sylvius; that he began in 1534 to travel in search of the British antiquities; that he abjured the church of Rome some time before his death, and that he died the eighteenth of April 1552 (c).

[A] He undertook several considerable works. A book De Topographia Britanniae primae, in quo vetustas etiam locorum quorum meminissent scriptores Romani, appellationes spissa caligine obsitas in lucem esset revocaturus. Fifty books De antiquitate Britannicae, sive de civilis historia juxta comitatum Angliæ & Walliæ, quæ tunc temporis obtinuerat, partitionem. Six books De insulis Britannicæ adjacentibus. Three books De nobilitate Britannica. This is what he promised in a petition he presented to king Henry VIII, in the 37th year of his reign. This petition, intituled Strena, was published by Bale (1).

[B] He fell into a deep melancholy, which distracted him. Let us make use of Dr Smith's nervous expressions. 'Proh tristes rerum humanarum vices! proh viri optimi deplorandam infelicitissimamque sortem! non enim multo postquam fidem quod suscepit præstandi quasi signatis tabellis obtrinxisset, sive operis promissi difficultatibus deterritus, sive immensis laboribus fatigatus fractusque, sive dolore nimio & malancholiâ, quod fructum industriæ justæque expectationi parem nondum percepisset, sorte oppressus, sive quacunque aliâ de causâ, abalienatæ mentis, nullis, è Religione & Philosophiâ, nullis è Medicinâ petitis remediis ad pristinum sanumque statum revocandæ, ægitudine perpestus est; vultu interim observationum, quas in Adversaria sine ordine & properante calamo, prout ipsi occurrissent, congesterat, mole relicta (2). — Sad vicissitude of human affairs! deplorable and wretched condition of the best of men! for, not long after he had obliged himself, as it were under his hand, to perform what he had undertaken, whether deterred by the difficulties of the promised work, or tired and broken with immense labours, whether perhaps oppressed with too much grief, and melancholy, because he had not found a reward equal to his industry and just expectation, or from what other cause soever, he suffered the loss of his senses, not to be restored by any remedies fetched from Religion, Philosophy, or Medicine; in the mean time, leaving behind him a vast heap of observations, which he had thrown together in his Adversaria, without order, and with a hasty pen, just as they occurred to him.'

* nostros notissimæ. Reperitur quoque aliud volumen 'Collectionum Lelandi' * in Bibliothecâ Cottonianâ. * Non irritabo Lelandi manes, si dixerò, totum opus, 6. * quod sæpè tractavi, mirè confusum, distractum, nulloque ordine digestum, limam ubique desiderare, & tanquam corpus exsuccum, exsangue, animæque destitutum prostrare (3). — The learned William Burton, well known to our antiquaries by his Description of Leicestershire, gave to the Bodleian Library, at Oxford, four manuscript books of these observations in folio, and seven of a smaller form, written mostly by Leland himself. There is found likewise another volume of Leland's collections in the Cotton Library. I shall not affront Leland's ghost, if I say, the whole work, which I have often looked over, is strangely confused, incoherent, digested into no order; that it every where wants polishing, and is a meer bloodless, inanimate, body.' I here insert this author's judgment upon Leland's vast design. 'Vir minime vanus & omni procul ostentatione profectus, se multa & magna . . . quæ infinitam illius industriam, solertiamque, & excellæ mentis, ad maxima quæque aspirantis præclarissimas cogitationes conatulus abunde testantur, moliri (4). — This writer, without any (4) Ibid. pag. 291. * vanity and ostentation, professes, that he has in hand many and great undertakings . . . which abundantly prove his very great industry, and diligence, and the excellent thoughts and attempts of his lofty and aspiring mind.'

[D] A book to which he put his last hand. Dr Smith will tell us the subject and the merit of it. 'Quantus vero fuerit Lelandus, si non ex editis opusculis Collectione, saltem ex eximio opere (quod perfectum reliquit) de Scriptoribus illustribus Britannicis, quod in publicam lucem exeat, dignissimo, colligere licet (5). — How great a man Leland was, may be collected, if not from his miscellaneous works, which are published, at least from that excellent treatise, (which he left perfect) concerning the famous English authors; a treatise most worthy to see the light.' And that one may judge of the piece by the pattern, he gives us Leland's collections about Simon Stoch. Dr Smith transcribed this article to send it to the Jesuit Papebroch, the compiler of the Acta Sanctorum. The Catalogue of the Bodleian Library gives the titles of some of Leland's printed works. Mr Telfier (6) should have acquainted the public, that the book De illustribus Britannicæ Scriptoribus; de Academicis Britannicis; de Typographia, &c. Which he ascribes to John Leland, is not printed. I fear he has put Typographia instead of Topographia, which will occasion Leland's being placed among the authors, who have written concerning Printing.

LEMNIUS (LAEVINUS), a famous Physician, was born at Ziric-Zee in Zeland, the twentieth of May 1505. One of his principal works is that de oculis Naturæ Miraculis [A]. WILLIAM LEMNIUS, his son, practised Physic with such success, that Erric, king of Sweden, sent for him to his court, and made him his first Physician (a). He was so faithful to that prince, that he was imprisoned, and put to death, in 1568, when Erric was dethroned (b).

(b) Melch. Adam, in Vita Medicor. pag. 100.

[A] One of his principal works is that de oculis Naturæ Miraculis. It has been printed I know not how often. Several editions are mentioned in Lexicon renovatus (1); but nothing is there said of the first, which was that of Antwerp, apud Guilielmum Simonem, 1559, in 8vo. The work at that time consisted but of two books: it was dedicated by the author to Matthias Gallomontanus ab Heeswijk, apud Metelliburgum Antistes. The second edition at Antwerp, for Plantin, 1564, in 8vo, contains four books, and was dedicated by the author to Erric, king of Sweden. The preface informs us, that Lemnius proposed to add two books more to these four.

LEMNOS, an isle in the Ægean sea near Thrace, and mount Athos [A], was famous upon several accounts. It was thus called from the great goddess, who was named Lemnos, and had maids sacrificed to her (a). The Sinti, a people of Thrace, were the first that inhabited it (b). It had but two cities, one of which was called Hephestia, and the other Myrina (c). Its labyrinth was one of the four buildings of that kind mentioned by the Antients [B]. The inhabitants of Lemnos were the first who forged

[A] Near mount Athos. A great many authors have observed, that the shadow of this mountain extends as far as the isle of Lemnos. 'Lemnos' ab Atho LXXXVII mill. passuum. Circuitu patet CXII. M. D. pass. Oppida habet, Hephestiam & Myrinam, in ejus forum solstitio Athos ejaculatur umbram (1). — Lemnos is distant from Athos eighty seven miles: it is in circumference an hundred and twelve. Its towns are Hephestia and Myrina, into whose forum, at the Solistice, Athos throws its shadow. You see in these words of Pliny, that the distance from mount Athos, to the isle of Lemnos, was eighty seven thousand paces. Solinus takes but one thousand from it (2). This does not agree with the observations of Belon, an eye witness, and consequently more to be credited than Pliny. These are his words. 'The isle is more extended in length than in breadth, from east to west, so that when the sun is going to set, the shadow of mount Athos, which is more than eight leagues beyond it, falls upon the port, and over a point of the isle, on the left side of Lemnos: a thing which we observed the twelfth day of June. For mount Athos is so high, that though the sun was not very low, yet the shadow touched the left angle of the isle (3).' This testimony is sufficient to convince us, that the antients had reason to say, that the shadow of this mountain reached the isle of Lemnos; but that they did not well know the measure of that extent. It would be a distance of about thirty five French leagues (4), if we computed it by Pliny's eighty seven miles. What abatements must we make, since Belon says only something above eight leagues? The following passage shews, that Plutarch was in the same error with Pliny. 'I know well, that neither you nor I have ever been in Lemnos; yet we have often heard that Iambic verse, so frequent in every one's mouth, for the shadow of that mountain falls, it seems, on the image of a brazen heifer, which is in Lemnos, extending itself in length over the sea, not less than seven hundred stadia; not that the mountain, which makes the shadow, is of that height as to cause it: but because the distance of the light renders the shadows of bodies manifoldly greater than the bodies themselves (5). The seven hundred stadia of Plutarch, are 87500 paces: so that he made the distance still greater than Pliny and Solinus. Apollonius makes it equal to the space that a ship can sail from break of day till noon. Salmastius proves, that according to the common estimation of the ancient Geographers, this signifies 250 stadia (6), whence we may infer, that Apollonius lessens the distance above half, which the others reckon between mount Athos, and the isle of Lemnos, and yet that he supposes it much greater, than Belon found it: for eight French leagues makes only 160 stadia. Note, that Apollonius observes, that the shadow of mount Athos reached as far as the city of Myrina.

Salmastius (8) quotes Stephanus Byzantius (9), to shew, that, according to Pliny and Solinus, the shadow of mount Athos, could not have reached the isle of Lemnos: he objects against them, that, according to that writer, the shadow did not reach above 300 stadia; 'Athos' but he would have more solidly confuted them, and many others, by Peter Belon's testimony.

[B] Its labyrinth was one of the four buildings of that kind, mentioned by the antients. The three others were that of Egypt, that of the isle of Crete, and that which king Porlenna caused to be built in Tuscany. Here follows a passage out of Pliny (10). (10) Plin. lib. de Ægyptio & Cretico Labyrinthis, satis dictum est, xxxvi, cap. xlii, pag. m. 305. 'Lemnius similis illis, columnis tantum centum quinquaginta mirabilior fuit: quarum in officina turbines ita librati pependerunt, ut puero circumagente tornarentur. Architecti illum fecere Zmilas & Rhodus, & Theodorus indigena. Exstantque adhuc reliquæ ejus, cum Cretici Italique nulla vestigia existant.' That is to say, according to Du Pinet's version, 'so much for the labyrinths of Egypt and Candy. That of Stalimene was the same, except that it had an hundred and forty marble pillars more than the Lemnos; others, which were all turned with that ease, that one person could turn the lathe in which they were made, so finely polished were the irons and axes that sustained them. Moreover, it is said, that Zmilas, Rhodus, and Theodorus, which were of the said isle, made this labyrinth, of which there are some remains; and yet we cannot find the least footsteps of that of Candy or of Tuscany.' This translator supposes, that the three Architects of this labyrinth, were Lemnians; but the original affirms this only of Theodorus, who is, perhaps, the same who wrote a book concerning a temple of Juno (11).

[C] Vulcan fell into this island, where he set up a forge. Some authors say, that Jupiter threw him head-long, and that if the Lemnians had not received him in their arms, he would have lost his life (12). But he himself says in Homer, that Juno threw him down, and that Eurynome and Thetis, the daughters of Oceanus, caught him, and prevented his being killed (13). He says in another place of the Iliad (14), that Jupiter took him by the foot, and threw him out of heaven, and that having been a whole day in coming down, he fell into the isle of Lemnos at sun-setting, that he was almost dead, and that the inhabitants took him up. Perhaps it will be said, that Homer should have been more careful not to contradict himself; but what he says implies no contradiction; he only relates two different adventures. Valerius Flaccus supposes, that Vulcan fell upon the shore of Lemnos, and that the inhabitants hearing his voice, ran to him, and gave him all manner of assistance, so that he had ever since a great affection for that island.

Here follows a thing, which shews, that the most fabulous traditions will last a long time. Belon, who travelled in Turkey in the year 1548, informs us, that there is no inhabitant of the isle of Lemnos, but knows something of Vulcan's history; and as the little children of the isle of Corfula will tell you the history of the Dolphin, as if it was a new thing; so every body in the isle of Lemnos, relates the adventures of Vulcan, but in a different manner. For some say, that he and his horse broke their thighs by their fall, and that he was immediately cured by the virtue of the earth on which he fell (17).

[D] The place where he fell was very remarkable for a kind of earth, which had great virtues. It cured Philoctetes who was bit by a serpent. Philostratus mentions a particular very different from the common tradition. He says, that Philoctetes was not tormented in the isle of Lemnos, with the long pains that were so much talked of. 'That brave man, adds he (18), was immediately cured by the earth of Lemnos, which is taken from the very place on which Vulcan fell from heaven; for it has the virtue of curing all sorts of violent and furious distempers, and of stopping all bloody fluxes; but it cures not the biting of serpents, except that of the Hydra.' I shall set down some particulars taken from Peter Belon's observations, who travelled in that country towards the middle of the XVIIth century. 'The ancients, says he (19), had a kind of earth, which was accounted an excellent remedy for several distempers, and which at this day is as much used as ever. The Latins call it Terra Lemnia, or Terra Sagillata. It is such a rarity, that ambassadors, at their return from Turkey, do commonly take some along with them, to make a present of it to persons of quality. It is good, among other things, for the plague, and for all manner of defluxions. There is some to be had at the Druggists, that goes by the name of Terra Sagillata, but is generally sophisticated. The isle of Lemnos is the only country where it is to be found.' He gives (20) the figure of several seals that are made use of to mark that earth, and adds (21), that all the 'seamen of a bark that came from Lemnos to Constantinople, assured him, that it was impossible to get any, but from the under-basha of the island; and that if we had a mind to see it, such as it is naturally, the only way was to go thither; for the inhabitants are forbidden, upon pain of death, to export any. Moreover, they told me, that if any of the inhabitants should sell a small cake of it, or was discovered to have any in his house, without the governor's knowledge, he would be severely fined; for none is allowed to distribute it but the under-basha, who rents the island, and pays a tribute to the Turk.' He got some body to carry him to the place out of which the earth is taken, and saw nothing but a sloping hole (22), that was stopped, and he could never get it opened; for they never opened it but once a year, viz. on the sixth of August, which they do with great preparations and ceremonies. 'This earth (Belon goes on) (23) shews how much ceremonies enhance the value of things that are vile and inconsiderable in themselves; for though the earth I speak of, has a great virtue, yet if it was so common that any one might be allowed to go and fetch some, it would be slighted. So that if any other vein of earth, like that of Cochino, had been found in some other part of that island, I do not question but that the Greeks would scruple to use it, unless the Caloiers were present at the digging of it, and performed the usual ceremonies; and if they had some like that of Cochino, they would hardly use or distribute it to others, if it had not been dug on the sixth day of August; thinking that part of it's

— jam summis Vulcania surgit
Lemnos aquis, tibi per varios deserta labores
Ignipotens; nec te Furis & crimine matrum Terra, fugæ meritique piget meminisse prioris.
Tempore quo primum ferebitis infurgere opertos
Cælicolam, & regni fensit novitate tumentes
Jupiter; ætheriæ nec stare silentia pacis:
Junonem volucris primam suspendit Olympo, Horrendum chaos ostendens, pœnamque baratri.
Mox etiam pavidae tentantem vincula matris
Solvare, prærupti Vulcanum vertice cœli
Devolvitur: ruit ille polo, noctemque diemque
Turbinis in morem; Lemni cum litore tandem Insonuit: vox inde repens ut perculit urbem, Acclivem scopulo inveniunt, miserentque soventem
Alternos ægro constantem poplite gressus.
Hinc reduci, superas postquam pater annuit arces, Lemnos cara deo: nec fama notior Ætnæ
Aut Lipares domus (15).

Vulcanian Lemnos rises from the waves,
By thee, through numerous, varied, toils, bewail'd,
God of the fire: nor irks it thee, O land,
To keep in mind his flight, and former merit:
What time rebellion shook the throne of Jove,
And broke the peace of the ætherial court:
The fire of gods, first, from Olympus' height Suspended Juno, to her frighted view Disclosing chaos, and th' infernal pains.
Next Vulcan, who, with filial piety,
Strove to unloose his trembling mother's chains,
He seiz'd, and bur'd from heaven: in giddy whirls,
Both night and day, he fell, till Lemnos isle
Receiv'd the panting god; whom, when his voice
Had reach'd the neighbouring town, the Lemnians found Reclin'd against a rock: with pity struck,
They kind refreshment lend, to ease the god,
Lam'd by the rapid fall. The grateful deity, Reform'd to heaven, and reconcil'd to Jove,
Favours the Lemnian isle, equal in fame
To Lipare, or Ætna's burning bill.

Homer says that Lemnos was the beloved country of Vulcan.

Εἶσατ' ἔμην ἐς Λῆμνον ἐκνήμιον ἀπολίσσων, Ὡ οἱ γαῖαν πολὺ φιλάτη ἐνὶ ἀπασιών.

Troy, was mightily sung by the Poets [E]. Some other reasons occasioned the fiction I have mentioned concerning Vulcan; for it was said that in former times flames frequently broke out of the earth in the island of Lemnos [F], particularly on the top of mount

it's virtue proceeds from the ceremonies that are practised upon such an occasion: nay, they would be apt to believe it has no virtue, unless they themselves saw it dug up. Nothing can be more judicious than these observations of Belon; and he alleges the two following examples. The Iris grows very plentifully in the mountains of Macedonia, and was to be had at a cheap rate; yet it was thought, that no body should be allowed to gather it, but such as were chaste, and that the earth was to be watered three months before with holy water, in order to pacify it. Besides, several other superstitions were to be practised, which have been described by Theophrastus (24). He proceeds to the ancient ceremonies which concerned the earth of Lemnos. In the time of Dioscorides, who wrote before Galen, it was an usual thing to mix the blood of a he-goat with the earth, in order to make cakes of it. You must know, that some ceremonies were usually performed in the killing of goats consecrated to Venus, who, as the fables have it, produced an ill smell, like that of goats, in the women of Lemnos. Whereupon their husbands having expressed a dislike of them, all the women, with a common consent, killed all the men of the island. Which was the reason why the priestesses sealed those cakes with a seal on which was the figure of a goat, and therefore they were called Sphragida ægos, which signifies a goat's seal. . . . Galen being desirous to know the truth of what was said concerning that earth, as he came from Troy, (at that time called Alexandria, a Roman colony) in his way to Rome, passed by Lemnos, and inquired whether it was still an usual thing among the inhabitants to mix the blood of a goat with the earth before it was sealed. But being in the very place I am speaking of, he found that such a practice was grown out of use. He gives an account of what was performed, when he was there, and says, that a priestess threw here and there some wheat and barley upon the ground, and used some other ceremonies according to the custom of the country, and then filled a cart with earth, and had it carried with her into the town of Hephæstia. Galen says this and much more which we shall not recite for brevity sake (25). As for the modern ceremonies, he tells us what had been confirmed to him by above six hundred men, who had seen them celebrated all their life-time. 'The most eminent persons of the island, both Turks and Greeks, with their priests and calovers, meet together. The Greeks go to the little chapel called Sotira, and after the celebration of a mass, according to the way of the Greeks, attended with prayers, they and the Turks go up the hill, which is only two bow shot distant from the chapel; and get the earth dug up by fifty or three-score men, till they have discovered the vein, and when they come to it, the Greeks fill small sacks with it, and give them to the under-basha or vavode, and when they have taken out as much of it as there is occasion for, the same diggers immediately cover the earth. The under-basha sends the greatest part of that which has been dug out, to the Grand Seigneur at Constantinople, and sells the remaining part to the Merchants. . . . Those, who are present at the digging of it, may take a small quantity of it for their own use, but dare not sell it. The Turks are less scrupulous than the Greeks, and many other nations: they permit the Christian Greeks to say their prayers upon the earth sealed, in their presence, and they themselves join with them. And if what I have been told by the oldest inhabitants be true, this custom of pitching only upon one day in the year, was introduced amongst them, when the Venetians were masters of Lemnos, and of the isles of the Ægean sea (26). Stephen Albacarius, who was sent into the isle of Lemnos by Busbequius, on purpose to be informed of all these things, was more lucky than Belon; for he assisted at the ceremonies. See the relation he gave of it to that illustrious ambassador. See also Ego rediitio, d. fia chorographia dell' Arcipelago di Francis Placentia, professor of Geography at Modena (27). Pliny (28) is very particular in his account of the Terra Sigillata of Lemnos; but he takes it to be a kind of vermillion, and confounds it with a red chalk which was dug up in the same island. See Salmafius (29). You will find several particulars in the third chapter of the third book of Lewis Gyon's second volume.

[E] The disagreeable stay of Philoctetes in the isle of Lemnos . . . was sung by the Poets. Some say that the Grecians sent him thither, because the priests of Vulcan were skilled in curing the bitings of serpents. 'Neque multo post Philocteta cum paucis ubi curatur in Lemnum insulam mittitur, namque in ea sacri Vulcani antistites inhabitare ab accolis dicebantur soliti mederi adversum venena hujusmodi' (30). He was left there till the siege of Troy was over, and he bore very impatiently the dismal condition he was in.

Non te, Pœcanti proles,
Expositum Lemnos nostro cum crimine haberet,
Qui nunc (ut memorant) sylvestribus additus antris,
Saxa movet gemitu, Lærtiadeque precaris
Quæ meruit: quæ (si dii sunt) non vana precaris.
Et nunc ille eadem nobis juratus in arma, (Heu!) pars una ducum, quo succedere sagittæ
Herculis utuntur, fractus morboque fameque
Venaturque aliturque avibus, volucresque petendo
Debita Trojanis exercet spicula satis (31).

Nor thee, great chief, whom Pœas' consort bore,
Our guilt had left expos'd on Lemnos' shore:
Who now, in secret caverns hid, do'st groan,
Whilst pitying rocks re-echo to thy moan.
There do'st thou vent on curs'd Ulysses' head
Dire imprecations, which the gods succeed.
Behold the wretched Philoctetes there,
Leader with us, and partner of the war,
Whose hands Alcides' fatal arrows bear:
Worn with disease, on birds those shafts employ,
Which heav'n has destin'd for the fall of Troy.

The tragic Poets displayed all their eloquence upon this subject. Read these words of Cicero (32): 'Turpe putandum est non dico dolere (nam id quidem est in terdum necesse) sed faxum illud Lemnium clamore Philocteteo funestare.

Quod ejulatu, questu, gemitu, fremitibus Resonando mutum flebiles voces refert.

— It should be thought scandalous, I do not say to grieve (for that is sometimes necessary) but to be always uttering complaints, like Philoctetes' Lemnian rock,

Which, echoing with complaints, with sighs, and groans,
Tho' mute itself, still utters mournful sounds.

See also Sophocles, in the tragedy intitled Philoctetes.

[F] Flames frequently broke out of the earth in the isle of Lemnos. Eustathius mentions this as the reason, why the antients feigned that Vulcan fell into that island. 'Οτι οὐκ ἐκείνῃ γῆνι ἀνέσθιδος ποταμός ἐκέρχεται. Quia olim ibi terra erumpebat spontaneus ignis (33). The Scholiast upon Lycophron, quoting Hellanicus's book concerning the foundation of Chios, tells us, that the first invention of fire and arms, was owing to a thunder-bolt that fell upon a tree in the isle of Lemnos. This he says, upon some words of Lycophron, in which fire is called Lemnian (34). What has been said of mount Molychus, is much the same with what has been reported of mount Ætna. See Hesychius and Nicander, and the Scholiast upon the latter, with the verses he quotes out of Antimachus (35); and do not forget these words of Seneca.

mount Mosychlus. Two massacres were committed in that island, which gave occasion to some proverbs (f). I have mentioned the first of these two massacres, in the article HYPsipyle; and that country had in time been wholly dispeopled by it, if the Argonauts had not prevented it. The women had killed all the men, and had no mind to receive the first comers; for hearing that a ship was about to land upon their coast, they took up arms, and ran to the shore, fully resolved to oppose the invasion (g); but when they came to know that these foreigners were not the Thracians their enemies, and that it was a ship of the Argonauts, they shewed them all manner of kindness, and declared to those brave men, that they might land in their country, provided they would take an oath to lie with them [G]. They accepted the condition, and were so

[G] Provided they took an oath to lie with them.] This particular being contrary to the decorum, which the Poets usually observe, I ought to produce a proof for it in the very words of my author; and therefore I shall set down this Greek passage: Αἰσχρὸν ἐν ὑπὸ πύλῃ ἐν ὁπλοῖς φησὶν αὐτὰς ἐπελθούσας χερμαζομένους τοῖς Ἀργοναύταις, μέγας δ' ὄρκον ἔλαβον τὰς αὐτῶν ἀποδοῖσι μιγῆσθαι αὐταῖς. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Λημνιάδῃ καὶ μάχην ἰσχυρὰν αὐτὰς συνάγει φησὶν (38). The meaning of those words, is, that the women of Lemnos took up arms, and continued to threaten the Argonauts, distressed by a storm, till they swore that they would lie with them.

(38) Schol. Apollon. in lib. I. ver. 773. pag. m. 79.

Euripides says those women fought with a great deal of bravery. This story will hardly be credited by those, who do not well weigh the circumstances; but if we consider on the one hand, that these women had destroyed all the men of that island, and on the other, that they resolved upon such a massacre, because their husbands not being able to endure their ill smells, applied themselves to other women, whom they made their concubines (39), the thing will appear highly probable. Nor can it be a wonder, that these women should have been so forward in their advances, and that the Argonauts should have discovered so little tenderness and gallantry. The warlike equipage, and martial look of these women, were no inticing things. The cruel havoc they had made of their fathers, husbands, sons, and brothers, did certainly raise an abhorrence for them. Besides the consideration of the reason, why they had committed such a slaughter, must needs have been an obstacle to the love of the Argonauts; for they committed that horrid crime, because their husbands grew out of conceit with them by reason of their smell, which proceeded from their breath; but some say it proceeded from their arm-pits, which we call to smell rammiss. Lactantius, upon the fifth book of Statius's Thebaid, follows this opinion, for he calls this smell of the Lemniades, hircinum odorem. Dion Chrysostom says likewise to the same purpose in his thirty third oration. Λημνίαν ταῖς γυναῖξιν, τὴν Ἀρεσθίτην ὀργισθεῖσαν λέγεται διαρθεῖν τὰς μασχάδας. As it is said that Venus being exasperated against the women of Lemnos, infected their arm-pits (40). All things duly considered, one may easily perceive, that the ancients did not transgress the rules of probability, when they supposed, that the companions of Jason had much ado to promise on the shore of Lemnos, what they would have asked and offered in other places. The women who came to a parley with them, deserved to be told what was said by Catullus against one Rufus, who wondered that all the women he met with proved cruel.

Horace alledged a like reason to a woman, who complained that he was unkind to her.

Some there are who attentively considering these circumstances, will judge perhaps, that the rules of probability had been better pursued, if the same conduct had been ascribed to the Argonauts, which Augustus observed, when Fulvia proposing to him peace or war (43), he chose the latter. But it is certain, that probability has been sufficiently guarded in the episode of Lemnos, the choice that the Argonauts made, being the more natural. Their ship lay in the road, and had been shattered by a tempest: they had occasion for a port in Lemnos, and there was a necessity of their landing. This they could not do without fighting; and they had already experienced the valour of these women; who had fought courageously, and had not been worsted. They must either renew the attack, or retreat, or take an oath that they would grant these women all they desired. The retreat was scandalous, whether before the decision of a second battle; or after a fresh attempt, as unsuccessful as the former. What can be hoped from the expedition to Colchos, might all Greece say, when our heroes are baffled at the isle of Lemnos, repulsed by silly women, and forced to fly? The tempest destroyed their hopes of any good success in case of a second battle. All then that remained, so well pleased with the performance of it, that it seemed as if they had entirely forgot their expedition to Colchos: but Hercules, who kept on board the ship, upbraided them with their giving themselves over to their pleasures, and obliged them to re-embark [H]. Some pretend, that they passed two or three years a-shore with the women of Lemnos, and that the island was by this means re-peopled. The other massacre destroyed all the children begot by those of Lemnos, on their Athenian concubines [I].

(43) See, above the article of the first GLAPHYRA, remark [C]; and the article LYCO-RIS, remark [F].

I speak

mained, was to the submit to necessity of the oath demanded. And perhaps, they thought that the cause of the aversion of the Lemnians was over, or in a great measure abated; and whatever might happen, they could quickly free themselves from the ungrateful yoke, since nothing in particular was enjoined them as to time or any other circumstance. These might be the considerations that obliged them to swear, and we must not believe they went upon equivocations, or mental reservations, or upon the right which dispenses with an oath taken by force, & metu cadente in constantem virum. We shall see in the following remark, that they kept their promise very well.

[H] Hercules who kept aboard his ship, upbraided them . . . and obliged them to re-embark.] There is some room to wonder, that being so much given to the love of women as he was, he should not divert himself, as well as the rest, in the island of Lemnos; for though the Lemnian dames, for reasons already mentioned, were none of the most tempting; yet we see no reason why he should be nicer than the rest of his companions. The oath they exacted, say you, carried some suspicion with it, and since they could not think bare promises a sufficient tie, he concluded they had an extreme mistrust of their own charms, and that something was in the wind which he could not well guess at; in short that it was not worth while to go a-shore. But once more, why should he be so much more squeamish than the rest, he who had as amorous a constitution as the best of them? I own I am at a loss what to answer to this difficulty, and shall therefore take up with the bare matter of fact. Apollonius declares, that 'Hercules never would set foot in the island, but kept constantly aboard the ship Argos, that he might have a right to reprove his companions, who suffered themselves to be drawn away by the caresses of the Lemnian women, and never once thought of pursuing their enterprise; which he did with so much the more freedom, as he himself was not liable to the same imputation (44).' Valerius Flaccus represents these young heroes so intent upon solacing the widows of Lemnos, that they think no more of re-embarking. They quite forget themselves in the island; the game pleases them, and Hercules is forced to drag them thence by dint of reproach, and to speak very severely to Jason, chief of the enterprise.

Urbe sedent læti Minyæ, viduisque vacantes
Indulgent thalamis; nimboque educere luxu;
Nec jam velle vias: Zephyrosque audire vocantes
Diffimulant; donec residet Tyrinthius Heros
Non tulit; ipse rati invigilans atque integer; urbis
Invidisse deos tantum maris æquor adortis, Desertaque domos, fraudataque tempore segni
Vota patrum; quid & ipse viris cunctantibus assit?
O mihi, &c. (45).

The joyfull Minyæ in the town remain,
Indulging in the Lemnian widows beds:
And now no more they think to quit the isle,
Nor bear the winds, that call them to embark.
Their amorous stay with grief the hero saw,
Himself unburt, and watching to depart:
Then strives their sleeping virtue to awake,
With thoughts of their own land, deserted,
And their fond parents vows for their return,
Cheated by their delay; then chides them thus,
O wretched men, &c.

(45) In the article I observed in another place (46) that the best prize had fallen to Jason's share; the queen of the island fell in love with him, and gave him the tenderest marks of her esteem. The remonstrance of Hercules awaked these heroes: they re-embarked without chewing any regard to the tears of their Lemnian ladies (47). Ovid (48) supposes that they tarried two whole years with them, but Apollonius informs us that their stay was much shorter, and this indeed is more likely, for had they passed two whole years in these delights there had been no need of striking the lyre of Orpheus to draw them away, that powerful lyre, which the stones themselves obeyed (49). Now it was found necessary to have recourse to this machine, else they never had been able to tear themselves from their wives of Lemnos.

Let us note an error of Barthius. He says, Ovid makes the Argonauts stay three years in this island, and thus he proves it (51): 'Sic enim ipsum penes Jasoni scribit bona nostra Hypsipyla.

Tertia messis erat, cum tu dare vela coactus, Implesti lacrymis talia verba tuis

— For thus our Hypsipyle writes to Jason;

'Twas the third harvest, when compell'd to sail,
Weeping, you thus bespake me . . .

If he had taken notice of the foregoing verse (52), (53) He tibi bis he would have only said two years; and this shews que astas, bisque us how much it concerns writers not to run too cucurrit hieme- fast, but patiently examine what goes before, and what follows the places they design to allege. Three you summers, harvests do not signify three years: they lie almost and two winters within the compass of two, as three sundays within the compass of two weeks.

[I] The other massacre was that of all the children begot by those of Lemnos on their Athenian concubines.] To give a just comment on this article, I must take notice (53), that the Athenians having expelled the Pelasgi out of Attica, gave them the country which lies at the foot of the mountain Hymettus for a habitation (54). This was in recompence of the pains the Pelasgi had taken in building the walls of the citadel of Athens. They cultivated the country which had been assigned them with so much industry, that of the worst land thereabouts they soon made it the best. And this was the reason why the Athenians expelled them. The historian Hecateus assigns no other reason for it. But they themselves would never own this injustice; they pretended that their children of both sexes (55) going to fetch water from the nine fountains, had a horrible affront put upon them by the Pelasgi, who not content with that insult, had made preparations for an irruption, and were convicted of it. The Athenians maintained that they might justly have put them to death, and that they had shew-

(55) Herodotus observes that neither the Athenians, nor any other of the Greeks had slaves in those days.

I speak of it in one of the remarks. This island was very much infested with grasshoppers, and for that reason each inhabitant was taxed to kill a certain number of them, and they worshipped the birds which destroyed them [K]. Great respect was paid here to Bacchus, and to Diana, but none to Venus [L], who, on her part, had never shewed any

ed a great deal of clemency in having only expelled them. The Pelasgi withdrew into several countries, and particularly into the island of Lemnos. They watched an opportunity to revenge themselves; and as they knew the time of the Athenian festivals, they laid an ambush for the women of Athens, who were celebrating the feast of Diana at Brauron, carried off a great number of them, and afterwards made them their concubines. They had a great many children by them whom they brought up in the language and manners of Athens. These children grew proud, and disdained to keep company with those that were born of Lemnian mothers; and if any of them happened to quarrel with another child who was a Pelasgian by father and mother, they went in a body to his assistance, and affected a superiority in every kind of respect. The Pelasgi observing this, concluded that such bastards who knew from the very cradle how to form leagues against the legitimate children, and pretended to master them, might prove very dangerous one day. They therefore slew them all; and some time after they slew their Athenian concubines too. This transaction was followed by a notable sterility, which extended equally to their wives, and to their fields, and to their flocks. They applied themselves for relief to the oracle: Apollo ordered them to make all the satisfaction to the Athenians that they should demand. They went to Athens and declared their readiness and good intention; but when a country was demanded of them resembling a table which was laid in the Prytaneum, and spread with all manner of good things they answered, we will comply, when a ship shall sail in twenty four hours from your country to ours, by a north-wind. They thought they had promised nothing considering the situation of Athens with respect to Lemnos. Miltiades several years after seized on the Thracian Chersonesus, from whence he set sail to Lemnos, and declared to the inhabitants that the condition of their promise was accomplished, and consequently they were obliged to leave the country. The Hephæstians obeyed, but the Myriniens resisted, alleging that the Chersonesus was not Attica. Miltiades besieged them, and forced them to surrender. This is the account of Herodotus (56). His narrative is not altogether like that of Cornelius Nepos, with respect to the conquest of the isle of Lemnos; for the latter (57) supposes that Miltiades before he subdued the Chersonesus, addressed himself to the Lemnians, summoning them to retreat voluntarily elsewhere, and that they made him the answer above mentioned; that having conquered the Chersonesus, he returned to Lemnos, and demanded the performance of the agreement, and that the Lemnians not daring to resist him, yielded up the island. Cornelius Nepos calls them Carians, and not Pelasgi. It appears from several places of Thucydides that the inhabitants of Lemnos, were on the Athenian side, in the Peloponnesian war. They had then the same language and the same laws as the Athenians (58).

Note, that Herodotus observes that a Lemnian action among the Greeks, imported a crying sin, on account of the massacre of the Athenian concubines, &c. and the barbarousness with which the Lemnian women dispatched their husbands, without sparing even king Thoas. This is the true sense of this historian's words, and it is without reason that a learned critic has found faults in them (59). Verba Herodoti, ubi de Thoante sermo est, omnino mendosa sunt. Εὐταῦθα ἔδ' ἔθ' ὅστις κτείνεν τὰς παῖδας τὰς ἐκ τῶν Ἀθηναίων γυναῖκων. Ἀπὸ τούτου δὲ τὰ ἔργα καὶ τὰ ποτήρια τῶν τὸ ἐργάσαντο αἱ γυναῖκες, τὰς αἰμα Θωάντι ἀνδρᾶς ποτήριος ἀποκτείναντες, νεβόμισαν ἀπὸ τῶν Ἑλλάδων τὰ σέβητα ἔργα, μάλιστα δὲ τὰς ἀφ' ἡμῶν καλεῖσθαι (60). Nemo enim de Thoante hoc tradidit. Igitur duæ voces, αἰμα Θωάντι, aut glossata sunt, aut corrupta est prior, & legendum, ἀπὸ Θωάντος. Barthius does not explain his thought clearly: for we know not what he means by these words, Nemo de Thoante hoc tradidit. Does he mean that no body has said that the Lemnian women, favoured or assisted by Thoas, rid themselves of their husbands? But this is not Herodotus's meaning. Does he mean that all authors agree that Thoas was not killed, and that therefore there is a fault in this passage of Herodotus, if it is pretended that he is here included in the number of the Lemnians killed by the women? But in this case he is mistaken; since there are authors who say that the women understood that Hypsipyle had not killed her Father Thoas, they made so diligent search that they found him and killed him (61).

Erasmus has committed some faults in abridging Herodotus's narration: he says (62) in the first place, that the Lemnians carried off the Athenian women during the celebration of Minerva's feast at Brauron. He should have said Diana instead of Minerva. II He adds, that the Athenian concubines would not suffer their sons to marry the legitimate daughters of the Lemnians; Herodotus does not say so, but supposes these bastards were killed before they were marriageable. Erasmus's third fault is his affirming that after this massacre the Lemnians were afflicted with barrenness, pestilence, and many other evils. Herodotus mentions only the barrenness of the earth, and of the women (63). IV. Erasmus most falsely imputes to him the saying that these evils were partly the cause of the proverb Lemnia Mala. V. And that the other cause of it's origine, was, that the Lemnian women not able to bear the stench of their husbands, killed them all by the assistance of Thoas. It is true Herodotus occasionally touches as one of the reasons of the proverb, the slaughter these women made; but he does not say that their husbands stunk, and he affirms that Thoas was no more spared than the rest. Benedictus in his Paraphrase of Pindar, is grossly mistaken, for instead of saying that the Lemnians were disgusted at the ill smells of their wives, he affirms the women were incommoded with the ill smell of their husbands (64). This fault has not been corrected in the Oxford edition of Pindar 1698. The scholiast from whom Benedictus had taken a passage (65) not long before might have preserved him from falling into Erasmus's snare, Mr Moreri falls into it headlong, tho' he has not copied all the faults of this learned man. He has only caught at a very few facts which he met with in his Adages. The Pelasgi, says he (66), forced away the women of Athens, and had children by them, whom they afterwards killed, observing they had inclinations contrary to theirs. And the women killed their husbands by the assistance of Thoas. Every one sees that this is assigning the reason, in too indefinite and unlikely a manner, which induced the Lemnians to kill their bastards. And plainly telling us that the action of these women succeeded the massacre of these bastards; as extravagant a falsity as the pretended assistance of Thoas.

[K] They worshipped the birds which destroyed them. Here is a very curious passage (67). In Cyrenaica regione lex etiam est ter anno debellandi eas, primo ova obterendo, deinde sætum, postremo adultas: de fœtoris pœna in eum, qui cessaverit. Et in Lemno insula certa mensura præfinita est, quam singuli enecatatum ad magistratus referant. Graculos (68) quodque ob id colunt, adverso volatu occurrentes earum exitio. In the region of Cyrene, there is even a law for destroying them three times in a year, first by crushing their eggs, then their young, then the full-grown: he, who leaves off, is punished as a deserter. And in the island Lemnos, every one is obliged to kill a certain number, and bring them to the magistrate. They likewise worship Jackdaws: who fly before them, when they go to destroy them. Let us also hear Plutarch, tho' he differs from Pliny as to the kind of bird which the Lemnians adored. The Egyptians says he (69), worshipped the ox, the sheep, and the Ichneumon, on account of the service and benefit they received by them, as the inhabitants of Lemnos honoured the larks, because they found out the grasshoppers eggs and broke them.

[L] Great respect was paid here to Bacchus and Diana, but none to Venus. Thoas king of Lemnos was the son of Bacchus and Ariadne (70); no wonder then any kindness to this country: A very great affront had been put upon her in this island of Lemnos; for here it was that Vulcan exposed her linked with the god Mars (b); and here he gave all the gods the pleasure of seeing her surprized in the fact. Homer is of another opinion; he lays the scene of this adventure in heaven (i). The Persians conquered this island in the reign of Darius the son of Hytaspes, and placed a governor over it, who treated the people inhumanly (k). Miltiades subdued it a long time after (l). Herodotus tells a story on this occasion, which is not easily reconciled with that of Plutarch [M]. Ubbo Emmius assures us, that the Amazons reigned in that island before the descendants of the Argonauts inhabited it (m). I should be glad to know in what good author he had met with this. I find in Vitruvius, that the Romans bestowed the revenues of it on the Athenians (n). If what Strabo wrote concerning it, had been preferred to us, I do not doubt but we should have found in him several curious particulars; but that part of this excellent Geographer's book, is lost to us, and yet Mr Moreri (o) cites him as an author, who speaks of it in a particular manner. Lemnos is at this day called Stalimene. The Turks besieged it in the year 1475, and were obliged to raise the siege. It was on this occasion, that a maid, called Marulla, manifested then that the worship of Bacchus should be well established in this island. It was in a temple of this god that Hyppolyte concealed her father in the night of the massacre (71). Strabo informs us that the mysteries of Samothrace, and those of Lemnos, had a pretty great conformity with the ceremonies the Bacchantes observed (72). For the rest, this island was so fruitful in wine, that this alone might make it considered as a country consecrated to that god. Quintus Calaber calls it αμπεδογεναν, vitibus abundantem (73). - - fruitful in vines. Our travellers, say it still deserves this epithet (74). As for the worship of Diana I shall content myself with pointing out the place where Plutarch tells us, that the Lemnians, being driven out of their island, carried about with them the image of Diana, which they had taken at Brauron (75). I shall observe also, that they stamped the figure of this goddess upon their Terra sigillata. See Salmastius, in his exercitationes Plinianas in Solinum, pag. 1156. All the authors who speak of the rage of the Lemnian women against their husbands, observe, that the bad smell, which rendered them so insufferable, was an effect of Venus's anger, who saw herself neglected and despised in this island. See Apollodorus (76). Hyginus (77), Apollonius's Scholiast (78), &c. We have still an answer to censure in Barthius. He believes, that, in after-times, the Lemnians consecrated an image of Venus, which was one of the most exquisite statues of antiquity. 'Venerem etiam Lemniam, says he (79), inter pulcherrima simulacra cultum postea discimus ex Luciani Imaginibus. Item Lemniam Minervam, à Lemniis, dedicatam, quod omnium fuerit Phidias opus elaboratissimum, Pausanias Atticus. — We learn from Lucian's Images, that the Lemnian Venus was afterwards worshipped among the most beautiful images: likewise from Pausanias's Atticus, that the Lemnians worshipped a Lemnian Minerva, the most elaborate of all Phidias's performances.' He has reason to say, that the Minerva which was Phidias's master-piece, was dedicated by the Lemnians. Pausanias says, that for that reason she had the surname Lemnian. See the 28th chapter of his first book; but Barthius is wrong, in distinguishing it from the image which Lucian mentions, and pretending that Lucian has spoken of a Lemnian Venus. He had indeed mentioned a Minerva so named. This cannot be disputed, if we observe the remark he has made, that this was the most excellent piece of Phidias, and that to which he put his name (80).

[M] Herodotus tells a story on this occasion, which is not easily reconciled with Plutarch. This last author says, that the Tyrrhenians, having seized the isles of Lemnos and Imbros, stole away the Athenian women from Brauron, and had children by them. This race was expelled these islands by the Athenians, who looked upon them as half barbarous. This race set sail towards Peloponnesus, and landing at Tenarus, did good services to the Lacedæmonians in the war with the Heilotes, and obtained in recompence the privileges of citizens, and the liberty of marrying into the families of Lacedæmon, but not the privilege of bearing public offices, or being admitted into councils. This exclusion made these people suspected of a design to embroil the state; and upon this their persons were secured, and they were kept in close confinement, till proofs were found out to convict them of the conspiracy. Their wives obtaining leave to visit them, changed habits with the men, by which means they got away, and left them in their stead. Having seized mount Taigetis, they joined with the Heilotes, and became so formidable to Lacedæmon, that it was thought proper to capitulate with them. Their wives were restored; and they had money and ships given them, and a promise of owning them as relations, and as a colony of Sparta, wherever they should settle themselves. They accepted the conditions, and some went and settled at Melos, others at Crete. The latter, after several battles, made themselves masters of Lycus, and some other towns, and hence the inhabitants of Lycus pretended, that by the mother's side they were related to the Athenians, and looked on themselves as a colony of Lacedæmon (81). This is Plutarch's account. Those whom he calls Tyrrhenians, and a little after Pelasgi, are the very same whom Herodotus calls Pelasgi. These two names belong to the same people (82), and it must not be imagined, that the authors who have said that the isle of Lemnos was inhabited by the Tyrrhenians (83), differ from those who say it was possessed by the Pelasgi; so far then there is no difference between Herodotus and Plutarch: but when the latter affirms, that the posterity of the Athenian women carried off from Brauron by the Tyrrhenians, who had settled in the isles of Lemnos and Imbros, were expelled those isles by the Athenians, he contradicts Herodotus, who pretends, that the Lemnians themselves destroyed all the children begot by them upon the Athenian women. These two historians differ widely in point of time. The one (84) will have Miltiades expel the Lemnians, the other makes that expulsion much more ancient, at least confounds what he ought to distinguish. The history of these women, who procured the liberty of their husbands, relates to a time, in Herodotus, much earlier than Miltiades, and has not the circumstances which are mentioned by Plutarch.

This is Herodotus's account (85). The inhabitants of Lemnos, who were descended from the Argonauts, were expelled this island by the Pelasgi, who forced away the Athenian women from Brauron. They retired to the country of the Lacedæmonians, and informed them, that they were the posterity of the Argonauts, and that being driven out of their country, they returned to their ancestors, and begged leave to live among them. The Lacedæmonians remembering that Castor and Pollux had been in Jason's expedition, gave these fugitives a kind reception, allowed them lands, and incorporated them into their tribes. These refugees contracted new marriages, having first parted with the wives they had brought from the isle of Lemnos, to some of their neighbours. It was not long before they grew proud, would domineer, and became guilty of every ill action. They were imprisoned, and their death resolved on, but the wives saved them by changing habits, as I mentioned before. The design was still continued, of putting them to death, but Theras, who was preparing to found a colony, interceded for them, and promised to take them away with him, and prevent any further danger. His request was granted. Most of them dispersed themselves, the rest followed Theras, who manifested an extraordinary courage (p). Mr Moreri makes mention of it (q), but he falsely supposes, that she lived in the XIVth century. who founded a colony in the island which bears his name (86). the Lemnians of Theras's colony, founded the city of Cyrene.

If any one should say this is foreign to my subject, he would be to blame, and that for two reasons; first, because criticism requires, that I should shew the differences between Herodotus and Plutarch; and next, I am obliged, as an Historian, to collect the adventures of the inhabitants of the isle of Lemnos.

LENTULUS (SCIPIO) was a Neapolitan who forsook the Romish church and embraced the Reformed religion in the XVIth century. He was minister of Chiavenne, in the country of the Grisons, and he employed his pen in the defence of an edict which the Grison leagues made in 1570, against the sectaries (a) [A]. They failed not to attack this edict, with the arguments for toleration, which the Reformed themselves alledged against the Roman Catholics, in the persecuting countries: But our Lentulus answered these reasons. He is the author of an Italian grammar, printed at Geneva in 1568 (b).

I add, that he preached sometimes at Ferrara, before the dukes Renata of France (c); that he was afterward minister of the church of St John, in the vale of Luzerne (d); that he answered a book of the Jesuit Possévin, who had been sent to that place on the foot of a converter, in the year 1560 [B]; that he found himself greatly exposed to the caprice

[A] He employed his pen in defence of an edict against the sectaries.] The epitome of Gesner's Bibliotheca mentions this work of Lentulus, as a piece that was never printed. Ejusdem liber de jure Magistratum in puniendis hereticis, quo Sylvi cujusdam Epistolam hereticis patrocinantem refutat nundum editus. This you will find in the 744th page of that epitome, Zurich edition, 1583. At last the book was printed at Geneva, by John le Preux, in 1592, in 8vo. This is the title: Responsio oribodoxa pro edita Illustrissimorum D. D. trium federum Reblie, adversus hereticos, et alios Ecclesiarum Reticarum perturbatores promulgato; in qua de Magistratus autoritate et officio in coerendis hereticis, ex verbo Dei disputatur. I know some persons, who, having read in the Catalogue of the Bodleian Library, that Lentulus's apology for the edict of the Grison leagues, was printed in 1502, over-strained their imagination, to find what sect this could be, which gave occasion to that edict among the Grisons, in the beginning of the XVIth Century. They turned over many books, and even consulted those who had libraries, and who exhausted themselves in conjectures. At last, the true date of the edition was discovered, and a new influence given of the confusions, into which the faults of the press cast authors, on thousands of occasions. Mr Voëtius observes, that the Sectaries proscribed by the edict of the Grison leagues, were Arians, or something worse; and that Lentulus gave the particulars of their blasphemies in his preface (1). He observes also (2), that Lentulus's orthodox answer, pro edito, &c. confuted the complaints published by an anonymous author, in 1570, against the edict of the Grisons, and that it came out in 1573. This is very different from what is found in Gesner's epitome.

[B] He answered a book of the Jesuit Possévin, who had been sent to that place on the foot of a converter, in the year 1560.] Possévin had entered himself in the society of the Jesuits but a few months before, being then twenty six years of age (3). Therefore I am not surprized, that the Historian, who furnishes me with what I am going to say, did not give him that title. The Pope having signified to the duke of Savoy, that it was necessary to use force, in order to convert the Heretics of the vallies of Piedmont, it was resolved in his highness's council, to comply with the Pope's desire: 'But that, to keep up some shew of proceeding regularly, some person, qualified to convince the accused of their errors, should be once more sent into the vallies, and according to the success of this, to take the necessary measures: and for this business they made choice of Anthony Possévin, commander of St Anthony de Fossano (4), a man of great reputation among them, but who made it appear by his actions, he was not the man they took him for. His highness gave him his letters-patents, of the seventh of July, which declared him sent to establish preachers of Christian doctrine in his dominions, and particularly in his vallies of Piedmont, with the necessary provisions for their maintenance. Commanding, for this end, all, in ecclesiastical, or secular, office, syndics, communities, and, in general, all his subjects, to afford him all the necessary assistance for the execution of his said commission (5). This man, leaving Nice, where his highness was, went directly to Cavour and having caused the people to be assembled in the principal church of the town, he mounted the pulpit, read for his text his letters of commission, explained them by enlarging and exaggerating what he pretended he was going to do in the neighbouring vallies, to convince and confound the ministers, to drive them away, to establish in their room those that should preach up the Pope, to prove that the mass was good, to make all the inhabitants of those vallies go to it, and to denounce extermination concluded against all those, who would not obey his orders (6). He went and did the same thing at Bubiano, in the valley of Luzerne, and at Luzerne, 'the capital of the valley' and ordered the leaders of the Reformed to attend him the twenty sixth of July. He came to the assembly, assisted by a great number of the nobility, magistrates, and other principal men of his religion, where he laid before them the reasons of his coming, and ordered the letters of his commission to be read: afterwards he ordered to be read the letters and petitions, which the Reformed had written to his highness and his council, which he had brought back with him, and demanded of them, 'Whether they owned the sending such writings, and whether they would observe what they had promised in them?' They answered, Yes (7). He alledged some reasons to prove the Mass: the ministers having proposed to him their difficulties, 'he fell into excla-caprice and persecution of Castrucaro, who commanded in the valleys of Piedmont; that this obliged him to look out for another residence in 1565, and that he retired to Chbiavenna, in the country of the Grisons, where he continued the exercise of his ministry to his death (e). His Apology for the Edict, which the Grisons had published against the Heretics, ought not to surprize any one, on pretence that he had been formerly persecuted himself; for nothing is more common than to see persons, who have fled for their religion, ringing the alarm against the sects.

'mations, and abusive language, with unbounded rage; at which those who attended him appeared very much grieved and ashamed, seeing that one of such great reputation among them, could not produce any one reason in defence of their religion, nor any thing to convince the other party of error, and besides had shewed himself so immoderate and abusive. As for him, coming a little to himself, he said, that he was not come to dispute with the ministers, but to drive them away, and establish other preachers in their room, according to his commission; and without hearing, or answering any thing else, he ordered M. Anthony Malingre, Notary of Bag-nol, to draw up, in form, his command to the syndics and communities, and in their persons to all the other inhabitants of the said places respectively, to drive all the Lutheran ministers away, who preached there, without any more hearing them in public, or private, and besides to receive and hear the preachers, whom he should settle among them, as soon as the ministers should be gone, and to provide them a fit habitation and maintenance, under the penalties contained in his highness's edicts, ordering them to report to him the result of their deliveration in three days (8). The syndics gave in their answer to him, to which he replied, 'the fifth of August, by a long letter, telling them, That his commission tacitly implied authority to drive away the pastors, because he was commanded to establish other preachers, which he could not do, whilst the ministers continued there, who would always be contradicting what his preachers said and did. His letter was enlarged with strong exhortations to the Reformed to return to the church of Rome, with many promises to those who did it voluntarily, and without staying till they were compelled to it. He joined to this letter another writing, by which he endeavoured partly to repair the breach he had made in his reputation, in the assembly of the twenty sixth of July: for he had collected some few passages of holy scripture, and a few more of the doctors of the ancient church, in proof of some parts of the mass, and also of the practice of celibacy among the clergy: but Scipio Lentulus, a Neopolitan, pastor of the church of St John, wrote a learned answer to him, which was soon after printed: in which he shews Possévin's ignorance in the arguments he produced, and how widely the new Romish church, in such things, erred from the right way (9).

(9) Ib. pag. 105.

'The most reverend Possévin (the very greatest men of his party adorn him with this title) seeing that he could not repair the breaches made in his reputation, neither by his writings, nor his words, addressing himself to those, who knew how to answer him, he entirely left them, and went and discharged his indignation on the poor faithful, scattered and dispersed among the Papists at the very bottom of the valleys, and especially at Campillon and Fenil. He imprisoned their persons, and plundered the effects of the said Reformed. . . . The greatest part of them fled: but those, who suffered themselves to be taken, were ill used. Some were so weak as to abjure the Protestant religion in the church of Campillon, on the fifth of August, in presence of all the aforesaid, who caused acts to be drawn up of it with great solemnity: then they set them free, and restored to them their plundered effects, of whom the better part returned afterwards to the right way (10). . . . The month of August was almost wholly taken up in such extortions. . . . Possévin returned to the duke's court, the beginning of September, and, by his injurious and calumnious reports, caused a resolution to be taken, to proceed against the Reformed of the valleys, by force of arms (11).

A strange way this of converting Heretics!

LEO I, firnamed the Great, took possession of the papacy, the tenth of May, 440. He was a man of great abilities and courage, a great master of Eloquence, and well skilled in affairs. Nor did he want opportunities of discovering his great talents: he found exercise enough for them, from the Heresies he had to engage, and the ravages committed in the Roman empire. His zeal against the Manicheans, the Priscillianists, Pelagians, Nestorians, and Eutychians, was wonderfully seconded by the penal laws of the emperors, executed with great severity. He did not disapprove the extending them, even to the effusion of blood [A]. His deputation to Attila, produced very good effect [B]: But the miracle which is added to it, is a meer fable

[A] He did not disapprove the extending them even to the effusion of blood. You will quickly have the proof of this in a passage of Mr Maimbourg. It relates to the capital punishment inflicted on Priscillian, and several of his followers, and the exile to which many others were condemned, which Sulpitius Severus highly disapproved, as a thing of most pernicious example. Because he believed nothing like it had been seen before. As to the point of banishment, no body can deny but he is in the wrong. For all the world knows that Constantine banished the bishops who refused to subscribe the condemnation of Arius; that he punished also with exile, as did the other emperors after him. As to the penalty of death, it is true it had not hitherto been inflicted on Heretics; not but this severity may be very justly exercised against them, as in after-times it frequently has. And not to speak of those who have proved in their writings, that it was not only lawful, but very expedient, to treat Heretics against this manner, we need only see what St Leo has written upon it, when giving the necessary orders (as we shall cite him by and by) to act in Spain against the heresy of Priscillian, he praises Maximus for an action of this kind, and says *, That the rigour and severity of his justice against that that Heresiarch, and his disciples, whom this prince put to death, was a great assistance to the clemency of the church. For though the church contents itself with that lenity of judgment, which the bishops exercise according to the canons, against obstinate Heretics, and admits of no bloody executions, it is however much aided and supported by the severe constitutions of the emperors, since the fear of so rigorous a punishment sometimes makes Heretics have recourse to the spiritual remedy, to cure the mortal disease of their heresy, by a sincere conversion (1).

[B] His deputation to Attila, produced a very good effect. As this is one of the finest passages in the life of this Pope, it deserves to be a little enlarged on in this place. Attila had made himself master of Aquileia, and almost reduced it to ashes: He had ravaged all upon his march from Aquileia to Pavia and Milan. He had made himself master of these two great cities, and had treated them as he had the rest, laying them both in rubbish. . . . (2). So many dismal messages arriving upon the back of one another at Rome, caused a great consternation there (3). The senate was assembled to deliberate whether the emperor should quit Italy, as Aëtius advised him: they could not resolve what course to take. To defend Rome, in the condition it was, against that innumerable multitude of Barbarians, fable [C]. His eloquence had not the same success with king Giseric, nor yet was it ans, seemed utterly impossible, to forsake it, and fly, and seek a sanctuary somewhere else, was the last disgrace to an emperor, who ought rather to die honourably, than live after so shameful a piece of cowardice. What then must be done? A medium was found between these two extremes, which was, to send an honourable embassy to Attila, to obtain peace of him, upon any tolerable conditions. This being resolved on, it was thought that no one could better acquit himself of that employment, than the holy Pope Leo, to whom the strength of his parts, his consummate prudence, his address, virtue, learning, and eloquence, joined with the dignity of sovereign Pontiff, which rendered him venerable to all the world, had acquired the reputation of being universally acknowledged the greatest man of his time. The emperor therefore conjured him to accept this employment, which he most willingly did to save the capital city of the empire, and the holy see, from the invasion of the Barbarians. To honour the embassy, and the Pope, at the head of it, he had for his assistants two of the greatest men of the empire, Avienus and Triguettus, one of which had been consul, and the other prefect of Rome. Some senators were added to them, among whom was the father of Cassiodorus, who, carried away by a filial affection in one of his epistles †, where he speaks like an Orator, in making the encomium of his father, ascribes to him 'all the honour, and effect of this important embassy. But in his chronicle, where he speaks like an Historian, he unsays it again, and gives the whole glory to St Leo, as all other authors before him do (4). Attila gave a favourable reception to this embassy (5), 'in the neighbourhood of Mantua, not far from the place where the river Mincio discharges itself into the Po (6): and as savage as this prince was, he paid all kind of honours to the Pope. He favourably heard his speech, which he ordered to be interpreted, and found it so fine and judicious, so forcible and moving; that this Attila, this scourge of God, this enemy of mankind, whose sight alone struck a terror into the most undaunted, and his very name made all the earth to tremble, was immediately softened; of a ravening wolf, as he was before, he became gentle as a lamb, and immediately granted him the peace he desired: and that without exacting any grievous conditions, promising invariably to observe it on his part; after which turning his course, he marched back beyond the Danube, from whence he returned no more (7).

[C] The miracle which is added to it, is a mere fable. If I alledged the authority of a Protestant writer, I should startle the tender minds of the Romish communion; wherefore I choose to cite a man who lived a long time among the Jesuits, and is inclined to nothing less than favouring the Non-Catholics. His words are these (8).

I know what is commonly said to make the thing more wonderful, that Attila's captains asking him the reason of his having honoured this Pope so far as to obey him in all his commands, this prince answered them trembling, that all the time Leo was speaking, he saw a venerable old man stand by his side, who holding a naked sword in his hand, threatened to kill him, unless he granted all that the Pope desired. But I am obliged to say that one may dispense with the believing any thing of it without being thought incredulous; indeed this vision is not to be found in the Breviary of Paris, since our learned archbishop Francis de Harlay has restored it to its genuine state; having taken great care to retrench all that was apocryphal, or very uncertain in it; and to insert for the lessons, the finest pieces of the fathers, such as are best suited to the subject, and to the feast which is celebrated. I shall boldly say then, that we may, without scruple, be of their opinion who do not give credit to this apparition: for ancient authors, as Jornandes, Theophanes, Suidas, count Marcellinus, Cassiodorus, Anastasius, and others who have written of this embassy of St Leo, do not mention St Prosper who was then at Rome, and has related all the circumstances of it, and St Leo himself who mentions it in one of his sermons ‡, say nothing of this vision, which they would not have suppressed if it had been true. Very far from it; instead of attributing this condescension of Attila to the fear he had of this apparition, and this menacing sword, they unanimously agree that it was an effect of the majestic presence, and persuasive eloquence of St Leo, which softened and subdued the heart of this Barbarian; and the holy Pope, who was far from glorying in it, declares it ought to be ascribed, not to the influence of the stars, as some of the prophane would have it, but to the infinite mercy of God alone † who suffered himself to be intreated by the intercession of his saints, and thereupon vouchsafed to soften and change the hearts of the Barbarians. Here is nothing in all this that intimates this vision. That which has made it current of late, is it's being found in the history called Miscella, which is falsely ascribed to Paul the Deacon. But beside that the antient editions of this compiler have it not, which shews it was added at pleasure, without proof, or authority; beside that this history contains many other palpable falsities, the apparition is mentioned in it only upon an uncertain report, in these terms Ferunt post discessum Pontificis interrogatum esse Attilam à suis, &c. It is said that after the departure of the Pope, Attila being asked by his attendants, &c. I have reason therefore to say that we are at liberty to reject this vision, and that we ought not to seek a further miracle in it, than what St Leo himself performed, in softening and changing by his eloquence the heart of the most fierce and most formidable of all men; to such a degree, that he obtained from him, on the spot, and without any conditions, a peace, and a promise to depart out of Italy. What is most remarkable herein, is, that this great man, who turned the hearts of these barbarous Infidels, with so much ease, should be unable to do as much by his letters, with respect to Heretics. These last words afford the historian a happy transition.

[D] His eloquence had not the same success with king Giseric, nor yet was it wholly fruitless. The empress Eudoxia, Valentinian's widow, had been obliged to marry Maximus, who usurped the throne after having caused Valentinian to be assassinated. This Maximus had the impudence to tell Eudoxia, that the passion he had to enjoy her, was the only motive which induced him to destroy the emperor. Eudoxia, enraged at so villanous a declaration . . . sent secretly one of her chief confidants to Carthage, to Giseric king of the Vandals, who had made himself master of Africa, conjuring him by all the powerfull motives she could suggest, especially by the easiness of the enterprize, all being defenceless at Rome as in full peace, to come with all expedition, and revenge the death of Valentinian, his ally, and deliver her from her oppression under the tyranny of the most cruel, and villanous man alive (9). This Barbarian king, who had then in the port of Carthage a good naval force, failed not to lay hold of the opportunity; he embarked his forces, and landed in Italy without the least opposition; he advanced towards Rome, and had the pleasure, without ever drawing his sword, to see the city surrender at discretion, all the gates being thrown open to him (10).

Then it was that St Leo seeing his poor flock exposed to the fury of these wild beasts, like the good shepherd who lays down his life for his sheep, went forth and addressed himself to this Vandal and Arian king, whom he knew to be the mortal enemy of the Catholics, and especially of the bishops, on whom he had discharged all his fury in Africa, treating them with a barbarous cruelty, in a much more inhuman manner than any others. Nevertheless this cruel man, who was just ready to enter Rome, resolved to destroy all with fire and sword, stopped short, at the sight of this admirable Pontiff: and as if that august and saint-like majesty which shone in his face, had changed, all at once, the tyger's heart within him, into that of a reasonable man, he paid him all the honour that was owing to the head of the church. He patiently heard all he had to say; and if his eloquence did not then work the same miracle that it wrought before upon Attila, in causing him to return from whence he came, yet it performed three others of a very remarkable nature. For it was so persuasive as to obtain a promise, that neither the inhabitants should be put to the sword, their houses fired, nor the three principal churches profaned, to wit the Constantinian, that of St Peter it wholly fruitless [D]. They who say he cut off his own hand [E], on having felt some irregular motions whilst a woman kissed it, and add that he recovered it by the ardency of his prayers, vent two fallacies. The best edition of his works is that of Father Quesnel (a). Some of the books ascribed to him in that edition, are attributed by other authors to St Prosper [F]. A learned dispute has been started upon this matter. A famous minister has a little embarrassed himself by placing the Epocha of Antichrist in the pontificate of St Leo [G]. This Pope died in 461.

in the Vatican, and that of St Paul without the walls. He kept his word: and having given Rome to be plundered by his soldiers for fourteen days together, he returned in his ships laden with spoils, and with rich prisoners, to be set to ransom; among whom was the empress Eudoxia, and the princesses Eudocia and Placidia, her two daughters, whom he treated perfectly like a generous man.

[E] Some say that he cut off his own hand. It is said that a devout and handsome woman, was, according to custom, admitted on Easter-day to kiss this Pope's hand: he perceived I know not what emotions which favoured too much of flesh and blood, and thought himself obliged to obey the precept of Jesus Christ in the rigor of the letter. If thy hand offend thee cut it off (11). But being by this mutilation, rendered incapable of saying mass any more, there arose a murmuring among the people, which made him earnestly beg of God the restitution of his hand; it was granted him; and from that time, say they, the custom of kissing the Pope's hand was changed into that of kissing his feet. Others say, that St Leo cut off his hand under the reproaches of his conscience, for having conferred holy orders on an undeserving person.

Cum autem sanctus Leo eam ob causam facrificare desisset, idque in populo Romano murmur non leve excitaret, impetravit à Deo ardentissimis precibus, ut manus abscissa sibi restitueretur. Ex eo tamen tempore, abolito usu manibus Pontificis oscula figendi, inductus est usus figendi osculum pedibus. Scribunt hæc de sancto Leone varii, ac nominatim Sabellicus, l. 5. Andreas Eboresensis, tit. de Castitate, ac Majolus, lib. i. de irregularitat. c. 14. n. 4. qui addit aliquos asserere, contigisse ut sanctus Leo manum sibi abscinderet, actus sancto erga se odio, ob male impostas alicui manus, & præcipitem indigni hominis imitationem (12). — But when St Leo ceased, upon that account, to perform sacred functions, and the people of Rome began to murmur greatly at it, he obtained of God by the most ardent prayers, that his hand, which had been cut off, might be restored. From that time, the custom of kissing the Pope's hands being abolished, the practice of kissing his feet was introduced. Several authors give this account of St Leo; particularly Sabellicus, in his fifth book; Andreas Eboresensis in his section of Chastity; and Majolus in his first book concerning Irregularity, ch. 14. n. 4. who adds, that some assert, St Leo cut off his own hand, through an holy detestation of himself, for having rashly conferred orders on an unworthy person. The author from whom I take these words banishes this story to the land of fables, and observes that the custom of kissing the Pope's hand on Easter-day, has not been interrupted to either sex: and as to the scruple about the ordination rashly conferred, he gives this account of the origin of it (13): 'Quod ad eos attingit qui hanc narrationem referunt ad manus indigno appositas, videntur adducti ad hanc fabellam de sancto Leone confingendam, ex lectione revelationis ex Moscho descriptæ capite 149 Prati spiritualis. Quod scilicet sancto Leone pro peccatis suis ferventer precato, apparuerit ei B. Petrus, dicens exortasse se ei omnium errorum veniam, salva discussione peccatorum, si quæ fuissent ab eo admilla ob indignorum ordinationem. At aliud est quod hac revelatione continetur, aliud quod habet fabulosa calumnia quam retulimus. — As for those, who refer this narrative to his conferring orders on an unworthy person, they seem to have been led to this fiction concerning St Leo, by reading the revelation described out of Moschus, in his Spiritual Meadow, ch. 149. To wit, that St Leo having prayed fervently for his sins, St Peter appeared to him, telling him, that he had obtained for him pardon of all errors, except that of ordaining unworthy persons. But the fabulous calumny, we have related, differs from what is contained in this revelation.'

Some say that the hand which Leo cut off, to extinguish a lascivious flame, ut libidinis ignem resgueret (14), was restored him by virtue of a picture of the holy virgin (15), and that this picture was of St Luke's painting. St Antonine and many others relate this, and yet Baronius can hardly believe it (16).

[F] Some of the books ascribed to him, are attributed by other authors to St Prosper. Father Quesnel pretends that the two books concerning the calling of the Gentiles; the letter to Demetriades, and the chapters concerning grace and free-will, are not St Prosper's, as is commonly believed, but St Leo's. See the book (17) intitled, De veris Operibus SS. Patrum Leonis Magni & Prosperi Aquitani, Dissertationes criticae, quibus Capitula de Gratia, &c. Epistolam ad Demetriadem, nec non duos de Vocatione omnium Gentium libros Leonis nuper adscriptos abjudicat, & Prosperi postliminio restituit Josephus Antelmi, Presbyter, & Canonice Ecclesie Forojulienfis. The abbot Antelmi has strongly opposed this pretension, and maintained that St Prosper is the true author of the sermons which go under St Leo's name. What is observable in this dispute, is, that both parties alledge the conformity of style: one to prove that these works are St Leo's, the other, that they are not his but St Prosper's (18). The pains the abbot Antelmi has been at, on this occasion, is very remarkable: he has made tables in two columns, in which he compares several passages of St Prosper, taken from the books which are confessedly his, with other passages out of those which are disputed, and shews a great conformity betwixt the respective places of one and the other. These parallels, with regard to St Leo's sermons, shew us a way of speaking so peculiar, expressions, and turns so studied and so composed, that it seems impossible they should be conceived but by one and the same person (19). All this hinders not Mr du Pin's saying that the abbot Antelmi's system upon the sermons which bear the name of St Leo, seems to him chimerical, and that the proofs he brings are extremely weak (20). Nay Mr du Pin denies the conformity of style, alledged by Mr Antelmi, and the consequence he would draw from it. 'If some person would be at the pains of comparing the passages alledged by him, he must find that there is no conformity of style betwixt the two authors, though we meet with the same words in both. And besides, though there should be some small resemblance of style between St Prosper's writings and those of St Leo, should not we have more reason to say that St Prosper had imitated his master, whom he often heard discourse, and preach, whose sermons he had read, and perhaps copied to preserve them in scriinio Romanæ Ecclesie, supposing he was notary of the church of Rome (21). Here is a fact which confirms some reflections in the dialogues on the chimerical cabal (22). See the article ERASMUS (23), and that of JULIUS II (24).

[G] A famous minister has a little embarrassed himself, by placing the epocha of Antichrist in the pontificate of St Leo. He is going to be driven much farther. According to him, idolatry in the days of mark [Y]. St Leo was great enough in the church to make it an Antichristian church, and Leo himself Antichrist, and yet the same minister had wrote the following words in his thirteenth letter of this year. 'Wiltst Antichrist was little, he did not destroy the essence of the church. Leo . . . and some of his successors were good men, as far as goodness and piety are consistent with an excessive ambition. It is certain also, that in his time the church was engaged VERY FAR IN THE IDOLATRY of creature worship, which is one of the characters of Antichristianism: and though these evils were not yet extreme, nor such as might have DAMNED the person of Leo, who had otherwise good qualities; yet they were enough to begin Antichristianism. You see then that a man is not damned though he be an idolater, and not only an idolater, but even engaged very far in the idolatry of creature-worship. If a man be not of the number of the saints, and tho' we must raise St Leo out of this catalogue, he may at least be of the number of good men; and the sin of idolatry is not so extreme as that he shall forfeit salvation by it. Let us urge this matter farther. We have proved in the book of Variations and elsewhere †, from the express words of St John †, that the beast and Antichrist have blasphemed and been idolatrous from their birth, and during the whole course of the 1260 days of their continuance. The minister would fain have dissembled this, that he might not be obliged to charge these crimes on the times and person of St Leo, St Simplicius, St Gelasius, and other holy Popes of the Vth century: but at last he is forced to speak it out †. It is certain, says he, that all the characters of the beast commenced from that time. The Gentiles or Pagans began in the days of Leo to trample the church of God under foot: for Paganism which is the worship of creatures entered into it. Then began the blasphemy against God and his saints; for to take from God his true worship, to give it to the creature, is blaspheming against God. Thus you see Antichristian blasphemy and idolatry established under St Leo; he himself could not be exempt from it since he was the very Antichrist; and indeed it is certain, that he honoured relics, and asked the assistance of the prayers of the saints no less than others. Here then we find not only an idolater, but the head of the Antichristian idolatry in the number of the elect, and that idolatry hinders not salvation (25). As this is a dispute between private persons, and not a controversy upon the general doctrines of two communions, I may be allowed to say that the perplexed author made the best choice he could in humane prudence; which was to be silent: he would not even seem to know that his confusion had been exposed to the eyes of the public.

LEO X, elected Pope the eleventh of March 1513, was called John de Medicis. He had been honoured with a cardinal's hat at fourteen years of age by Pope Innocent VIII, and a long time after, with the dignity of legate by Pope Julius II. He discharged the functions of it in the army which was beaten by the French near Ravenna in the year 1512. Here he was taken prisoner; and during his confinement he made a wonderful experiment of the force of superstition, even over the minds of common soldiers [A]. It is thought that nothing contributed more to his elevation to the Popedom, than the wounds he had received in the combats of Venus [B]. His expences were excessive on the day of his coronation [C]; and he led a life little suitable

[A] He made a wonderful experiment of the force of superstition, even over the minds of soldiers. The soldiers who had vanquished him expressed so great a veneration for him, that they humbly begged pardon for their victory, beseeched him to give them absolution, and promised never to bear arms more against the Pope. This I learn from cardinal Palavicino after his having observed, that, in contempt of the royal authority, the Milanese looked upon the cardinals of the assembly of Pisa with aversion. In Milano con vilipensione dell' autorità Reale furon ricevuti non come Cardinali, Grado riveritissimo nella Cristianità, ma come uomini pestiferi e scelerati, e comete di sciagura ne paesi dove giugnessero. Anzi, non ostante che i Francesi riportassero la memorabil vittoria di Ravenna, e conducessero prigione a Milano il Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici Legato dell' Esercito pontificio, che poi assunto al Pontificato prese il nome di Leon Decimo non si tennero i soldati vincitori dall' andare con incredibile frequenza a venerar come Legato del Vicario di Christo il lor prigioniero; ricevendone l' assoluzione e baciava poscia di dar loro per haver combattuto contro alla Chiesa, con promessa d'astenersene per innanzi (1).

[B] Nothing contributed more to his elevation to the Popedom, than the wounds he had received in the combats of Venus. I have so often given the reason why I choose rather to cite Catholic than Protestant writers on such occasions, that without further preamble, I shall here produce the words of a French historian, and a bitter enemy to the Protestants (2). Three months had not passed since the return of cardinal de Medicis to Florence, when the death of Pope Julius II, obliged him to leave that town and go to Rome. He was carried in a horse litter by reason of an imposthume in those parts, which modesty will not allow us to name, and travelled so slowly, that the Pope's obsequies were over, and the conclave sitting, when he arrived there, . . . (3). The conclave had not ended so soon as it did, the young and old cardinals persisting in contrary opinions with equal obstinacy, if an odd accident had not brought them to agree. The cardinal de Medicis being extremely hurried by the number of visits he made every night to the cardinals of his faction, his ulcer broke and the matter which came from it, sent forth such a stench, that all the cells which were separated only by slight partitions, were perfectly poisoned by it. The old cardinals, whose constitutions were less capable of bearing the malignancy of a corrupted air, consulted the Physicians of the conclave, to know what they should do; these Physicians who had seen cardinal de Medicis, and judged of his state more by the ill humours which flowed from his body, than by that strength of nature which drove them out, answered, being first gained by the promises of Bibiana, that cardinal de Medicis had not a month to live. Their passing upon this sentence of death upon him was the cause of his being chosen Pope, the old cardinals who thought to out-wit the young, agreeing to give them a satisfaction, which could not as they presumed, last very long. They waited upon them and let them know, that they at last yielded to their obliquity, on condition they would remember to do the like for them another time. Thus cardinal de Medicis was elected Pope, upon a false information, being not full thirty six years old; and as joy is one of the most sovereign remedies, he soon recovered to perfect a state of health, that the old cardinals had occasion to repent of their being over credulous. Not to conceal any thing, I am obliged to acquaint my reader, that Paul Jovius does not place this ulcer in the place where Varillas does; but in the fundament (4) which would not suppose a disgraceful cause: and with the same sincerity I add, that this Pope ascended the throne with a great reputation of chastity, if we believe Guicciardin (5), and was reckoned very continent from his youth, if we credit Paul Jovius. Constat tamen cum, quod à primâ adolescentia opinione omnium summam continentiae laudem fuisset adeptus, non importuna quædam pedicitie, callitatisque præsidia quaesivisse; quando nequaquam pristinae vitæ more tam multis delicatisque oblectamentis uteretur (6). — It is certain however, that having gained a great reputation for continency from his youth, he sought out no very troublesome guardians of his chastity and modesty; since he did not eat so luxuriously, as formerly. Whence we must conclude that the Papal dignity was that which ruined Leo the tenth's good morals: he grew vicious when he should have grown virtuous; and lastly, I observe, that the sense in which I alledge Varillas's words, and which Mr Seckendorf gives them (7) is gathered only from consequences, and such as do not necessarily follow from them.

[C] His expences were excessive on the day of his coronation. He would be crowned upon the same day on which he lost the battle of Ravenna, and his mark [O]. liberty, the year before, and rode the same Turkish horse which he rode on the day of that battle; he ranfomed him from the French; and as he loved him mightily, he had him very carefully kept and pampered to an extreme old age. Velut est etiam in pompa illa eodem equo Thraci in quo ad Ravennam captus fuerat, quem ab hostibus pecunia redemptum ita adamavit, ut postea usque ad extremam senectutem summa cum indulgentia alendum curavit (8). And as his head was filled with the magnificences of ancient Rome, and the triumphal days of the ancient consuls, he endeavoured to revive those fine shews, and was so table to a successor of the apostles, and perfectly voluptuous [D]. He took too much pleasure in hunting. It is said his eye at this sport, was surprizingly quick [E]. As he well served in this design, that since the irruption of the Goths, there never was seen in Rome any thing more magnificent than his coronation. See the description of it in Paul Jovius (9). He agrees with Guicciardin (10), that the expence of it amounted to an hundred thousand ducats. Father Gretser censures Mr du Plessis for saying it cost a million, nec mitius agit Plessæus cum Leone X. quem die coronationis suæ decies centena aureorum millia, hoc est ut vulgo loquimur millionem consumpsisse scribit (11). This is found in the Latin edition which Father Gretser made use of. But in the French edition which I use, Mr du Plessis Mornai mentions only the hundred thousand ducats of Guicciardin.

[D] He led a life wholly voluptuous.] Paul Jovius cannot be accused of being too sparing of his incense to Leo X; but on the other hand, it must be owned, he explains himself clearly enough upon the vices of this Pope, not to leave an intelligent reader in suspense: The pleasures, says he, into which he too frequently plunged himself, and the leud actions objected to him, [tarnished the lustre of his virtues. He adds, that a temper more easy and complaisant, than vicious, cast him into this precipice, having about him such people, as instead of admonishing him of his duty, only talked to him of diversions. The original is more nervous than the abstract I give of it and therefore I shall deliver it in Paul Jovius's words. 'Has præclaras liberalis excelisque animi virtutes, cum nimia sæpe vita luxuria, tum objectæ libidinis obscurabant: ita tamen, ut jucunditate blandæ faciliq; naturæ potius, ac regia quadam licentia, quam certo depravati animi judicio in ea vitia prolabi videretur, quum frequenti blandientium turba cubile fore oblectæ paucos admitterent, qui alioqui docilis verecundique hominis solutos mores cohiberent, amicorum optimis ad ea conviventibus, ac libenter sese illecebrarum ministris immiscentibus, ne gratiam apud summos principes in lubrico positam in discrimen adducerent, si ingratis auribus potentium reprehensionis officium honestatis atque benevolentia specie susceperent. Verum hominem hilaritati humanique sensibus facile servientem mirum in modum incitabant plerique Cardinales opibus ætateque florentes, qui illustri loco nati, ac liberaliter educati, regio luxu vitam in venationibus, conviviis, atque spectaculis libentissimè tradebant (12). A little after he owns, that this Pope was charged with the crime of Sodomy (13): 'Non caruit etiam infamia quod parum honestè nonnullos è cubiculariis (erant enim è tota Italia nobilissimi) adamare, & cum his tenerius atque libere joculari videretur. Sed quis, vel optimus atque sanctissimus princeps in hac maledicentissima aula lividorum aculeos vitavit? & quis ex adverso tam malignè improbus ac invidiæ tabe consumptus, ut vera demum posset oblectare, nocturnum secreta scrutatus est? — He was reſtled upon likewise for shamefully intriguing, and using great freedoms with the pages of his bed-chamber, who were the flower of all Italy. But what prince, tho' the best and most holy, ever escaped the sting of envy in this censorious court? and who, on the other hand was so malicious, and envious, as to search out what passed in the night, that he might have foundation for censure? I omit what is told us of the luxury of his table, and the buffoonries acted at it. 'Mire quoque favit Pogio seni, Pogii historici filio itemque Moro nobili à gulæ intemperantia, articularibus doloribus distorto, & Brandino equiti, Marianoque fanioni cucullato facetissimis helluonibus, & in omni genere popinalium deliciarum eruditissimis Verum festivissimis eorum facietis, falsisque & perurbanis scommatibus magis quam ullis palati lenociniis oblectabatur (14). I have touched upon this in the article of HADRIAN VI (15), Leo the tenth's successor, and reformer of his luxury, as we are going to see. 'The other day the equerries, of the deceased Pope Leo, deputed one of their number, and sent him to the Pope to speak to him in behalf of them all: the Pope inquired how many they were in the retinue of Leo; he answered, an hundred. Adrian signing himself with the sign of the cross, as astonished at such a superfluity, said, that four were enough for him, but that he was content that twelve should be placed upon the list, since so many were necessary to exceed the number of those which the cardinals kept. In short, it's the common opinion that this Pope will be a good husband, and cash-keeper for the church, which is in truth very necessary, considering the prodigality of his predecessor.' This is what we find in a letter of Jerome Negro written from Rome the first of September 1522, it is inserted in Ruscelli's collection, translated by Belleforest.

[E] It is said his eye at hunting was surprizingly quick.] This we shall speak of after having taken notice of Leo the tenth's violent passion for hunting. He was wonderfully pleased with it; he understood and observed the laws of it much better than those of the gospel, and he could not bear any one should disturb his sport; he had no mercy on those, who through imprudence, or otherwise, occasioned the escape of the game. He gave them all manner of ill language. He was so much out of humour when the chace did not succeed, that no body durst then ask him a favour; but transported with joy, if it ended luckily; and these were the favourable moments (16) for obtaining whatever was desired of him. Paul Jovius relates this very elegantly. 'Venationibus & aucupii nobilioribus adeo perditæ studebat, ut spurcissimas sæpe tempestates insubrequæ ventos, & frequentia mansionum ac itinerum incommoda oblatinè contemneret (17) In venando autem sicuti præcepta artis ad normam exactioris disciplinæ patientissimè observare erat solitus, ita severitatem asperè admodum vir aliqui lenissimus semper exercuit; in eos præsertim, qui petulanti discursu aut vocibus temerè editis improvisis feris effugia præbuisse: ita ut claros sæpe viros acerbissimis contumeliis oneraret. At si quando imperitia, vel fortuito errore hominum, aut feris subtiliore aliquo insperatæ fugæ compendio servatis, vel iis denso in nemore contumacibus latentibus infelicitèr venaretur, incredibile est quali vultus animique habitu dolorem iracundiamque præferret. Propterea amici familiares ea temporis momenta provocandæ liberalitati maxime adversa sedulo devitabant: quando aliàs secundum opimam venationem, ac præsertim vario ac insigni labore aliquo nobilem, maxima beneficia incredibili benignitate collocaret (18). — He was so fond of hunting and fowling, that he obstinately despised the foulest storms, unwholesome winds, and all the inconveniences of journeying But in hunting, as he was most exact in observing the rules of the art, so he exercised the greatest severity, tho' otherwise of the mildest disposition, especially towards those, who, by their rash noise and clamour, gave the game an opportunity to escape; insomuch that he often bitterly chid men of distinction. But if it happened, either thro' unskillfulness, or mistake, or that the game unexpectedly made it's escape, or could not be routed, that he was unsuccessful in hunting, it is incredible what grief and anger he discovered in his countenance and temper. Therefore his intimates never asked any favours of him at that unlucky time: whereas, when his hunting was successful, or remarkable for the variety and uncommonness of the toil, he bestowed the greatest favours with incredible liberality.'

As to his sight, here is a passage which I take from a book of the Sieur des Accords (19). 'Pope Leo having caused these numeral letters to be written, to signify the year of his Pontificate, they were thus interpreted, M CCCC LX. Multi Cardinales cæci creantur cæcum Leonem decimum. Now I must say, by the way, that I do not know why he should be called blind since by the help of glasses he could see hawks, vultures, and eagles, at the highest soar; but on the other hand, whenever he read, he clapped the paper to his nose, and even then could hardly distinguish a letter; as Lucius Gauricus informs us, in his Schematibus Celestibus. 'Which puts me in mind of a certain honest curate who cannot read the church books of the fairest character, without spectacles, and yet shall distinguish the smallest dice, and is never to be put upon.' Paul Jovius confirms this but in part; for he says, that Leo read the smallest print with great ease, when he had been taught by preceptors (a), who instructed him thoroughly in the Belles Lettres; he loved and protected men of wit and learning. He favoured the poets in a particular manner, and that without preserving always the gravity which his character required [F]. he brought the paper near his eye. * Subtrahebant magna ex parte oris suavitatem, obefae malae & oculi extantes, convolutique & hebetes, verum si ad pupillam inspicienda propius admovent, supra fidem acutissimi: supplices enim libellos, vel minutissimis literis, & crebris syllabarum compendiis properanter exaratos celeritè & distinctissimè lectitabat: adnota autem cristallo concava, oculorum aciem in venationibus & aucupis adeo latè extendere erat solitus, ut non modo spaciis & finibus, sed ipsa etiam discernendi felicitate cunctos anteiret (20).

(20) Jovius, ubi supra, pag. 218.

What took off greatly from the sweetness of his countenance, was, his puffed cheeks, and his eyes, which were prominent, swelling, and dim, but most sharp, when he brought any thing very near to the pupil: for he read very fast and distinctly petitions written in the smallest characters, and with frequent abbreviations: and, by the use of a concave glass, he so extended the sight of his eyes, in hunting, that he excelled every one, not only in space and bounds, but even in the happiness of discerning. I have just consulted Luke Gauric's book, that des Accords cites, and do not find he says, that Leo X. could not see when he clapt the paper close to his nose. Let us cite Gauric, and admire the impertinence of his attributing to the planets the different qualities of the right and left eye of this Pope. Sol cum stellis nebulosis, oculi dextri aciem penitus hebetavit cum multis lineis transversis. Luna in sexta cœli statione sub Geminorum asterismo ad Martis tetragonam radiationem defluens, oculi quoque sinistri lucem impediēbat, adeo quidem quod nec legere, neque aliquid intueri poterat absque conspicio magno crystallino, non autem illius aciem prorsus desiderabat, quoniam salutaris Stella Jovis, Lunam trigonica radiatione intuebatur, & ita literas lectitabat nâso proximiores & oculo, sed cum illo vitreo oculo suspiciebat Accipitres, Aquilas, Astures, alius volitantes, & longe melius quam alii venatores, ibatque sæpius ad venationes Leporum, Caprearum silvestrium, & Vulpium, illasque optime conspicebat, quæ à canibus leporariis & molossis capiebantur (21). — The sun, with nebulous stars, entirely dim'd the sight of his right eye, with many transverse lines. The moon, in the sixth house, in Gemini, applying to the quarter of Mars, impaired likewise, the sight of his left eye, inasmuch that he could read nothing without a large crystal glass; yet he did not wholly want the sight of it, because the salutary star Jupiter was in trine to the moon; and thus he read letters by bringing them near his nose and eyes; and, by the help of a crystal glass, he distinguished hawks and eagles, in their biggest flight, much better than other sportsmen; besides, he often hunted bares, goats, and foxes, and had a clear sight of them, when caught by the bounds or masses.

[F] He favoured the poets . . . without preserving the gravity which his character required. The pleasures he allowed himself with them, sometimes degenerated into buffoonry. Quernus, who had been solemnly crowned, and promoted to the honour of Poet Laureat, was little better than a merry-andrew. He used to come to Leo the tenth's dinner, and eat at the window, the morsels which were conveyed to him from hand to hand. They gave him the Popes wine plentifully, but upon condition, that he would make extempore verses on the subjects that were given him. He was obliged at least to furnish a distich; and if he failed, or if his verses were good for nothing he was condemned to drink a great deal of water with his wine (22). Fuit diu inter instrumenta eruditæ voluptatis longe gratissimus, quum cœnante Leone porrectis de manu femeris obsoniis, stans in fenestra vesceretur, & de principis lagena perpotando, subitaria carmina faceret; ea demum lege, ut per scripto argumento bina saltem carmina ad mensam, tribut nomine solventer, & in penam sterili vel inepto longe dilutissime foret peribendum (23). Sometimes also the Pope made extempore verses with his arch-poet, which set all the company a laughing. What want of gravity was this! Ab hac

Archipoeta facit versus pro mille poetis,

* Et demum hæsitaret, inexpectatus Princeps hoc pentametro perargute responderit;

Et pro mille aliis Archipoeta bibit.

* Tum verò astantibus obortus est risus: & demum multo maximus, quum Quernus stupens & interritus, hoc tertium non inepte carmen induxisset:

Porridge, quod faciat mihi carmina docta Falernum.

Idque Leo repente mutuatus à Virgilio, subdidit,

Hoc etiam enervat, debilitatque pedes (24).

(24) Ibid.

— This high feeding brought on him a severe gout; during which he would be very merry with his Poet Laureat; who, being ordered to make verses on him, self, broke out into this line:

The Laureat for a thousand Poets writes;

* and stopping short, the Pope unexpectedly and wittily subjoined this line:

And for a thousand more the Laureat drinks.

* Upon which the company laughed, and afterwards excessively, when Quernus undauntedly, and aptly enough, repeated this third line:

Give me Falernian, to inspire my muse;

* To which Leo, borrowing from Virgil, immediately added:

This also weakens and unnerves the feet.

One day a Poet presented him with some Latin verses in rhyme: the Pope, to divert himself, gave him no other recompence than an extempore flight, containing an equal number of verses in the same rhymes. The Poet, vexed to see that Leo gave him nothing, returned the following distich:

Si tibi pro numeris numeros fortuna dedisset,
Non esset capiti tanta corona tuo.

Had fortune thus thy verse with verse repaid,
The tripple crown had not adorn'd thy head.

Hereupon the Pope extended to him his usual liberality (25). By this we may see, that he turned every thing to his diversion. But here is a passage that clearly discovers the buffooning spirit, which then reigned in the Pope's palace. A man having something to ask of Leo X., and finding himself amused for several days with ungrateful delays, which made him despair of being introduced, bethought himself of this stratagem. He acquainted Leo's great chamberlain, that he had the admirablest verses to shew the Pope, that ever were made. The chamberlain, transported with joy, goes immediately to the Pope, and tells him, he had light on the very top of fools, and the fittest thing alive . . . to divert him. It was the way of Leo's courtiers, to find out such as were half crazy, and compleat the disorder of their brains, for the diversion of the head of the church (26). But they were the cullies of the pretended Poet I speak of. For when he was admitted to the Pope's presence, he let him know the true reason which induced him to counterfeit a crack-brained Poet, and declared his real business. They who understand Latin will read this with more satisfaction, in the words following *.

(25) See Paulus Jovius, in Vita Leonis X., lib. iv, pag. 189, 190, where he speaks of the Musican Tarsicon, and the Poet Baraballus. See below, citat. (26), and the words following *.

granted to Ariosto's poems (b). In a word, let us say, that scholars and buffoons, equally shared his friendship [G]. He had not the same relish for Theological studies [H]. I will not vouch the story which is told, viz. that he once ridiculed the whole Christian doctrine as a mere fable [I]. He had the industry to ruin the council of Nicus Erythræus. 'Hoc hominum ridicule infannientium, genere non minimum delectabatur Leo X.

' Pontifex Max. cujus Gnathones, quos circa se habebat, dabant operam ut eos, quibus levis mens esset,
' ad infaniam adigerent, seque eos esse, qui non essent,
' arbitrantur. In quo mirabiliter lusus est à quo-
' dam, cui petenti aditum conveniendi non dabat: qui
' cum multos dies expectasset, atque omnes ad Ponti' ficem allegationes difficiles, omnes aditus arduos in' terclusosque videret, seducto Pontificii cubiculi præ-
' festo in aurem dixit, se esse poetam, solum præter
' ceteros, qui sua vellet carmina Pontifici tradere, qui' bus lectis obstupesceret, horreret, ad incredibilem ad-
' mirationem efferretur. Quo ille audito, ventis atque
' que avibus occlusis volavit in Leonis cubiculum, at' que hilaritate lætitiæque redundans, invenimus, in-
' quit, perfectæ infaniam hominem, qui tibi voluptati
' maximæ erit. At ille sine mora intromissus, ex illis
' se integumentis simulationis evolvit, causam, cur in-' faniam simulasset, aperuit, negotium, quod volebat,
' exposuit. Itaque ille deridiculo eos habuit, quibus
' ludendus tradebatur (27). Was it keeping the decorum of the Papacy to expedite a Bull so favourable to the poems of Ariosto? cardinal Hippolyto d'Est, to whom the Orlando Furioso of this Poet was dedicated, judged very well of it, when he asked the author, Messer Lodovico dove Diavolo havete pigliato tante coisnerie, — Where the devil could you find so many fooleries? Leo X. was infinitely more debonaire to this author. 'Almost at the same time that he thundered
' his anathema's against Martin Luther, he was not ' ashamed to publish a Bull in favour of the prophane
' poems of Lewis Ariosto, threatening those with ex-
' communication who found fault with them, or hin' dred the profit of the Printer (28). We shall see elsewhere (29) that he was a great admirer of burlesque pieces.

[G] Scholars and buffoons equally shared his friendship. The Historian, Peter Matthieu, having said, that Leo X loved buffoons, as much as the learnedest men in Italy, and changed his humour from one extreme to another (30), alleges these words of Peter Aretin.
'E beato colui che e pazzo e ne la pazzia sua compiace
' ad altri e a se stesso. Certamente Leone hebbe una ' natura da' stremito a' estremo, e non faria op'ra da ognuno il giudicare chi piu gli dilettaffe, o la vertu de i dott'i, o le ciancie de i buffoni, e di cio fa fede il suo haver dato à l'una e à l'altra specie essaltando tanto quetti quanto quegli. — He is happy who ' is a fool, and in his folly pleases both others and ' himself. Certainly Leo was, in extremes, and it ' would be a difficult matter to judge which pleased him
' best, the science of the learned, or the jests of the buf-
' foons, and this appears by his favour to these two ' sorts of men, praising the one as much as the other.'
Peter Matthieu, who so often cites the same Aretin, took much more pains than Mr Menage (31).

[H] He had not the same relish for Theological studies.
Cardinal Palavicino could not deny it; he honestly confesses, that Leo X valued those more, who understood Mythology, the ancient Poets, and profane learning, than those who understood Divinity, and Ecclesiastical History. His words, which are more frank, and have less of the bias than usual, are these. 'Gli
' oppone il Soave, ch'egli havesse maggior notizia di
' lettere profane che sacre ed appartenenti alla religio-
' ne: nel che io non gli contradico. Havendo Leone
' ricevuto da Dio un ingegno capacissimo e singolar-
' mente studioso; ed appena uscito dalla fanciullezza
' veggendosi posso nel supremo Senato della Chiesa;
' mancò al suo debito con trascurar nella letteratura
' una parte non solamente la più nobile, ma la più
' proporzionata al suo Grado. E s'accrebbe tal mancamento quando in età di trentasett'anni costituito Presidente e Maestro della religione, non solo continuò di donarsi tutto alle curiosità degli studii profani; ma nella Reggia della medesima religione con magior cura chiamò coloro, à cui fosser note le fa-vole della Grecia e le delizie de' Poeti, che l'istorie della Chiesa, e la dottrina de' Padri. Non lasciò ei veramente di rimunerar la Scholastica Theologia, onorandola con la Porpora in Tommaso di Vio, in Egidio da Viterbo, e in Adriano Florenzio suo Successore, e coll' ufficio di Maestro del Sacro Palazzo in Silvestro da Prierio; le cui penne illustrarono immortalmemente quella sacra disciplina. Ma nè co' Theologi usò di conversare come co' Poeti: nè promosse l'erudizione sacra come la profana; lasciando la Chiesa in quella scarsezza in cui la trovò di persone che dopo l'infelice ignoranza di molti secoli rauvivassero la prima, come si rauvivava già la se-conda (32). — Father Paul objects, that he ' was better acquainted with prophane letters, than with ' sacred or religious learning; which I do not deny. 2, pag. 50.

' God had endowed Leo with a great genius, and a ' singular industry; and being yet but a youth, he saw
' himself placed in the supreme senate of the church, ' but he neglected that part of literature, not only the ' most noble, but most suitable, to his station; and
' this neglect increased, when, at the age of thirty
' seven years, being appointed head and master of re' ligion, he not only continued to give himself up to ' the curiosity of prophane studies; but for the regula' ting of the said religion, did rather call to him those ' who were acquainted with the fables of Greece, and
' the delights of the Poets, than those who knew the ' history of the church, and the doctrine of the Fathers.
' He nevertheless favoured scholastic Divinity, in bo-
' nouring with the purple Tommaso di Vio, Egidio da
' Viterbo, and Adriano Florenzio, his successor, and in ' appointing Silvester da Prierio, master of the sacred ' palace; who, by their writings, have acquired an ' immortal glory, in illustrating that sacred science.
' But he did not converse with the Divines, as he did
' with the Poets; nor encouraged the sacred erudition,
' as the prophane; leaving the church in the same
' want, he found her, of learned men, who, after the ' unhappy ignorance of many ages, should revive the ' former as they did the latter. It were to be wished, that these two Historians always agreed so well.

[I] He ridiculed the whole Christian doctrine, as a meer fable (32). The tradition is, that secretary Bembo alledging something from the gospel, he answered him, it is well known of old, how profitable this fable of Jesus Christ has been to us. Quantum nobis nostrisque ea de Christo fabula profuerit satis est omnibus seculis notum. This story is found in the Mystery of Iniquity (33), and in abundance of other books; but still without being supported by citations, or having any other foundation than the authority of Bale: so that three or four hundred authors, more or less, who have said this, copying one another, ought to be reduced to Bale's single testimony; a testimony manifestly exceptionable, since he wrote in open war against the Pope, and against the whole Romish church. No tribunal in the world would receive the depositions of such a witness, swearing that he has seen or heard so and so, for when once the person appears to be his enemy against whom he de-poses, the challenges of the accused party are declared valid. Since books of controversy then are pieces which the parties produce in a suit pleaded before the public, it is certain that the testimony of a Protestant disputant, upon a fact which reflects upon the Pope, or the testimony of a Popish disputant, on a fact reflecting on the Reformers, ought to be reckoned as nothing. The public, which is judge of the process, ought to reject all these testimonies, and have no more regard to them, than to things which never happened. Private persons are permitted, if once persuaded of the probity of Bale, to believe what he affirms; but they ought to keep their persuasion to themselves, and not produce it to public view, as a juridical proof against their adversaries; which,
in my opinion, is a thing not sufficiently observed.

(32) It was under the pontificate of Leo X, that Ulric de Hutten published his dialogue, intituled Trias Romana. Now see how he speaks in that ingenious satire against the court of Rome: 'Tria, VADISCUS

' tem, communionem Sanctorum, & infernorum por-
' nas. ERNN. Persuasit. Exilimo enim, si animam

CRIT.]

They tell another story, which lies open to the same battery as the former. It is said, that Leo hearing two men dispute, one whereof denied, and the other affirmed, the immortality of the soul, pronounced, that the affirmative seemed true, but that the negative was more proper to give a man a cheerful countenance.
Leonis X. Papæ dictum refert (Lutherus) qui audita disputatione in qua unus immortalitatem animæ defendebat, alter oppugnabat, dixerit, tu quidem vera videris dicere, sed adversarii tui oratio facit bonum vultum, id est lætiorem mentem (Ital. buona cera) ex Epicuri scilicet sententia. Luther is the man who says this (34). We may, if we please, believe he spoke truth, but we ought not to alledge his testimony; he is a person at war with the Pope; he is an enemy persecuted and anathematized; the judicial practice requires, that his testimony should be rejected, and even his oath not admitted; he ought either to prove what he says, or say nothing. A famous professor of Divinity at Zurich, relates this story, upon the testimony of a book (35), as exceptionable as Luther himself. Qualis fuerit Leo constabit

. si de ejus impietate & atheismo nonnihil attexerimus. Ille scilicet Joannis XXIV. Joanis XXIV. animam in corporis domicilio sic insinuatam statuentis, ut extra illum carcerem non du-ret; jussit aliquando (uti Recusat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. caus. 8. pag. 266. comprobatur videre et) personatos Philosophos duos, ceu moriones ex adverso ad mensam affluere; quos animi gratia de immortalitate animæ disputantes audiret; alterum qui affirmaret, & qui impugnaret, alterum. Cumque finita disputatione judicium in arbitrium Pontificis hi rejicerent; ille sic definita sententia controversiam diremit. Etsi tu, inquit ad affirmantem, pulchras & bonas rationes habeas; tamen ego sententiam hujus, negantis, probo, ceu firmiorem, & quæ faciat bonum vultum (36). —

The character of Leo will appear, if I add something concerning his impiety and atheism. This Pope, being of the same opinion with John XXIV, who laid it down, that the soul could not exist separately from the body, gave orders one day (as may be seen in Recusat. Synod. Trid. par. 2. caus. 8. pag. 266.) for two personated Philosophers to stand opposite to each other, like buffoons, at a table, and to dispute in his presence concerning the immortality of the soul, the one to maintain it, the other to oppose it. The decision of the dispute being referred to the Pope, he gave this sentence, Though you, said he to the affirmer, have fine and good reasons, yet I approve this man's (the denger's) opinion, as the better grounded, and more plausible. He afterwards relates the answer, that it is pretended he made Bembo; and as he well perceived that things of this nature want to be proved by the testimony of Catholic authors, he how he orders it; he alledges the nephew of the famous count of Mirandola. Et ne ab hæreticis hæest (38). — And that the adversaries may not cry out, that these things are the fiction of Heretics, I give you an eye and ear-witness of the thing, who both ought to know, and had no reason to tell a lie; I mean the nephew of John Pici, count of Mirandola, who, in that conflict of the council of Pisa and Late-ran, treating of the question, whether councils or Popes can err, and, among other things, speaking of Leo, says as follows: I remember a Pope believed and adored, who himself not believing a God, went beyond the utmost pitch of Atheism: which not only his vile actions, such as buying the Popedom, and being guilty of all manner of wickedness, but his very words, confirmed the truth of. For it was affirmed, that he confessed to some of his domestic, even while he sat in the Papal chair, that he disbelieved the existence of God: which words of his you may read in the book de fide & ordine credendi, theore. 4. pag. 259, 260. It will, perhaps, not be unacceptable to find here more at large, John Francis Pici's account. Treating also the question, whether councils or Popes may err, which, from his own notion, may be easily decided, since he pre-supposes that they may swerve from the holy scriptures, he tells us that several councils have actually erred, feveral Popes fallen into Heresy: it often happening, that he who was looked on as supreme head of the church, either did not rightfully preside, or was not capable of so doing: for, says he, I. History informs us, that a woman was made Pope; and I remember, that in our age a learned man, approved in his morals, and dignified with honours in his order, pronounced, though not publicly, that he who was reckoned Pope, was not such, because he had exercised the Pope's office before he was elected by two parts in three of the cardinals, against the laws of the church, which decree, that such a man, not only is not Pope, but is even absolutely unqualified, and incapacitated for the office, as being under an anathema. II. We remember also another chosen and adored as Pope, who yet, in the opinion of many great men, neither was, nor could be so, because he did not believe a God, and was arrived at the highest degree of Infidelity, which he testified by his most wicked actions, having bought the Popedom and exercised in it all manner of iniquity, and even confirmed it by his most detestable sayings; for it was affirmed, that he confessed to some of his domestics, that at the very time he possessed the pontifical see, he did not believe a God. III. We have heard of another, who declared to one of his friends, when alive, that he did not believe the immortality of the soul; but being dead, he appeared to him, as he was awake, and declared, that he experienced an immortality, being condemned to eternal fire by the just judgment of God (39). Mr Du Plessis thought that the first of these three things related to Julius II, and the second to Leo X. Coiffeteau (40) only answered, that Du Plessis entering into the conscience of all mankind, had made this application without proof or judgment; but Gretser answered better: he shewed that none of these three things concerned Leo X.

Since John Francis Pici's book was printed in the pontificate of Julius II (41). Mr Rivet acquiesced in this censure: these are his words. As to the application made by our author to Julius II, and Leo X, of what he said of some Popes, that many great men did not look upon them as such, for the reasons he gives, it matters not at bottom, to whom the packet is addressed, provided it is certain, that it is to the Popes, of one of which he says, that it was maintained, he believed no God, that he was at the utmost degree of Infidelity, and even declared, that he did not believe a God. If you will exempt Leo X (of whom possibly he might not have spoke, because he dedicated his books to Julius, unless he enlarged them afterwards, as is usually done) yet it cannot be denied as to Alexander VI. There was in him, neither truth, nor faith, nor religion.

gion. This is what Mr Rivet says (42). Note, that Simony, or the purchasing the Popedom, is not imputable to Leo X, if we believe Guicciardin (43).

If Mr Heidegger, who had so good a memory, had remembered this, he would not have believed, that John Francis Picus was a witness of the impieties of Leo X. His mistake may and ought to serve for a lesson to many others. Let us conclude, that the duty of a good judge permits not to give sentence against this Pope, while we have no stronger depositions. We shall see in the other remarks (44), whether his apologists reason right.

[K] Having received the news of the misfortunes of the French, he died, it is said, of mere joy. Having rekindled the war between the emperor Charles and the king of France, in order to drive the French out of Italy, the news was brought him, at one of his country seats, called Maligno, of the taking of Milan, and Parma from them, which gave him such an excess of joy, that he was seized with a slight fever that very night, of which he died a few days after (45). These are Mr Du Pleiss's words. All Historians agree, that Leo X received this good news with a wonderful satisfaction, but I do not find many who say, that this pleasure caused his death; and though they should affirm it, I should not believe it; for they who die of joy, die suddenly, oppressed, according to all appearance, by too great an effusion of blood into the ventricles of the heart. If the first impressions of a violent joy be withstood, as was done by the Pope, a man is better afterwards, instead of being seized with a dangerous fever when other reasons do not occasion it. John Crespin's account seems much more probable, who supposes that Leo the tenth's death was sudden, but not of that sudden kind which is occasioned by an excess of joy. Hearing that the French were beaten at Milan by the emperor's forces, and driven out of Italy, which indeed was not done without his help: as he was drinking and making merry, and wonderfully rejoiced at the news, it is said that he suddenly gave up the Ghost, he who believed neither a heaven nor hell after this life (46). Sannazar's distich (47), alleged by this author, favours the supposition of sudden death; but yet it is certain, that the distemper Leo died of, lasted some days (48). Famién Strada has given two relations of this Pope's death (49), one in Livy's stile, the other after the way of Tacitus. They are fine and well wrought.

I must here observe a blunder of Guicciardin's translator. 'News came, says he, that Pope Leo died, the first day of December, a sudden death. For having received in his Villa of Magliano, where he often went to divert himself, the news of the taking of Milan, he fell into such an excessive joy, that that very night he was seized with a slight fever; and being carried to Rome the day after, though the Physicians at first made light of his distemper, he died within a few days, not without suspicion of being poisoned (as was said) by Barnabas Malepina, his chamberlain, who was appointed to give him his drink (50).' What an absurdity is it to say almost in the same period, that a man died a sudden death, and that he died of a small fever, slighted at first by the Physicians. Guicciardin was not capable of such a blunder, he did not say this death was sudden (51), nor has he connected the Pope's great joy with the fever (52), as the cause with its effect. This connexion is more than a poetical licence of the translator. Note, by the way, what close regard it is to be had to the words of the original, when we would faithfully translate.

[L] He did not always behave in a manner agreeable to the emperor Maximilian. He had conceived good hopes of Leo X, but when he was informed of this Pope's correspondence with the French, he said, 'If this Pope had not deceived me, he would have been the only Pope, whose honesty I should have had reason to commend (53).'

[M] The fordid traffic to which he reduced the distribution of indulgences. They made of it a kind of monopoly, and indulgences were let out to farm; the commissioners appointed for the collection of the sums, bought their commissions of the Pope, after which they stuck at no kind of exaction, and observed decorum so little, that the powers for releasing souls out of Purgatory were played for in the taverns, as we are assured by Guicciardin, 'Haveva sparso per tutto il mondo, senza distinzione di tempi e di luoghi, indulgentie amplissime, non solo per poter giovare a quelli, che ancora sono nella vita presente, ma con facoltà di potere oltre questo liberare l'anime de' defunti dalle pene del Purgatorio: le quali, perche era notorio che si concedevano solamente per eborquere danari da gli huomini; & essendo essercitate imprudentemente da Commissarii deputati a questa elatione, la più parte de' quali comperava dalla Corte la facoltà di essercitare; haveva concitato in molti luoghi indignatione, e scandalo assai, e specialmente nella Germania, dove a molti de' ministri era veduto vendere per poco prezzo, o giocarsi su le taverne la facoltà del liberare l'anime de' morti dal Purgatorio (54). — He has dispersed all over the world, without any regard to time or place, indulgences, not only for this life, but to deliver the souls of the dead from the pains of Purgatory: which as it was notorious they were only granted to pick peoples pockets, and were levied by commissioners, who for the most part were appointed by the court of Rome, occasioned in several places, great indignation and scandal, especially in Germany, where they sold them for a trifle, and the power of delivering a soul from Purgatory was played for at hazard in taverns.' The discontent of the people grew greater, when it was known to what use these sums were designed: almost all the money that was raised by them in Germany, being converted to the use of the Pope's sister.

[N] Some say he spoke honourably of this great reformer in the beginning. This particular had hardly been known, if Colomies had not mentioned it: Mr de Seckendorf (55) learnt it from him, being told by a councillor of Spire, that it was to be found in Colomies's Capsula, the passage is this. 'Mr Vossius having told me that he remembered, he had read in Bandi's Tragical Histories, an elogy given to Luther by Pope Leo X; I went immediately into his library, where turning over the histories of this author, see what I found in the preface to the twenty fifth novel of the third part. Nel principio che la Setta Luterana comincio a germogliare, essendo diribrigata molti Gentilhuomini, ne l'ora del mezzogiorno, in casa del nostro virtuoso Signor L. Scipione Attellano, e di varie cose ragionandosi, furono alcuni che non poco biasimarono Leone X Pontefice, che ne i principii non si mettesse remedio, a l'ora che Frate Silvestro Prierio, Maestro del sacro Palazzo, gli mostrò alcuni puncti d'heresia che Fra Martino Lutero haveva sparso per l'opera, la quale de le Indulgentie haveva intitolata; percioche imprudentemente rispose, che Fra Martino haveva un bellissimo ingegno, e che coteste erano invidie Fratesche. — When the Luteran sect began to appear, several gentlemen being in the house of our worthy Scipione Attellano, and discoursing about divers things, some of them very much blamed Pope Leo X, for not having taken timely care, when Silvester Prierio, master of the sacred palace, showed him some heretical doctrines which Frier Martin Luther had vented in his book concerning Indulgences; but indifferently answered that Frier Martin had a fine genius, and that these surmises were monkish jealousies. Words which Sleidan would not have failed placing in the front of his history, if he had known them (56).'

[O] I do not find that Guicciardin abuses this Pope so much as Mr Varillas insinuates. This author wrote a great many books against the house of Austria, which would have been printed perhaps, if Mr Colbert had not represented, after the Pyrenean treaty, that it would look ill to disoblige the Spaniards by allowing the impression of so many injurious volumes. We have seen the plan of this great work, in a book called La Politique de la Maison d'Autriche (The Politics of the house of Austria). The author sets out by a kind of apology for the liberty he has taken in touching the vices of princes. 'I only, says he (57), imitate the style, and copy the reverse of the picture, which Livy has given of Hannibal †, and I have even come so much short of others in this point, that no person of what condition soever is found so ill treated in my book, as Pope Leo X is, in the elogy which Guicciardin has made of him †, and for which he has no where been censured as I can find †.' It is manifest this elogy of Leo X is here alledged as a very satirical piece, otherwise it would be absurd to propose this instance. Now it is certain there is nothing in Guicciardin that answers this idea. The twelfth book cited by Mr Varillas is less to his purpose than the two following. It is in the thirteenth book, that we find the description of the trade of indulgences, as we have seen above, and in the fourteenth the censure of this Pope's extravagant expences, and his inclination to the diversions of Music and Farces (58). 'Egli per natura dedito all'ocio, & a' piaceri, & hora per la troppa licenza, e grandezza alieno sopra modo dalle facende, immerfo ad udire tutto'l giorno mufiche, facette, e buffoni*, inclinato ancora troppo più che l'honesta a piaceri; pareva dovessse essere totalmente alieno dalle guerre. — He naturally loved an idle and voluptuous life, and now being exalted to that high station he was averse to affairs, the whole day being spent in bearing Music, jests, and buffonries, and being excessively given to his pleasures; it was thought he would be intirely averse to the war.' Lastly, we find in the same book a general judgment on the conduct of this Pope; it is mixed with praises and censures, and can neither be reckoned satirical, nor even disrespectful. These are Guicciardin's words.

'Principe nel quale erano degne di laude, e di vizio perio molte cose, e che ingannò assai l'espertazione, che quando fu assunto al Ponteficato s'havva di lui; conciosia ch' eriuscisse di maggior prudenza, ma di molto minore bonta di quello ch'era giudicato da tutti (59). — A prince who was endowed with several good and bad qualities, and deceived the expectation they had of him when he was raised to the Papal chair; for he shewed more wisdom, but less goodness, than was expected by the world.' When this historian speaks of Leo the tenth's election, he does it in a manner very much to the glory of this Pope. He owns he was free from Simony, and all other evil suspicions, and that the reputation of the elected cardinal, stood very well in point of morality.

'Senti di questa elezione quasi tutta la Christianità, grandissimo piacere, persuadendosi universalmente gli huomini che haveffe a essere rarissimo Pontefice, per la chiara memoria del valore paterno, e per la fama che risonava per tutto della sua liberalità, e benignità, stimato casto e di perfetti costumi, e sperandosi che a essendio del padre haveffe a essere amatore de letterati, e di tutti gli ingegni illustri: laquale aspettazione accresceva l'essere stata fatta l'elezione candidamente senza simonia, o sospetto di macula alcuna (60). — This election was exceedingly acceptable to almost all Christendom, every body being persuaded that he would prove an excellent Pope, from the illustrious memory of his father's valour, from the general opinion the world had of his liberality, humanity, chastity, and good morals, and hoping that in imitation of his father he would be a lover of the literati, and of all illustrious men: which expectation was increased, because his election was made without Simony, or suspicion of any unfair dealing.'

See in the remark [R] the contradiction Varillas falls into.

[P] Paul Jovius's apology to me seems trifling. The methods this author takes to justify Leo X, may be reduced to four. I. He pretends that it was not from a vicious nature, but a gentle, easy, and magnificent temper, that this Pope, beset by a voluptuous crew, engaged a little too far in pleasures (61). This is but a poor excuse: there are a great many prostitutes, who may be justified upon this principle. They are not naturally wicked, brutal, and cruel; a great flock of good-nature, easy temper, and complaisance, makes them fall into the snare of the tempter. I shall by the way, observe, that Politian has said wonders of Leo X. This he did in a letter he wrote to Pope Innocent VIII, when this youth was made a cardinal.

'Ita natus & factus, ita altus atque educatus, ita denique eruditus atque institutus hic est, ut nemini secundus ingenio, nec aequalibus industria, nec preceptoribus literatura, neque gravitate senibus concesserit. Nativa in eo probitas, & genuina: diligentia quoque parentis ita impense culta est, ut ex illius ore non modo non verbum dictu foedius, sed ne levius quidem unquam aut etiam licentius exciderit. Non actio, non gestus, non incessus in illo notatus: non aliud postremo quod in deteriore partem conspiceretur. Sic in viridi aetate cana maturitas, ut qui loquentem senes audiant, proaviam in eo, nos paternam certe indolem agnoscamus. Cultum pietatis & religionis pene etiam cum lacte nutricis exfuxit: etiam tum ab incunabilis sacra meditatus officia (62). — This young man is so formed by nature and education, that, being inferior to none in genius, he neither yields to his equals in industry, nor his teachers in learning, nor old men in gravity. He is naturally honest; and so strictly educated, that he never lets fall an immodest, or even a light, expression. He does not distinguish himself by his action, gesture, or gait, or by any thing else that may give an ill impression of him. Though a young man, his judgment is so mature, that even the old respect him as a father. He sucked in piety and religion even with his nurse's milk, preparing himself for the sacred office even from his cradle.' Paul Jovius says in the second place, that if Leo be compared with his predecessors, he will be found very chaste. 'Si aliqua ex parte eo nomine fuggillari inclyta virtus potuit, Leo certe cum superiorum principum fama comparatus aestimatione rectissima continentiae laudem feret (63).'

This excuse is no better than the former. III. He says, that this Pope having had a good reputation as to continence, cautioned himself afterwards against the attacks of impurity, by renouncing high food, and by regular fastings. 'Constat tamen eum, quod a prima adolescentia opinio omnium summam continentiae laudem fuisse adeptus, non importuna quadam pudicitiae castitatisque praesidia quaesivisse: quando nequaquam pristinae vitae more tam multis delicatissime obsoniis uteretur: Itemque animo verè pudico die Mercurij carnes non edere, die autem Veneris nihil gustare praeter legumen & olera, ac die demum Saturni cena penitus abstinere, incorrupta lege instituisse (64). — It is certain however, that, having gained a great reputation for continency from his youth, he sought out no very troublesome guardians of his chastity and modesty; since he did not eat so luxuriously as formerly: for on Wednesdays he eat no flesh, and on Fridays only pulse and herbs, and on Saturdays fasted all day; and this way of life he religiously observed.' This is better than all the rest.

IV. Lastly, he says, that we ought to make a great difference betwixt the vices, which belong to a sovereign as such, and those which belong to him as a man. And he alledges the emperor Trajan so beloved of the Roman people, that it was the height of their wishes that the succeeding emperors should reign as well as he; and yet no one was ignorant of the sodomy and drunkenness of Trajan. His meaning is, that Leo the tenth's vices were not repugnant to the qualities of a good sovereign, but to those of a good Christian only, and therefore the irregularities of his youth ought to be pardoned, since they did not hinder his being a good prince. 'Alia principis, alia hominis esse vitia quis nescit? hæc uni privata conditione quum noceant, etiam aliquibus fortasse profunt; illa verò ab dira potestate, & luctum & calamitatem universis mortalibus apportant: idque verissimum esse constat praclaro quondam populi Romani testimonio, qui neminem sibi principem Trajano meliorem exoptavit,

* Otali forte di buffonerie, e di facette piacevoli a Papa Leone; si può raccogliere dal l. 4. della vita di lui del Giovio: dove pare, che furono recitate Comedie si fece professione di fare impazzire huomini e altre piacevolezze tali: onde il Tarascone si persuade d'essere gran Musico, il Baraballo fu laureato Poeta, e mandato fu l'Elefante, & i Parafiti furono sommarie favoriti.

... What sort of buffonries he pleased Pope Leo, may be inferred from the fourth book of his Life, written by Paul Jovius: who says, that they acted plays and farces, made it their business to humour some jest, conceived men, to the highest extravagance; and did such other pieces of pleastering; whereupon Tarascone fancied himself a great Musician, Baraballo was made Poet Laureat, and rode upon the elephant, and the Parafites were in very great favour.

exoptavit, quamquam eum illicitæ libidinis ac ebrietas censura notasset. Sed demus aliquid humanitati Leonis, uti in summa licentia fervidæ ætatis ac prosperæ valetudinis æstium ægerrimè sustinenti, postquam in magnis salutaribusque virtutibus optimi atque benefici cognomentum facile meruerit (65).

Generally speaking, this author's maxim is true: it is very possible for a prince to be an honest man, and at the same time but a poor king; that is, a king, who cannot maintain the vigour of the laws, nor remedy the disorders of the state. On the other hand, it is very possible for a prince to be an ill observer of those rules of morality, which prescribe the duties of private persons, and yet be a good king, that is, a king, who maintains order in his state, and wisely distributes punishments and rewards, without being burdensome to his people, by imposts, and pecuniary edicts. But it is very rare, that a voluptuous and prodigal prince, such as Leo X was, is a good prince; to supply his expences, he must be burdensome to his subjects, and commonly he distributes his favours, according to the humour of the ministers of his pleasures, and consequently to unworthy persons, whose evil administration he has not time to punish, being too much taken up with his pleasures, to allow the functions of royalty that application which they demand. It were easy to shew, that Leo the tenth's subjects were sufficiently loaded. Besides, it is not considered, that Leo's principal dignity was of a sacred and ecclesiastical nature. So that to know whether he discharged his duty, the great question is not, whether he has done what his temporal dignity demanded, it being impossible to justify him, without shewing, that he diligently acquitted the duties of his other dignity, that is, observed the precepts of the Gospel, and omitted nothing to recommend the practice of them to others. This was his principal function, and here his apologist is forced to forsake him. In his vero quæ rem divinam respicerent nequaquam secunda fama prægraviari est visus. Nam indulgentias vetera Pontificum ad parandam pecuniam instrumenta adeo plene atque affluenter provinciis dedit, ut fidem sacrosanctæ potestatis elevare videretur (66).

As to divine matters, his character has suffered not a little: for he was so lavish of indulgences (those old instruments, by which the Popes get money) that he seems to have lessened the credit of the holy authority.

(66) Jovius, ibid. pag. 193.

A REFLEXION on the uniting the spiritual and temporal authority in one person.

I must upon this occasion say, that this blending the temporal with the ecclesiastical authority, in the same person, is generally the ruin of the evangelical spirit. This combination had place among the Pagans, and was not unserviceable to the temporal good of religion.

(67) Virgil, Æn. lib. iii, ver. 80.

Rex Anius Rex idem hominum Phœbique sacerdos (67).

Anius, at once a king, and Phœbus' priest.

It has remarkably served the same ends in Christianity; but has produced an extreme corruption of manners. The ecclesiastical character ought to prevail, and be predominant, since the other dignity is only an accessory; and yet it is almost always swallowed up by it's colleague. The joining these two together, is like the joining a dead carcase to a living body; a fatal conjunction, where the dead communicates it's stench to the living body, and receives no vital influence from it.

(68) Id. lib. viii, ver. 485.

Mortua quinetiam jungebat corpora vivis. Componens manibusque manus, atque oribus ora, (Tormenti genus) & sanie, tabeque fluentes Complexu in misero, longa sic morte necabat (68).

The living to the dead the tyrant join'd,
With hands to hands, and mouth to mouth, confin'd,
There, smear'd with blood and putrid gore, to lie,
And in the dire embrace to groan, and die.

The world, the flesh, the weak part draws after it the resolutions, and the conclusions, just as in a syllogism, the weakest of the premises, is the rule of the consequence (69). The author of the Critique Générale (70) mentioning the distinction, between a Pope speaking ex Cathedra, and the same Pope, speaking in another manner, has related the witty saying of a peasant in the electorate of Cologne. I had a long time thought, that this witty saying was preserved only by tradition, but I was mistaken. It has been printed in grave books for above an age. Duaren has inserted it in one of his books (71), and copied it from Fulgofius (72). Here is the whole story; it is true, that an elector of Cologne is not expressly named in it. There goes a pleasant story of a German husbandman, who being at work in his field, saw his bishop pass by, attended by a train more becoming a prince, than one who calls himself the successor or deputy of an apostle; being highly scandalized at it, he could not forbear laughing, and laughed so loud, that the reverend gentleman would needs know the reason of it. The husbandman answered in his natural way, that is, as a true and plain person; I laugh when I think of St Peter and St Paul, and see you in such an equipage. How is that, said the bishop? Do you ask how, says the clown? Why they were ill advised to walk alone on foot throughout the world, when they were the heads of the Christian church, and lieutenants of Jesus Christ, the king of kings, and thou, who art only our bishop, go so well mounted, and have such warlike attendance, that thou seemest more a prince, than a pastor of the church. To this his reverence replied, but my friend, thou dost not consider, that I am both a count and a baron, as well as thy bishop. At which the rustic laughed more than before; and the bishop asking him the reason of it, he answered, yea Sir, when the count and baron, which you say you are, shall be in hell, where will the bishop be? This confounded the right reverend, who proceeded on his journey without answering a word (73).

[2] The other apologists have not succeeded much better.] Let us say a word or two concerning the manner that some authors have endeavoured to justify Leo X, with respect to irreligion. Coëffeteau (74) only alleges these words of Onuphrius Panvinus (75): Erat rerum divinarum diligens observator. - - He was a diligent observer of religious ceremonies. Rivetus (76) replies, that there are many profane, and many Atheists, who exactly observe the ceremonies to conceal their impiety under these leaves, who amongst friends say, they do it ad morem, non ad rem, legibus justis, non diis gratæ. Sannazar, who makes him die without receiving the sacraments, because he had sold them before, does not represent him such as Onuphrius would paint him to us. Note that Sannazar does not pretend, that Leo refused the sacraments. If this Pope did not communicate, &c. on his death-bed, it was because of his delirium. James Gretser, besides Panvinus's words, alleges Leo the tenth's Bull, against Luther. Bulla qua Leo Lutheri errores damnat immanem hanc Pseudologiam perspicuè redarguit (77). - - The Bull, by which Leo condemns the errors of Luther, plainly confutes this falsehood. This is pitiful; for though this Pope had had no religion, he would however have followed the ordinary stile in his Bull, and have expressed great zeal against a Heretic, who disputed with him an authority on which all his temporal happiness depended. Palavicino (78), endeavouring to answer the reproach which Father Paul cast upon this Pope, of having no regard for religion (79), does three things; he alleges 1. Politian's testimony (80); 2. The facts of the Pope. 3. The majesty and good grace, with which Leo celebrated mass. The second of these three, if the fact be really so, as Paul Jovius has related it (81), is in my opinion, a good proof of religion, when we well consider the circumstances. The first signifies nothing, for children to a certain age, are firmly persuaded of the truth of the lessons of their catechist, and raise no objections against them. If they become irreligious, it is when they are their own masters, and corrupt themselves by a bad conversation, or by a wrong way of philosophy. The last thing is rather a talent of the body produce a long passage from his Anecdotes, containing in short a pretty just character of Leo X [R], from whence I desire my reader to fill up what is wanting in the body of this article. Mr Varillas is also mistaken with respect to Paul Jovius [S].

Men of letters, of what religion or nation soever are bound to praise and bless the memory of this Pope, for the care he took to recover the manuscripts of the ancients; he spared neither pains nor cost in searching for them, and procuring very good editions. I have two anecdote letters, which are a proof of this [T], and which the reader body, than a sign of the persuasion of the soul. Let us see what Paul Jovius says. 'Sacra confectis, singulaque ceremoniarum obivit munia singulari cum majestate, ut non falso nemo superiorum Pontificum eo augustius & decentius sacrificasse diceretur (82). He performed religious ceremonies with a majesty and decency beyond any of the Popes his predecessors.' It is very probable, that Onuphrius means no more when he says, he was rerum divinarum diligens observator, & sacris ceremoniis deditus. A proof of religion absolutely equivocal.

[R] I shall produce a long passage from his Anecdotes, containing in short a pretty just character of Leo X. We find it in the preface of this book, and is as follows.

'Guicciardin . . . represents* this Pope as an accomplished model of modern policy, and the greatest statesman of his age. He sets him above king Ferdinand the Catholic, and makes him triumph in his youth over all the artifices of this old usurper. It is to him he attributes the secret of getting all his designs seconded by the councils of Spain, whether they would or no. After having established these wonderful principles, there are no shining virtues, but what heighten the picture of Leo X. He forms at twelve years of age, when he was made cardinal, those vast projects, which he executed afterwards, when he was exalted to the chair of St Peter. He negotiates with the states of Venice to save the ruins of his house, which had not power to withstand the fortune of our Charles VIII. He changed not his resolution upon seeing his brother lost in the passing of a river. He had no other thoughts than the educating the only son which his brother had left in the cradle; upon which he returns to Rome, where his intrigues recommended him to the favour of Pope Julius II, and occasioned his being chosen legate in the army designed to drive the French out of Italy. He is taken prisoner at the battle of Ravenna, but makes his escape in an unlucky conjuncture for him, Julius happening just then to die: he enters into the conclave, where he takes such advantage of the caprice of the young cardinals, who were obstinately bent on making a Pope of their own age, that he procured their votes in favour of himself. He joins with the Spaniards, and manages their friendship, as long as it is useful towards re-establishing his family in the principal functions of the magistracy of Florence; but as soon as fortune turns her back upon them, and he finds they are not inclined to see him usurp the duchy of Urbino, and invest his nephew with it, he treats with the French upon that condition; he draws up the famous Concordat, in which he baffles the stratagems and long experience of the chancellor Du Prat; he caresses Francis I, as long as that king is in a condition of doing him service; but no sooner obtains of him all he desired, but he quits him to reconcile himself with Charles V. He projects a new league with him, to re-establish the Sforza's in the duchy of Milan. He succeeds in it better than he expected, and conceives a joy on the news of his success, which occasioned his death.'

represents him as a violent man, who would carry every thing by main force. He ascribes to him the same warlike humour, as his predecessor Julius II had; he makes him even before his exaltation conceive a disdainful contempt for the rest of the sacred college, founded on an imaginary precedency of the house of Medici, before all the rest in Italy; he makes him carry on this contempt to all splendid actions, and even the most august ceremonies. He takes him to be the source and ground of the obstinate war against the duke of Urbino, and the other quarrels which happened through the whole course of his Pontificate. In a word, he will have vanity, but an haughty and shocking vanity to have been his strongest passion. If you desire to know how Paul Jovius came to penetrate so far into the soul of Pope Leo, as to be able to pronounce such a decisive judgment, he answers himself before-hand, that he had been the creature of this Pope; that it was he who made him quit the profession of Physic, and the pretensions to a chair at Padua, to engage in the ecclesiastical state; who made him bishop of Como, and chose him for his confident and assistant, in the councils wherein the most important and secret resolutions were taken; who engaged him to write the history of his time, who employed his good offices for him in France and Spain, that authentic pieces might be communicated to him, such as were necessary for the perfecting his work; and who discovered himself to him without reserve, in frequent and familiar conversations. Our preceding remarks shew, that Paul Jovius does not conceal the faults of Leo X, but it is certain, that the vice of which Mr Varillas speaks, is that of all others, which Paul Jovius the least imputes to him; it is even true that he attributes to him the contrary virtue. 'Pontifex, says he (84), cujus mite ingenium facilemque naturam in specimen ceterarum virtutum omnes illo tempore laudabant, clementius agendum sibi . . . exstimavit. — The Pope, whose mild temper and easy disposition were at that time universally extolled, as a specimen of his other virtues, thought he ought to shew a little clemency.' This author was never bishop of Como; nor did he obtain the episcopal dignity from Leo X, but Clement VII (85). This intimate confidence, and admission into the most secret councils, seems to me a romantic fiction, I have not found the least footsteps of it in the writings of Paul Jovius.

[T] I have two anecdote letters which are a proof of it. They were communicated to me by Mr de Seidel privy-counsellor to his Prussian majesty; he has inherited a very fine library of his father's, and hath considerably increased it, especially with scarce books, and manuscripts; he brought several from Greece, in a journey he made thither, and he very well deserves such a treasure; for he is a learned man, and takes a great deal of pleasure in favouring the sciences. The copy he was pleased to send me of these two letters of Leo X, is faithful and exact, he has the originals by him, written in Sadoleto's own hand. I shall observe, by the by, that they have printed in the Nova literaria Maris Baltici & Septentrionis (86), for the month of November 1699, a letter written on a subject of the same nature to his Danish majesty, by Leo X, the eighth of November 1517. JA. SADOLETUS.

This is the first of the two letters; here is the second. There is something in it, which may incline us to think, that the entire history of Livy was then in being. Mr de Seidel has Venerable Brother, Health and Apostolical Be-diction. We send our beloved son John Heytmers de Zonvelben, ecclesiastic of the diocese of Liege, commissary of the Apostolical see to the illustrious nations of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and Gothland, to search for valuable and ancient books that have been lost through the injury of time, in which business we spare no expence, only that, as we have determined from the very beginning of our Pontificate, solely with a design to promote the honour and glory of the most high, we may, by God's assistance, cherish, promote, and serve famous men of all sorts, especially the learned. We have been informed, that, of the said ancient books, there are not a few, in possession of your fraternity, or in the places subject to your jurisdiction, especially relating to the Roman history. Wherefore, intending to procure the publication of as many such books as can come to our hands, for the common good of all learned men, we affectionately exhort your fraternity and earnestly entreat you in the Lord, that, if you ever propose to do a grateful action, you would transmit to us as soon as possible fair and correct copies of all those books, or which we rather wish, the books themselves, which shall be returned you, as soon as transcribed here, according to an obligation drawn up by our apostolical chamber, or such as the said John our commissary, bearer of these presents, sufficiently instructed for that purpose, shall think fit to be drawn up in the name of the said chamber.

And because the said John has promised in a short time to give us the thirty third book of Livy, of the Macedonian war, we have commissioned him to give it into your fraternity's hands, to be transmited as soon as possible by a faithful messenger, to us, or our beloved son Philip Beroaldus, Librarian of our apostolical palace. But because we have ordered to be paid, here in the city, to the said John, a certain sum of money, and are indebted to him a certain quantity, for expences already made and to be made, we will, and authorize, and command your fraternity, after he shall have received the said book of Livy, to pay, or cause to be paid, to the said John 147 gold ducats of the chamber, out of the money arising from indulgences granted through-those provinces, in favour of the royal Fabric of the prince of the Apostles; which sum we will allow in the accounts between your fraternity and the apostolical chamber, as at present we do allow, and order to be allowed. You are likewise to assist the said John with safe Conducts, Letters, and Aids, and help him, thro' your provinces, in coming at books, and, if occasion be, engage your word for him, that the books shall be returned within a certain time, and sent back to their places. Which if your fraternity shall do, as we are fully persuaded you will, you will acquire a great reputation among learned men, and perform a thing the most acceptable to us. Given at Rome, at St Peter's under the fisherman's ring, November 26.

a canon of Magdeburg, who was one of the ministers of state to the marquis Joachim-Frederic, vantage of the confusion things were then in, and carried away several manuscripts out of the public library, particularly this Livy, to enrich his own. His heirs preserved it, but they concealed the manuscripts, because they had come unjustly by them. At last the whole was destroyed, when the town was pillaged in the year 1631.

Beloved Sons, Health and Apostolical Benediction. Our beloved son John Heytmers de Zonvelben, ecclesiastic of the diocese of Liege, whom we lately appointed special Nuncio and commissary from us, and the Apostolical See, to the illustrious nations of Germany, Denmark, Sweden, and Gotland, to search after ancient books, has informed us, that he has received letters from a certain person, whom he had appointed for that purpose, in which he acquaints him, that he had found in your library an ancient book, containing all the decads of Livy, and that he had obtained your leave to transcribe them, not being allowed to have the original book. We commend your humanity and obedience to the Apostolical See. But, my beloved sons we resolved, from the very beginning of our Pontificate, to promote and favour, with God's assistance, all men of merit, especially learned men. With this view, we procure these kind of ancient books, so much wanted, as many as can come to our hands, to be first corrected by very learned men, of which there are many, by the gift of God, in our court, and afterwards to be carefully printed, for the common benefit of the learned. But if we have not the original books themselves, our design will not be fully answered, because these books, the copies only being seen, cannot be published correctly. We have given orders in our apostolical chamber, that a sufficient security be given, that these books shall be restored whole and uninjured to their owners, as soon as they shall have been here transcribed, and the said John, whom we have again deputed as commissary for the aforesaid purpose, has a sufficient order to the same chamber, to oblige it to the said restitution, in the manner and form he shall think proper. We only aim at the benefit and advantage of learned men. Of which our beloved sons, the abbot and convent of the monastery of Corvey, of the order of St Benedict of Paderborn, are ample witnesses; out of whose library when the five first books of the Roman history of Cornelius Tacitus were stolen, and through many hands came at last into ours, we took care to have them first corrected by the aforesaid learned men residing in our court, and were at the expence of printing them with the rest of the works, which were extant, of the said Tacitus. Afterwards, the matter being discovered, we sent one of the volumes of the said Tacitus, corrected, printed, and handsomely bound, to the said abbot and monastery of Corvey, to be placed in their library in the room of that, which was stolen. And that they might know, that this theft turned rather to their advantage than disadvantage, we sent them a perpetual indulgence for the church of their monastery. Wherefore, with the utmost affection, and in virtue of holy obedience, we exhort, and, with sincere charity in the lord, require you and any of you, that if you ever intend to oblige us, ye would admit the said John into your library, and suffer him to transmit to us from thence both the said book of Livy and others, that he shall think proper, which shall be

LEON (ALOISIO, or LEWIS DE) in Latin Legionensis, professor of Divinity in the university of Salamanca (a), son of a gentleman of Castile, entered into the order of the Hermits of St Augustin the twenty ninth of January 1549 (b). He understood Greek and Hebrew well, and discovered a great deal of dexterity in explaining the holy scripture in his lectures. In 1588, he drew up the rules of the barefooted monks, who began to appear under the name of Recollects. He was made vicar-general of the order, and provincial, the twenty second of August 1591, and he died the day after [A] at Madrid, at sixty four years of age. He had been engaged in a very troublesome affair before the tribunal of the Inquisition; but he had extricated himself with honour, after some years captivity (c) [B]. I doubt not that this occasioned an explanation that he made of a verse in Solomon's Song [C]. His Latin Commentary on that book of Scripture was printed at Salamanca in the year 1589 (d). He published it likewise in Spanish (e). There are some other books of his writing [D], which have made it wished that the rest of his works were published (f).

[A] He was made vicar-general and provincial the twenty second of August 1591, and died the next day. For all this they say, that he governed the province well, and that he gave rise to a more strict observance. Vicarii Generalis officio, & Provincialis munere 1591. 22. Augusti honoratus, Provinciam laudabiliter rexit, arctiorisque vitæ initium fuit Obiit altero ab electionis die in Provinciam (1). Who could imagine an author should be capable of such a narrative as this? I know not whether Elsius did not mean, that Lewis de Leon had been some years vicar general of the order, but that he was made provincial only the day before his death. By this we should easily understand, that this Augustin discharged his office very worthily: but Elsius's narrative will however be very defective.

(1) Philippus Elsius, in Encomiast. Augustin. pag. 443.

[B] He had been engaged in a very troublesome affair before the tribunal of the Inquisition; but he had extricated himself with honour after some years captivity. Let us quote an apologist of the archbishop of Sebaite (2). 'Father Aloysio de Leon an Augustin, . . . Professor of Scripture at Salamanca, was near five years a prisoner in the Inquisition of Spain. But having at last found an equitable judge, he came out innocent, was re-established in his office, and entered Salamanca in triumph, which covered his unjust censurers with confusion.' Elsius makes the imprisonment of this Salamanca professor last but two years, and he takes a pleasure in describing the circumstances of his glorious re-establishment. 'Edidit Herolum specimen præclaræ patientiæ, & magni animi indicium. Cum enim aliquorum invidia S. Inquisitioni delatus simulque contritus, ejusdem carceribus biennium integrum detentus fuisset, tandem infracli animi vir, publico triumpho, cum palma & laurea educitur, ac veste candida, in signum innocentie, amictus, præcone præeunte, deducitur, priusque honoribus, titulis, ac Professioni Theologicæ restituitur. Primam vero lectionem, post tenebras, ut auspicabatur, pleno concessu ad novitatem evocato, inquit: Dicebamus besterna die (3). — He gave an heroic instance of patience and fortitude. For being accused by some envious persons to be Inquisition, and imprisoned two whole years, this brave man was at last brought out in public triumph, dressed in white, as a symbol of his innocence, and preceded by an herald's and was restored to his former honours, titles, and Divinity-professorship. The first lecture he read after his imprisonment, before a numerous audience, he began thus: We said yesterday.'

[C] His imprisonment occasioned an explanation which he made of a verse of Solomon's Song. I speak of the

verse, in which the spouse says: The watchmen that went about the city found me, they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me. Aloysio de Leon pretends, that the spouse speaks thus in the person of good Christians persecuted by the ecclesiastical powers (4). He observes, that these kind of vexations are proofs the most hard and difficult to be supported, and which God often reserves for the most perfect. 'It may perhaps be thought strange, adds he, that the spouse always meets with the watchmen in her way, from whom she not only receives no assistance, but even receives injuries and bad treatment. Is it to be believed, that those who are appointed to preside over the faithful, and who govern the churches of God (for they are to watch the city and its walls) instead of affording them the least succour, often afflict and persecute good men, and those who love God most? Yet this is what all that follows in this divine song obliges me to believe. And certainly, as there is nothing better, nothing more useful to salvation, than good bishops, who faithfully discharge the duties of their sacred ministry, on the contrary unjust and wicked pastors, who make the authority, they have received, to govern the people of God, subservient to their designs and interests, are hurtful to all in general, and principally to the best men, and the greatest saints, and are good for nothing but to ruin them. There has always been a great number of these pastors in the church, and it is to them, that this verse of the Canticles, which I explain, is to be applied.' He says several other things in the same strain, and more home: they may be seen in French in the work that I quote (5). I would fain know whether any commentator, well satisfied with his bishop, and who has always been of the strongest party, has explained in the same manner these words of Solomon's Song. Persecution sharpens the wit, and makes a man wonderfully clear-sighted in discovering the mystic sense.

[D] There are some other books of his writing. A treatise printed at Salamanca in 1590, de utriusque agni typici ac veri immolationis legitimo tempore, in which he maintains, that the Pascal lamb was slain the fourteenth of the moon (6), and that JESUS CHRIST, who conformed himself to this practice in celebrating the Passover, was crucified on that same day (7). A treatise de probæ matrisfamilias officio; another de divinis Nominibus (8). A commentary on the twenty sixth Psalm (9). Note, that this writer is one of those, who apply to Mahomet the predictions of the Apostles concerning Antichrist (10).

LEON (PETER CIEÇA DE), author of a History of Peru. He left Spain, his native country, at thirteen years of age, to go into America, where he sojourned seventeen years (a). He saw there so many curious things, that he resolved to give an account of them. I shall mention some of them if it be only to shew the injustice of those who pretend that the Christians first taught the people of America to be be wicked [A]. This cannot be said without a great many restrictions, possibly in some countries of this new world, the stupid and simple inhabitants might honestly and frugally have followed the laws of nature, and learned deceitfulness and debauchery by their commerce with the Christians; but, generally speaking, the corruption of the Americans was so brutal and enormous, that we cannot sufficiently detest it. The design

[A] I shall mention some of them, if it be only to show the injustice of those who pretend, that it was the Christians first taught the people of America to be wicked.]

He says, that the grandes in the valley of Nora, endeavoured to take from their enemies, as many women as they could, that they lay with them, and fed the children they had by them, very delicately to the age of twelve or thirteen; when finding them well fat, they killed and eat them. This among them, was reckoned a most delicious banquet (1). Let us hear what treatment the inhabitants of this country gave their prisoners of war. They reduced them to the condition of slaves, they obliged them to marry, and eat all the children that were the fruit of those marriages, and afterwards eat the slaves themselves, when they were no longer able to beget children. 'Mangiavano i figliuoli de quei schiavi, & poi mangiavano gli stessi schiavi quando erano tanto vecchi, che non potevano generare (2)'. The first time the Spaniards entered this valley, a lord called Nabonuco, came in a friendly manner to see them, attended by some women; night being come, two of them did lie at full length, on a carpet, another laid herself across to serve as a pillow to Nabonuco, while the two others served him for a mattress. He laid himself along upon the two first, and taking another woman by the hand, who was very handsome, was asked what he designed to do with her; he answered, he designed to eat her, and also to feed upon a child which she had (3). The author observes, that in the country of Quito, the women tilled the ground, and took care of the harvests; and that the men employ themselves only in spinning, and house-keeping (4). They worshipped the sun in Peru, and one of the principal acts of adoration, was the offering him six teeth, which the votaries had pulled out of their heads (5). There were several provinces in that country, where the ideas of honour, as to chastity, were wholly extinguished. One of their diversions was singing the brave actions of their ancestors; this they did dancing to the sound of a drum, and drinking till they were drunk; then they took out the woman they liked best, and enjoyed her, and no body found any fault with it. 'Alcuni pigliano quelle donne, che gli piacciono, & condotte in certe case, Siuocano con quelle la lor lussuria, non se lo recando a biasmo, perche non conoscono qual dona si conserva con la verecondia, ne tengono conto di honore, e manco riguardano al mondo (6)'. Thus we see what we are to think of those who speak so much of the good morals of the Americans, and pretend, we have taught these nations to be wicked, since we carried the light of the gospel among them. The most debauched Spaniards had never seen in their own country, what they saw in the new-found-world, women running after them in furious transports of lust, and provided with some uncommon philtres to heighten the pleasure. Here follows some Italian lines upon it. 'Nell' Istorie del l'Indie narra Amerigo Vespucci d'esser capitato ad una certa costa, dove trovò femmine di tanta libidine, che come spiritate correvano dietro a' suoi marinari, perche usassero con esso loro; e dice, che havevano un fugo di non so che erba, col quale bagnando le parti genitali de gli huomini, non solo cagionano, ut citius, ac sapius erigerent, sed etiam quod eorum penis in insolitam excreveret magnitudinem: il che piaceva loro mirabilmente (7)'.

Here is something still worse. The author informs us, that in the province of Carthagen, the men look on the bride's having her maidenhead, as a fault, and refuse to consummate the marriage, till she has been well cleansed of that spot, by her relations, or by her friends. In some places they leave this good office to be performed by the mother; but for fear of deceit they will have the operation done in the presence of witnesses. 'In certe parti della provincia Cartagena, quando maritano le figliuole, & che la sposa deve andare a marito, la madre della giovane in presenza d'alcuni suoi parenti le toglie la virginità con le dita, si che riputavano, che fusse piu honore mandarla a marito così corrotta, che con la sua virginità'.

VOL. III.

'Ma tra questi costumi usati da loro, era miglior di alcune terre, che i parenti, o amici toglievano la virginità alla giovane & con questa conditione, la maritavano, & il marito la riceveva (8)'. Diodorus Siculus, ascribes the same humour to the isles which we at present call Majorca and Minorca (9). He affirms, that in the celebration of their marriages, the husband did not enjoy the bride till all the relations and friends, who were invited to the wedding-feast, had enjoyed her round, each according to the rank which his age gave him (10). It is very strange, that a nation so lascivious (11), should be so little jealous; for, generally speaking, the more people are inclined to this brutal pleasure, the more subject they are to jealousy. Witness the Turks and Moors. The latter are the farthest in the world from this humour of the Americans of the province of Carthagen: there is nothing they insist on in the bride so much, as that she should have her maidenhead, and if they are not well convinced the day after the marriage, that they have had it, they send her back to her parents. See Maro's Voyages, published by Mr de St Olon, in the year 1694. There lives a people on the borders of the Red-Sea, who are jealous, to a degree of frenzy, they are not satisfied, unless precautions are taken, from the very cradle, which oblige the bridegroom to begin by a kind of chirurgical operation. Cardinal Bembo's Latin will let us into the meaning of this. 'Aliis post hos relictis populis, mare rubrum ingressi, complures nigrorum item & bonorum hominum, ac bello sortium civitates adierunt: qui natis statim feminis naturam consuunt, quoad urinae exitus ne impediatur: easque cum adoleverint, sic confutas in matrimonium collocant; ut sponsi prima cura sit conglutinatas atque coalitas puellae oras ferro interscindere: tanto in honore apud homines barbaros est non ambigua ducendis uxoris virginitas (12)'. — Passing by other people after these, and entering the Red-Sea, they touched at several towns inhabited by blacks, but men of virtue, and brave in war: who, immediately upon the birth of a female child, sow up nature, so as only to leave a passage for the urine, and, when they grow up, give them thus sowed up in marriage; so that the husband's first care is to cut a passage with an instrument; so careful are these Barbarians to be sure of a maiden-head, when they marry. How can man be subject to follies so diametrically opposite!

Let us return to the Americans. The most part remove the grievances themselves, which their married state might be subject to, if the women contracted came maids to the nuptial bed. One would think they were resolved to trust only to themselves; they leave nothing to do for the relations or friends, I mean, that before ever they speak of contract, or marriage, they do all they have a mind to with those they afterwards marry. 'Si maritavano alla foggia de i lor vicini: & odo dire, che alcuni, o la maggior parte, prima che si maritino, togliono la virginità a quelle, che s'haviano da maritare, mescolandosi con quelle lussuriosamente (13)'. For the rest, this contempt of virginity is not the general taste of the Americans. There are several American nations, where the husbands require it; but the greatest part do not find it, they come too late. 'La maggior parte de gli Indiani si maritano con le figliuole & sorelle d'altri, senza ordine, & pochi trovano le mogli vergini (14)'. What the author observes concerning Sodomy, is horrid; it was openly and publicly practised. 'Non essant c'havessino molte donne bellissime, tuttavia (si come da loro intesi) usavano pubblicamente il tristo vicio della sodomia, & anco se ne vantavano alla scoperta (15)'. There were even temples in which it was committed as a pious action (16); an abomination unknown to the Paganism of antient Greece, though the prostitution of women, in honour of the gods, was very common. I have not observed in Ciega, that there were any nations in this new world, who did not cover their secret parts; but other relations positively affirm it, and with this very strange circumstance, that those of the female sex, who had their virginity,

This is very surprizing, since the laws of decency are every where more relax for married women than for maids.

Note, that this astonishing corruption, which had extinguished the laws of humanity and modesty, and had sunk these people into the cruelty and ferocity of cannibals, and the most monstrous lasciviousness, had not extinguished or stifled the ideas of religion. They believed the immortality of the soul: this appears by all their funeral ceremonies (18); they adored the sun (19), they believed a creator of all things (20), they offered sacrifices to their idols, and even spared not human blood in them (21). The author observes over and over, that they worship the devil; but it is under the notion of a being extremely powerful, and which, notwithstanding it's wickedness, has something in him of the divine nature. Indiani di Tacunga credono

Considering the vast extent of the heavens, the motion of the sun, the moon, and other wonderful things, though blinded by the devil, they believe that he has power over all things. Some, knowing his malice, and that he is always a liar, and uses them very ill, hate him; yet they obey him out of fear, believing that there is something divine in him.' He observes, that the priests live a holy life, and are much respected (23).

[B] That book has been translated into Italian.] Nicolas Antonio (24) observes, that the Spanish edition of Seville, 1553, in folio, was followed the year after, by that of Antwerp, in 8vo, and by an Italian edition of Rome, 1555, in 8vo. He says, that Augustin de Gravaliz is the author of the Italian version. I add, that it was printed at Venice, appresso Giordano Ziletti, in the year 1557, in 8vo. This is the edition I make use of, and the name of the Printer in the title, but I find in the last page these words: In Vinegia, appresso Domenico de Farri, ad instantia di M. Andrea Arriagabene MDLVI. Nicolas Antonio did not know of this edition. He says, that the other parts of this history were impatiently expected (25).

LEON (GONSALEZ PONTIUS DE), was of Seville, and lived in the XVIth century. He resided at Rome in the year 1585, and he there published, in Latin, an Answer (a) to a book, which a Protestant of Germany, named Leonhart Waramund, had written in defence of Gebhard Truchses, archbishop of Cologne. He was very warm in this Answer; and, according to the practice of those times, he loaded his adversary with a thousand reproaches. He does not write ill in Latin for a Spaniard [A], and he does not want learning.

(a) It is in 4to, of 185 pages.

[A] He does not write ill in Latin for a Spaniard.] I will not say, that there have been no Spaniards, who have understood the Latin language very well, and have used it with purity and eloquence. My meaning is that generally the writers of that nation, are too negligent in that respect. Some of them even disregard the Orthography, and put an o for a u, and a y for an i. I will give this instance of it. Cujus (rei maritimæ) itidem polytica tractatio, dispositio, & Archigubernatio à Magno Philippo nostro Hispaniarum Rege . . . tuæ solitudinî & prudentiæ emandata prædicatur. These are the words of the licentiate John Baptist de Urquiola & Elorriaga, in a preliminary epistle of a treatise of Civil-law (1), printed in 1663 (2), and dedicated to Don Francisco Ramo del Manzano. He always writes Lyffius instead of Lipfius.

LEONCLAVIUS (JOHN), one of the most learned men of the XVIth century, was born in Westphalia, and was a gentleman. He spent near two years in the court of the duke of Savoy, on the affairs of Lazarus Suendius (a); and afterwards travelled a long time in the retinue of baron Zerotini. He lived also some years in the family of the baron of Kiltz. He had been invited to Heidelberg, to be Greek professor; but the death of prince Casimir made that invitation useless (b). During his stay in Turkey, he collected excellent materials for the composing the Ottoman History; and it is to him the public is indebted for the best accounts we have of that empire [A]. He had joined to the knowledge of the learned tongues, that of the Civil-Law,

(a) He was general of an army.

(b) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Philosophorum, pag. 379.

[A] The public is indebted to him for the best accounts we have of that empire.] Hear what Thuanus says of him. 'Juris Romani Græcique consularissimo, & rerum Turcicarum apprime perito; ad quas linguæ ipsius Byzantina peregrinatione comparatam cognitionem, exactam ultimæ historiæ Græcæ lectionem, & acce ac admirandum judicium attulit, quod non solum scriptis ab ipso dum viveret publicatis, sed in iis quæ post mortem ejus edita sunt, elucet. — He was thoroughly conversant in the Greek and Roman law, and particularly skilled in Turkish affairs, to the study of which he brought a knowledge of the language itself, acquired by travelling to Constantinople, an exact reading of the later Greek history, and an acute and wonderful judgment; which appears not only from the works he published in his life-time, but also from those, which came out after his death.' (1) Thuan. lib. civ, sub fin. Leonclavius has written Historiæ Muslimanica Turcarum libri 18. Apologetici duo, prior est libitarius index Osmanidarum; posterior continet epistolas de rebus Turcicis. Commonefactio de præsentis rerum Turcicarum statu. Annales Turcici cum supplemento, & pandectis historiæ Turcicæ (1). This last work is properly the translation of a book written by the Turks themselves; I mean of the Turkish annals, which Jerome Beck of Leopoldsdorf, Ferdinand's ambassador, brought from Constantinople in 1551. Ferdinand caused them to be translated in High-Dutch, by John Spigelius Constantinopolis advectus, jussuque (2), and afterwards Leonclavius translated them into Latin (3).

Law, which enabled him to make a good translation of the Basilica [B]. His other versions were esteemed, though the critics have pretended to find many faults in them [C]. [B] The translation of the Basilica. I mean, the Abridgment of the Basilica: his work is intitled Verfio & Notæ ad Synopfin LX Librorum Basilicon, seu universi Juris Romani, & ad Novellas Imperatorum. It was printed at Basil in the year 1575. Melchior Adam speaks thus of it (4): 'Evulgavit cum annotationibus sexaginta librorum Basilicon, hoc est universi Juris Romani auctoritate principum Romanorum in Græcam linguam traducti, Eclogam five Synopfin ante non vifam: item Novellarum antea non publicatarum librum. — He published sixty books of Basilica, that is of the Universal Roman Law, translated, by the authority of the Roman emperors, into the Greek tongue; an Eclogue or Synopsis never before seen; likewise a book of Novels, never before published.' Mr Teiffier mult give me leave to observe, that his manner of reciting this title may mislead the reader: he has also published, says he (5), sexaginta libros Basilicon, Eclogam five Synopfin, & Novellas cum notis. This is mentioning the Basilica intire, and another book intitled Ecloga five Synopfi, and consequently multiplying and confounding things. The same author citing Melchior Adam affirms, that Scaliger calls Leonclavius the most learned Civilian of his time, and sets him even above the great Cujas (6). Melchior Adam says not a word of it; and besides what we find in Leonclavius's praise in the Scaligerana, is much beneath this character. 'Leonclavius has written the best concerning the Turks.' 'Leonclavius fuit Westphalus, sed non Barbarus: bene intellexit Græca Constantinopolitana & inferioris ævi, omnia ejus scripta sunt utilia, imo necessaria; Græca Jurisconsultorum intellexit, sed Autorum Veterum non intellexit, ut H. Stephanus, qui paulo ante obitum multa scripta ad me contra Leonclavii editionem Xenophontis. Leonclavius habebat sortita secum. Clusius eum novit familiarissimè (7). — Leonclavius was a Westphalian, but not a Barbarian: he well understood the Constantinopolitan Greek affairs, and those of the last age of the empire: all his works are useful, may necessary: he understood the Greek of the Civilians, but not of the ancient authors, as Henry Stephens, did, who, a little before his death, wrote many things to me against Leonclavius's edition of Xenophon. Leonclavius kept mistresses: Clusius was intimately acquainted with him.' Thus speaks the second Scaligerana. Leonclavius's learning is more praised in it than his morals, since we are here informed that he kept whores in his house. Let us not forget his Jus Græce Romanum (8) in two volumes in folio, and his Notæ ad Paratitla seu ad Collectionem Constitutionum Ecclesiasticarum (9) in 8vo.

[C] His other versions were esteemed, though the critics have pretended to find many faults in him. He is one of the most famous translators, that Germany ever produced. He has given us the version of Xenophon revised three times; that of Zosimus; of the annals of Constantine Manasses; of those of

Michael Glycas; of the abridgment of the sixty books of the Basilica; and of several works of St Gregory Nazianzen. . . . He has also corrected Xenander's Versions of Dion, and that of Chalcondyle by Clausar (10). Mr Baillet, whose words these are, informs us also of the praises, Mr Huet has given this translator. They are very advantageous. The notes on Zosimus, in the English edition, 1679, do not give such an idea of this man's capacity. Henry Stephens severely criticized his translation of Xenophon (11), and was exposed to several complaints of his adversary. Mr Baillet mentions this dispute; this is what Melchior Adam tells us of it. 'Litem tamen ei super ista interpretatione Xenophontea criticam Grammaticam movit Henricus Stephanus, vir & typographus clarissimus, edita in ejus errores insignes inquisitione autochædialica. Contra & Leonclavius de Stephano conqueritur, quod contra fidem datam, & præter officium viri boni, Xenophontis à se Latine reddit exemplar, sicut & Zosimi, detinuerit. Et falsus est Stephanus, accepisse se illam Xenophontis versionem ab annis circiter octodecim: post tredecim aut quatuordecim amplius annis sibi non vifam, sed cum è sua suppellectile libraria, militum incuria, belli tempore aliquot libri incendio perissent: nescivisse, an in illorum numero Xenophon à Leonclavio versus, fuisset. Tandem, interfecto anni amplius spacio, librum inventum fuisse, situ oblitum, & membrana crassa, qua involutus erat, conservatum (12). — Henry Stephens, a famous Printer, had a critical and grammatical controversy with him about that interpretation of Xenophon, and published extemporaneous remarks on his egregious blunders. Leonclavius, on the other side, complains of Stephens, for detaining, contrary to promise, and the duty of a good man, the copy of his translation of Xenophon, as also of Zosimus. And Stephens owned, that he had received that translation eighteen years before; that after thirteen, or fourteen, years at most, he saw it no more; but that, during the war, when some books of his library, through the carelessness of the soldiers, were burnt, Leonclavius's translation of Xenophon, for ought he knew, might be among them. That at last, in a little more than a year's time, the book was found, mouldy, and preserved by the thick parchment, in which it was bound.'

[D] What he published of Cæsius, put James de Billy into a violent passion. Leonclavius published four dialogues (13) of Cæsius, brother to St Gregory Nazianzen, which he had translated into Latin. It is disputed whether this work ought to be ascribed to Cæsius. Father Labbé has referred that inquiry to another time. 'Plura, says he (14), adversus Leonclavium primum eorum (dialogorum) editorem declamavit Jacobus Billius Prunæus prælatione in decimam orationem sancti Nazianzeni, quæ alias expendimus accuratius.' Lambecius (15) espouses Leonclavius, warmly against James de Billy's invectives.

LEONICENUS (NICOLAS), was born at Vicenza, in Italy, in 1428. He taught Physic in the university of Ferrara for above sixty years (a). He was not only excellent in his profession; but also very well versed in the Belles Lettres. He was the first that translated Galen's works into Latin (b). As admirable as his learning was, his virtue was much more so. No body could be more disengaged from the pleasures of sense. Sobriety, chastity, and an aversion to avarice, were the distinguishing virtues of his life [A]; and it was to this great purity of manners, that he attributed the vigorous health he enjoyed [B] to an extreme old age; for he lived ninety six years [C]. His merit

[A] Sobriety, chastity, and an aversion to avarice, were the distinguishing virtues of his life. If he had not been of a gay humour, and smiling countenance, he might have passed for a true Stoic. He eat little, slept little, abstained from wine and women; all dishes were alike to him; he took without choice whatever food was set before him, and could hardly distinguish one piece of money from another: 'Cibi & vini maxime abstinent, fomique minimi, præsertim verò Veneris continentissimus, usque adeo mollioris vitæ voluptates abdicavit, ut pecunias, luxuriæ instrummenta, nec agnita quidem monetæ nota contemneret; oblatum, & nulla delectum cura cibum caperet; nec unquam de fortuna quereretur. . . . eum hercle perfectum Stoicum putasses, nisi honesto ori liberalis hilaritas affuisset (1).'

[B] It was to this great purity of manners that he attributed the vigorous health he enjoyed. This Paul Jovius tells us as from his own mouth. 'Quum ego aliquando comiter ab eo peterem, ut ingenue proferret, quonam arcano artis uteretur, ut tanto corporis atque animi vigore vitia senectutis eluderet: vividum, inquit, ingenium merit must needs have been illustrious, since the two Scaligers mention him with commendation [D]. I question whether we are to believe what one of them says, that Leoniceus being afflicted with the Falling-sickness in his youth, was so weary of his life, that he had like to have laid violent hands on himself [E]. This able Physician wrote several good books [F]; and was a very good Poet [G]. He died in 1524. He set up for a great critic on Pliny, which did not please his disciple Calcagninus, whose words

'ingenium perpetua, Jovi, vitæ innocentia, salubre verò corpus, hilari frugalitatis præsidio facile tuetur (2). — When I once courteously intreated him, ingeniously to tell me, by what secret art he preserved his health both of body and mind, and escaped the inconveniences of old age; Jovius, said he, we easily preserve the mind's health, by a perpetual innocence of life, and that of the body, by the cheerful defence of temperance.' He had been saying (3), that Leoniceus, at ninety years of age, had all his senses perfect, and a very strong memory; that he walked without a stick, and did not stoop, though very tall. Observe well, that a virtuous life has not always the effect, which Leoniceus ascribes to it. There are those, who might dispute the crown of chastity and sobriety with him, and whose conscience was as clear as his, whose days notwithstanding have been few and evil, they lived but a short while, and yet were often sick.

We will add to Paul Jovius another witness. I have read a passage in Melchior Adam, by which one might gather, that Leoniceus had told Paul Langius, his disciple, that he took the chastity of his youth to be the cause of his long life. 'Audivit in Italia (Joannes Langius). . . . Nicolaum Leoniceum, Dioscoridis illustratorem: qui annum ætatis attigit nonagesimum sextum, cum amplius sexaginta annos Ferrariæ docuisset. Hic dixit, se viridi vegetaque uti senectâ, quia castam juventutem virili ætati tradidisset: ediditque opusculum, in quo omnibus agri salutem & vitam restitui conciliarique posse docuit (4). — John Langius heard, in Italy, Nicolas Leoniceus, the interpreter of Dioscorides, who was ninety years old, having taught sixty years at Ferrara. This Physician said, that he enjoyed a strong and healthy old age, because he had lived chaste in his youth, and published a book, in which he taught, that health and life might be restored to all sorts of sick persons.' You see in this passage, that he was the author of a book wherein he maintained, that all kind of distempers were curable. Undoubtedly he excepted that of old age, at least acknowledged this disease incurable. He had the experience of it; for observe what Langius, an eye witness, says of him. 'Ferrariam igitur venimus, ubi Leoniceum, elegantioris medicinæ illustratorem, edentulum fere, & jam ex senio marasmo tabescentem, convenimus: quem senile ætatis ejus decus reveriti, perplexis de erroribus Plinii prolembatibus obtundere volebamus (5). — We arrived at Ferrara, where we met with Leoniceus, the improver of the more elegant practice of Physic, almost tottles, and wearing away with old age, whom, out of reverence for the dignity of his years, we would not disturb, by proposing difficult problems of Pliny to him.' The letter, in which Langius says this, is without date: and therefore we cannot judge by it, whether Paul Jovius is mistaken as to the vigour he ascribes to old Leoniceus.

[C] He lived ninety six years.] Naudæus is mistaken, when he makes him live above a century. I shall give his own words, because they contain some other very curious particulars. 'Hippocrates, Galenus, Avicenna, Leoniceus, cogitate vos quantum tempore, loco, vivendi ratione inter se discrepantes, hoc uno vitæ termino plane conveniunt, quem omnes ultra centesimum annum protraxere (6). — Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna, Leoniceus, though differing in time, place, and manner of living, yet agree in their term of life, which each protracted to above an hundred years.'

[D] The two Scaligers mention him with commendation.] See in what terms, (7) Leoniceus à patre semper imprimis commendatus, & Medicorum sui temporis facile princeps judicatus. — Leoniceus was particularly commended by Scaliger the father, and esteemed by him the greatest Physician of his time. Thus says the father: let us now hear the son. 'De eo viro non nisi honorifice prædicare debemus, vel eo nomine quod primus Philosophiam & Medicinam ipsam cum humanioribus literis conjunxit. Primus enim ille nos docuit, homines qui sine bonis literis Medicinam tractant, esse similes iis qui in alieno foro litigant (8). — We ought never to speak of this man without respect, if it were but for this reason, that he was the first, who united Philosophy and Medicine with polite learning. For he first taught us, that men, who, without learning, apply themselves to medicine, are like those, who go to law at a strange bar.'

[E] . . . one of them says, that Leoniceus being afflicted with the Falling-sickness in his youth, was so weary of life, that he had like to have laid violent hands on himself.] Mirum præterea, continet be, 'accepi de viro. A pueritia, imò à cunabulis ipsis, ad 30 annum morbo comitali adeo tentabatur, ut cum ad se redierat, pertæsus vitæ pene sibi manus afferret. Sed post trigessimum annum plane eo malo defunctus, omnibus membrorum ac sensuum officiis integer, nulla morbi suspitione ad 94 annum pervenit. Et si bene memini, triduo antequam decederet à vita, operam dederat lectioni. — I have heard a strange particular of this man. He was so troubled from his youth, nay even from his cradle, to his thirtieth year, with the Falling-sickness, that, when he came to himself, he was so tired with life, as almost to lay violent hands on himself. But after his thirtieth year, being entirely free from that distemper, and having all his limbs and senses entire, he reached his ninety fourth year, without suspicion of any disease: and, if I remember right, he read lectures but three days before he died.' Here is a condition to be envied; not because Leoniceus lived ninety six years; that alone was a poor thing, and rather a curse than a blessing; but because he had preserved to this old age the use of his understanding, his memory and his senses, and that his last sickness was very short (9).

[F] Leoniceus wrote several good books.] The translation of several tracts of Galen, of Hippocrates's Aphorisms, and Aristotle's first book De partibus animalium. De Plinii & plurium aliorum Medicorum in medicina erroribus. De tribus doctrinis ordinatis secundum Galeni sententiam. De formativa virtute. De disparte & pluribus aliis serpentibus. Quædam de herbis & fructibus, animalibus, metallis. De morbo Gallico, sive Neapolitano. Contra suarum translationum obtrusores apologia. A book intitled Antisophista, which made Paulus Jovius say (10), that 'nemo error Sophistarum importuna garrulitate cuncta confutavit (11) (quàm Leoniceus). — No one has more eloquently and forcibly confuted the errors of the Sophists, who spoil every thing by their impertinent garrulity, than Leoniceus.' He translated into Italian, Dion's History, and Lucian's dialogues, to oblige Hercules, duke of Ferrara, who did not understand Latin (12). I forgot his treatise De vipera, against which Rhodiginus tells us, a learned man has written (13). 'Nec me fallit ex eruditioribus quemdam edito etiam libello Marsum à vipera disparasse, quo Nicolai Leonici viri undecunque scientissimi (14) placita uberius de hujus animalis natura convellat.'

[G] He was a very good Poet.] This Giraldis assures us. 'Erat & Leoniceus merito inter poetas collocandus, nam cum senex optimos versus faceret, & interdum à Græco in Latinum transferret, tum in juvenili sua ætate non modo meditato arguere, sed docile composuit, sed etiam ut sæpe mihi memorare solitus fuit, ex tempore & impræmeditata carmina cecinit (15). — Leoniceus might deservedly have been ranked among the Poets; for, both in his old age, he made excellent verses, and sometimes translated out of Greek into Latin, and also in his youth he not only composed ingeniously and learnedly, but even, as he often told me, repeated verses extempore.'

[H] He

words I shall cite [H]. They are much to the honour of Leoniceus.

He did not apply himself to the practice of Physic; and being asked the reason, he answered, that he did more service to the public by teaching other Physicians, than if he himself made visits to the sick (c).

When I said that he was born at Vicenza, I followed the herd of writers; but I should have shewn their error. They have not understood the meaning of the epithet Vicentinus which he gives himself: it signifies only that he was born in the Vicentine. The place of his birth is called Lunigo in Italian (d) and Leonicum in Latin: this is the reason why he took the surname Leoniceus.

I shall cite the words of Calpurnius.] They are found in a letter he wrote to Erasmus, the sixth of July, 1525.

Leoniceus, the Physician, has been some months dead, a man of immortal reputation, whom I used to call the last of heroes, and remains of the golden age. For in that century, which produced so many great men, the Hermolaus's, Politians, Pico's, Me-rola's, and Domitius's, he died the last, at almost an hundred years of age, and, which may seem strange, with all his senses perfect. He wrote many things, translated many things out of the Greek, and revived many things in Physic, which had been lost.

He was perpetually at variance with barbarous Physicians: he also censured Pliny too severely, from which undertaking I in vain dissuaded him. Lastly, what happens to but a few, he lived to see his own posteriety: his death greatly afflicted me, upon a private,

as well as a public, account; for he had been my tutor, and I foresaw the loss the Latin language, and learning, would suffer by his death.

LEONIN (ELBERT or ENGELBERT), in Flemish de Leew, a native of the isle of Bommel in Guelderland, was one of the ablest Civilians of the XVIth century, and versed in state affairs. He studied first in his native country, then at Utrecht, afterwards at Emmeric, and lastly at Louvain. He did not confine himself to the study of the Belles Lettres in this last town, under the learned Peter Nannius, but also applied himself to the Civil-Law, and became a Licentiate in that faculty in 1547. He afterwards went to Arras to learn the French tongue, returned to Louvain at the year's end, and married a daughter of the first professor of the Civil-Law [A]. A professor's chair of the Canon-Law becoming vacant on the second day of his marriage, he was promoted to it. He discharged that office worthily, and grew famous as well by his lectures, as by his answers to several Law cases sent him from all parts of Europe. He succeeded Gabriel Mudæus first professor of Civil-Law in 1560, and from that time saw his reputation daily increase; inasmuch that the great lords and magistrates of the Low-Countries did consult and honour him. Even those who were at variance among themselves, agreed in intrusting him with their most secret affairs and differences, and refused not his arbitration, tho' the obstinacy of their hatred rendered ineffectual his endeavours to reconcile them. He had the honour to be intimately beloved by the prince of Orange; and this was one reason, why he would never re-engage in the party of the king of Spain, after he had once embraced that of the lords and provinces associated in defence of their liberty. I shall give his other reasons below [B]. He was chosen chancellor of Guelderland

[A] He married at Louvain, a daughter of the first professor of the Civil-Law.] Her name was Barbara de Haze (1). If her husband deserved the surname

Longolius on account of his tallness (2), she deserved

a particular surname on account of her long life. Valerius Andreas tells us, she lived fifty two years with her husband, and thirty six a widow (3). She was twelve at least when she married. Add these numbers together, and they will make an entire century.

There will be no error in the calculation, though there is in Valerius Andreas's way of reckoning: according to him we must allow at least a year between the licence and the marriage of Leonin: the licence was taken out in 1547: Leonin must be married then in the year 1548, now he died in 1598. How then can it be said that he lived fifty two years with his wife?

all this I know appears from his epitaph (4); but we ought to conclude from it, that he married Barbara de

Haze, in 1546, and Valerius Andreas is to be blamed for not seeing his false computation.

[B] I shall give his other reasons below.] We find in him a rare example of constancy, for being once engaged with the States, he unalterably continued the same course to his death, though a zeal for religion did not tie him to them. It is no extraordinary thing to see people die in the party they have espoused at the beginning of a faction or revolution; but if the train of such an enterprize has been long and perplexed, one while favourable, another disadvantageous,

VO L. III.

you commonly see the same persons quit and re-espouse three or four times the same party, and it is a meer chance if, sometimes, they end as they begin. Death seizes them, when they are returned to their first starting place: some years more would have caused them to repair perhaps to the opposite standard. The surest way of preventing change, is either to embrace, out of an ardent zeal for religion, the revolting party, or so to irritate one's prince, as to leave no room for confiding in the amnesty promised: nothing of all this was the cause of Leonin's constancy, which was very long and without interruption. What then were his motives? they were these. He enjoyed the intimacy and particular friendship of the prince of Orange. This made him suspected by the royalists and by the king himself. They believed he was an accomplice in the rebellion; this however, says he, was a falsehood (5).
but he did not think fit to trust those who falsely suspected him. Besides he was a counsellor of state to the new republic, he had been trusted in the greatest affairs: he thought therefore it would be perfidious to reveal them to the other party, as he must have done, if he had changed sides (6). Besides he was of Solon's opinion, that in civil wars, an honest man ought to embrace the weakest side, and the most exposed to danger. Sed & Solonis dictum, inquit, ac consilium ob oculos habebam, quod bonus vir in civilibus diffensionibus partem eligere debeat inferiorem, & magis periculosam (7). A man must be a thorough Philoland after the departure of archduke Matthias in 1581. He was one of the ambassadors of the States to the king of France after the death of the prince of Orange in 1584, he made a speech at the audience they had of Henry III (a), and in the conferences concerning the offer of the sovereignty. He haranged at the Hague, in the name of the same States, the earl of Leicester, whom the queen of England had given them for governor. He insinuated himself into the good graces of this earl, and the other English lords, and advised them to exercise their authority with moderation; but contrary counsels prevailed. He died at Arnheim the fourth (b) of December 1598, in the seventy ninth year of his age (c). He never professed the Protestant religion, and behaved himself somewhat too freely on this head [C]. We have several books of his writing [D].

fopher, to give such advice, and much more so to follow it. But how comes it, that Solon did not advise to adhere to the reasonable side? I believe we may answer for him, that each of the contending parties, in a republic, pretend the public good, and that with such a train of objections, and answers, that private persons cannot easily distinguish the right from the wrong. What remains then, but to engage in the least powerful faction? It is not so hard to distinguish it. It ought to be preferred not only because it is generous to assist the weak against the strong, but because the temptation to commit acts of injustice is greater in the prevailing, than in the weaker faction. You will say that the latter would not be more moderate than the other, if it had equal power. I grant it; but as long as inability deprives it of occasions to tyrannize, you ought to balance and avoid being an abettor of violence. If it becomes uppermost, quit it, for fear it should draw you into oppressive methods in its turn. This, by the by, and on occasion of Solon's maxim, and with the corrective I have joined to it, viz. that at the bottom, you know not who is right and who is wrong.

[C] He behaved somewhat too freely on the subject of religion. He would have religion reduced to a great simplicity, and all left to the judgment of God and the angels, that exceeds the reach of human understanding. We ought, says he, to admire and adore the Deity rather than define it. Let us banish from the republic subtle disputations. 'Ego simplicem religionem amplectendam semper prædixi, & etiam nunc prædico, prorsus divina & humani ingenii caput excedentia, divinitati & secreto Dei atque Angelorum judicio relinquens: honorandam potius & admirandam divinitatem quam definiendam judicavi. Enixè laboravi, ut nimium subtiles disputationes à Republica ejicerentur, de quo memini in Oratione ad Ordines habita, quæ post primam Centuriam Consiliorum meorum impressa est (8). — I always declared for simplicity in religion, and now also declare for it, leaving divine things, and such as exceed human comprehension, to the Deity, and the secret judgment of God and angels: I have thought the Divinity ought to be honoured and admired, rather than defined. I have laboured hard to banish from the commonwealth subtle disputations; which I mention in an oration delivered before the States, and which is printed after the first century of my Consilia.' St Aldegonde found him amiable in all respects, except that he had too great an aversion to Theological subjects: you are shipwrecked, says he, writing to him, on those maxims, do no injury, live honestly, &c. To me this looks like making the labours of the prophets and apostles quite useless. 'Elbertus Leoninus, Haggeus Albada, alique inter proceres religioni reformatæ nunquam nomen dederant. Ille honestate civili contentus, religionem omnem siveque deque habebat: uti eum ipsi graphice descripsit Phil. Marnixius in select. Epist. Belgarum centur. 2. ep. 44.' 'Nihil enim est in te quod non sit suavissimum, si hoc unum demas, quod nimium es atheologus. Dum enim tuis illis formulis, quid dico formulis? imo oraculis, Neminem lædere, honestè vivere, aliisque tanquam scopolis inhaerere, videris mihi Apostolorum omnium ac Prophetarum laborem omnem prætere inane ducere (9). — Elbert Leonin, Haggei Albada, and others among the nobles, never embraced the Reformed Religion. The former, satisfied with civil honesty, esteemed all religions alike; as Phil. Marnixius, in select. Epist. Belg. cent. 2. ep. 44, has described him to himself. 'There is nothing in you but what is most pleasing, except that you pay too little regard to Divinity: for whilst you adhere to those formularies, (why do I say, formularies?) those oracles, injure no one, live honestly, you seem to me to esteem the labour of all the apostles and prophets as vain and useless.' The place where Grotius speaks of three illustrious men, who died in the Low-Countries in 1598, deserves our notice. The two first (10) beginning with public affairs, grew old in a retreat. But the third called from the obscurity of his closet to the acquaintance of great men, spent the rest of his life in public employments. He speaks of our Leoninus, and says he was a man, who derived from nature, what the precepts of the old Philosophers aimed at; he was in a manner free from passion, he followed the republican party, not through interest or prejudice, but because he found himself engaged in it. 'Elbertus Leoninus in umbra studiorum quondam educatus, & ante pacem Gandavensem regiarum partium minister, tunc summus Geldriæ juridicus consiliis publicis immorabatur, homo natura consecutus, quo veterum magistrorum præcepta nituntur, ut affectu pene omnino vacaret, adeo quidem, ut partes quoque non studio ullo, sed quia sic invenerat, sequeretur (11).'

[D] We have several books of his writing. Most of them came out after his death: as we may know by the dates added to the following titles: Centuria consiliorum at Antwerp 1584 in folio. We see at the end of this work Oratio habita in conventu Ordinum Generalium, Antverpiæ anno 1579, tempore Colloquii Coloniensis, de bello, religione, & pace per Belgium. His seven books Emendationum sive Observationum, were printed at Arnheim in 1610, in 4to. Prælectiones ad tit. Cod. de jure Emphyteutico, at Francfort 1606. in 8vo. ad lib. 9. Cod. in quo tituli & leges omnes ad instar processus criminalis explicantur, at Cologne 1604, in 4to. Commentarius ad tit. D. de usufructu, Lichæ 1600. in 8vo. His dissertation, de tropezitis Belgii vulgo Lombardis was published by Boxhorn (12). I omit several books he designed for the press (13), which were left in the custody of Elbert Zofius, his grandson (14), advocate of Utrecht.

LEONTIUM, an Athenian courtesan, made herself famous, first by her leudness, and next by her application to the study of Philosophy. The second of these would have repaired the disgrace of the first, if Leontium had renounced her amorous intrigues, when she betook herself to Philosophy; but it is said she abated nothing of her pleasures; and that becoming Epicurus's disciple, she prostituted herself to all the scholars of that Philosopher. It is said too that he himself came in for a share, and that he made no secret of it (a). They who pretend that the slanders raised on his morals, are a malicious imposture of his enemies, do not own there passed any thing dishonest betwixt him and Leontium; but they cannot deny that he has expressed a deal of friendship for her in his letters (b). This they can grant without leaving room for ill consequences. She was either the wife or the concubine of Metrodorus, and had a son by him, whom Epicurus in his last will recommended to his executors. This furnishes us with a proof against against the letter, in which it is supposed she complains of the morose and disgusting humour of this old gallant (c). Some take her for the same Leontium, who was mistress to the Poet Hermesianax [A]. It is more certain that she applied herself in good earnest to Philosophy [B], and even became an author [C]. Note, that her Metrodorus was one of the chief disciples of Epicurus. She had a daughter, who carried herself very ill, and died a violent death, as we shall see below [D].

I know not from whence Ludovicus Vives borrowed the reason he gives why she wrote a book against Theophrastus. He pretends she did it because that Philosopher had published several good things relating to marriage [E].

[A] Some take her for the same Leontium, who was mistress to Hermesianax. Athenæus (1) speaks of this mistress, and even produces several verses, taken from the third book of the elegies, which Hermesianax had wrote in praise of Leontium. Mr Menage (2) is of opinion, that she is the same with Epicurus's good friend; and therefore censures Vossius for placing (3) Hermesianax in the number of the Poets, whose age is unknown. This Poet's verses, preserved by Athenæus, contain a long list of amorous persons, and it is probable the whole work turned on that subject; for Antoninus Liberalis (4) has taken from the second book of these elegies a love history. Parthenias has taken from the same Poet the fifth and twenty second of his stories. As to the twenty second, he cites Hermesianax in general, but as to the fifth, he cites him thus Ερμηςανᾶς Λεόντι. It is evident, that we must read Λεόντιον, and not Λεόντι (5). Mr Menage adds that Hermesianax writ an excellent poem upon his native city Colophon, mentioned by Pausanias (6). Doubtless Vossius mistook Mr Menage by these words; 'Hermesianax Colophonius, poeta Elegiacus de patria Colophone egregium carmen condidit, ut ex Pausania cognoscere est (7)'. Pausanias leaves no room for ascribing such a performance to him. He only says he does not believe Hermesianax was alive, when Lyfimachus destroyed the city of Colophon; for, adds he, Hermesianax would certainly have lamented the ruin of this city in some part of his poems. Ὅς Φοίνικα ἰαμβικὸν ποιεῖν Κολοφώνιον, θρηνησάτω τὴν πόλιν. Ἐρμηςανᾶς δὲ ὁ τὰ ἐλεγεία γραφὰς ἔχει (ἐμοὶ δοκεῖν) περὶ πάντα γὰρ οὐ καὶ αὐτὸς ἀνὰ τὴν ἀλυσὶν Κολοφῶνιν ὠδύετο. Phanix Colophonius iamborum scriptor eam excisionem deploravit; nam Hermesianax qui elegos scripsit, ad illud usque tempus superstitem fuisse non crediderim, neque enim in aliqua carminum suorum parte excisam Colophonem non deisset (8). You see he had been speaking of the Poet Phanix, a native of Colophon, who had written lamenting verses on that subject. We may collect from this passage of Pausanias, that Hermesianax was cotemporary with Epicurus, and therefore Chronology may very well allow them both to have loved the same Leontium. Pausanias would not have expressed himself as he did, if this elegiac Poet had preceded Epicurus many years. Note, that this Lyfimachus, who destroyed Colophon, is one of those who shared the conquests of Alexander.

[B] She applied her self in earnest to Philosophy. Hence it was that the Painter Theodorus drew her in a meditating posture. Leontium Epicuri cogitantem (9). [C] She became an author. She wrote against Theophrastus, who was one of the strongest pillars of Aristotle's sect, and the ornament of his age. Cicero tells us, that this book was very politely written. 'Non modo Epicurus, says he (10), & Metrodorus, & Hermachius contra Pythagoram, Platonem, Empedoclemque dixerunt, sed meretricula etiam Leontium contra Theophrastum scribere ausa est, scito quidem illa fermone & Attico, sed tamen tantum Epicuri hortus habuerit licentiæ, & soletis queri.' These last words have exercised the critics; they construe them several ways, and I question whether any of them has hit on the right; however, we know the drift of the author. He would exaggerate the licentiousness of Epicurus's school; and the better to effect this, he alleges the boldness of Leontium, a lewd woman who durst write against Theophrastus. But Cicero, as great an Orator as he was, has not been so happy as Pliny, in giving a lively idea of the indignity he conceived in Leontium's enterprize. We learn from Pliny, that this woman's boldness occasioned a proverb, the meaning of which was, that there was no remedy but a rope, if men of the greatest parts were insulted at this rate. 'Ceu vero nesciam adversus Theophrastum, hominem in eloquentia tantum ut nomen divinum inde invenerit; scripsisse etiam se minam & proverbium inde natum suspensio arborem eligendi (11)'. (11) Plin. in Prefat.

[D] She had a daughter, who... died a violent death as we shall see. She was called Danaë; in point of gallantry she followed her mother's steps, but I do not know whether ever she troubled her head with Philosophy. Athenæus says nothing of it, and he is the only author, from whom I learn any thing of her. He says (12) she took up the profession of a courtesan, and became concubine to Sophron, governor of Ephesus. She insinuated herself also into the favour of Laodice, even so far as to be her oracle and confident. Understanding that Laodice designed to put Sophron to death, she made a sign to him to retire. He understood the danger of which she gave him notice; and pretended to have forgotten something, without which he could not answer to the point, upon which he was examined. He obtained time to recollect himself, but he appeared no more, and escaped by night to Corinth. Laodice had no sooner discovered, that Danaë was the cause of his escape, but she condemned her to the precipice; Danaë knowing her death unavoidable, was haughty enough not to answer to Laodice's questions; but she was not silent, when she went to the place of execution; she dropt a most insolent murmur against providence. It is not without reason, said she, that several persons despise the gods; the only recompence they give me for saving the life of my husband, is a precipice: ωβίστι Laodice, who has murdered her's, enjoys great honours. Ἀπαγομένην δὲ ἐπὶ τὴν κρημνὸν εἶπεν, ὅς δικαίος οἱ πολλοὶ καταφρονεῖσι τὸ θεῖον, ὅτι ἐγὼ τὴν γυναικὲν μοι ἀνδρὸς σώσασα, τοιαύτην χρεῖα παρὰ τῷ δαίμονι λαμβάνω. Laodice δὲ τὴν ἰδίαν ἀποκτείνασα, τυλικάντης τιμῆς ἀξιώται. Cum ad precipitium duceretur, dixisse, a multis non injuria Deos contemni. Nam quod, inquit, virum meum servavi, hanc mihi gratiam Diæ rependunt; quod autem Laodice maritum suum interfecerit, in maximo honore est (13).

[E] Vives pretends, that she wrote her book against Theophrastus, because that Philosopher had published several good things relating to marriage. It is probable such pieces would displease a woman, who was never married, and entertained gallants; but this probability would not excuse Ludovicus Vives, if, without having read the fact in any author worthy of credit, he gave it for certain. as he does in these words: 'Novum malis non est, odisse bene monentes: sed in hoc ipso materiæ genere Theophrastus, quum de concugio gravissime multa scripsisset, meretrices in se concitavit: & profluit Leontium, Metrodori Concubina, quæ adversus tantum & facundia & sapientia virum, librum sine mente, sine fronte evomeret (14)'. It is no new thing for the vicious to hate those who give good advice: hence Theophrastus, having wrote many excellent things concerning matrimony, brought the barlots upon him; one of whom, Leontium, the concubine of Metrodorus, wrote a foolish and impudent book against that eloquent and wise author. This particular is neither remarked by Cicero, nor by Pliny, when they speak of the book, which Leontium published against Theophrastus (15). For this reason it should not have been advanced without a good authority. This is infinitely less necessary with respect to facts, which we meet with every where. I will observe by the way, that the French translation of this work of Vives, by Anthony Tiron, and by order of Plantin, in 1579, does not contain this passage, nor several others. This surprizes me: for I suppose the occasion of these omissions was, that Plantin did not make use of the editions, which Vives had revised and enlarged.

LEONTIUS, an Athenian Philosopher towards the end of the IVth century, had a daughter whom he instructed in the sciences, and made her very learned. Perceiving also, that she no less distinguished herself by the advantages of the body, than by the talents of the mind, he believed her learning and her beauty might very well serve her for a fortune. For this reason he left her nothing in his will, dividing all he had between his two sons. This injustice of Leontius, was the occasion of her coming to the empire; for she it was, who under the name of Athenais, appeared so amiable to the emperor Theodosius, and the princeps Pulcheria, that Theodosius married her. The suit she commenced against her brothers, on account of her father's will, obliged her to implore Pulcheria's protection; and hence came her good fortune (a). Father Garasse has given a wrong account of this [A]. Consult the dissertation which I

(b) Sebast. Kortholus de puellis Poëtiis, pag. 12, & seq.

[A] Father Garasse has given a wrong account of this. (1) Somme Theologique, liv. ii, pag. 132. 'God seems to act, says he (1), "as formerly did the Philosopher Leontius, who having three daughters, one of exquisite beauty, and the two others much deformed, left no fortune to the first, but only her beauty, saying, she was the best provided for, as in effect she was, for her beauty made her an empress, and gave all his estate to the other two, saying, that with all that, they would have enough to do to find husbands; for as to lands which are of themselves beautiful, good and fruitful, God gives them no other dowry, &c." All the authors, who speak of Athenais, give her two brothers, and not two sisters, so that it is an insufferable licentiousness in a modern author, not only to change brothers into sisters, but to make them frightfully ugly, and put disobliging words into their father's mouth.

LEOVITIUS (CYPRIAN), a famous Astronomer, was born in Bohemia. He pretended to Astrological predictions, but had no success in them. Bodin has censured him severely [A]. Lewis Guyon, copying Bodin as a true plagiarist, knew not how to make use of what he stole [B]; but he tells a story pleasant enough about the fright Leovitus put people in by his false prediction of the end of the world [C]. This great Astrologer

[A] Bodin has censured severely. His words are these (1). 'Leovitus had foretold as a certainty, that the emperor Maximilian should be monarch of all Europe, to punish the tyranny of the other princes . . . which is not yet come to pass, and there is no great likelihood it ever will. But he did not foretell what happened a year after this prophecy, that Sultan Solymán should besiege and force the strongest place of the empire, nay of Europe (2), in the fight of the emperor and Imperial army, without the least opposition. . . . It is very strange, that Leovitus should see nothing of the great changes which have happened in his three neighbouring kingdoms; how could he foreknow the end of the world, which has not been revealed to the angels? The only reason he gives is this, that the religion of Jesus Christ, and the world, must end under the watery triplicity, since Jesus Christ was born under it; hereby supposing a second deluge; which is no less impious than ignorant, whether we follow the maxims of Astrologers, who agree, that no planet ever ruined it's own house: Now it is certain, that Jupiter is in Pisces in the great conjunction of the year MDLXXXIII, and LXXXIV, and that the conjunction of these two planets is always amicable: or whether we take the authority of Plato in Timæus, and that of the Hebrews, who say, that the dissolution of the world is caused successively, first by water, and afterwards by fire.' Add to this passage, that of the 354th page (3), where we see, that this Astrologer had precisely fixed the end of the world to the year 1584. 'Since he has so positively asserted it, that it cannot be any ways doubted, why would he calculate Ephemerides for thirty years after the end of the world?' This is a question which Bodin (4) asks with a great deal of reason. But this supposes, that Leovitus's Ephemerides extended to the year 1614. Yet Gesner's Epitome, Thuanus (5), and several others, affirm, that they reached only to the year 1606. They were printed at Augsburg in 1557. As to his Prognosticon in viginti annos, it was printed in 1564, and translated into French the year following. This is the book Bodin means, when he charges Leovitus with ignorance about the taking of Sigeth.

(1) That is to say, Sigeth. See Bodin, ibid.

(3) Cyprian Leovitus affirms in his writings, that the end of the world will happen in the year 1584. Procul dubio, says he, alterum adventum filii Dei & hominis in majestate glorie lux præsumit. Bodin, ibid. pag. 554.

lian the emperor should be universal monarch of Europe, to chastise the tyranny of other princes . . . which is not yet come to pass, and there is no great likelihood it ever will. These are Bodin's express words; they were good sense in the original; but they are absurd in the transcriber; for, when Guyon made use of them, Maximilian the emperor had been a long time dead (9). Was it not smartly said then, that there was no great likelihood he should ever be universal monarch of Europe? Bodin, who used these words in his French edition, because Maximilian was then alive, took care to leave them out in the Latin edition which he was preparing (10), after this emperor's death.

(9) Lewis Guyon dates the epistle dedicatory of the second volume of the first of June 1613, Maximilian died in 1550.

[C] Guyon tells a pleasant story about the fright Leovitus put people in by his prediction of the end of the world. Let us make use of Lewis Guyon's words. 'In the year 1584, a rumour was spread almost throughout Christendom, that the world should certainly be at an end that year: all the Astrological mathematicians had affirmed it in their Almanacks, and many curates and preachers told it to their congregations; which put the people into such a fear, that multitudes received the holy sacrament, having first fasted and confessed their sins. In some boroughs of this country, and of the Marche, which I forbear to name, the people even made their wills, and I, happening to be by, let them understand, that, if all perished, there would be none to inherit; and besides, that all their goods must perish too. Pantagruel made the same remonstrance to Panurge, who, being tossed at sea in a dreadful storm, and seeing the danger which he had not been used to, despaired of escaping, and instead of labouring like the rest, to cut down the masts, lower the sails, and throw the lading over-board, talked only of making his will, and roared and swore for pen, ink, and paper; but Pantagruel reproved him, telling him, either we shall all perish, or all be saved; if all perish, who shall carry your will to your relations? If all are saved, your will signifies nothing. At the same time, the poor ignorant people kept solemn fasts month after month, and gave great part of their goods to the priests, in order to prolong the time of the great and last judgment. This opinion proceeded from Cyprian Leovitus, a German (11). Here is an author, who insinuates, that the priests artfully kept up this terror, on purpose to procure to themselves gifts; they filled in troubled water; they know how to make their advantage of every thing. I like his observation on the contradiction the people fell into. They firmly believed the end of the world, and yet made their wills; what an absurdity is this? I wonder Mr Petit (12) could mention two or three predictions predictions of this nature, made by Stöffler and Regiomontanus, and forget this of our Leovitus.

A man of a great deal of wit and learning, and a professor in the Mathematics, has lately communicated to me an extract he has made of a book of this Astronomer. I make no alteration in his letter. 'I have met with a small book in 4to, of Leowicz's, De conjunctionibus magnis inferioribus superiorum planetarum, &c. in quarta monarchia cum eorumdem effectuum historica expositione. He observes the conjunctions of Saturn and Jupiter from our Saviour's time, and a little before, to the year 1564, and adds some particulars from history, which he pretends had a relation to the circumstances of these great conjunctions. He afterwards makes his prognostics and predictions for the following years, to the year 1584. Here, and every where else in the book, he finds a thousand great events, with which he honours the eclipses, comets, and conjunctions; a notion unworthy a person of good sense. Lastly, he foretells the conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in Pices, in May 1583, and the conjunction of almost all the planets in Aries, about the latter end of March, and the beginning of April 1584, attended with an eclipse of the Sun in the twentieth degree of Taurus: he doubts not but all this will bring on a comet, and the comet produce the end of the world, at the end of the watery, and the beginning of the fiery Trigon. He gives an admirable reason for it, which has been contradicted by experience. The world, says he, began by the conjunction in the fiery Trigon, therefore it will end by the watery Trigon, I answer, 1. Nego antecedens. 2. Nego consequentiam. This is not all; the year 1584, or, at latest, the year 1588, is the end of the watery Trigon, therefore the world will end at that time; for it were not worth while to wait 800 years more for another watery Trigon, and the entire revolution; besides that the world at that rate would last near 6400 years, which is manifestly against the prophecy, quod cum prophetia manifesta pugnat, &c.

[D] He died at Lawingen. It is a town of Swabia upon the Danube. Leovitus made it his ordinary abode. Here Tycho Brahe made him a visit in 1569, and had much discourse with him at table about Astronomy (13). Thuanus is mistaken as to the town Leovicus died in: he says it was at Augsburg (14).

LERI (JOHN DE), a Protestant minister was of Burgundy (a). He was a student at Geneva, when he heard that Villegagnon desired some pastors might be sent him to Brasil. He made that voyage with the two ministers, which the church of Geneva sent thither in 1556. They arrived at the isle of Coligni under the tropic of Capricorn, in March 1557. Leri left that country, with some others, the fourth of January 1558, and arrived at the port of Blavet, in May the same year (b). He wrote a relation, or account of this voyage [A], which has been commended by Thuanus (c), and Lescarbot has inserted the abstract of it in his History of New France. He was admitted minister after his return from America. I cannot justly tell where he exercised his ministry, but I know he was at Sancerre, when that town was taken, in 1573. He published a relation of this siege, and the cruel famine the besieged underwent. The marshal de la Châtre gave him a pass to go where he pleased, even before the capitulation was signed (d). He went to Bern, and met with a good reception from Mounseur de Coligni, son to the admiral, for which he expressed his thanks, by dedicating to him the relation of his voyage to Brasil. I have not yet been able to discover the rest of his adventures. La Croix du Maine has committed three faults [B].

I have seen his memorable history of the town of Sancerre. It was printed in 8vo, in the year 1574, and contains 253 pages. The abridgment, which was published in Latin at Heidelberg, apud Joannem Marefballum, in 1576, contains but 50 pages in octavo.

[A] He wrote a relation of this voyage. The account he gave of this country, made his friends desire him to publish a book on this subject. He finished it in the year 1563, and gave his manuscript to a friend who sent it back to him by some persons from whom it was taken at one of the gates of Lyons. Not being able to recover it, and giving it for lost, he set about composing it anew, and lost it a second time; for, escaping from Charité, upon the Loire, and making the best of his way to get into Sancerre, at the time of the massacre of St Bartholomew, he left all his books and papers exposed to the pillage. Yet he recovered his first work at Lyons, in 1576, at a time when he least expected it, and published it the year following (1). There were several editions of it. I make use of the third, which is that of the year 1594, for the heirs of Eustachius Vignon. I have cited many things from it in this Dictionary (2). One observation, which this author makes, has been much taken notice of (3); viz, that, in regard of what is called religion among other nations, it may confidently be affirmed, that those poor savages have none, and not only so, but that, if there be a nation, which lives without God in the world, it is truly this (4). The minister Peter Richier confesses as much in a letter he wrote from this country. He expresses in it his concern to see no likelihood that these people will ever be converted to the gospel, since they are not

ly ignorant of the difference between vice and virtue, but even of the existence of a God. 'Bonum à malo non fecerunt; denique vitia quæ natura in cæteris gentibus naturaliter arguit, loco virtutis habent. Saltem vitiorum turpitudinem non agnoscunt, adeo ut hæc in re à brutis parum differant. Cæterum quod omnium perniciosissimum est latet eos an sit Deus, tantum abest ut legem ejus observent, vel potentiam & bonitatem ejus mirentur: quo fit ut profusus sit nobis adempta spes lucrificandi eos. Christo: quod ut omnium est gravissimum, ita inter cætera maxime ægri ferimus (5).' But, adds he, it will be objected, that they are a Tabula rasa, which will easily receive a tincture of the gospel, as having no contrary impressions. To this he gives no other answer, than that the difference of language is a great obstacle, and that the interpreters, they must employ, were Papists. 'Audio quidem qui mox objiciet eos tabulam rasam esse quæ facile suis possit depingi coloribus, quod nativo hujusmodi colorum splendore nihil habeat contrarium. Sed norit ille quantum impedit Idiomatum diversitas. Adde quod desunt nobis interpretes qui Domino sint fideles (6).'

I have suppressed some words and passages in this place of Mercurialis: not that I pretend this learned Physician had not a right to speak out as he has done; a commentator or interpreter, who only makes use of the authority of such a writer as Martial, known to all the Republic of Letters, is not to be blamed. Either we must banish the ancient authors, or, in the explication of a difficult passage, suffer their own words to be produced. However, I was loath to cite the passages from Mercurialis entire; we must some times submit to the scruples of the mode.

[D] Few people have mentioned the oracle of Lesbos. Philostratus, if I mistake not, is the only person, who gives us an account of it. He says (11), Philoctetes departed voluntarily from the island of Lem-

nus, after Diomedes and Neoptolemus, sons of Achilles, had required it of him, in the name of all the Grecian army, and declared the answer the oracle of Lesbos had given, concerning his arrows; for, adds Philostratus, the Greeks make use of their own country oracles, as that of Dodona, the Pythian, and all others, in vogue and reputation, where approved predictions are delivered, as those of Bœotia and Phocis: but as Lesbos was not far from Troy, the Greeks, at the siege, sent to the oracle, which was there dispensed by Orpheus. For, after the bloody murder committed on him by the Thracian women, his head, arriving at Lesbos, lighted on a rock there: from this rock the oracular answers were given, whither not only the Lesbians, but the other Æolians also, and the Ionians their near neighbours, and even those about Babylon, resorted for advice; for he foretold abundance of things to the kings of Persia, and to the elder Cyrus among the rest, to whom it is said he gave this answer, What is mine, O Cyrus, is thine, hereby intimating, that he should become considerable among the Odryians, and all over Europe. In reality, Orpheus heretofore obtained great consideration and credit by his mighty wisdom and knowledge, as well with the Odryians, as among all the other Greeks, who celebrated his mysteries. But by this answer, he farther intended to signify what should finally befall Cyrus: who venturing beyond the Danube, to subdue the Massagets, and Issedonians, nations of Scythia, died by the hands of a woman, who commanded them, and who cut off his head, as the Thracian women had formerly served Orpheus (12).*

(12) Here is an example of the ambiguous answers of the oracles of Paganism; for what can be more strained than the interpretation of the answer to Cyrus?

LESCARBOT (MARK), an advocate in the court of parliament, has written a History of New France [A]. He had lived for some time in that country. He afterwards attended Peter de Castille, ambassador from Lewis XIII to Swisserland. And as he took a delight in writing accounts of the countries, in which he travelled, he wrote a description of the thirteen cantons in heroic verse, and published it at Paris in 1618. He was born at Vervins (a).

[A] He wrote an history of New France. It contains an account of the navigation, discoveries, and settlements, made by the French in the West Indies, and New France, with the approbation and authority of our Most Christian Kings; and their different fortunes in the execution of these things, for an hundred years past, to this present time. Wherein is comprised the moral, natural, and geographical history of the said province; with maps and draughts of it. I use the second edition, which is that of Paris, by John Millot, of 1611, in 8vo. This work is curious enough: the author intermixes with it many learned observations. He begins with the description of the voyage of John Verazzan, a Florentine, who was sent into America by Francis I, in 1524. This was the first voyage into that part of the world, under the protection of the crown of France.

LESLEY, an illustrious family of Scotland, descended from one of the chief gentlemen who came over from Hungary into England, and from thence into Scotland [A], with queen Margaret (a), about the year 1067 (b). His name was BARTHOLOMEW; he married one of this queen's maids of honour, and had a son by her called Malcolme. Some say that his wife was the queen's own sister. He got the esteem of the king of Scotland, and received distinguishing marks of it [B], for having,

(b) Malcolme III reigned then in Scotland.

[A] An illustrious family of Scotland, descended from one of the chief gentlemen who passed from Hungary into Scotland. He is said to be descended from a most ancient Hungarian family, and particularly from one Lesley, who was son-in-law to an emperor. Originem suam duxisse asseritur ex pervertuto sanguine Hungarico, & specialiter à Lessao quodam, qui, ut antiquissima referunt Familiæ monumenta, perhibetur exilitisse magnus Imperatoris Locumtenens, cujus etiam filia ei in thori consortem est concessa. Ab hoc porro vetusto Lessaorum cognomine varia ad hæc usque tempora loca in Hungaria suum nomen derivarunt, quæ inter LESLINIA, LESSILIA, LELES ac alia temporum vicissitudine denominationem immutantia possunt recenferi (1). — It is affirmed, that he descended from a very ancient family of Hungary, and especially from one Lesley, who, as the most ancient monuments of the family relate, was the emperor's great lieutenant, and even married his daughter. From this ancient name of the Lesley's several places in Hungary, to this time, derive their names, among which may be reckoned LESLINIA, LESSILIA, LELES, and others, allowing for some alteration in the name through length of time.

[B] He received very distinguishing marks of it. The method king Malcome took to know the lands he should allot him, has something singular in it. He ordered our Bartholomew to ride a whole day towards the north, and bait his horse in every county, and he gave him all the lands for a mile round the place, where the horse baited (2). Here is the Latin account, in which we shall find this reward, and several others. Fuit Bartholomæus tantæ æstimationis apud Regem Malcolmum, præsertim ob arcem Edinburgensem valide à se munitam, & strenuè dein propugnatam; ut cum non solum Equitem Auratum crearet, & toto vitæ tempore dictæ arcis præfecerit; sed præterea in præliis obsequiorum mercedem ei concesserit; ut, ubi DUMFERMILINGO septentrionem having, among other actions, built, and bravely defended the fortrefs of Edinburgh. He died loaded with years, and covered with glory, in 1120. His successors in the right line lived in splendor, as well by the new benefits conferred on them by their princes, as by the marriages, which allied them to the noblest families, down to DAVID LESLEY, who was the eighth from Bartholomew. This David, after having bore arms in Palestine against the Saracens, for seven years, returned into Scotland, and, though he was eighty years old, married, and had a son, who was the first that had the title of baron of Lesley. His issue failed in the seventh generation, in the person of GEORGE, baron of LESLEY, who died very much in debt. His widow married John Forbes, who paying off the creditors, became possessed of the barony of Lesley (c). All the LESLEYS now in being, descend from two collateral branches; that of ROTHES and that of BALQUHANE. The branch of ROTHES began in NORMAND LESLEY, brother to David, and advanced itself wonderfully in riches and honours. GEORGE, great-grandson to Normand, was the first who had the title of earl of ROTHES (d). The right male line of his descendants became extinct, in 1681, by the death of JOHN ROTHES, whom king Charles II created duke, and raised to the greatest posts [C]. The collateral branches are very numerous [D], from one of which descended JAMES LESLEY, who signalized himself in the service of the Great Duke of Muscovy, where he was colonel. As for the branch of Balquhane, it began in the person of GEORGE, second son to ANDREW, which Andrew was the sixth lord Lesley from Bartholomew the founder of the family. GEORGE, first baron of Balquhane, obtained several lordships in grant from king David Bruce, and died in the year 1351. His posterity, subdivided into several branches [E], has produced a great many persons of distinguished merit. It reckoned three generals of armies at the same time; one in Scotland [F], one in Germany [G], one in Muscovy (e) [H]. I speak of them in the remarks.

(c) It still belongs to the family of Forbes.

(d) His predecessors were only counts.

(3) Bartholomew was in such esteem with king Malcolm, especially for building, and then strenuously defending, the fortress of Edinburgh; that he not only created him a knight, and made him governor, during life, of the said fortress, but granted him likewise, as a reward of his services, that, taking one day's journey from Dumferlin, northward, on the same horse, in whatever county he stopped to bait, he should possess for ever all the lands a mile round. First then he arrived at FECHIL, now called LESLEY, in Fife; next to INNERLEPAD, in Angus; thirdly to FESKIE, or ESKIE, in Merina; fourthly to CUSHNIE, in Mar; and lastly to a place called from that time LESLEY, in Garioth, where his horse failed: on his return, when the king asked him where he had left his horse, he is said to have answered, at the Lesse Ley beside the mair: then the king, taking notice that the place answered his name, said, Lord LESLEY shalt thou be, and thy heirs after thee; and at the same time confirmed to him the donation of all those possessions; which Alexander, his son, likewise ratified, as still appears by a royal diploma to the baron of Lesley, in the time of John Lesley, bishop of Ross; and many of these estates still hold of Lesley, earl of Rothes, as their lord.

[C] John Rothes, whom king Charles II created duke, and raised to the greatest posts. This John Rothes had married Ann Lindsay, daughter to the earl of Crawford: he had only two daughters by her; the eldest was married to the earl of Haddington (4), and the youngest to the marquis of Montrose, and after wards to John Bruce, baron of Kinlesse. The son of the eldest took the name and arms of Lesley, and will be earl of Rothes after the death of his mother (5). The titles and places, with which king Charles II honoured John earl of Rothes, are these. — His Johannes post infelicem pugnam ad WORCESTER, diu in Anglia captivus detinebatur; Rege dein Carolo secundo ad Regna reverto, factus est primò Regiarum extrinsecarum Præfectus, mox thesaurarius, & omnium Scotticarum copiarum Generalis, paulo post supremus Commissarius, ac demum usque ad mortem magnus Regni Cancellarius: creatus fuit ab eodem Rege Dux de ROTHES, & Marchio de BAMBURGH, &c. quæ dignitas etiam ad mares posterorū devoluta fuisset, nisi eis caruisset. — This John, after the unfortunate battle of WORCESTER, was kept prisoner a long time in England; but, after the Restoration, king Charles made him colonel of the guards, then treasurer, and generalissimo of all the Scotch forces, afterwards head commissary, and at length great chancellor of the kingdom to his death: he was created by the same king duke of ROTHES, and marquis of BAMBURGH, &c. which dignity would have descended to his male posterity, if he had had any.

[D] The collateral branches are very numerous. That of the lords of Lindors; those of the lords of Newmarket; that of the barons of Newtown; those of the lairds of Finros, Burdubank, Aikenway, and of Pitnamon (6).

[E] The posterity of the baron of Balquhane, subdivided into several branches. Besides the direct line, there is the branch of the lairds of Kinragie; that of the barons of Wardes; that of the lairds of Bacharne; that of the lairds of Clifton; that of the lairds of Newleslie; that of the lairds of Kininvie; and that of the barons of Pitcaple; that of the lairds of Crichtie; and that of the earls of Ross (7).

[F] It reckoned three generals of armies at the same time; one in Scotland. He was of the branch of Kininvie, son to George, laird of Drumvir. He learned the art of war in Germany, and had very great employs in the armies of the king of Sweden. When he returned into his own country, he was appointed generalissimo of all the Scotch forces. He was created earl of Levin by king Charles I, and died in 1650, at seventy years of age. His grandson succeeded him, and left only daughters (8).

remarks. The famous bishop of Rofs, in the reign of Mary Stuart, was of this family [1]. Moreri speaks of him under the word Lesley.

in the service of the emperor. The service he did his Imperial Majesty, when Walstein was killed, obtained him a regiment, and several other favours. Ferdinand III made him count of the empire, marshal de camp general, privy counsellor, and governor of a province (9). He was ambassador for his Imperial Majesty at Rome, and in other courts, and was sent to the Porte for the ratifications of the peace, concluded in 1664. He had been made knight of the golden fleece before. The Jesuit Paul Tafferner, his confessor, has published a relation of that embassy to Constantinople. Count Walter Lesley died at Vienna, the fourth of March, 1667, in the sixty first year of his age. He was married to Anne-Frances of Dietrichstein, daughter to prince Maximilian of Dietrichstein, high-steward of the emperor's court; but, having no child by her, he made his nephew James, son to Alexander, fourteenth baron of Balquhane, his heir. He had sent for him long before into Germany, and had been an excellent patron to him. This nephew rose from the lowest military degree, to the post of mareschal de camp general. He married Mary Therefe of Liechtenstein, daughter to prince Charles of Liechtenstein, duke of Troppau, by whom he had no children. He left all his estate to two nephews (10). These are the titles that are given him in an epistle dedicatory (11). ' Jacobo S. R. I. Comiti de Leslie, Libero Baroni de Balquhane, Domino Neostadii ad Mettovicium; Petrovii, Perneg, &c. S. C. M. Camerario, & Consiliario Actuali Intimo, Consilii aulæ Bellici Int. Aust. Præfidi, Generali Campi Marichallo, Pedestris Regiminis Colonello, &c.' The following eulogy is given him in the same epistle. ' Tu ex viginti, quibus per Germaniam, Hungariam, Belgium interfuisti præliis, nunquam victus, pierumque victor discessisti: Intra ultimum tantum biennium quo ante graviorem ægritudinem Tuam castra frequentare licuit, Viennam introducto opportune præsidio imminentem contra hostem providè munivisti, & allatis postmodum a Te ipso inter primos, suppetiis ejus eliberationem insigniter promovisti, Tartaros a superiore Austria non semel fortiter rejecisti; Virouitziam, Bresoviziam, Slatinam, aliaque propugnacula, barbaris caesis, & Cæsareis finibus longe lateque in Slavonia propagatis feliciter expugnasti; paucis Tuorum millia ad Ternaviziam contra Ottomanici exercitus robur rarè industriâ, & fortitudine servasti; ac demum ad Gloriam Tuam cumulum Pontes Effectianos, & civitatem inter hostes cum exigua militum manu plurimum dierum confecto itinere flammis injectis audacter incinerasti, festivisque quasi ignibus

' Tuos Triumphos adornasti: Quod si biennio solum tot, & tantas Laureas messuisti; quot hæcenus, & quantas messuisses, si infirma Tua valetudo permisisset? — In twenty battles, fought by you in Germany, Hungary, and Holland, you generally came off victorious, but never were vanquished. Within the last two years, before your want of health kept you from the field, you secured Vienna from an impending foe, by opportunely throwing in succours, and afterwards, at the head of a reinforcement, remarkably promoted it's deliverance: more than once you bravely drove the Tartars from the upper Austria: you successfully besieged Viravittza, Bresoviza, Slatina, and other fortresses, destroying the Barbarians, and extending the emperor's dominions in Slavonia: with uncommon industry and valour, you saved a few thousands of your own men, at Ternaviza, against the whole force of the Ottoman army; and, to crown your glory, with a handful of men, and after a march of many days, you boldly set fire to the bridge and town of Effect, in the very midst of the enemy, and adorned your own triumphs as it were with festal fires. If, in two years only, you reaped so many laurels, how many would you have gathered by this time had your health permitted?'

[H] One in Muscovy.] His name was Alexander; he was of the branch of Crichtie. He came to be general, after a long series of great services done the dukes of Muscovy in their armies, and was made governor of Smolensko. He died in the year 1661, at ninety five years of age. There were at that time in Muscovy seven colonels, several captains, and other inferior officers of the name of Lesley (12).

[I] The famous bishop of Rofs was of this family.] He was descended from Malcolm, son of Andrew, third baron of Balquhane. His father was a learned Civilian, who, after he had travelled into Italy, France, the Netherlands, and England, died the sixteenth of March 1554. The prelate we speak of had a great share in the esteem of queen Mary; she made him a counsellor in the supreme court of Scotland, afterwards a member of her privy council, and employed him in state affairs. He was appointed coadjutor of the abbey of Lindors, and at last bishop of Rofs. He did great services to this princess, and was imprisoned in England on her account, tho' an ambassador from the king her son. He negotiated her liberty at Rome, at Vienna, and at several other courts, and afterwards died at Brussels in 1595. He wrote several books, and, amongst others, a History of Scotland (13).

(12) Laurus Lesleana, ibid.

(13) Ibid. fol. T. It is cited under the name of Joannes Lesleus.

LESSEVILLE, (EUSTACHIUS LECLERC DE) bishop of Coutance, was son of NICOLAS LECLERC DE LESSEVILLE, lord of Thun, and Eucquemont, who died dean of the chamber of accounts; and of Katherine de Boulanger, sister to the president le Boulanger, who had been provost of the merchants, and died in the grand chamber as he was giving his opinion. As Nicolas Leclerc de Lesseville had several children, and that Eustachius was only the third, having before him, ANTONY, lord of Eucquemont, who died young, and CHARLES, who died dean of the Great Council, he resolved to be an ecclesiastic, and went to study in the Sorbonne, which was not usual at that time for persons of quality. He was not full twenty years of age, when he was nominated rector of the university; and it was he who first made the university to go in coaches, whereas before they always walked. Which made Henry IV say, that his eldest daughter, meaning the university, was a very dragletail. Eustachius had so strong a call to the church, that he was ordained priest before he had any title to a benefice. He was doctor of the house and society of Sorbonne, and quickly after Lewis XIII chose him one of his almoners in ordinary. He afterwards treated about a place of counsellor in parliament; and was preferred to the cure of St Gervais at Paris, in the times of the troubles, which saved him his life: for, being in the town-house with several deputies, both of the parliament and of other societies, and the people, as all the world knows, having rose up in arms, and murdered several deputies, and amongst others, the Sieur le Gras, master of requests, who had married his sister whom we speak of, some watermen and others of the rabble thought it their duty to rescue their pastor. Accordingly they forced their way through the rest of the mob, and carried him off out of the midst of the assembly, and conducted him to his house in safety. Some time after, he was preferred to the abbey of St Crespin near Soissons, and the barony of St Ange, and was made honorary canon of the chapter of Brioude, which gives the title of count. At last the king gave him the bishopric of Coutance, vacant by the cession of Claude Auvri, treasurer to the holy chapel at Paris. Tho' he did not live long after, yet he failed not to gain the esteem and friendship of all his diocese, where his name is still in veneration. He was particularly distinguished by a great capacity, and a profound knowledge in Divinity and Law. As he was doctor of the Sorbonne, and had been fourteen years counsellor in parliament, he was equally versed in both these sciences, which made him arbiter of the most important affairs of the province. He died at Paris, the fourth of December 1665, during the assembly of the clergy, to which he was deputed, and was buried in Augustins, in the burying place of his ancestors. Leclerc de Lessville bears azure, three crescents, or, (a).

LESTRYGONS, or rather Læstrygoni, were a very brutal people, situated in Italy, near Cajeta. Their capital city bore the name of Formiæ (a) [A]. Homer calls it Læstrygonia, or the city of Lamus (b). It is because Lamus king of the Lestrygons, and son of Neptune, built it (c): his dominions were pretty large (d). Antiphates, who reigned there, when Ulysses landed there, was a cruel man, who would have eaten all Ulysses's deputies [B], if they had not escaped, after having seen the sad fate of one of them (e). It is certain the Lestrygons passed for man-eaters [C]. Moreri, instead of saying this, observes, that they eat raw flesh. It is not known whether they passed from Sicily into Italy, or from Italy into Sicily; but we cannot doubt of their settlement in Sicily, because the country round the city Leontium was called Campi Læstrygonii [D]. Ovid supposes they were originally Greeks (f). It is certain, that Homer compares them to giants; but this is no reason why Bozcius should say, that, according to the fabulous accounts, they made war upon the gods, that Hercules fought with them, that they were destroyed by thunder, that the plains, situated

[A] Their capital city was that which bore the name of Formiæ. Cicero puts it past doubt; for he applies to the city of Formiæ, the epithet which is given by Homer, to the city where Lamus and Antiphates reigned. Si in hanc ἡλίουπυλον veneris Læstrygonium (1) (Formias dico) qui fremitus Hominum? quam irati Animi (2)? — If you come to Læstrygonia with widely distant gates (by which I mean Formiæ) how tumultuous the inhabitants? what enraged minds? See also Horace, Ode XVII, of the third book, and add to it these words of the preceding ode.

(1) That is to say, Longe-distantes habentem portas Læstrygonium. These two Greek words are taken from Homer, Odys. lib. x, ver. 82.

Nec Læstrygonia Bacchus in amphora Languescit mihi;

Nor does my wine grow old in Lestrygonian casks:

By which he means the Formian wine. Pliny is very positive: 'Oppidum Formiæ, Hormiæ prius olim dictum: exstimavere, antiqua Læstrigonom sedes (3). — The city of Formiæ, formerly called Hormiæ, and thought to be the antient seats of the Lestrygons.'

(3) Plinius, lib. iii, cap. v, pag. m. 325.

[B] Antiphates . . . would have eaten all Ulysses's deputies. I desire leave to give this name to the three men, whom he sent to view the country. You are going to see, that Antiphates eat one of them, and that he spent his fury on Ulysses's ships, so that but one of them escaped.

Inde Lami veterem Læstrygonis, inquit, in urbem Venimus: Antiphates terra regnabat in illa. Misiss ad hunc ego sum, numero comitante duorum: Vixque fuga quæsit salus, comitique, mihi que. Tertius è nobis Læstrygonis impia tinxit Ora cruore suo: fugientibus inquit, & agmen Concitat Antiphates, coeunt, & saxa trabesque Conjiciunt: merguntque viros, merguntque carinas. Una tamen, quæ nos ipsumque vehebat Ulysses, Effugit (4).

(4) Ovid, Metam. lib. xiv, ver. 233. This is taken from the tenth book of the Odyssey.

To Lamus's antient Lestrygonian town
We came: Antiphates then wore the crown.
To whose dire court, by great Ulysses sent,
Myself, with only two companions, went;
Whence two alone escaped by timely flight:
The third he seized, and mangled in our sight:
We saw him cruelly the limbs devour,
And swear his impious lips with human gore.

We fly; the horrid Lestrygonian crew,
With fell Antiphates, our steps pursue,
Quite to the strand; thence stones and timber throw,
And sink our men, and ships that rode below.
One only bark, which wise Ulysses bore, Escap'd from the inhospitable shore.

Hence this barbarous Lestrygon has been alledged as an example of cruelty and inhospitality.

Quis non Antiphaten Læstrygona devovet?

Who curses not the Lestrygon Antiphates?

Says Ovid in the ninth elegy of the second book de Ponto. In another place he expresses himself thus:

Nec tu contuleris urbem Læstrygonis unquam Gentibus, obliqua quas obit Ister aqua (5).

Nor set the Lestrygonian town 'gainst those,
'Round whose fair walls the winding Ister flows.

I omit several other passages, and content myself with these verses of Sidonius Apollinaris.

[C] The Lestrygons have passed for man-eaters. Add to the proofs alledged in the foregoing remark these words of Pliny: 'Esse Scytharum genera, & quidem plura, quæ corporibus humanis vescerentur, indicavimus. Id ipsum incredibile fortasse, ni cogitemus in medio orbe terrarum, ac Sicilia & Italia fuisse gentes hujus monstri, Cyclopes & Læstrygonas (7). — That there are several Scythian nations, which feed on human flesh, I have shewn: which might seem incredible, did we not know, that in the middle of the world, even in Sicily and Italy, are to be found such monstrous people: I mean the Cyclopes, and Lestrygons.

(7) Plinius, lib. vii, cap. ii, pag. m. 6.

[D] The plains of the city Leontium are called Campi Læstrygonii. See Pliny (8), and his commentator Fac- (8) Id, lib. iii, ther Hardouin, who cites a passage of Polybius, where it is said, that those, who had possessed the territory situated between Mount Vesuvius and Puteoli, were called Phlegrai Campi on that account, and that the flames of Mount Vesuvius proceed from the fire, which burns the Lestrygons in hell. He pretends, that Homer, Pindar, Polybius in his second book, and Strabo in his fifth book, affirm these things (g). He is mistaken; the Lestrygons did not cultivate land; but they had cattle (h). Homer shewed himself very ignorant of the globe, when he placed them in a climate, where the nights are very short (i). It is not true that Thucydides believed, that the Lestrygons were a fabulous people (k): he only says, that Historians tell us, that the most ancient inhabitants of Sicily were the Lestrygons, and the Cyclops; but that he has nothing to observe concerning their origin, and that he neither knows whence they came, nor what became of them (l).

*After Antiphates's dreadful sway,
And the Cyclopean rule.*

LEUCAS was at first a peninsula, joining to the continent of Acarnania (a), but became an island by the industry of the Corinthians (b). They cut the isthmus, and built a city upon the canal, which they called Leucas, whether they transported the inhabitants of the town of Neritus. This undertaking did not much promote Navigation (c); and if we believe Pliny the Elder, the sands, driven in by the winds, restored the isthmus [A]. In the article of SANCTA-MAURA (d), we shall speak of its present state. As to its ancient state, if any circumstance of it deserves to be related, it is I think, the ceremony of the Leap [B]. There seems to have been a

[A] If we believe Pliny, the sands restored the isthmus. He seems to fall into a contradiction here for, in the nineteenth chapter of the second book, he reckons Leucas among the countries, which had been separated from the main land by the violence of the sea; in another place (1) he attributes it to the labour of the inhabitants. 'Leucadia ipsa peninsula quondam Neritis appellata, opere acolarum abscissa a continenti, ac redditā ventorum flatu congeriem arenæ accumulantiū. — The peninsula of Leucas, formerly called Neritis, cut off from the continent by the industry of the inhabitants, and reunited to it by the force of winds accumulating heaps of sand.' Strabo, in the two places I have quoted (2), favours him as to the last passage, but not as to the first. Ovid (3) seems more favourable to him in respect of the first, than the last, when we consider what he makes Pythagoras deliver concerning the changes of nature.

Leucada continuum veteres habuere coloni,
Nunc freta circumteunt. Zancle quoque juncta fuisse Dicitur Italæ, donec confinia pontus Abstulit, & media tellurem repulit unda.

*Leucas was part of the continent of old;
Now ocean round it's sea-girt coast is roimd:
So Zancle, torn from the Italian strand
By forceful waters, left it's parent land.*

After all, we cannot entirely excuse Pliny, not even by Father Hardouin's kind expedient, who would have it acknowledged, that Leucas had been twice rejoined to the continent, because, at the time of the Roman war with Philip king of Macedon, Leucas was a peninsula (4), and, in Livy's and Strabo's time, it was an island. By this rule Leucas must have been an island all the time betwixt this Roman war, and the reign of Augustus, and became a peninsula again, and continued so all the time betwixt Augustus and Pliny. If it had been made an island by the violence of a tempest, he should not have observed a counteraction betwixt the labour of the inhabitants and that of the winds (5). It must therefore be said, that the inhabitants made their country an island. But in this case, how shall we reconcile what Pliny had said in the nineteenth chapter of the second book perrupit mare Leucada? — the sea broke through Leucas. This event must doubtless have preceded the war against king Philip; but in these former times, we find it was the Corinthians, and not the sea, which cut the isthmus of Leucas.

[B] The ceremony of the Leap. There stood upon the promontory of Leucas a temple of Apollo, and there was an ancient custom (6) that annually, on the festival of this god, a criminal should be thrown from the top of this promontory, in order to avert all impending evils. However they fastened a great many feathers and live birds to the criminal, whose flight, it was hoped, would break the violence of the wretch's fall. They endeavoured to catch him at the bottom in small barges lying round in a circle, and if he was saved, they only banished him. All this was enacted by public authority, and for the public good; but there were private persons, who voluntarily leaped from the precipice, to put an end to the pains they suffered from love. Whence this place was called the Lover's Leap (7). Strabo informs us, on Menander's authority, that Sappho, desperately in love with Phaon, who slighted her, was the first, who took the leap of Leucas: He cites Menander's verses; but probably he had not quoted the whole passage: for, by what he has quoted, it does not appear that Sappho was the first, who took this dangerous leap. Besides, Strabo does not come over to this poet's opinion: He says, that they, who have most exactly searched into antiquity, declare that Cephalus was the first, who made trial of that desperate remedy, when he was in love with Psithia. An author (8), whom Photius has given some extracts of, traces the origin of this practice. He says, that Venus, after the death of Adonis, sought him every where, and found him at last at Argos, in the isle of Cyprus, in the temple of Erithian Apollo. As she made no secret to this god of her passion for Adonis, he led her to the rock of Leucas, and bid her throw herself headlong from that precipice. She took his advice, and finding herself cured of her passion, she desired to know the reason of it. Apollo answered, that, by virtue of his gift of prophecy, he had discovered that Jupiter, finding himself smitten with the love of Juno, came constantly to sit upon this rock, and thus abated the violence of his flame. He adds that numbers of both sexes had been cured of their love by leaping from the top of this mountain. Photius gives us a long catalogue of persons, who had recourse to this remedy. Some found themselves cured, others lost their lives by it. I have not met with Calyce among them, and am the less surprized, because he omits the unfortunate Sappho.

pho. She tells us in a letter that Ovid has written as her secretary, that Deucalion, in love with Pyrrha the coy, took the leap of Leucas, without hurting himself; upon which his passion wore off, and Pyrrha began to love him in her turn.

*His breast from love's tyrannic pow'r to free,

The force of love a different way was turn'd;
Deucalion cool'd and thoughtless Pyrrha burn'd*

Several (10) have mentioned this strange remedy of love, and others have even said, that some took this leap for another thing, namely to learn news of their relations.

I have said, that Calyce is not to be found in the catalogue of the Leucas-leapers. She had fallen in love with a young man called Evathlus, and in vain solicited the goddess Venus to bring about their marriage. Evathlus perished in his obdurate coldness, and Calyce threw herself down the precipice of Leucas (11). I believe, if the account were faithfully cast up, we should find that more women than men had taken this desperate leap.

[C] There seems to have been a set of people who engaged themselves every year . . . to give this [scape]. A passage of Servius has furnished Vinet with this conjecture (12). Servius's words are these: 'Fœminas in sui amorem trahēbat (Phœm) in quibus fuit una quæ de monte Leucate, cum potiri quæsi- re, nequiret, abijecisse se dicitur; unde nunc aucturæ se quætotannis solent qui de eo monte jaciunt in pe- lagus (13).' Vinet thinks this passage ought to be restored thus, unde nunc aucturæ se quætotannis solent qui se de eo monte jaciunt in pelagus; and that this may signify, that there were some, who ventured for a sum of money to take this leap, as others articulated at such a price to kill one another on the amphitheatre. The curious will do well to search to the bottom of this particular. It is certain they engaged themselves by a vow to take this leap; as appears by the answer of a Lacedæmonian, who was insulted for drawing back at the sight of the precipice. I knew not, said he (14), that my vow would stand in need of another vow still greater. Menander's verses, cited by Strabo (15), shew that Sappho made a vow to Apollo before she threw herself down, that was probably, the consecrated this action to the god. I forgot to say, that there were two verses of Anacreon concerning the Lover's-leap. Scaliger mentions them (16); but I think that they who say Hephæstion has preserved them (17), are mistaken.

LEUCIPPUS, a Greek Philosopher. The place of his birth is not agreed on; but almost all authors own him to have been the inventor of the Atomical system; so that we must not rely upon Posidonius's testimony [A]. It cannot be denied, that in some things, the cartesian system resembles that of Leucippus [B]; and Epicurus is to blame in not having acknowledged how much he was indebted to this Philosopher's

According to which, we must believe that a Phoenician Philosopher called Molchus, who lived before the siege of Troy, was the inventor of atoms; for see what Strabo tell us. Imo si Posidonius credimus, antiquae Trojani belli tempus vixit (1). Sextus Empiricus observes the same thing, and in the same manner as Strabo, that is to say, citing Posidonius, with I know not what signs of distrust, which does not appear in Strabo with respect to the other original doctrines of Phoenicia. Δημόκριτος δὲ καὶ Ἐπίκουρος ἀτόμους (substant) ἔλεξαν εἶναι τὰ τῶν ὄντων κοίτηα, εἰ μὴ τὴ ἀρχαιότεραν ταύτην βεβῶτη τὴν δυνάμιν καὶ ὡς ἔλεγον ὁ Στωϊκὸς Ποσειδώνιος, ἀπὸ Μόχου τινὸς ἀνδρὸς Φοίνικος καταγομνύν. ‘with respect to my master I speak it, seems to have ‘invented some things.’ Perhaps Pofidonius was a little touched with the distemper, which reigns in all ages. We take, as much as in us lies, the glory of an invention from those who boast of it, or are not of our party, and had rather find another inventor, in the remotest times and places.

[B] We cannot deny, that in certain respects, the Cartesian system resembles that of Leucippus. The stemper, I have been mentioning, appears in our age, with respect to Mr Des Cartes. They endeavour to rob him of all the glory of the invention, and divide it among other Philosophers, ancient and modern. I enter not into that enquiry, but only say that, in some things, there is reason to believe he has only revived old notions. For example, is not the hypothesis of the Vortices Leucippian?

matter this quality, if he had kept to his own principle; but, by a consequence, which we cannot sufficiently wonder at, he forces to the center of the vortices this subtle matter, and to the circumference the more massy globules (7). I have spoken elsewhere (8) of those, who say, that, in respect of the vortices, and the causes of gravity, Des Cartes is only Kepler's transcriber. They ought to add, that Kepler is the transcriber of Leucippus.

[C] Epicurus is to blame in not acknowledging, that he was indebted to the inventions of Leucippus. It is the failing of most great wits; they will not easily acknowledge, that they are indebted for their notions to the lights of others; they would have it thought, that they have drawn all from their own stock, without any other matter than their own genius. Epicurus has been reproached with having only reformed in some respect the system of Democritus, of which Leucippus was the inventor. All this is testified by Cicero.

'Ista enim à vobis quasi dictata redduntur: quæ Epicurus, oscitans hallucinatus est, cum quidem gloriaretur, ut videmus in scriptis, se magistrum habuisse nullum: quod & non prædicanti, tamen facile crederem: sicut mali ædificii domino glorianti, se architectum non habuisse. . . . Xenocratem audire potuit: quem virum? dii immortales! & sunt qui putent audivisse, ipse non vult. Credo plus nemini. Pamphilum quendam, Platonis auditorem, ait à se Sami auditum. . . . Sed hunc Platonem mirifice contemnit Epicurus: ita metuit, ne quid unquam didicisse videatur. In Nausiphane Democriteo tenetur: quem cum à se non neget auditum, vexat tamen omnibus contumeliis. Atqui si hæc Democritea non audisset, quid audierat? Quid est in physicis Epicuri non à Democrito? Nam cum quædam commutavit, ut, quod paulo ante de inclinatione atomorum dixi: tamen pleraque dicit eadem: atomos, inane, imagines, infinitatem locorum, innumerabilitatemque mundorum, eorum ortus & interitus, omnia ferè, quibus naturæ ratio continetur (9). —

(9) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xxvi. Others reproach Epicurus with the same thing. See Gassendi, in ejus Vita, lib. i, cap. iv, & lib. v, cap. 3, & ii.

'These things are delivered by you as dictated; in which the negligent Epicurus was deceived, when he boasted, as we see in his writings, that he never had a master, which I should easily believe, if he had not said so, as I should the owner of a bad house, who should boast he had employed no architect. . . . He might have heard Xenocrates: Gods! how great a man! and some think he did hear him, though he himself denies it. I give more credit to no one. He pretends he heard one Pamphilus, a follower of Plato, at Samos. . . . But Epicurus wonderfully despises this Platonist: so afraid is he to seem to have ever learned any thing. When he cannot deny, that he heard Nausiphane the Democritean, he loads him with all kinds of abuse. But, if he was not brought up in Democritus' school, where had he his instruction? What is there in the Physics of Epicurus, which is not fetched from Democritus? For though he altered some things, as what I just now mentioned of the inclination of atoms, yet he advances many things the very same; atoms, a void, images, infinite space, and innumerable worlds, their birth and destruction, and almost every thing relating to the system of nature.'

Father Lescapier observes, that Heraclitus had also boasted, that he was indebted to no body for his knowledge, and thereby discovered, that he thought it no disgrace to have a spice of the sacred disease, that is, arrogance (10). A strange name for pride! One could forgive it in those, who knew the pride of ecclesiastics, under the Popes of Rome. If any sort of vanity deserves this name, it is surely that of certain persons, who boast, on some occasions, that they owe their knowledge neither to reading, nor to the lectures of professors. You set up then, we may tell them, for inspiration.

[D] They who have so much ridiculed the invention of atoms, have not distinguished with all the exactness that is necessary. Lactantius lays out all his strength in confuting Leucippus's hypotheses, as well with respect to the origin and direction of the atoms, as to their qualities. He has done very well on the first point, but wretchedly on the second. The epithets of madman, dreamer, visionary, are due to whoever imagines, that a fortuitous concourse of infinite corpuscles produced the world, and is the continual cause of generation. But if we give the same names to those, who maintain, that all bodies are formed from a various combination of atoms, we manifestly discover, that we have no taste, nor idea of true natural Philosophy. We must own, then, that in the following words of Lactantius there are good and bad objections: which proceed from his confounding things, which he ought to have distinguished. 'Non est, inquit, providentiæ opus, sunt enim semina per inane volitantia, quibus inter se temerè conglobatis universa gignantur, atque concresecunt. Cur igitur illa non sentimus, aut cernimus? Quia nec colorem habent (inquit) nec calorem ullum, nec odorem: saporis quoque & humoris expertia sunt, & tam minuta, ut secari, ac dividi nequeant. Sic eum, quia in principio falsum susceperat, consequentium rerum necessitas ad deliramenta perduxit. Ubi enim sunt, aut unde ista corpuscula? Cur illa nemo præter unum Leucippum somniavit? A quo Democritus eruditus hæreditatem stultitiæ reliquit Epicuro. Quæ si sint corpuscula, & quidem solida, ut dicunt, sub oculis certe venire possunt (11). — It is not, says he, the work of providence; for there are seeds flying through the void, which, uniting at a venture, form all things. Why then do we not perceive them? Because, says he, they have neither colour, heat, nor smell; they are likewise void of taste and moisture, and so small that they cannot be cut or divided. Thus from false principles he is necessarily driven to absurd consequences. For where, or whence, are these corpuscles? Why did no one, but Leucippus, ever dream of them? By whom Democritus being instructed left the inheritance of folly to Epicurus. Which corpuscles, if they really existed, and were solid, as they pretend, would certainly be visible. He dilates upon these objections in another book. 'Primum minuta illa semina, quorum concursu fortuito totum coherescit mundum loquuntur, ubi, aut unde sint quæro. Quis illa vidit unquam? quis sensit? quis audivit? An solus Leucippus oculos habuit, solus mentem? qui profecto solus omnium cæcus, & excors fuit, qui ea loqueretur, quæ nec æger quicquam delirare, nec dormiens possit somnare. Quatuor elementis constare omnia Philosophi veteres distinebant. Ille noluit, ne alienis vestigiis videretur insistere; sed ipsorum elementorum alia voluit esse primordia, quæ nec videri possint, nec tangi, nec ulla corporis parte sentiri. Tam minuta sunt (inquit) ut nulla sit acies ferri tam subtilis, qua secari, ac dividi possint: unde illis nomen imposuit atomorum. Sed occurrebat ei, quod si una esset omnibus, eademque natura, non possent res efficere diversas, tanta varietate, quantum videmus inesse mundo. Dixit ergo levia esse, & aspera, & rotunda, & angulata, & hamata. Quanto melius fuerat tacere, quam in usus tam miserabiles, tam inanes, habere linguam. Et quidem vereor, ne non minus delirare videatur, qui hæc putet resellenda. Respondeamus tamen velut aliquid dicenti. Si levia sunt, & rotunda, utique non possunt invicem se apprehendere, ut aliquod corpus efficiant, ut si quis milium velit in unam coagulationem confingere, levitudo ipsa granorum in massam coire non sinat. Si aspera, & angulata sunt, & hamata, ut possint coherere, dividua ergo, & secabilia sunt: hamis enim necesse est, & angulis eminere, ut possint amputari. Itaque quod amputari, ac divelli potest, & videri poterit, & teneri (12). — In the first place I ask, where and whence are these seeds, by whose fortuitous concourse they pretend the whole world is formed? Who ever saw them? Who ever perceived or heard them? Had Leucippus alone eyes and understanding? rather be alone of all men was blind and stupid, who talked of things more vain and empty than a sick man's dreams. The ancient Philosophers taught, that all things were made out of four elements. Leucippus would not allow it, that he might not seem to tread in the steps of others; but of the elements themselves he pretended that some were primordial, which could neither be seen, touched, nor felt by any part of the body. They are so small, says he, that there is no edge fine enough to cut and divide them; whence he gave them the name of atoms. But there lay an objection against him, that, if they were all of one and the same nature,

(11) Lactantius, Divinar. Institut. lib. iii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 190.

(12) Id. lib. de Tr. Dei, cap. 2, p. 533.

I have often wondered, that Leucippus, and those who have trod in his steps, never thought of saying that each Atom had an inherent vital principle. This supposition would have delivered them from a great part of their perplexity [E], and there is as much

ture, they could not form different things, with so great a variety as we see in the world. He pretended therefore, they were smooth, rough, round, cornered, and hooked. How much better would it have been to have said nothing, than to talk so wretchedly and impertinently? And I fear it will be thought no less impertinent to undertake to refute this opinion. However let us reply as if he had really said something. If these atoms are smooth and round, they cannot unite into one body; just as if any one should endeavour to unite millet into one mass, the very smoothness of the grains would prevent a coalition. If they are rough, and cornered, and hooked, that they may be capable of sticking together, they must be likewise divisible and scissile: for they must have hooks and points, which may be cut off; what therefore may be cut off, and torn away, may be both seen and felt.

A man would be laughed at in our days, who should make such objections; for ever since the chimerical qualities invented by the schoolmen, have been rejected, the only remedy left is that of admitting insensible parts in matter, whose figure, angles, hooks, motion, and situation, constitute the particular essence of the bodies, which strike our senses. Cicero has introduced an interlocutor, who has shewed Lactantius the error of not using distinctions; for he ascribes the same qualities both to the figure of the atoms, and to their fortuitous concurrence (13). The moderns have distinguished better; they reject the eternity of atoms and their fortuitous motion; but, keeping, in all other points except this, to the hypothesis of Leucippus, they make an admirable system of it. This is what Gassendus has done, who differs not from Des Cartes, about the principles of bodies, only as he retains a vacuum. Lactantius's objections against the indivisibility of atoms are the weakest that can be made to the atomists; the followers of Aristotle and Mr Des Cartes propose much stronger; but, after all, they prove nothing more than the possible division of all sorts of extension; for as to the actual division, all sects are obliged to stop somewhere. It is plain there are necessarily innumerable corpuscles, which are never divided, and this alone is sufficient to invalidate Lactantius's objections by way of retortion. Would we make a sound judgment of Leucippus's system, we must follow that of Dr Thomas Burnet. Here is what he says of it (14): 'Ad hanc sectam Eleaticam aggregari solent Leucippus & Democritus, viri celebres & eximii, qui hypothesein Atomorum invexerunt: quæ licet, mea sententia, falsa sit & male fundata, dedit tamen occasionem philosophandi strictius & accuratius. Hi enim non querunt corporum principia, aut agendi vires inter numeros, proportionales, harmonias, ideas, qualitates, aut formas elementares, ut ab aliis factum est: sed ipsa adeunt corpora, eorumque conditiones Physicas & Mechanicas examinant, motum, figuram, partium situm, tenuitatem aut magnitudinem, & similia: & ex his ejusque virtutes æstimant, actiones definiunt, effecta explicant, idque recte solideque, ut mihi videtur, hucusque. Quod vero has minutias indivisibiles esse vellent, aut innatum impetum habere, aut inclinationes ad certa loca, aut denique inanibus spatiis disjungi, hæc & hujusmodi, non tantum gratis dicta sunt, sed etiam clarè rationali refragantur. Utcunque, cum viam aperuerint ad saniores differendi methodum circa res physicas, & in hac parte de republica literaria non male meruerint, illos laude sua ne fraudemus. — To this Eleatic sect Leucippus and Democritus are usually referred; famous men, who first invented the hypothesis of atoms: which, though in my opinion, it be false and ill-grounded, yet gave occasion to philosophize more strictly and accurately. For these men do not look for the principles of bodies, or their power of acting among numbers, proportions, harmonies, ideas, qualities, or elementary forms, as others have done; but they go to the bodies themselves, and examine their physical, and mechanical states, motion, figure, situation of parts, smallness, or magnitude, and the like: and from these they estimate the virtues of each, define their actions, explain their effects, and that rightly and solidly, I think, hitherto. But where as they will have these small parts to be indivisible, to have an innate tendency to certain places, and lastly to be disunited in empty spaces, these and the like suppositions are not only without foundation, but even contrary to reason. However it be, since they opened a way to a more sound method of reasoning upon natural things, and in this respect deserved well of the learned world, let us not rob them of the praise that is due to them.

[E] This supposition would have delivered them from a great part of their perplexity.] They might then have given some sort of answer to an objection, which they have never been able to solve; it is that, which Plutarch propo- Coloten, pag. 1112.

THAT which chins ought to be indivisible. The advantage, which the system of Leucippus would have had by assigning a soul to each atom.

much foundation for it as for the eternity, and inherent motion, which they attribute to their indivisible corpuscles. Let us observe, that there was a sect of Philosophers in the capacity of knowing would be entirely useless; no one act of knowledge could result from that capacity: at least it's acts of knowledge would be very different from those which we experience; for these represent to us all the object at once, a whole tree, a whole horse, &c. An evident proof, that the subject, affected with the whole image of these objects, is not divisible into many parts, and consequently that man, as a thinking being, is not corporeal, or material, or divided, or compounded of many beings. If he were, he would be perfectly insensible of the stroke of a flick, since the pain would divide itself into as many particles as the member smitten consists of. But these members consist of infinite particles: so that the portion of pain, which belonged to each part would be too small to be perceived or felt. If you answer that each part of the soul communicates its passions to the rest, I am ready to make you two or three replies, which will throw you back again into the mire.

I would tell you, in the first place, that it appears no more possible for the parts of a globe to communicate their pain, than to communicate their motion. Now it is most certain, that each part preserves that quantity of motion, which falls to its share, and communicates nothing of it to others. Push a globe; the motion you communicate to it equally distributes it self to all the particles of this moveable, to each according to it's bulk; and from that time forward, till the globe leaves moving, there is no new division made of this motion among it's parts. Why then should you suppose any other law with respect to thought; for instance, with respect to the pain you might excite in this globe by a kick with the foot? Ought you not to say, that this pain distributes itself through the whole globe, and that each part of the globe partakes of it, in proportion to it's magnitude, and retains what falls to it's share? In the second place, I desire your answer to this short question. How does the part A of the soul communicate it's pain to the parts B and C. Does it transfer it by fairly divesting itself, in such a manner, that the same numerical pain, which was lately in the part A is now found in the part B? If so, it destroys a most certain and true maxim, That accidents do not pass from one subject to another (20). Besides, it destroys your own supposition. Your design is to shew, that the pain of a kick with the foot must be very smart, though divided into infinite portions, and you suppose that the portion, which falls to one part of the soul, quits that part, and fixes on another. But this way of communicating will not augment the sensation; for if, as fast as one part of the soul communicates it's pain, it loses it; an increase to that degree, which we call intensive (21), is infallibly prevented, and thus the difficulty subsists in it's full force. One cannot conceive why a pain, because divided into infinite parts, should be an insupportable sensation. You will say then, that one part of the soul communicates it's pain to the rest, and yet retains it, that is to say, produces in the neighbouring parts a sensation like it's own. But my objection reverts. This like sensation produced a new, is it not received into a subject divisible in infinitum? It will consequently then divide itself into infinite parts, after the manner of the first, and by this division each subject, or each part of the substance, will have only a degree of pain so small, so insignificant, as not to be felt. Now experience teaches us quite the contrary. My third reply shall be, that you introduce into the world an infinite number of needless things. You can never bring your notion to bear, but by supposing a thing inconceivable, to wit, that the image of a horse, or the idea of a square, being received into a soul composed of infinite parts, preserve themselves entire in every part. This is the absurdity of the intentional species, which the schoolmen dare hardly any longer advance. It is an absurdity greater than that of those doctors, who say the soul is all in all the body, and all in every part (22). But I let that pass, and only ask you, whether your supposition does not manifestly include this monstrous absurdity; that, in a famished dog, there are infinite substances, which feel the gnawings of hunger, and, in a man who reads there are infinite things, which read and know each what they read. Nevertheless, we all know by experience, that there is only one thing in us, which knows that it reads, that it is hungry, that it feels pain or joy, &c. To what end then serves this infinite number of substances, which read in every reader, which hunger and thirst in every animal, &c. This consequence you cannot deny, since, to deliver yourself from the inconveniences, to which you are exposed by the division of thought into as many parts, as there are parts in the substance of a material soul, you are forced to answer, that the parts of the soul, by reciprocally communicating their modifications, preserve the sensation entire in every part. This puts me in mind of a very good argument, which a sect of Philosophers, whom I shall mention in the following remark, employed to maintain the spirituality of God. If God is a body, say they, the perfection of his being is found either in all the individual substances of his body, or in one alone. If in all, there are then many Gods; if only in one, the rest are superfluous. 'Si Deus est corpus, tum Divinitas & Veritas ejus perficitur vel in universalitate & complexu Substantiarum individuorum corporis illius, quod habet, vel in una tantum. Si perficitur in una, tum nulla est utilitas reliquarum, sed sunt superflua: nullaque est ratio essentie illius corporis, (quia una substantia indivisa non potest corpus constituere). Si in omnibus & singulis perficitur tum erunt Divinitates multe, non vero Deus unus. Atqui vero jam demonstrarunt, Deum esse unum. Ergo (23). You will tell me, perhaps, that the soul does not see all the parts of a horse at once, but one after another; that this succession is so quick, that it is imperceptible, and that the impression, received the first instant, lasts long enough to be united with the impression of the following instants; whence it happens, that the soul believes it sees the parts of an object, which really act no longer upon it. Thus the soul thinks she sees a circle of fire; when one turns round a flaming stick. She sees the parts of this circle successively, and yet she thinks she sees them all at once. Which proceeds from hence, that the impression, she has received, lasts longer than the action of the object. I answer, that this subterfuge will not bring you off. It signifies nothing against my last, nor even against some of my former objections; it can only serve to dazzle a little on account of the disproportion between the greatness of the object, and the smallness of the thinking substance. But after all, what could you reply, should I say, that, when a man attentively beholds an immoveable body, a wall for example, the same part of the object, which struck him the first of these imperceptible instants you mention, must strike him every following instant; for no reason can be assigned, why it should cease acting on the soul. It acts then at the same time with all the other parts; but tell me, if you can, how the image of a wall can be fitted all entire, and at the same instant, to a subject divisible in infinitum. This, and several other arguments, to be seen in the writings of some moderns, invincibly prove that thought is incompatible with a compound being (24).

I have enlarged on this matter, on purpose to confirm what I had before laid down, that Leucippus, Epicurus, and the other Atomists, might have guarded against several unanswerable objections, if they had thought themselves of giving a soul to every atom. They would thereby have united thought to an indivisible subject, and they had as good ground to suppose atoms animated, as to suppose them uncreated, and endued with a moving virtue. It is as difficult to conceive this virtue in an atom, as that of sensation. Extension and solidity constitute the whole essence of an atom in our idea. The power of moving is not included in it. It is as foreign and extrinsic to body and extension, as that of knowledge. Why then, since the Atomists supposed in their corpuscles a self-moving force, would they rob them of thought? I know they could not have avoided all difficulties, by ascribing it to them: they might still have been pressed with invincible objections (25). Yet there had been some glory in parrying a thrust here and there. Let us observe, that very great Philosophers have made the principal properties of the soul to consist in a self-moving power the East, who admitted the hypothesis of atoms, and a vacuum [F]; but they amended, it for they ascribed to God the creation of those atoms. power (26). It is by this attribute they have characterized and defined it. Would any one then have thought it strange, that they, who gave to atoms the principle of motion, should give them a soul too?

[F] There was a sect of Philosophers in the east, who admitted the hypothesis of atoms, and a vacuum.

The famous Rabbi Maimonides, speaks at large of this sect of Philosophers. They are called The Speakers (27). They principally exercised themselves on these four points (28). I. That the world is not eternal. II. That it was created. III. That its creator is one. IV. That he is incorporeal. This Rabbi mentions the twelve principles they laid down for their foundation. The second of which was, that there is a vacuum, and the third, that time is made up of indivisible instants. It does not appear, that their atoms were like those of Leucippus; for they gave them no magnitude, and made them all exactly alike (29). Maimonides presses them hard (30) on their being forced to deny, that one moveable went faster than another, and that the diagonal of a square was longer than one of its sides. These difficulties obliged them to say that the senses deceive us, and that we must trust to reason alone (31). Some even went so far, as to deny the existence of a square figure (32). Let us say, by the by, that they might have retorted these difficulties upon their adversaries, and let us challenge all the patrons of divisibility in infinitum, to answer the arguments, which prove that the diagonal of a square is not longer than one of the sides. For the rest, these Arabian Philosophers supposed in part, what I have said Leucippus ought to have done; they taught, that every atom of animate bodies was animated, and every atom of sensitive bodies sensitive, and that the understanding resided in an atom. There was no dispute among them on this point; but as to the soul, they divided into two opinions about it; some said, she was lodged in one of the atoms, of which man, for example, is composed. Others compounded her of many very subtle substances. They were divided much the same as to knowledge. Some placed it in a single atom, others in each of the atoms, which constitute the knowing person. (33) Vita, ex iporum sententia, existit in unaquaque particula corporis viventis. Ita dicunt, quavis particulari Animantis sensu præditi, sensibilem quoque esse. Nam Vita, Sensus, Intellectus, & Sapientia ipsæ sunt Accidentia, non minus quam Nigredo & Albedo. De Anima dissentiant. Quidam statuunt, Animam esse accidentem existens in uno aliquo atomorum illorum, & quibus homo verbi gratia compositus est; totum autem compositum vocari Animam, quia substantia illa individua vel atomum illud in eo continetur. Alii dicunt, Animam esse compositam ex multis subtilissimis substantiis accidentem quoddam habentibus, quoniam uniantur & conjunguntur, & animata (34) fiunt, substantiasque illas cum substantiis corporis commisceri. Ex quibus vides, illos Animam quoque inter Accidentia referre. Intellectum quod attinet, unanimi sententia affirmant, quod sit accidentem in substantia quadam individua totius Intelligentis. De Scientia hærent, an sit accidentem existens in unaquaque substantia individua scientis, an in una tantum?

[G] The vacuum became the favourite doctrine of the most famous Mathematicians.] Plutarch affirms (35). I. That a vacuum was rejected down from Thales to Plato. II. That Leucippus, Democritus, Demetrius, Metrodorus, and Epicurus, admitted an infinite vacuum. III. That the Stoics taught, that all was a plenum in the world, and beyond it an infinite vacuum. IV. That Aristotle acknowledged, beyond the world, only so much vacuum, as was sufficient for the heavens to breathe in; adding, that the heaven is fire. I do not know where Aristotle has taught this doctrine; but I know where he has denied, that there are bodies beyond the heaven (36), which supposes his admitting an infinite vacuum beyond the world; for nothing could be more absurd, than to suppose, above the highest heaven, a void and finite space. Note, that he teaches in the same place, that there is neither place, nor vacuum, nor time, above the highest heaven; however, it is a meer question about a word; for he rejects the vacuum, only as defined to be a space, which contains no matter, but which may contain it. He maintained, that it was not possible, there should be bodies above the world; therefore he could not admit a vacuum according to that definition; but he had doted, if, taking the void, simply and generally, for whatever contains or incloses no body, he had said, that, beyond the last celestial sphere, there was no void. Christian Philosophers, professing his doctrine, have taught, what Plutarch attributes to the Stoics, that all is full in the world, and that beyond it there is an infinite void. This they call the imaginary space, and do not believe it to be a vacuum properly so called, though it includes no body; for by a vacuum, or void, they understand the space, which containing no body, is yet surrounded by bodies on all parts. It is manifest, that this definition belongs not to the imaginary space. As to the plenitude of the world, they have admitted it as a fundamental point, dear and precious to nature; since they have said, that it has such a horror for a vacuum, that it will rather violate its own laws, than suffer it to insinuate itself any where. It makes light bodies descend, and heavy bodies ascend, as often as a vacuum threatens it, say they, these motions are contrary to her own laws, and do violence to the elements: but what shall we do in this case? is it not lawful and just, of two evils, to chuse the least? the modern Philosophers have sufficiently ridiculed these visions. Galileus, and his successor Torricelli, revived the doctrine of a vacuum; Gassendus, the great restorer of Leucippus's system, brought it into fashion, and pretended to have proved it demonstratively. Mr Des Cartes declared for a plenum, and carried the thing much farther than Aristotle's followers had done; for he not only maintained, there was no vacuum, but also, that it was absolutely impossible there should be any; he went upon this, that the vacuum, having all the properties, and all the essence of body, that is, the three dimensions, it were a contradiction in terms to pretend, that the vacuum is a space without body. The identity he established between space and body, was thought by most people a great paradox; they cried out, that he detracted from the divine omnipotence, as teaching, that God himself could not by a miracle effect, that a vessel, remaining a vessel, should not be filled with some matter. This is doubtless a consequence of his doctrine, but which does not strike at the omnipotence of God; the question is not concerning his omnipotence, but only whether whatever has three dimensions be body. Many have thought Mr Des Cartes's arguments very solid, and believed that, by the help of his subtle matter, motion and plenitude might be easily reconciled, and they have found a parallogism in the pretended demonstrations of Mr Gassendus (37). Thus the reign of the plenum seemed to be better established than ever, when, to our great surprize, we have seen some great Mathematicians of the contrary opinion. Mr Huygens has declared for a vacuum (38): Part III, chap. xlviii, n. 4. pag. m. 328, & seq. and note, that Aristotle, lib. iv, Phys. cap. vii, and I have heard him say, that the existence of a vacuum is not a problem, but a thing certain, and the answers, which mathematically demonstrated. He added, that the void space is incomparably greater than the full. This Royal make to new sect, patronizing a vacuum, conceives the universe as an infinite space, in which are scattered some bodies, which, in comparison of that space, are no more than as some ships dispersed here and there on the ocean. So that they, whose sight should be good enough to distinguish what is full from what is void or empty, would cry out, Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto (40).

Free, scatter'd, floating on the vast abyss.

TRAPP.

What perplexes the new patrons of a vacuum, is, that they find the Cartesian arguments against the nothingness of space so very strong, that they dare not maintain, as the school Philosophers do, that space is

(37) See the Art. opinion. Mr Huygens has declared for a vacuum (38): Part III, chap. xlviii, n. 4. pag. m. 328, & seq. and note, that Aristotle, lib. iv, Phys. cap. vii, and I have heard him say, that the existence of a vacuum is not a problem, but a thing certain, and the answers, which mathematically demonstrated. He added, that the void space is incomparably greater than the full. This Royal make to new sect, patronizing a vacuum, conceives the universe as an infinite space, in which are scattered some bodies, which, in comparison of that space, are no more than as some ships dispersed here and there on the ocean. * Sir Isaac Newton.

is a pure privation. When therefore they are asked, what these spaces are, which have really three dimensions, are distinct from body, and suffer themselves to be penetrated by bodies, without making any opposition, they know not what to answer, and are almost induced to adopt the chimera of some Peripatetics, who had the boldness to say, that space is nothing but the immensity of God (41). This would be a very absurd doctrine, as Mr Arnauld has shewn in the books (42), wherein he pretends, that Father Mallebranche seems to attribute to God a formal extension. Note, that Mr Hartsoecker, a good Natural Philosopher and Mathematician, has taken the middle way between Des Cartes, and the new followers of a vacuum; for if, on one hand, he pretends, that motion is impossible in the Cartesian system, on the other side he will have the fluid expanse, in which bodies float, and scud at their ease, not to be pure space, or penetrable extension (43).

From this we may collect two things. One is, that these great Mathematicians, who demonstrate a vacuum, give the Sceptics greater pleasure, than they imagine. Observe how. The mind of man has no ideas more clear and distinct than those of the nature and attributes of extension. This is the foundation of Mathematics. Now these ideas manifestly shew, that extension is a being, which has partes extra partes, and which consequently is divisible and impenetrable. We know by experience the impenetrability of bodies; and, if we seek the origin and reason of it a priori, we find it with the utmost perspicuity in the idea of extension, and of the distinction of the parts of extended being, and cannot possibly conceive any other foundation of it. We conceive extension, not as a genus, which contains under it two species, but as a species, which has under it only individuals (44). Whence we conclude, that the attributes, found in any one extension, are found also in every other. In the mean time, here are Mathematicians, who demonstrate a vacuum, that is an indivisible and penetrable extension, so that a globe of four feet diameter, and the space it fills, which is also of four feet, are no more than four feet of extension. There is therefore no trusting to any clear and distinct ideas, upon which our minds can rest, since that of extension is found to have miserably deceived us. This idea had induced us to believe, that whatever is extended has impenetrable parts; but here is now a space mathematically demonstrated, a space, I say, with three dimensions, which is immoveable, and which suffers other dimensions to pass and repass, without moving itself, or opening for them. The second thing I have to say, is, that Spinoza's system is but ill adapted to this two-fold extension in the universe, one penetrable, continued, and immoveable, the other impenetrable, and separated into parcels, which are sometimes distant a hundred leagues from one another. I believe the Spinozists would find themselves strangely puzzled, if they were forced to admit Mr Newton's demonstrations.

I mentioned, above (45), an observation of the Philosophers of the sect of the Speakers. The Rabbi Maimonides confutes it after this manner (46): "Hanc rationem si consideraveris, invenies illam superfluum. Nam esse propositioni ipsorum primæ & quintæ, ac proinde nullius esse ponderis. Potest enim illis dici, Corpus Dei non est, ut dicitis vos, compositum ex conjunctione particularum ejusmodi individuarum, quales ipse creavit; sed est corpus unum continuum, nullam nisi in Cogitatione admittens divisionem. — If you consider this reason, you will find that it is built upon their first and fifth propositions, and therefore is of no weight. For they may be told 'The body of God is not, as you say, composed of a conjunction of such individual particles as he himself created; but is one continued body, admitting of no division but in idea.' The answer, this Rabbi supposes might be made, is not very wide of their position, who admit a positive space, which is the Deity itself.

LEUWENTZ, a town of Hungary, I mention it only to correct two gross faults in the Supplement to Moreri [A].

[A] I mention it only to correct two gross faults in the supplement to Moreri. I To affirm, that this town depends on the archduke of Austria, is to deceive the reader; for it is supposing, either that this town is annexed to the archduchy of Austria, or that it belongs to a prince distinct from his Imperial Majesty, and yet known by the title of archduke of Austria. Both of which are false. Nothing was easier than understanding this phrase of Mr Baudrand, which has been mis-understood, sub domino Austriacorum etiamnum. Mr Baudrand had wrote his Dictionary (1) before the losses, which the Turks had suffered in Hungary, and whilst they were in possession of their last conquests, and particularly of Neuhaufel, of which he had been speaking. For which reason he thought himself obliged to observe, that the house of Austria was still in possession of Leuwentz; for, having said before, that this town depended on the government of Neuhaufel, he led his readers to believe, that this place belonged to the Turks, since the cession of Neuhaufel, by the treaty of 1664. The second fault is most absurd. Mr de Souches, who beat the Turks at Leuwentz, in 1664, was not General of the French, though he was a Frenchman. He should here have distinguished these two things the more carefully, because the French had extremely magnified the part they had in the defeat of the Turks at the passage of Raab, in 1664. Mr Baudrand is secure from this criticism, though his phrase, Grandi clade affecti fuisse à Soucho Duce Gallo, is a little too equivocal.

LEWIS VII, king of France, was crowned at Rheims the twenty fifth of October 1131 (a), and reigned with his father till the first of August 1137, and afterwards alone till the month of September 1180. He married Eleanor daughter and heiress to William, the IXth of that name, duke of Guienne, in the year 1137 (b). This princess was a great match, both on account of her beauty and of the fine provinces her father had left her; but it is pretended she was very leud, and that her husband had very good reasons to dissolve the marriage, if human prudence could have suffered him to renounce the possession of Eleanor's great estates by this divorce. All Historians blame him for being more jealous than politic; for at last not being able to bear the weight of his jealousy, and the dishonour he pretended his wife's irregular life brought upon him, he earnestly sued for a divorce, and obtained it by the sentence of the prelates of the kingdom, assembled at Baugency, in the year 1152 (c). He did what Marcus Aurelius would have done in the like case; but he had acted a wiser part if he had imitated that emperor [A], and in consideration of the dowry, stifled all thoughts

[A] He had acted a wiser part, if he had imitated Marcus Aurelius. When it was represented to this emperor, that since he would not put his wife to death, whose debaucheries were arrived to the utmost pitch of infamy, he ought to divorce her: he answered, but if I do that, I must restore her portion, that is, I must divest myself of the empire.

thoughts of a separation. He restored to the divorced princess all that belonged to her; and thereby put his most dangerous neighbour in a capacity of oppressing France; for the king of England (d) preferring the interests of his grandeur before the shame of marrying a divorced and disgraced princess [B], went as we may say post to Bourdeaux (e), when she was offered to him after the separation, and presently concluded the marriage. He sacrificed without any difficulty, and even with a great deal of pleasure, the nicety of a point of honour to ambition. The king of France had taken Eleanor along with him into Asia, where, as if Europe were not a large field enough for her gallantries, it is said, she completed the ruin of her reputation [C], being little affected with the sanctity of the places she went to see, with the princes of the crusade, philosopher. We here see that Marcus Aurelius knew how to reconcile these two characters. If he had kept the empire after the divorce, he had done an unjust action, and had but ill maintained the character of a Philosopher. If he had chose to be reduced to a private condition, rather than be a cuckold, he had shewn a contempt of greatness and authority, and so would have ill maintained his character of emperor. The justice of his maxim was not unknown to Burrhus, Nero's governor; for when this prince would have divorced Octavia, the emperor Claudius's daughter, Burrhus endeavoured to dissuade him from it, by telling him, that if he divorced her, he must restore her the empire (2). We have here a king of France, who practised this principle so conscientiously, that we may say he was scrupulous not only beyond what a prince ought to be, but beyond what any private person would have been. To prove this, I shall set down the words of a modern Historian, a great favourer of Eleanor.

She retired, says he (3), immediately to her dominions of Guienne, from which the king withdrew his garrisons, without retaining any one place; though having two daughters by that marriage, which he kept with him, it seems he might, under pretence of securing their pretensions to the succession, have seized on the fortresses of the duchy. Possibly he might have acted this out of policy, to prevent the revolt of Guienne, where the people, turbulent and jealous of their rights, would never have suffered him to make himself master to the prejudice of their lawful sovereign; so that he judged it prudentest to wait till the death of this princess, should put her daughters in possession. Perhaps too it was a pure nicety of conscience; not believing he could justly retain the estate of a princess he had divorced. Besides, he had lately lost two of the ablest men of his kingdom; the abbot Suger, and the count de Vermandois, who died in the same year; and as they had the whole management of the kingdom, whilst he never concerned himself with it, he was in as great a perplexity at their death, as a man whom his guides forsake in the midst of a forest. So much it imports a sovereign to be timely instructed in the interests of his states, and to govern by his own understanding, and not by that of his ministers. However, queen Eleanor was very happy, that Lewis VII, being more a monk than a king, listened to the scruples of his conscience, rather than the motives of ambition. I have retrenched nothing from this passage; there is a justness of thought runs through the whole, proper to instruct the reader. Another modern writer reasons upon the motives of Lewis VII, without mentioning any scruples of conscience. Here is what he says: 'Lewis being returned from the Holy-Land, had disannulled his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitain, under pretence that they were near relations, but indeed to punish this queen, for a suspected gallantry of her's in the east, with a Turk named Saladin, and for other debaucheries, too public to be kept secret. Pure discontent put him upon this divorce, with so little precaution, that against all the rules of policy, he sent back Eleanor into her own country, which he restored to her; not thinking, perhaps, that either there was any man so venturous as to marry a princess he had divorced, or any prince so little nice, as to take a disgraced woman, by whom he had had two daughters. The event shewed he was mistaken. Henry, then duke of Normandy, overlooked this scruple, to vex Lewis, and add Guienne to so many other fine territories which he possessed in France; by which he saw himself in a fair way to be one day as 'powerful as the king (4)'. Add to this a passage of Mezerai, which I cite in the following remark.

For the rest, I pretend not to draw a parallel between Faustina and queen Eleanor; the greatest detractor cannot say that of the latter, which history says of Faustina. She went herself to chase her gallants on the sea-shore, among watermen and mariners, and that because they commonly went naked (5). My meaning is easily understood.

[B] The king of England preferred the interests of his grandeur, before the shame of marrying a divorced and disgraced princess. A passage of Mezerai will inform us of two things which will amaze good men, and men of honour; the one will be surprized, that the king of France should pay so much deference to the severe laws of the Gospel: and others, that a presumptive heir of England, should not pay enough to the laws of worldly honour: 'Lewis VII, being returned from the Holy-Land, was willing to get rid of his wicked wife, though he had had two daughters by her, Mary and Alix. To this end having declared to the Pope, that she was related to him in a prohibited degree, he assembled a council at Baugency, where the bishops being secretly acquainted with the true cause of this divorce, pronounced the marriage null: Eleanor having as passionately desired it as he, because, as she said, he was more a Monk than a king. And truly it was well for her that he was; for if he had not been somewhat monkish, he would have treated her in another manner, and not have been so conscientious, as to restore her Guienne and Poitou; but have confiscated them for her crime, and for the rest have favoured her with her life, if he had thought fit. But we need not wonder that he committed such a gross fault in point of policy, in which he had little experience, having always trusted the administration, in a word, all the government and management of affairs, to his minister, the abbot Suger, who died the year before, had left him as much bewildered, as a man who loses his guide in a desert and unknown country. Most honest men will think this scrupulous restitution strange, and men of honour will also wonder to see that Henry, to whom Stephen, having no children, had bequeathed the kingdom of England, should marry this princess, whose debauchery was so public, that the king could not think any private gentleman would have had the meanness to dishonour his family with her (6)'. [C] He carried his wife into Asia, where it is said she completed the ruin of her reputation. Father d'Orleans had been telling us, that she was suspected of a gallantry with a Turk, named Saladin. This wants a farther explanation, such as an Historian, this queen's apologist, has given. During Lewis VII's abode at Antioch, the queen wrote to Saladin for the liberty of one of her relations, whom she loved much, and backed her letter with a considerable sum for his ranfome (7). He granted the queen the liberty of her relation, without taking the ranfome, and made a very ingenious and civil answer to her letter (8). The prisoner was the bearer of it, and delivered it to the queen, without saying any thing to the king. He often talked of Saladin's generosity to the queen, and every where praised his gentle carriage, and great merit, with such exaggerations as are natural to those who speak of a benefactor. The king was advertised of it, and was willing to know the circumstances of that adventure. The secret the queen had made of her negotiation with Saladin, appeared suspicious to him, and the proceeding of the Sultan seemed so extraordinary for a Turk, that he could not believe his genero-

city was disinterested. He thought an adventurer, such as Saladin was, and head of the robbers, such as the Turks then were, incapable of so generous an action, had he not designed to make himself amends by something more advantageous than the ransom he had refused. He made no long enquiry into what might be his design. What was told him of the gentleness and bravery of Saladin, of the letter the queen had written to him, and of the answer he had given her, made him look upon the queen as a woman who had betrayed him, and who held a criminal correspondence with Saladin. He made no reflexion upon the distance of places, nor the quality of the persons which rendered this commerce impossible, but fancied that this Sultan might come disguised to Antioch, and that the queen saw him at her uncle's. Add to this, that this prince, provoked by his suspicions, took no care to cure him of them; but pushed on by her uncle, who was resolved to revenge a repulse the king had given him, instead of a meek behaviour and complaisance, expressed a great contempt for him, and proposed the dissolving their marriage, which the relation, she said, between them made unlawful. Then it was, that the king feared; she would quit him the first opportunity, to follow her gallant, and it was the fear he had of this, that made him send her away in a hurry from Antioch, not doubting, after such a proposition, but she had formed the design. This is what History informs us concerning this adventure, which might give occasion to the jealousies of so weak and suspicious a prince as Lewis VII, but which cannot justify the calumnies, with which some Historians have blackened this queen's innocence.

I grant, with Mr de Larrey, that the calumnies founded on this adventure, as if Saladin (9) had actually lain with queen Eleanor, are frivolous; but I do not think with him, that Lewis VII betrayed any symptoms of a weak and suspicious prince in being persuaded there was a mystery of iniquity in the case; the most resolute and the greatest prince would have had a just occasion to be alarmed. The most reserved Historians acknowledge, that this princess was a coquette (10), and burned with lust and ambition. Some months after her divorce, she married Henry duke of Normandy, and presumptive heir of England, a prince young, ardent, red-haired, and very capable to satisfy all her desires (11). She was in love with him before she was divorced, and it was that passion that prompted her to press the dissolution of her marriage, as Mr de Larrey confesses (12). From a like motive she was likely enough to run after Saladin (13). I have read in a book of the lady de Villedeu, a passage that I think remarkable, and which I shall set down without warranting the truth of it. 'History has so celebrated this princess's beauty, that it would be a vain attempt to describe it. She it was that charmed the fierceness of the brave Saladin, general of the Saracen army (14), and who having given him to understand, that she believed no protestations of love, but in her own tongue, forced this great captain to that surprizing effect of love, as to learn the French tongue in a fortnight (15).'

Mr de Larrey doubtless will not take it ill, after I have owned with him, that there is no likelihood Eleanor had to do with the great Saladin, if I advertise my reader, that good Historians, who speak of this queen's disorders, do not suppose her lover was the same Saladin, who made himself so famous by his conquests. They say then, that the person she had an affair with in Antioch was one Saladin, a baptized Turk (16). Others, without mentioning the conversion of this person, simply say, that he was a Turk named Saladin. And there are some who speak as if he had never been baptized, and they describe her running after a Turkish soldier, whom she had made the object of her passion, in contempt of her religion and dignity. It is Mr Larrey himself, who speaks thus in his advertisement to the reader. All this manifestly insinuates, that the great Saladin is not the person in question, for a good Historian could not, in speaking of so great a man, make use of the phrase one Saladin; a Turk named Saladin (17). For the rest, when this queen carried herself to ill in Antioch, Saladin was not Sultan of Iconium, as Mr de Larrey supposes (18), nor do I think that country was ever one of his conquests. He married one of his 45 daughters a long time after to Melich, the Sultan of Iconium's son (19). This does some prejudice to Eleanor's apology.

John Boucher, in his annals of Aquitaine, affirms, that Lewis VII suspected his wife desired to marry the Sultan Saladin, and that that reason was alledged by the king when they treated of the divorce. 'Some have written, that if the said king Lewis had not brought away his wife Eleanor, she had formed a design, by the advice of her uncle duke Haymond, to quit the king, and marry the Sultan Saladin; by which means the said duke Haymond would have recovered all his lands: he did this out of revenge, because the said king Lewis had refused to assist him to recover them; but he said nothing to Eleanor of it, till he was in France, as we shall see afterwards (20).'

Let us see what is contained in the place he refers to (21): 'The council being assembled, the matter was put in debate by the archbishop (22) of Langres, who was also summoned thither, speaking thus; you know, gentlemen, what our Saviour Jesus Christ formerly said, that man cannot separate those, whom God has joined in marriage; however, he excepts one case, which is when one or the other commits adultery; for if that happens they may be dissolved and separated. Now gentlemen, it is true, as the king commands me to say, that in a voyage beyond the seas (from which, thanks to God, he is returned) through the great love he had to Madam Eleanor his wife, he took her along with him, as well to visit the sacred places of Jerusalem, as to see Haymond, the duke of Antioch, her uncle, by whose means the king expected to have succours and assistance in the said country, to perfect his enterprise; nevertheless, the said lady, without occasion, cause, or reason, and from meer levity, designed to desert the king, her husband, and give herself up to Sultan Saladin, whose picture she had seen, and thus betray the king and his whole army, and all this by the counsel of the said Haymond her uncle. Which wicked and damned enterprise was not executed, as God would have it, by the great diligence the king made to retire from that danger, which he never declared to the said lady. However, he has always laid this fact to heart, and can in no wise trust in her, and would willingly be divorced, if he saw the thing were reasonable, and that God would not be offended by it. For, as he says, he can never be assured of the children that may proceed from her.' The author adds, that the archbishop of Bourdeaux, desiring that her divorce might be grounded on some other reason, besides the petulancy and ill intentions, the said lady Eleanor was charged with, proposed another more honourable medium, which was, that the king and she were relations, and that in the degree prohibited. This overture was accepted, and the dissolution of the marriage founded upon it. The queen informed of what had passed, fainted away from the chair she sat in, and was speechless above two hours; nor could she cry, nor open her teeth. And when she was a little come to herself, she began with her clear and beautiful eyes to look upon those who had told her the first sad news, and said to them, &c. (23).'

He speaks ill of Eleanor; he blames Edward III for having confined his mother in a castle for her love-intrigues. 'A slight offence, says he (24), since it is natural; and having conversed with military men, and used herself so much to ramp with them among arms, tents, and pavilions, it was hardly possible for her to contain, from playing the same pranks within the curtains, as this often happens; I refer myself to our queen Eleanor, duchess of Guienne, who attended the king her husband beyond sea, and to the holy-war, and who, by frequent conversing among arms and the soldiery, gave herself such a loose as at last to have to do with the Saracens; for which the king divorced her, which cost us dear. Consider, that she had a mind to try whether these warlike men were as brave champions in a chamber, as in the field of battle, and that possibly it was her humour to love valiant men, for one valour attracts another, like virtue; nor did he say

So that some layed there, and others returned very expert. band in that crusade, were not the least disgraces that expedition exposed him to. St Bernard had not promised these ill events [E]; on the contrary, he had fed him with hopes of great victories; and was so little concerned at the murmurs raised against him, that had it not been for persons less zealous, and consequently more capable of reasoning aright upon the consequences, he had engaged in a second expedition (f). Lewis had reason to repent all his life, of the fault he had committed, in suffering the inheritance of the duke of Guienne, to come into the hands of the English. To oppose the king of England, he was forced to take a conduct most unjust in itself, and of ill example to all kings; which was to excite this prince's sons to rebel against their father, and to protect them in their rebellion. But this he did so faintly, and with so little success, that he contributed more to the glory of his enemy, than he injured him. Eleanor was very much dissatisfied at her second marriage. She was at least as jealous of the second husband [F], as the first had been of her. But the second was much harsher than the first; he put her in prison, and kept her closely confined all his life, as the reader will see in our remarks, with the sequel of this queen's history [G]. Lewis died on the eighteenth or twentieth of September 1180 (g). Two years

'amiss, who said, that virtue resembled lightening, which penetrates every thing.' See the sequel of that passage in the margin (25).

[F] St Bernard had not promised these ill events.] Being ordered to preach up the crusade throughout all Christendom, he began in France. 'He assembled a national council at Chartres, in which he was chosen Generalissimo of that expedition; but he refused that office, contenting himself to be the trumpet of it; he published it every where with that vehemence and assurance of success, and, as was believed, with the working so many miracles, that the cities and towns were deserted, and all people lifted themselves for this war (26).' The emperor Conrad set out with an army of sixty thousand horse, and arrived at Constantinople towards the end of March 1147 (27). Lewis began his march the second week after Whitsuntide the same year, and arrived in Syria, in Lent 1148. Emanuel the emperor of Constantinople, caused plaster and lime to be mingled with the flour which he furnished to Conrad, and gave him guides, who after having led the army by long circuits, in which it consumed all its provisions, delivered it half dead and languishing, into the hands of the Turks, who cut it all to pieces, inasmuch that the tenth part did not survive (28). Lewis ran the same risk as Conrad; however, he escaped more by good fortune than prudence. 'He gained a battle in passing the river Meander; but he reaped no advantage by it; for after this, not standing upon his guard, he received a notable check at the desile of a mountain. At last he came to Antioch, whereof Raymond, the queen's uncle by the father's side, then held the principality.' Here it was that he discovered his wife's commerce with Saladin, and was tempted to dissolve his marriage. 'He found no other remedy to avoid this scandal, but to take his wife by night from Antioch, and send her away before him to Jerusalem.' He and Conrad besieged Damascus, and succeeded in this enterprize as ill as in all the rest, 'thru' the prodigious treachery of the very Christians of the country. Therefore these two princes detesting their villany . . . thought only of returning (29). Lewis being on board his vessels, met on the road the naval force of these traitors, who laid in wait to take him. As they were engaged, or even, according to some authors, as they led him prisoner, it happened by good fortune, that the army of Roger, king of Sicily, their capital enemy, conducted by his lieutenant, arrived, who quickly caused them to release their prisoner, having burnt taken, and sunk abundance of their vessels (30). The ill success of this crusade, which made so many widows and orphans, ruined so many families, and dispeopled so many countries, raised murmurs and reproaches against St Bernard's reputation (31), who seemed to have promised a quite different event. So that when the Pope, two years after would have had him preach up another crusade, and oblige him to go in person to the Holy Land, in order to draw a greater number after him; the Cistercian monks broke all his measures for fear of a second misfortune, which might have been greater than the first (32).

[F] Eleanor was . . . jealous of the second husband.] Let us use the expressions of a modern Historian already cited (33). 'Queen Eleanor, the woman of all the world, whom it least became to be jealous of her husband, was extravagantly so, and had reason for it. Henry was a man of ill fame, with respect to women, and the monument we have remaining of the famous Rosamond, is a testimony to posterity, of this prince's leudness. She who, at the time I speak of, inflamed this queen's jealousy, was Alix of France, betrothed to prince Richard, and given as her sister Margaret, to be educated by her father-in-law, who was fallen in love with her. Exasperated at this passion, and at the same time, by the fear, that if the son was vanquished, the father being enraged, might come to some extremity against him, Eleanor knew so well how to persuade Richard and Jeoffry, that it was their interest not to quarrel with their elder brother, that she engaged them to enter into the confederacy of the malecontents.' That all my readers may understand this, I ought to observe, that the king of England's eldest son, by queen Eleanor, was in rebellion against him. He had stolen the princess Margaret of France, daughter to Lewis VII, who was to be his wife, and whom the king of England educated in his own court. According to some historians (34), it was she, that raised Eleanor's jealousy (35), and it was Eleanor (35), who excited her eldest son to this rebellion, as afterwards she engaged her two younger sons to join with their elder brother. This plot was hatched, whilst the king was in Ireland. As soon as he returned into England, the first thing he did was to shut up Eleanor in a close prison, where she remained all the time her husband lived, and very dearly paid for the satisfaction she had sought in a revenge, which neither did justice to the rights of the throne, nor those of the conjugal engagement (36).

[G] He kept her prisoner all his life as the reader will see . . . with the sequel of this queen's history.] Eleanor was a prisoner till the death of the king her husband. This prince died in 1188. Richard, his third son, succeeded him. He was then in France, where he had been engaged in a furious war against his father. The first thing he did after his return into England, was to deliver queen Eleanor, his mother, who had been a prisoner sixteen years (37). He made her regent of the kingdom (38) whilst he went into the Holy Land. The jealousy which still cankered in her soul, induced her to make a voyage to Navarre to seek a wife for the king her son. To understand this, we must know 'that it was told this queen, in prison, that Henry designed to divorce her . . . in order to marry the princess Alix (39). The fear of this made her hate this princess mortally; and when she was in a way to revenge her self, she carried things to an extremity. As she had a great ascendancy over Richard, she endeavoured to put him out of conceit with this match, by giving him suspicions of his father's conduct with this young princess, and seeing that her suspicions were not sufficient, she added, that Henry had debauched her, and had had a son by her. At last, fearing that the charms of so fine a princess would be more prevalent in Richard's heart than her words, she made all the haste she could to marry him to another. For this reason she went to the court of the king of Navarre, designing to match Richard with the princess Berengaria years after he had made a pilgrimage into England. He had made such another to St James of Galicia, not in 1152, as Mezeraï affirms, but in 1155 [H]. He caused his Berengaria, having obtained permission to negotiate this treaty before she left England. It was not difficult for her to accomplish it, having so much address as she had, and the match besides appearing to the king of Navarre so advantageous, as it really was (40).⁽⁴⁰⁾ Afterwards she conducted the prince of Navarre into Sicily to her son, who consummated the match before he set sail to the Holy-Land. Eleanor returned into England, from whence she went over into Germany in 1194, to deliver Richard, who was made a prisoner by the duke of Austria (41). Richard dying in 1199, she formed cabals for devolving the crown upon her son John, earl of Mortain, to the exclusion of Arthur her grandson, tho' she had more affection for Arthur than for John, and tho' she was persuaded, that John's pretensions were unjust (42). But her ambition was the only rule of her conduct. She apprehended that if Arthur should come to reign, he would suffer himself to be governed by the duchess Constance, his mother, a woman of solid sense, and excellent courage, who would not give her any share in the authority. Thus she preferred the earl of Mortain before him, a prince without faith or honour, because she believed, that having need of her support, he would let her reign in conjunction with him (43).⁽⁴³⁾ This earl is the same who was called John sans terre (John without land). By the peace he made with Philip Augustus, king of France, in 1201, it was laid that the Infanta of Castile his niece, should marry Lewis, Philip's only son. Queen Eleanor, notwithstanding her great age, went in quest of this Infanta, her granddaughter, to the court of Toledo, and brought her into Normandy (44).⁽⁴⁴⁾ She was besieged in Mirebeau, by prince Arthur her grandson, in the year 1202. But John without Land succoured her, and took this prince prisoner, and murdered him some time after. He durst not do it, they say, whilst Eleanor lived. This queen died, laden with years and sins. Let us use Mezeraï's expressions. 'This woman, consummate in all sorts of wickedness, lived above eighty years, kept up a war for above sixty years, and settled a hatred betwixt France and England, that has continued above three ages; so that with reason we may say of her what the Greek Poet said of Menelaus's wife, that we have suffered not a 10, but a 400 years fire and sword by means of this woman' (45).⁽⁴⁵⁾ Her fruitfulness deserves but part of the epithets which are given to the fecundity of Julia, Augustus's daughter (46), for Eleanor's sons had a great complaisance for their mother's passions, they revolted against their father at her desire; and they who reigned suffered her to enjoy the regency; but otherwise they brought a thousand miseries upon their country. They had hearts like lions; but then it was not so much a true courage, as a hardness determined to despise the maledictions of fame, and behold with an unconcerned eye, the most atrocious crimes. In a word, they neither did honour to France, from whence they descended originally, both by father and mother, nor to England, the inheritance of their father. Eleanor's death is placed on the thirty first of March 1204 by Moreri, who adds, that coming out of prison in 1194. She retired into a monastery, and died in that of Fontevraud. He is mistaken five years, as to the time she came out of prison, and much more as to the retirement he attributes to her; for after her liberty, she shewed her ambition as much as ever, her intriguing spirit, her jealousy and vindictive humour. But it is true, that she desired to be buried at Fontevraud, and took the veil of the order (47). She was a great benefactress to that house (48), for which reason she is represented in the obituary of Fontevraud, as one of the most virtuous princesses in the world. So certain it is, that in order to obtain of these honest monks testimonials of a good life, in the midst of a conduct so scandalous, that the most flattering history dares not conceal it, it is enough to enrich them. See the remark [I] of the article of St GREGORY. Migravit à seculo domina Alienoris Regina Francie & Anglie, Ducissa Aquitanie, quæ nitore Regiæ sobolis suæ mundum illustravit. Nobilitatem generis, vitæ decoravit honestate, morum ditavit gratia, virtutum floribus picturavit, et incom-

I am sorry Father de la Mainferme has not marked the day and year of Eleanor's death; for if it be the thirty first of March, 1204, as Moreri affirms, it follows that Mezeraï and Larrey are mistaken, in saying that John without Land durst not kill his nephew Arthur in his mother's life-time, Mr Pinson des Riolles, whom I desired to consult Father de la Mainferme, informed me that this monk was dead, and that Father Labbe in his Genealogical Tables (50), and Father Anselme in his History of the Royal Family of France (51), mark the time of Eleanor's death, as Moreri does.

It must not be forgotten that this princess has been put in the catalogue of learned women. Anno 1130cciiii, obiit Eleonora Regina . . . Ab eruditione ac prudentia multum celebrata est. Scriptit epistolas ad Cælestinum Papam, Henricum Cæsarrem, Richardum & Joannem filios. Vide plura apud Matthæum Parisium, nec non Balæum. — In the Monum. See more in Matthew Paris, and also in Bale. Thus Vollius speaks at the eighty second page of his treatise de Philologia, in the Amsterdam edition, 1650. It is among the additions to his book. He did not know this particular, when he wrote the second chapter, where he gives a long catalogue of learned women.

[H] He made a pilgrimage into England . . . and another to St James of Galicia . . . in 1155.] Let us make use of Mezeraï's words. 'As the devotion to the relics of St Thomas à Becket, increased by the example even of king Henry himself, who of his persecutor was become his votary; king Lewis went over into England, paid his devotions at his tomb, and left magnificent marks of his piety (52).'⁽⁵²⁾ That prince had made a pilgrimage before. Let us hear Tom. II, pag. m. what Mezeraï says (53). 'It was not lawful for the kings of France, as Yves de Chartres says, to marry bastards. Now it was reported, that Constance (54) was one. For this reason Lewis, two years after his marriage, desired to enquire into it, and under pretence of going in pilgrimage to St James's in Galicia, he passed through the court of his father-in-law, the most magnificent prince of his time, who received him, and treated him royally at Burgos, and removed the scruple he had in his mind.' This shews that devotion was one of the principal qualities of Lewis VII. He was unfortunate in his greatest enterprises, says Mezeraï (55), and too slack in affairs that demanded vigour; but as pious, charitable, good, equitable, liberal, and valiant, as any prince of his age; yet two faults may be laid to his charge, 583: one against prudence, in having divorced his wife; the other against the laws of nature, in having supported the rebellion of king Henry's children against their father. Devotion and piety are undoubtedly the greatest of all virtues. A prince can no more dispense with them than a private person, and if he chuses to fulfil the duties they enjoin rather than preserve his dominions, he is, in the sight of God, one of the greatest men on earth; but it is certain, that, according to the course of human affairs, nothing is more likely to ruin a nation, than the scrupulous conscience of the ruler. If his neighbours acted like him, we might expect from his piety, the greatest happiness that a people can enjoy; but if whilst they practise all the tricks of state policy, he pre-emptorily refuses to take the least step beyond the severe rules of the gospel morality, both he and his subjects will infallibly be a prey to other nations, and all the world will say, he was fitter for a monastic life, than to wear a crown, and that he would do well to yield his place to a less scrupulous prince. Exeat aula Qui vult esse pius (56):

his son Philip to be crowned at Rheims, the first of November, 1179. He had him by Alix of Champagne, his third wife. I have not given a chronological account of his actions, because it may be found in Moreri.

(57) This restriction was necessary; for sometimes this piety brings great prejudice to the most powerful princes: the house of Austria has felt it, France feels it.

(58) See Maimbourg's Histoire des Croisades, livr. iii, pag. m. 337, & seq. where he shews, that the scruples of this monarch were the cause of the ruin of all his affairs in the expedition to the Holy Land.

This maxim especially regards the head of a court. I speak not of the piety, which consists in building magnificent churches, in extending the limits of his religion by force of arms, and extirpating sects. This kind of piety is sometimes (57) subservient to the temporal good of a prince, to his greatness and conquests. I speak of a piety, that will not make use of the oblique ways of policy; I speak of a conscience that always prefers the honest before the profitable, and that rejects all the maxims of the art of reigning, which are contrary to exact probity. This virtue is doublets prejudicial to a temporal interest, because it allows not the resisting the attacks and cabals of the enemy. Lewis VII is an instance of it (58), tho' it must be owned that his scruples were of a very particular nature; for they hindered not his encouraging children to revolt against their fathers, and protecting them in that rebellion; but they would not suffer him to marry a bastard; they forced him to make a voyage, to know whether his wife was the lawful daughter of king Alphonso. He was afraid of offending against the laws of the kingdom. Why did he not fear to offend against the law of God, which commands children to honour their fathers?

I conclude with a passage of Mr Amelot de la Houff-saye, in which he cites Machiavel. 'The man, says he, in the fifteenth chapter of his Prince, who professes himself a perfectly honest man, amongst such numbers as are otherwise, will be sure to be ruined. There is therefore a necessity that the prince, who would stand his ground, should learn the faculty of not being good, when he ought not to be so. And in his eighteenth chapter, after having said that the prince ought not to keep his word, when it is against his interest, he frankly confesses that this precept should not be given, if all men were good; but there being so many wicked and deceitful, it is for a prince's security to know how to be so too. Without which he might lose his dominions, and consequently his reputation; it being impossible that a prince, who has lost the one, should preserve the other (59).' Some pages after he speaks thus: 'Some Maxims of state are to be more equitably interpreted than is usually done, the practice whereof is become almost absolutely necessary, thro' the wickedness and perfidiousness of men. Add to this, that princes are of such refined policy, that he who at present would act like a downright honest man with his neighbours, would quickly be their dupe.'

* Plutarch says, that if to reign well one must absolutely discharge all the duties, and observe all the rules of justice, Jupiter himself would not be able to do it.

LEWIS XI, king of France, was born at Bourges, in 1423. He succeeded Charles VII, his father, in the year 1461. He was a prince well versed in the art of reigning. He was consummate in the intrigues of policy, which he very happily employed to deliver himself out of a thousand perplexities; but they sometimes confounded him (a), which is the less to be wondered at, when we consider that he was not uniform in his conduct, but ran from one extrem to another [A], being referred to excess, for the most part, and too open on some occasions. It was justly said of him, that he made himself as considerable by his vices, as by his virtues, being apt in the one as well as the other, to run into extremes (b). He was neither a good son, nor a good father, nor a good brother, nor a good husband. At sixteen years of age he set himself at the head of a party, and being forced to return to his duty, he watched for other occasions of revolt, and persisted in these courses till the death of his father [B], and even afterwards discovered his unnatural temper in a scandalous manner [C]. He took no care

[A] He ran from one extrem to another.] Here follows what an historian says of him. 'He was the ablest prince in the world, to bring men over to his opinion, to discover the secrets of his enemies, to perplex them with distrusts, and divide the most united; but in his mirth, was incapable of keeping in his secrets; every thing slipped from him, and he was more subject to commit faults, than able to repair them, which he did by all manner of ways, and more frequently by bad than good means (1).'

[B] He set himself at the head of a party . . . and watched for other occasions of a revolt, and persisted in these courses till the death of his father.] Charles VII made a regulation, which neither pleased the great men, nor the officers who were fattened by the misery of the people: they interrupted it by a dangerous commotion, which was called la Praguerie. The dukes of Alençon, Bourbon and Vendôme, the bastard of Orleans, and several others, were concerned in it, they complained that the king put the government in the hands of two or three private persons; and hereupon made a league against his ministers. La Trimouille himself, who was disgraced, joined with them, resolving to return to court at any rate (2). To add more weight to this conspiracy, the faction set the Dauphin at the head of them, giving out, that they only designed the reformation of abuses, and to order it so, that all things for the future should be managed by this prince's authority, regulated by the advice of the princes of the blood (3). They wrote letters in his name to the towns of Auvergne, and other provinces where they thought these designs might be approved. . . . But all the towns abominated this revolt (4); and as the king was vigilant, and attacked the conspirators, where-ever they appeared, they were forced to have recourse to his clemency, and deliver up the Dauphin. This commotion was quelled in less than nine months (5). This shews their comparison to be just, who liken the people to coquets. There are some days in which they are not to be moved with sighs or presents; the next day they come to hand without any trouble. We may also say, that there are conjunctures in which the most plausible manifesto's of those who take arms against their sovereign, shake not the fidelity of the people: at other times half these pretences would be sufficient for an entire revolution.

The king having pardoned his son, kept him near his own person, and watched him narrowly. He took him with him on some expeditions, and sent him upon others, and gave him opportunities of obtaining a great reputation, especially by the defeat of four or five thousand Swissers near Basil (6), who defended themselves very bravely. He distrusted his son's natural temper, and kept him somewhat short; but the young prince too haughtily took head; and it is said, that he gave a box of the ear to the beautiful Agnes, the king's mistress (7). This joined with other things, obliged his father to send him into Dauphiné for four months (8). The Dauphin went thither in a menacing manner: he carried himself with a great deal of haughtiness, and committed intolerable extortions (9). He had intrigues with the neighbouring princes, and thought of returning no more to court; and knowing that Charles VII was taking measures to secure him, he elcaped to the duke of Burgundy's court, and thereby made himself so much dreaded, that his father hastened his own death, by too great an abstinence, upon the bare apprehensions of poison (10). Mezeral justly says, that Charles VII might have been called happy, if he had had any other father, or any other son (11).

[C] He discovered his unnatural temper, in a scandalous manner, after the death of his father.] This death gave him too great a joy to be kept within his own breast, and he gave such marks of it, as could not but make the government of so unnatural a son to be feared. He rewarded him that brought of the education of his son, and married his daughters in such a manner, as shewed he had no concern for their welfare [D]. It is pretended that he put his brother to death [E], and it is certain he had mistresses and bastards [F]. The peace he made with

brought him the first news of it, beyond his expectation. He wore mourning but one morning, and appeared in cloaths of a white and carnation colour after dinner the same day. He even forced the courtiers, who hastened to join him at Guenap, to follow his example, since he would not suffer them to come into his presence, with cloaths of a different colour from his own (12). Another Historian says, that from this king's, first behaviour it was concluded, 'that he would embellish the beginning of his reign with other trophies, than clemency; he discarded almost all the officers and servants of king Charles his father; being wonderfully pleased to undo what he had done, to pull down what he had built, and to build what he had pulled down (13).' It is observed (14), 'that he punished his father's Physician, because, following the rules of his art, he had obliged the sick king to eat.' He who informs me of this, adds, 'That the pretence of Lewis XI pleaded of rendering hereby the authority of the sovereign inviolable to the last, is not allowable. He is in the right; but if he fancied that it was the true motive of this prince; if he believed, I say, that he was willing to take example by Domitian's temper, he is mistaken. Ut domesticis persuaderet ne bono quidem exemplo audendam esse patroni necem, Epaphroditum à libellis, Capitali pœna condemnavit (Domitianus) quod post delititionem Nero in adipsa morte manu ejus adjutus existimabatur (15). — To persuade his domestics that men ought never to attempt upon the life of their patron, tho' instances were produced that the same had been justly done, Domitian condemned Epaphroditus his secretary to die, because it was thought he had assisted Nero when he killed himself.' The Physician was punished only because Lewis XI had an aversion for a person, who had endeavoured to save Charles the seventh's life.

[D] He took no care of the education of his son, and he married his daughters in such a manner as shewed he had no concern for their welfare.] He was an ill father, and tho' he had had his only son so late, who was afterwards Charles VIII., that there was no probability this young prince should ever give him the same disturbances, that he remembered he had formerly given Charles VII., nevertheless he looked upon him as a formidable person. He took no care of his education; he placed none but mean persons about him; he had him bred up in sloth and pleasures; and the only maxim he taught him, was, that a man was incapable of ruling, that did not know how to dissemble. Anne of France, his eldest daughter, was perfectly beautiful, but she had abundantly more wit than he was willing she should have had; and it was to humble her, that he married her to a younger brother of the house of Bourbon, of a genius so mean, that his majesty had no reason to fear, he should enter into any intrigues against his service. Jane of France, his second daughter, was so deformed, that the Physicians affirmed, she would never have children; nevertheless he constrained the duke of Orleans, the first prince of his blood, to marry her, tho' he had reason to foresee she would be unhappy with him (16). He had obliged himself to give the duke of Calabria a force sufficient to recover the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, together with his eldest daughter in marriage; but of the temper he was of, he was far from chusing so worthy a man for a son-in-law. He performed neither of these promises. . . . The count de Beaujeu was preferred before this duke, for no other reason, but because he was beneath him in merit and valour; but the fortune of this younger brother of the family of Bourbon, was not bettered by marrying Anne of France. A contract of marriage was presented him to sign, which would have made over all the estates of this house to his wife, had not he been advised to evade it by some words which were not taken notice of; and as long as the king his father-in-law lived, he employed him only in affairs that were odious. . . . And after all, never did him any good (17). Peter Matthieu (18), observes, that

Lewis XI, hated his daughter Jane, because she was black, little, and crooked. The lord Lesquiere, her governor, frequently hid her under his long robe, when the king met her, that he might not be assisted at the sight of her.

[E] It is pretended that he put his brother to death.] Let us again comment on this in Varillas's words. 'Tho' Lewis by the advice of Francis Sforza had invested his brother with the duchy of Normandy, yet he took it away from him a little after the league for the public good was broken, and gave no other reason for it, but that this province was then one third of the revenue of France, and that his younger brother would be too rich, should he enjoy it. He chose rather to give him Guienne; but he so repented it afterwards, that the author, of the History of Aquitaine, and the abbot of Brantome, pretend, he got his brother poisoned by the abbot of St John d'Angeli (19). I have elsewhere cited (20) Brantome's words, and will not repeat them here. See also Peter Matthieu, in the History of Lewis XI (21).

[F] He had mistresses and bastards.] I observe this as the proof of the character I have given him of an ill husband. He was twice married; the first time to Margaret Stuart, daughter to James I, king of Scotland, in 1436. She died at Chalons upon the Marne the twenty sixth of August, 1446 in the twenty sixth year of her age (22). Hall and Grafton, two English historians, affirm, that she disguised her husband by her stinking breath (23). Buchanan is very angry with them, and confutes them, in the first place, by Montfretet, who says she was handsome and virtuous; in the second place, by a Scotch author, who went into France with her, and never forsook her as long as she lived. He has left it in writing, that she was beloved by her father-in-law, her mother-in-law, and her husband, and was highly extolled in a piece of poetry made upon her death. Montfretet's testimony does not confute the English historians: a woman that is handsome and virtuous, may however be disgusting in that respect which they alledge. The testimony of the Scotch author is suspicious; a domestic does not think himself obliged to publish, that his mistress was hated in the family of her husband, and makes no scruple to say the contrary: it is a common-place of praise. Funeral encomiums are no argument against the ill humour of a husband. It might be proved by modern examples, that princesses much dissatisfied with their husbands and father's-in-law, have been praised after their deaths, in the most magnificent strains by Poets and Preachers. However let us see Buchanan's words: 'Quantum illam existimabimus vel mentendi licentiam, vel maledicendi libidinem, qua, in ejusdem Regis filiam, utuntur: quam, ob oris graveolentiam (nihil enim in mores, homines alioqui tam impudentes, audebant confingere) marito scribunt fuisse ingratum? At Montfretetus illorum temporum scriptor æqualis, & probam fuisse, & formosam, memoriam prodidit; & qui librum Plascartensem scripsit, eique Reginæ, & naviganti & morienti, fuit comes, scriptum reliquit, eam, dum vixit, egregie caram focero, socru, & marito fuisse, epitaphiumque carmen, omni laude plenum, Gallicis versibus, Catalauni ad Matronam (quo in oppido decessit) fuisse publicatum, quod in Scoticum Sermonem versum, plerique nostrorum adhuc habent (24). — How great must we think that liberty of falsifying or desire of slandering to be, which they use against the daughter of the aforesaid king! For whereas such men, otherwise impudent enough, had nothing to alledge against her morals, they write that she was unacceptable to her husband, because of her stinking breath, whereas Montfretet, a cotemporary writer, doth affirm that she was virtuous and beautiful. And he who wrote the Plascartine book, and who waited on that queen, both at sea and at her death, has asserted, that as long as she lived she was very dear to her father and mother-in-law, and to her husband; and that her epitaph full of her praises, in French verse, was published at Chalons on the Marne, where she died, and being afterwards translated into Scotch verse, most of our country-men have it by them to this day.'

with England in 1475, was more useful than glorious; he was jested on for it, but at bottom was excusable [G]; for considering the great number of potent enemies he had to fear, it was better to be submissive than to be haughty in that juncture. Of two evils the least is to be chosen; it was an act of prudence; and a man ought not to pretend to a Roman courage out of season. Lewis XI raised a great deal of money in his kingdom, and trampled much more on his subjects than his predecessors had done, and yet his personal expences were so small, that he cannot be acquitted of fordidness [H]. 'day.' Mezerai affirms that Louis XI could never love his first wife, because of some secret imperfection and so had no children by her (25). His second wife was Charlotte of Savoy. This second marriage 'was consummated at Namure in the year 1457. She was very ill treated by her husband for many years together, and died at Amboise the first of December 1483, being thirty eight years of age (26). I know not therefore for what reasons Mr Varillas had recourse to the silence of the Historians of Savoy. Lewis says he (27), was liable to a sickleness in love We have read in the king's library three contracts of marriage, which he signed in favour of so many of his natural daughters but bating that, the Historians of Savoy, do not charge him with having used queen Charlotte his wife unkindly.' The following passage of Peter Matthieu will shew, she was not very happy. 'In the first year of his abode there, Charlotte of Savoy was brought to Namure, to consummate the marriage that had been treated five years before. A marriage which being made with reluctance, was consequently without love. When the duke of Burgundy gave the Dauphin his pension of twelve thousand crowns, Oliver de la March writes, that it was upon condition he should marry her, which shews he had no great inclination to it. She brought him a son whom he called Joachim The child died immediately after, which gave the father extream sorrow, who not being yet possessed with the jealousies which age brought upon him, desired to see him a man, knowing that children, who are born late, are orphans betimes. The loss of this child, who was the first that made him a father touched him so sensibly, that he made a vow, as Philip de Comines says, never to know any other woman but his own wife, and yet in several places of his chronicle, we find him amongst the women, some of which were prostitutes, and others married, and that to husbands of mean fortune raised to employments, with abundance of other instances of this kind, which do not bespeak a continence equal to that of Alexander (28). We shall see, below (29), the particulars of his galantries; but that which is sufficient to convince us, that Charlotte of Savoy was not very happy, is, that her husband, at his death, admonished his son not to trust her; for, says he, I have always found that she favours the Burgundians (30); judge whether he could love her, though he believed her otherwise good and virtuous. Mezerai, having said of this king's first wife, what we have seen above, adds, he would very seldom have visited the second, only in hopes of having an heir (31). Observe well what follows: 'Every thing gave king Lewis apprehensions; he always kept his wife at a distance, and in his last years banished her into Savoy (32). Philip de Comines observes, that this queen was none of those in whom her husband could take great pleasure, but however was a very good lady (33).

[G] The peace he made with England was more useful than glorious; he was jested upon for it, but at bottom was excusable. I am going to cite an author who is none of the most celebrated; but what then? It suffices that he speaks good sense. We find, says he (34), that Lewis XI, king of France, having too many affairs upon his hands, demanded peace of Edward IV, king of England, as soon as he understood he was entered into Picardy, and bought it very dear, little minding that the count de Lude, and others of his favourites, called him the cowardly king, as the politician Angevin has written, because he only made that peace to disunite and weaken his enemies, whilst he might fortify himself to defeat them one after another afterwards, and master them, as he did for the most part . . . (35). The Romans would rather have lost their dominions, than have had such a thought: for it never appears during the space of 700 years, in which they made war with all nations, that they ever sued for peace, except to the Gauls, who besieged them in the Capitol, after having burnt their city, for which they revenged themselves quickly after, and to Coriolanus. On the contrary being overpowered by king Perseus, they would not grant the conqueror a peace, unless he submitted himself and his kingdom to their mercy, altho' he offered to pay them tribute. And when king Pyrrhus, after having obtained some victories, and received some loss, sent his ambassadors to Rome to treat of peace, according to the custom of great princes who are in a foreign country; answer was made that he must first depart Italy, otherwise there could be no mention of peace, which was the answer of a unanimous people, who perceived themselves able to make head against the enemy: a thing which would ill become a weak prince who ought, as a wise pilot, to lower his sails, and obey the tempest he cannot avoid, that he may get safely into harbour, and not make necessity minister to ambition; like the Vaivod of Transylvania, who confidently and openly said, that he would chuse to be a slave to the Turk, rather than an ally to Ferdinand, which happened to be his fate.' Peter Matthieu relates, 'That Edward had taken twelve members of the house of commons along with him, who by this time were weary of the war, and of lying in the field like the soldiers; these approved the proposals of peace, and said that if it was just and reasonable, it would be imprudent to refuse it, and that they ought to be satisfied with having reduced the king of France, to sue for peace of the king of England, so far as a great king cannot be more humbled, nor descend lower, than to sue for peace of his enemy (36).' This was doubtless a very great mortification to France; but the circumstance of the time would allow no other methods without exposing the state to greater evils. Read these words of Philip de Comines: 'I believe a great many may think that the king debased himself too much: but wise men may judge by what I have said, that this kingdom was in great danger, if God had not interposed his hand; who disposed the mind of our king to make so wise a choice (and much confounded that of the duke of Burgundy, who committed so many errors as you have seen) in this matter, after having so much desired what he lost by his own fault. We had at that time a great many secret heart-burnings amongst us; from which great mischiefs would have ensued to this kingdom, and that quickly too, if this resolution had not been taken, and that without delay, both with regard to Britany and other parts (37).

[H] He cannot be acquitted of fordidness. This is what we find in a book of La Mothe le Vayer: 'Scandalous parsimony the opposite to prodigality, is perhaps equally blameable. Lewis XI made himself contemptible by his vile habit, and his greasy hairs, which history upbraids him with: and we cannot read without indignation in the registers of the chamber of accounts, an article of twenty pence for two new sleeves, to mend one of his doublets, with another of fifteen farthings to grease his boots (38). Here a passage of Mezerai will very conveniently come in. 'The decisive sentence of Lewis XI did as little satisfy either party (39) as his interview with Henry king of Castile satisfied either French or Spaniards. The latter laughed at the penuriousness and at the low and silly mien of king Lewis, whose coat was of coarse cloth, short and straight; and wore a leaden image of the Virgin Mary, on his bonnet; the former were shocked at the Castilian arrogance, and at the pride of the count de Lodofme, Henry's favourite (40). La Mothe le Vayer and Mezerai borrow these particulars from John Bodin; for thus he speaks: 'There may be parsimony without lessening the majesty of a king, or the dignity of his household, or debasing his greatness, which

Those of his household were as poor in proportion. The same may be said of his embassies [I]; but in other respects he was prodigal (c), and retained pensioners in most foreign courts which cost him dear. He spent a great deal in spies, upon hunting, and upon the ladies [K], and rewarded those liberally, who were the first messengers of great news. He gave four hundred marks in silver to Philip de Comines, and to the Seigneur de Bouthage, who brought him the first news of the battle of Morat (d). He said, I will give as much to any one, who will bring me such a piece of news (e). He often used to discourse of the issue of affairs before he had any account of it (f). This is a sign of his impatience, and we need not wonder, after this, that he was the first king who settled the posts (g). He made his soldiers pay their quarters punctually, and severely forbid them to do any injury, and punished the disobedient with the utmost rigour. This was the reason why his kingdom, tho' very much loaded with taxes, did, notwithstanding, grow rich [L]. The enacting that law, which makes Misprision of treason which sometimes is the cause of the contempt of strangers, and rebellion of subjects; as it happened to king Lewis XI, who having almost expelled the gentlemen of his family, employed his Taylor for his herald at arms, his Barber for ambassador, and his Physician for chancellor, (as one Antiochus, king of Syria, made Apollonophanes, his Physician, president of his council †) and to mock other kings, he wore a greasy hat, and the coarsest cloth; and even in his chamber of accounts was found, &c. . . . Nevertheless he heightened the taxes three millions a year, beyond his predecessor, and alienated a great part of the crown lands (41). Here is what he had said in another place of the same book (42): 'The king of Egypt having seen Agesilaus rolling in a meadow, clad in a plain cloak of poor cloth, and lean, little, and lame, made no more account of him, than was made of king Lewis XI, who being chosen arbiter of a difference between the kings of Navarre and Castile, the Spaniards at the meeting ridiculed the French and their king, who looked like some pilgrim of St James of Compostella, with his greasy hat edged with images, and his jacket of a tan colour cloth, and who had no majesty in his face, no more than in his manners; and his train accoutred like himself, for he could not endure to see any body finely dressed; whereas the king of Castile, and his retinue, came richly habited, and their horses bravely caparisoned, shewing a certain Spanish grandeur, which made the Frenchmen look like their valets.' We shall see below (43) that we may trace this to an author who lived before Bodin, and whom Varillas did not understand.

1 King Lewis XI leaving added 300 livres to the salary of Martin Berthelot, master of the chamber of the king's revenues; the chamber of accounts would not allow it without an express order of the king, which was given at Paris in May, and the 16th of April 1481.

We have already seen that this prince employed his Barber on embassies. He made him a nobleman by patent in 1474, investing him with the county of Meulant, and changed his name from Oliver the Devil into that of Oliver le Daim (the Deer) (46). He sent him on an embassy to the heirs of Burgundy, who laughed at him: what, said she, have I to do with a Physician, I am very well (47). Mr de Wicquefort has mentioned this deputation of Oliver le Daim (48).

[K] He spent a great deal . . . upon hunting, and upon the ladies. Lewis's two predominant passions were for hunting and the ladies (§ a); and it is observed that his liberality ran into an inconceivable excess, as often as he had a mind to gratify either of these two passions. As for the first, he kept a prodigious number of huntmen, falcons, hawks, and hounds, and was so solicitous of hindring those who had the right of hunting, from exercising it under any pretence whatever, that it was more dangerous to kill a stag than a man . . . When he parted from Lyons, after he had received certain advice of the defeat of the duke of Burgundy at Morat, he took with him, to the great scandal of good people, from this city, to that of Paris, two mistresses, one called la Gironne, a widow, and the other la Passiflon, a Merchant's wife. Immediately after the prince of Orange had made him master of the duchy of Burgundy, he sent for a young lady, a perfect beauty, called Hugete de Jaquelin who was at Dijon. But before all this we find in the king's library three contracts of marriage, which are so many testimonies of his incontinence, since he there appears in quality of a father of three natural daughters, and matches them without disguising the matter (49). Peter Matthieu tells us that this prince was at great expenses for his amours, even when he was reduced to the necessity of borrowing. 'I have seen in the accounts of the chamber of the revenues, that being on a progress to Arras, he borrowed of one of his servants, called James Hamelin, the sum of three hundred and twenty livres, sixteen sols, and eight deniers, to employ in his pleasures and delights, and sending for a gentlewoman of Dijon, called Huquette Jaquelin, widow to the deceased Philip Chamargis, in August 1479, one of his Carvers, who went to fetch her, advanced the charges both of her journey and of the stay that she made at Tours (50). Note, that at that time twenty sols went farther than two pilsols at present.

[§ a] In the library of St Elizabeth at Breslau there is a manuscript history of king Charles VII, and Lewis XI, from the year 1410 to 1483. The author, who has not put his name to it, but in his preface, boasts to have had in his youth several conversations with king Charles VII, ends his work with the epitaph of Lewis XI;

Perfidia insignis, hinc usque ad Tartara notus;
Formosi oppressor pecoris, nequissimus ipse.

[L] This was the reason that his kingdom . . . did notwithstanding grow rich.] Thus you see how the ill qualities of a monarch are sometimes compensated with others, which, all things considered, make the people as happy as under a good and well-natured sovereign (51). is a good thought. Vitia erunt donec homines, sed neque hæc continua, & meliorum interventu pensantur (52). But we may go farther, and say, that in the same person the good and the bad qualities sometimes so counterpoize one another, that more public advantages result from it, than from a certain uniform goodness. Lewis XI levied too much money upon his subjects, but he made that money circulate; for his troops were obliged to pay exactly for whatever was necessary for them, and he never suffered them to steal or pilfer. Let us use the plain and antique style of John Bouchet (53). He would have justice administered, the church revered and not pillaged; and he delighted in adorning images and churches; and he ordered his soldiers exactly to be paid their wages, which his treasurers could not fail in without peril of the halter. He had a long time in his pay above four thousand men of arms, and a great number of foot, called Frank archers, with whom the earth was quite covered, from Bourdeaux to Picardy. Amongst whom there was so good order and military discipline, that no violence was known to be done to the poor people, except in one place, where they stole some bees, and in another, where they fished a couple of pullets, for which the malefactors were immediately hanged, though they were men of arms. For this reason, tho' the people were burdened with great taxes and subsidies, and the king levied upon them four millions, seven hundred thousand livres in taxes and subsidies yet the kingdom of France was rich, because the money which the people gave, paid the soldiery, and the soldiery afterwards gave part of what they had received back, for what they had, and so a farting did not go out of the kingdom. For this wise king never endeavoured to have two crowns, nor an imperial scepter. Here you may observe a for well placed; nothing exhausts a kingdom more than the desire princes have of making creatures in foreign countries, either for conquest by election, or any other conquest. Note that in all this John Bouchet contradicts the other Historians, who affirm, that Lewis XI much impoverished his subjects (54), and employed a great deal of money in maintaining pensioners and intelligencers in foreign countries.

[M] The law that makes misprison of treason a capital crime, is ascribed to him. This text is not unworthy the readers curiosity, but the comment much more deserves it, as containing very particular circumstances of Thuanus's trial *. I shall only be the count de Brienne's transcriber, who was minister and secretary of state. The true occasion of my intimacy with the chancellor, says he (55), was the promise he made to me, and which he faithfully kept, of contributing all he could to the deliverance of Thuanus; and indeed he acted with so much zeal in it, that though there was a law made in Lewis the eleventh's time, declaring, that whoever should have notice of a conspiracy formed against the king's person, or estate, and did not come and reveal it, should be punished as the author of the crime, and incur the same penalties of loss of life and estate; though I say a magistrate as well versed as the chancellor, in the knowledge of our king's ordinances, could not be ignorant of one of this importance, yet he dissembled the knowledge of it, and carried himself on this occasion, as if he made no account of that law; for after having often advised Thuanus, when he was examined and gave way to his lively and brisk temper, to give himself time to hear what was asked him, and to consider what he ought to answer, he did not stick to declare even to cardinal de Richelieu (to prepare him for Thuanus's acquittal), that he found no law which condemned to death a person who had knowledge of a conspiracy formed against the state, unless he was an accomplice in it; that as to the accused, it appeared indeed that Fontailles, at his return from Spain, had given him some intelligence, but that he disapproved the design, and blamed this gentleman for having served as an instrument to engage Monsieur in so odious a business. Cardinal Richelieu, surprized at this discourse, consulted with some of the commissioners of the chamber, one of which having quoted the ordinance I have mentioned, he caused it to be transcribed from the body of the law, and shewed it to the chancellor himself; but though he was pressed so by this minister (whose way of acting on such occasions is but too well known) yet he could not be brought off from the resolution he had taken of discharging the accused; but went on to invalidate that ordinance, saying, that it was not in use in the parliament of Paris, where he had been bred. I cannot disown but when the votes were taken, he was of the side of the ordinance; but as his vote could not absolve Thuanus, so it was not that which caused his condemnation, and every one who knows the duty of a president will acknowledge, that he cannot depart from a law, which all the judges declare valid, much less from a majority of opinions when given in form; it is also a great error, and which I am, with all the Lawyers, very far from entertaining, that it is in a judge's power, as a pacific arbitrator, to pronounce according to equity, and not according to the rigour of the law; for besides that his oath obliges him to do justice, the character of a judge does not appoint him master, but only preserver and minister of the laws and ordinances.

This being not only an historical but a critical Dictionary, I may be allowed to make some reflexions on this narrative of the count de Brienne. I say then, that there are some passages in it, which methinks make not much for the honour of the chancellor. That which is alledged in his excuse, of being for the ordinance, has a great deal of weight; but on the other hand, it may be employed as a conviction against him; for if he ought to be the minister of the laws and ordinances, he ought not to have attempted to have brought off Thuanus, that is, to invalidate the ordinance of Lewis XI. He should either have refused the function of judge, or have divested himself of all friendship, as well as hatred for the accused person; and have had no other view than the discovery of the fact, and giving his suffrage according to the ordinance. Instead of this, we are told here, that he seemed to be ignorant, that there was any law which affected the criminal; and being advertized that there was, he answered, that it was not in use. Why then did he conform to it, in giving his vote? For what end was he the preserver and minister of the laws? He could not be excused, either of oppressing innocence, or of prevarication; for if the law of Lewis XI was obsolete and out of use, Thuanus could not be reckoned an infringer of the laws, but must be declared innocent. But if in pronouncing him guilty, nothing was done but according to law, it follows, that the ordinance of Lewis XI had preserved its force, and consequently, that the chancellor discharged the duties of his place very ill, in endeavouring to make it believed, that there was no law of this nature in France, and when he could not deny it, then alledging, that it was not observed in the parliament of Paris. There is reason to suspect, that this was a subterfuge, and that he only spoke thus, that he might not be reckoned ignorant of an ordinance of Lewis XI; for how is it probable, that the parliament of Paris should dispense the subjects from the obligation of revealing treason? This obligation seems inseparable from the oath of allegiance to the sovereign. Mr du Maurier (56) relates, that one of Barnevelt's sons was beheaded at the Hague, for being privy to the conspiracy his brother had formed against prince Maurice, and not revealing of it; having not been accused by any of the conspirators who were executed in great numbers in all the towns of Holland . . .

(57). He had the same fate as Francis Thuanus, who died for not revealing the design that Mr de Cinq Mars, great master of the borse of France, had communicated to him. Du Puy's noble relations, caused a discourse to be printed on this subject, wherein, to prove the iniquity of the sentence, amongst other passages, they made use of this of Gigas, a Milanese Lawyer. Qui consilium adversus Majestatem Principis inintum cognoverunt, nec probare possunt, non tenentur revelare: & qui tales condemnant, non sunt Judices, sed carnifices. They who know a conspiracy against a sovereign, and cannot prove it, are not obliged to reveal it; and they who condemn such, are not judges, but murderers. By this Milanese Lawyer's favour, Thuanus's judges did their duty (58), but the court did not; for never any fault of that kind was more worthy of pardon than humours, which were very singular, and these were sometimes the rule of his favours [N]. As he was infinitely desirous of prolonging his life, no person experienced his liberality more than his Physician. He gave him an absolute authority over him [O]. He was very than Thuanus's (§ a). I am not ignorant of the fine distich which Mr Menage falsely ascribes to Grotius (59). Mr Zuylichem is the author of it; it is the end of an epigram of eight verses intitled Epitaphium Fr. Augusti Thuanus. See page 180 of his Momenta desultoria, in the Leyden edition, of 1644, 8vo.

(§ a) Peter de Puy (Puteanus) has written a vindication of Francis August Thuanus, wherein he proves that the sentence against the said Thuanus was not only contrary to all Civil laws, but even to the laws made in France; and that the judges were influenced and corrupted by cardinal Richelieu, who had a personal hatred against him. Mr Buckley has inserted this valuable piece, in the seventh volume of his excellent edition of Thuanus's history of his own times. REM. CRIT.]

[N] He was subject to some caprices and humours, which were very singular, and these were sometimes the rule of his favours. He once commanded 'the abbot of Baigone, a man of great wit, and who had the art of inventing new musical instruments, and always attended the king, and was in his service, to get him a consort of swines voices, thinking it impossible. The abbot was not surprized, but asked money for the performance; which was immediately delivered him, and he wrought a thing as singular as ever was seen. For out of a great number of hogs, of several ages, which he got together, and placed under a tent or pavilion, covered with velvet, before which he had a table of wood, all painted, with a certain number of keys, he made an organical instrument, and as he plaid upon the said keys with little spikes, which pricked the hogs, he made them cry in such order and consonance, as highly delighted the king and all his company (60). Bouchet adds to this the story of a Scullion. The king, dressed in a very plain woollen gown went one day into the kitchen, and asked a boy that turned the spit some questions, who not knowing him, answered; 'I am a native of Berry, such a one's son, and my name is Stephen; I serve the king here in mean quality, and yet I get as much as he. The king asked him what the king got? His expences (said the boy), and by my faith, I will have my expences of him, as he has of God, and he will carry away no more than I. The king (who sometimes raised people in a frolic) was pleased with the answer, and Stephen made his fortune by it; for the king made him his Valet de Chambre, and he grew very rich. Some say this was Stephen the Usher, who was so loved by the king, that when at any time he gave him a box on the ear in anger, he pretended to be sick, and a dying, and immediately the king gave him a thousand, or two thousand crowns. This king was very familiar with those he loved; and despised royal pomp and costly cloaths; he eat and drank always in the hall, with all his lords and gentlemen, and they who drank best, and they who had any lascivious jest upon women, were very welcome (61). One day, as he entered into a church, whilst the great bell went, he saw a poor priest sleeping before the door, and enquiring if any body was dead, he was told that a canon was dead, whose benefice was in his majesty's nomination, he ordered the priest to succeed him, to verify the proverb, that he who is happy his good fortune comes when he is asleep (62). Let us add to all this, a passage of Stephen Patquier. Now, though Lewis XI pretended to great zeal for religion and piety, yet he used them sometimes according to the convenience of his affairs, sometimes out of a wonderful superstition; thinking all things were lawful to him, when he had performed some pilgrimage. In short, a man of arbitrary humours, by means of which, right or wrong, he put in, and out, what officers he pleased, and upon the same foot, sometimes ran into fooleries and impertinencies, in which he would not be contradicted. As when he ordered all the birds of Paris that could speak, to be brought into his chamber to divert himself with their gibberish (63).

The Jesuit Garasse has censured these words of Patquier, and made himself ridiculous. For a subject, says he (64), to take the boldness of thinking, speaking, and writing, that his king was a fool, or subject to fool-ries and impertinencies, is such an extravagance and insolence, as deserves chastisement. . . . (65). I remember this device of some old slanderers, who to stain the honour of a brave emperor, said of his religion, that aliam sibi aliam servabat imperio, that he had two religions in his sleeve, one for Jews, and another for conscience, one for the closet, another for the ball, one for himself, and another for his subjects. . . . (66). That a subject should describe his king as a libertine, who plays with God and religion, and makes Tiberian's buskins of both, and takes pilgrimages to canonize his impieties: I question whether the ministers have written so much of Charles IX. . . . (67). This is a symptom of ill-nature, and a very wild disposition. The answer that was made to this invective of Garasse, could not but confound him; he was shewed what was the duty of an historian (68), and it was maintained against him, that the first scandal proceeds from him who commits the evil, not from him who relates it, and that Patquier said nothing but what he had found in the histories of Lewis XI. They did not forget the words of Tacitus (69), which teach us, that the chief design of an historian ought to be the preserving the memory of good actions, and making posterity dread the infamy of bad ones.

I omit the four stories related in Erasmus's Colloquies; for though they denote a very singular and unequal method of rewarding, they are rather good proofs of the dexterity at distinguishing the artifices of a flatterer, or true merit, than signs of an odd and whimsical humour. Let us only give the substance of one of these four stories (70). A countryman, at whose house Lewis XI, in the time of his disgrace, had sometimes eaten turnips, was very well recompensed for the present he made him of a large turnip, after he was upon the throne. This made a lord of the court believe, that if he gave the king a fine horse, he should receive a magnificent reward, but the king only ordered him the countryman's turnip.

[O] As he was infinitely desirous of prolonging his life. . . . he gave his Physician an absolute authority over him. Concerning this passage, see the Miscellaneous Thoughts upon Comets (71), and add to them this reflexion. It is believed, that his devotion for St Servatius, was founded upon this saint's long life. The legends say, that he lived three ages, others are content to give him a bishopric, which he enjoyed above sixty years. 'Infusa, Belgarum maxime populi opinione, affinem illum Christi, ejusque superem temporibus extitisse atque inde tertiam explevisse hominum ætatem; five ita fuerit, neque enim desunt, affirmare hoc ausi, seu potius ex longissima Episcopatus sui præfectura, nam ultra septuaginta annos illam extendit; prodigialiter annosum ac triseiscentum planè crediderint. Ut hinc suspicari forte quis possit Ludovicum Undecimum Gallie Regem ideo sibi ornandum delegisse Servatii templum, ut ab eo inter Divos maxime longævo, longam ipse vitam, cujus erat producendæ cupientissimus, impetraret (72). The people, especially in Flanders, believe that St Servatius was Christ's kinsman, and his cotemporary; and that he lived thrice the age of a man; whether this be really true, as some dare to affirm, or rather that it was said so on account of the long duration of his episcopacy, which lasted more than seventy years. And this may be the reason, why Lewis XI king of France, took such particular care to adorn the church of that saint; that by his intercession, he might obtain the prolongation of his life, which he earnestly desired. Let us not forget this. Lewis XI had often said in his life-time, that in whatever extremity he should be, they should never pronounce on him the word of death, thinking it too harsh for the ear of a king. . . . They who had the charge of his conscience, expected, that he finding himself dying, should acknowledge it. A Divine, his Physician, and Mr Olivier, took a resolution to signify his condition to him. They went to him boldly, and with little respect, as people who had added impudence to the meanness of their condition; and their speech was in these words: Sir, we are obliged to discharge our consciences, confide no longer in this body man, nor in any thing else; for assuredly

(59) These two words of Grotius on the death of Thuanus, are excellent, O legum fabulæ nefas, quibus inter amicos Nolle fidem frustra prodere, proditio, etc. O wretched falsity of the laws, which declare it treason to refuse betraying a friend. Each of them spoke some such short sentence, to let him know, that they were all of the same opinion concerning his death. He answered, I hope God will assist me, I am not perhaps so ill as you imagine (73).’ What shall we say of the careles he made to Francis de Paul? He flattered him, supplicated him, threw himself on his knees before him, built two convents of his order, the first in the park du Pleffis les Tours, the second at the foot of the castle of Amboise, that he might prolong his days for him (74).’

As to the authority of his Physician, read these words. Lewis XI ‘changed his servants every day, and was subject to the roughness of John Cottier, his Physician, to whom he gave 10,000 crowns a month, durst refuse him nothing, and promised him all he could desire, provided he would drive away the terrible phantom of death †, at the mention whereof he would cover his face in bed. [P] They say be at last preferred an ass to his Astrologers.] The story is this, which I relate word for word, as I find it in a book printed at Lyons, in the year 1650 (76). ‘Lewis XI, having a most famous Astrologer in his court, and intending one day to go a hunting, asked him, whether it would be fair weather, or whether he did not suspect it would rain, who, having consulted his astrolobe, answered, that the day would be fair and serene; the king determined therefore to pursue his design; but having rode out of Paris, and coming near the forest, he met a Collier driving his ass, laden with coals, who said, that the king would do well to go back, because in a few hours there would be a great storm; but as what such people say is but little regarded, the king made no account of it, but rode into the forest, and was no sooner there but the day grew dark, thunder and lightning came on, and the rain fell in such abundance, that every one endeavouring to save himself, the king was left alone, who had no recourse but to his horse’s swiftness, to escape this misfortune. Next day the king having sent for the Collier, asked him where he had learned Astrology, and how he could so exactly foretel what weather should happen; the Collier answered, Sir, I was never at school, and indeed I can neither read nor write; nevertheless, I keep a good Astrologer in my house, who never deceives me; the king being amazed, asked him what was his Astrologer’s name, upon which the poor man, quite abashed, answered, Sir, it is the ass which your majesty yesterday saw me driving, loaden with coals; as soon as bad weather is coming, he hangs down his ears forward, and walks more slowly than usual, and rubs himself against the walls; by these signs (Sir) I certainly foresee rain, which is the reason that yesterday I advised your majesty to return home: the king hearing this, cashiered his Astrologer, and gave a small salary to the Collier, that he might make much of his ass, saying: Vivit enim Dominus, quia deinceps alio non utar Astrologo, quam carbonarii asino. — For the future, said he, with an oath, the Collier’s ass shall be my Astrologer. Alas, poor Astrologers, what will become of you, if an ass knows more than you?’ I have said elsewhere (77) that Angelo Catho, who had been this king’s Astrologer and Physician (78), arrived to great honours. You will find in Peter Matthieu, the names of this king’s other Astrologers. It is said, that one of them prophesied, that a lady whom the king loved would die in a week’s time. The thing happening, Lewis XI sent for him, and commanded the people about him not to fail, at a signal he should give them, to take the Astrologer and throw him out at the window. As soon as the king saw him: you that pretend, says he, to be such a wise man, and know so perfectly the fate of others, inform me a little what will be your own, and how long you have to live? whether the Astrologer was secretly advised of the king’s design, or whether he knew it by his science: Sir, answered he, without expressing any fear, I shall die three days before your majesty. The king was so far from having him thrown out at the window after this answer, that, on the contrary, he took particular care not to suffer him to want for any thing, and did all that he could to retard the death of a man, which his own was so closely followed (79). This Astrologer was no less ingenious than he who delivered himself from a like danger in Tiberius’s time. Who being asked what the stars predicted to him that day; answered, after some artificial preambles, that he found himself threatened with an extreme danger. This answer was the reason, not only of his not being thrown from the top of the house, as it had been resolved, in case his science should be found fallacious, but also of Tiberius’s honouring him with his confidence (80).

[Q] There never was a king in France, whose cruel conduct and extortions came so near to tyranny.] Had Comines designed to give the portraiture of a cruel prince, he could have employed no stronger colours than those which describe his rigorous prisons, his iron cages, and nets †. He says, they were made of wood, covered with plates of iron: that he had got some Germans to make very weighty and terrible irons to put on the feet, and in which there was a ring to put one foot in, very hard to be opened, like an iron collar, with a thick and heavy chain, and a great iron ball at the end, very heavy, and these were called the king’s nets. The reign of this prince was terribly tempestuous; it cannot be said of it as of incident in foam that of Antoninus, that it was not stained with blood ‡. Trifstan, his grand provost, who as justly deserved by his barbarous and severe conduct, the name of Trifstan, as Maximin did, was so ready to execute his rigorous commands, that he sometimes destroyed the innocent with the guilty, and always disposed his prince rather to use the sword to punish offences, than the bridle to restrain men from offending. Claude de Seyssel could say nothing more severe on the memory of this prince, than what he writes, that about the places where he was, were seen a great number of people hanging on trees, and the prisons, and other neighbouring houses, full of prisoners, which were often heard, both by day and by night, to cry out for the torments they endured, besides those who were secretly cast into the rivers (81). The same Historian observes (82), that Lewis XI carried his absolute power to excess. His provost went and took the prisoners who were in the palace goal, and caused them to be drowned near the Grange aux Merciers. (83) Besides the examples of the contempt of justice, which are often seen in several parts of the history of Lewis XI, in which we find trials begin by execution, and executions without example; it says, that in many processes, he would have justice done according to his own humour, and would not trust to those, who had the dispensing of it. A place also is still shewn at Pleffis les Tours, where he concealed himself to watch his provost, when he examined the prisoners. (84) There were represented to the states which were held after his death, several sorts of injustices, which, during his reign, had afflicted the people, every one complaining that he had not taken care to maintain the rules of justice.

lute submission he required of the parliament of Paris. For the rest, he had eminent qualities, and such as were absolutely necessary to him; for without these he never could have maintained the monarchy against domestic and foreign enemies, against so many factions of his own subjects, and the rude attacks of the duke of Burgundy, seconded by England. He not only preserved his dominions in the midst of so many attempts, but also enlarged them; for he re-united Anjou, Maine, and the duchy of Burgundy to the crown, and acquired Provence (1). It was in his power to have added to it all the estates of the house of Burgundy, by matching the heiress with the Dauphin [R]; but a surprising justice. It was said in that assembly, that the king had raised to offices of judicature, men without ability and experience, and that blank commissions were ready drawn to insert the names of those who bid most, which were given to soldiers, huntsmen, foreigners, and illiterate people; that they might exercise them by others, and reap the profit of them; that the secretaries of the chancery exacted excessive fees at their discretion, and that for the seal to confirm a privilege to a city, they had exacted four hundred golden crowns. Then letters of appeal to the chancery and parliament, were denied to those who had recourse to the supreme justice of the king, against the injustices and oppressions of inferior judges; that they who administered justice in the parliaments, exacted great and excessive fees to reimburse themselves for the offices they had bought; that several had been accused of crimes of which they were innocent, and the accusers rewarded with the confiscation of their estates, and sometimes commissioned to try them, or to name what commissioners they thought fit; that the number of sergeants was multiplied in such a manner, that in the Bailliwicks and Seneschalries, in which there were wont to be only twenty or thirty, there were in his reign an hundred, or double the number. Many lords and others addressed themselves to this assembly for the restitution of their goods, lands, and offices, of which they had been deprived. It was represented to the same estates, that men, women, and children, were in several places forced, for want of beasts, to labour with the plough to their necks, and that by night, for fear the day might expose them to the commissioners of the taxes (85).

We will finish this remark with a passage of Mezerai. Comines, says he (86), describes him to us very prudent in adversity, admirably skilled at penetrating the interests and designs of men, and at drawing and turning them to his own ends, furiously suspicious and jealous of his power, most absolute in his will, who never pardoned, and who terribly trampled his subjects under foot, and yet with all this, the best prince of his time. He had put to death above four thousand persons by different punishments, which he sometimes delighted to see. Most of them had been executed without form of law, several drowned with a stone tied to their necks, others precipitated going over a swale, from whence they fell upon wheels armed with spikes and cutting instruments; others were strangled in dungeons; Trislan, his companion, and provost of his palace, being judge, witness, and executioner.

(86) Mezerai, ubi supra, pag. 348, 349.

[R] It was in his power to have added to his crown, all the estates of the house of Burgundy, by matching the heiress with the Dauphin. The princess Mary, heiress of all these estates, had a desire to be married to the Dauphin, and negotiated this affair by her principal counsellors. They removed all the difficulties that Lewis XI proposed to them: his son, he said, was not yet nine years old; he was extraordinary little for his age; his constitution could not either be more weak or more tender than it then was. Nothing was more dangerous for him than an early marriage (87). They replied, that the affairs of that prince would not admit any delay of her marriage; but that when it should be accomplished with the Dauphin, there might be ways found to retard the consummation, as long as it might be judged prejudicial to either of the parties. That Mary of Burgundy had declared, she would willingly wait as long as they thought convenient; but that her subjects had at present occasion for a master. The king replied, that the means they spoke of were not infallible; and that in the mean time, the health of his only son was so precious to him, that he could not expose it to a danger so great for a young prince, as that of a present marriage to a young lady, who was but too capable of consummating it. The Flemings in vain endeavoured to convince Lewis, that his fear was imaginary, and not being able to effect it, they made him a second proposition, which was no better received than the first (88). This was the marriage of the princess to Charles count of Angouleme (89). The king was so blind as to slip this the most glorious and advantageous opportunity that heaven could have offered him. His hatred for the duke of Burgundy was extreme, and capricious in its excess. It did not stop at his person, but extended to that of his daughter, for this only reason, that the duke was her father. This daughter had never done Lewis any injury, and yet he was so little equitable on her account, as to chafe, that the estates she inherited should be possessed by strangers, rather than secure them in a lawful way, such as by marriage (90). This shews, that the passions of monarchs do not always turn with the wind of their interest. They are accused of this fault, and supposed to divest themselves of friendship and hatred, with the greatest ease, when their grandeur requires it; this may be true, generally speaking, but they all have, like other persons, some secret passions, or certain antipathies, which, on some occasions, do not permit them to govern themselves otherwise than according to this disposition; to which they sacrifice their glory, their prudence, and most valuable interests. Philip de Comines ascends to a higher cause, and deserves to be heard.

(89) Who was the father of Francis I, so that by this marriage the two countries would have been soon united to the crown of France. See Mezerai, ubi supra, pag. 312, but as Lewis XI could not foresee this, there is no ground to blame him on this account, for he had solid reasons against aggrandizing the prince of the blood. See the art. de BURGUNDY (M A R Y), remark [B].

(90) Varillas, ubi supra, pag. 172.

Notwithstanding that Lewis XI was thus free from all apprehensions, God permitted him not to take this matter, which was so great, by the most useful handle; and God seems to have shown him, as he has done since, that he would rigorously persecute this house of Burgundy, both in the person of the lord of it, and of the subjects having their estates in it. For all the wars which they have had since, would not have happened, if the king our master had taken things by the end he should have done, to compleat their happiness, and unite to his crown all these great lordships, to which he had no right. Which he ought to have done by some treaty of marriage, or have attracted them to him by good and true friendship; which he easily might have done, considering the great despair, poverty, and weakness, in which these lordships were. By doing which, he had retrieved them from great troubles, and at the same time had strengthened his own kingdom, and secured it by a lasting peace (91). When the duke of Burgundy was yet alive, the king often talked to me of what he would do, if the duke should die, and he spoke very rationally at that time, saying, that he would endeavour to marry his son (who is our king at present) to the duke's daughter, (who since has been duchess of Austria) and if she would not bearken to it, because the Dauphin was much younger than she, he would endeavour to marry her to some young lord of his kingdom, to keep her and her subjects in friendship, and to recover without contention, what he pretended a title to; and the king was still in this mind, till a week before he heard of the death of the duke. But this wise resolution, I speak of, began to change a little, the day that he knew of the death of the said duke of Burgundy (92). He expresses himself still more fully in the following chapter, for he expressly says, that God blinded this prince, in order to punish those who did not deserve to be happy. 'Our king's understanding was so great, that neither I nor any one else in the company could see so clearly into his affairs as he himself; for, doubtless, he was one of the wisest and most subtle princes of his time. But in these great affairs, God disposes the hearts of kings and great princes, (which he holds in his hand) to pursue methods subservient to the works which he designs to bring about in due time. For, without doubt, if it had been his will, that our king should continue the resolution which he himself had taken before the duke of Burgundy's death, the wars which since have followed, and those which are waged at this day, would all have been prevented.

surprising fatality so infatuated him in this point, that he could not sacrifice a personal passion to the most solid advantage he ever could have procured France, for the present and the future. He was blamed for suffering his enemies to make conquests in Germany, and for prolonging a truce, which gave them opportunities further to aggrandize themselves. This censure was ill-grounded [8]. He died the thirtieth of August 1483, after such tedious and severe distempers of body and mind [7], that there is hardly a human

ed; but we were not yet worthy on either side to obtain that long peace which was prepared for us; and hence proceeds the error our king committed, and not from any defect in his understanding; for, as I have said before, he was a very great man (93). Nothing can be more judicious than this discourse. We must say of this false step of Lewis XI, what the Physicians say of some distempers, that there is something supernatural in them, Δείον γάρ. Herodotus would speak out more frankly than any other; he who conceived the Deity as a jealous and malignant nature (94); for the event has shewn, that it was for the punishment of the people, that God permitted not the marriage of Mary of Burgundy and the Dauphin to take effect. They have suffered for the foolish politics of Lewis XI. It could never be said more truly, Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi (95).

The people suffer when the prince offends.

The marriage of this prince with Maximilian of Austria, was the original of a war, which has lasted above two hundred years, and which in all probability will last much longer. It has been sometimes interrupted by the low condition of the combatants, only to return like intermitting fevers, when the dissipated humours have had time to recruit. Hence we may derive those rivers of blood, those repeated burnings, ravagings, and desolations. There is reason to wonder how a country of so little extent has been able to furnish for two ages an ample theatre of war (§ 2) to so many nations (96): France and the house of Austria, the principal parties, who have disputed this piece of ground, have engaged most of the Christian princes in their quarrel; for whenever the balance of power has been on the side of the latter, the former has been seconded in its attacks; and when the former has been but too likely to conquer, the other has been vigorously assisted. The Eastern nations, who know not the nature of the country, nor the concurrence of obstacles, laugh, that so many battles gained, and so many towns taken, should not decide this quarrel. The conquest of three or four provinces, is, with them, the business of a very few years; their historians, spend but three or four pages in relating it. What would they say, should they know that two camels could not carry all the histories, that have been written upon the wars of the Low-Countries? The historians of the troubles which occasioned the erection of the republic of the United Provinces are so numerous, that when Mr Varillas came to Paris, no body but Mr Naudé was capable of giving a catalogue of them (97). And yet these are but a very small part of the wars of the Netherlands, since Charles VIII. It is said that a Turkish emperor desiring to see, in a map, the little territory that maintained so long a war against so potent a monarch (98), said, that if it were his business, he would send a good number of pioneers, and make them shovel that little point of land into the sea (99). These people doubtless pity both those who have lost something, and those who have not taken all in so long a series of wars. They do not think it glorious to fight so often for the same towns; they take and restore them two or three times in the same reign, and so they are always to begin again. But what would they say, had they genius enough to reflect upon the consequence of these losses? The house of Austria would not by this time have had a foot of ground in this country, if it had not lost half of it in the sixteenth century. It has experienced the truth of this maxim of the ancients, that half is better than the whole (100). What it lost then has served, and will always serve, to save the rest; without this, it would at this time neither have what it has preserved, nor what it could not recover. The poor Flemings, as Comines very well said, are always the sufferers;

whereas by the marriage of their prince with the Dauphin, they had probably only seen war at a distance: it would have been kept out of their frontiers, which is an inestimable advantage. As long as there is an inch of ground to be gained, they will always be the suffering party; this will be a constant and infallible ferment of new wars.

[(§ 2) The same has been said of Italy long ago, 'Et Galli & Helvetii, & Hispani & Teutonici, omnes eorum pugnas veniunt committere in Italiam, cum maximo Italorum discrimine. — The French, and the Swiss, the Spaniards, and the Germans, they all come to fight their battles in Italy to the great danger of the Italians.' Says John Nevizanus in his Sylva Nuptialis, Lib. IV, num. 136. REM. CRIT.]

[8] This censure was ill grounded. It was indeed specious; for, generally speaking, it is true policy to oppose the conquests of an ambitious and well armed neighbour. But there is no rule without an exception, and there are circumstances in which instead of crossing an enemy in his enterprise, we ought not to hinder him from engaging in it: as for example, when we foresee that such a one will be hampered, and that the consequences of this may be of advantage to us. This was the duke of Burgundy's case, when having conquered the duchy of Guelderland, he formed new projects against the empire. Let us hear a man that undertook this matter admirably. 'The said duke prolonged his truce with the king, and some of the king's servants thought, that he ought not to have prolonged it, nor have given so great advantage to the duke. This seemed rational enough, but they did not understand this matter, for want of experience, and duly weighing circumstances. There were others who saw farther into it than they, and who had more experience, as having been upon the places, who told the king, that that truce was wisely made, and that he ought to suffer the said duke to dash himself against the Germans (an enterprise so great and daring, that it was almost incredible) saying, that when he had taken one place, or ended one quarrel, he would soon engage himself in another, and that he was not a man, ever to be contented with the success of any undertaking (in which he was opposite to the king; for the more he was embroiled, the more he would embroil himself) and that there was no better way of being revenged on him, than letting him go on his own way, and even giving him some small aid, without giving him suspicion of any design of breaking this truce: for considering the greatness and power of Germany, it was not possible but he must soon be utterly ruined. For the princes of the empire, though the emperor was a man of little virtue, would see it done; and so it happened in the issue to the said duke (101).

[T] He died . . . after tedious and severe distempers of body and mind. He who supplies me with the proofs of this, is so valuable a witness, that it is not possible to have a better; for it is Philip de Comines. He tells us that the king, his master fell sick at Forges near Chinon, in March 1480 (102). He intirely lost his speech, his senses, and his memory . . . Two or three days after he began to recover his speech, and his senses . . . As he found himself somewhat better he began to enquire, who they were that had hindered him by force from going to the window? They told him the truth, and he immediately expelled them his family; some he turned out of their places, and never would see them more. Others . . . he only dismissed (103). The reason of all this was, that there was nothing he so much dreaded as the losing his authority. What torment, what punishment was this? This distemper held him about fifteen days, and he recovered perfectly as to his sense and speech; but continued very weak, and in great apprehensions of a relapse (104). He accordingly relapsed the year following, and lost his speech a second time, and was thought a human creature so barbarous as to wish his bitterest enemy the like. He may well be reckoned in the the number of the princes, whose bad fortune much exceed their good to be dead for two hours . . . They devoted him to St Claude . . . immediately his speech returned and he walked about the house in a very weak condition (105). He made a journey to St Claude, and returned to Tours, and shut himself up, so that few could see him, and grew wonderful suspicious of every body, and jealous, lest they should take away or diminish his authority (106) . . . He did a great many strange things, for which they that saw them, thought him bereft of his senses; but they did not know him . . . he knew that he was not beloved by the great persons of the kingdom, nor by many of the meaner sort, and he had so taxed the people, as never king did (107) . . . so that it is no wonder if he had distracted thoughts and imaginations, and fancied he was not wished well, and had great fears on that account . . . In the first place hardly any one came to Plessis du Parc, (which was the place where he resided) except his domestics and his archers, which were four hundred, a good number of them being always upon the guard, and walking before the palace, and guarding the gate: No lord or great person lodged within the court, and but few of the great lords were ever admitted: Nobody came near him but Monsieur de Beaujeu, the present duke of Bourbon, his son-in-law; he encompassed the castle of Plessis, with an iron palisade, and fortified the entrance into the ditches of Plessis with forked iron turn-pikes; he also caused four pieces of ordnance to be made, all of massy iron, and port-holes to shoot through, and it was a majestic piece of work, and cost above twenty thousand livres: and lastly, he placed there forty cross-bow men, who day and night were in these ditches, and had orders to shoot at any man who approached them, till the gate was open in the morning: he fancied moreover that his subjects were somewhat forward to assume his authority when they saw an opportunity (108). Comines having amply spoken of Francis de Paula goes on (109), 'Our king was in Plessis, attended by very few, except archers, and under the suspicions before mentioned; but he had taken all imaginable precaution; for he left no man either in the neighbourhood or town, of whom he had a suspicion, but sent them all away, under a guard of archers. Nobody spoke to him of business, but such as concerned him most: he looked more like a dead than living man. He was grown so lean that no body could have believed it; he clothed himself richly, more than ever he used to do wearing only robes of crimson satin, furred with fine fables, and gave some to whom he thought fit, without their asking: for no body durst ask any thing, or speak to him: he ordered severe punishments, to render himself dreaded, and for fear his subjects obedience should slacken; for so he told me himself. He dismissed officers, and disbanded soldiers, lessened some pensions, and took away others; and he told me a few days before his death, that he spent his time in placing and displacing people, and got himself more talked of in the kingdom than any king ever was, and this he did for fear they should think him dead; for as I have said, few saw him: but when his actions were talked of, every one was in suspense and could scarce believe he was sick; he caused all sorts of beasts to be brought him from foreign countries, and gave a prodigious price for them; and all this to amuse the people that they should not think he was sick (110). The historian compares (111) the evils and pains king Lewis suffered to those he had made others suffer; because, says he, I hope that the miseries he suffered before his death . . . will prepare his way to heaven, and be part of his purgatory. He reckons amongst those evils, the indiscretion of those who pronounced him a dead man. What a thunderstroke was it to him to hear this news, and this sentence? for never man feared death more, or endeavoured more to find a remedy for it; and he had all his life-time said to his servants, and to me among others, and prayed, that if ever we saw him in extremity, we should say nothing to him, except, speak little; and that we should only bring him to confess, without pronouncing that cruel word death: for he did not seem to have courage to bear so cruel a sentence (112) . . . you see then how indiscret-

ly his death was signified to him. Which I was willing to relate . . . in order to shew, that the miseries he endured were very great, considering his temper, who exacted more obedience than any one else in his time, and who had had more paid him. So that the least word of an answer, contrary to his inclination, had been a great punishment for him to endure: some five or six months before his death, he was suspicious of all men, and especially of all who were worthy of authority: he was afraid of his son, and caused him to be strictly guarded. No body either saw or spoke to him, except by his command; he was, suspicious at last of his daughter, and son-in-law the present duke of Bourbon, and would know what people entered Plessis with them; at last he broke off a council, which the duke of Bourbon, his son-in-law, held there by his command. When his son-in-law and the count de Dunois came back from reconducting the embassy, which was come to the wedding of the king, his son, and of the queen, at Amboise, and entered Plessis, and much people along with them, the king, who caused the gates to be well-guarded, being in the gallery, which looks into the court of Plessis, ordered one of the captains of his guards to be called to him, and commanded him to go and examine the attendants of the said lords, whether they had not coats of mail under their cloaths; and that he should do it, as by discoursing with them, without making too much shew of it. Judge then, whether he who had made so many people live in suspicion and fear of him, was not well recompensed; and who were those that he could trust, since he was jealous of his son, his daughter, and his son-in-law. I speak not this on his account only. But for all other princes who desire to be feared, they never meet with the requital of it till old age: for penance they fear every body: and what torment was it for this king to be troubled with this fear, and these passions (113)? Afterwards the author mentions (114) the slavery in which the Physician kept this prince, and having described (115), the precautions the king took to secure himself in a house surrounded with great iron grates, &c. &c. He goes on (116), 'Is it possible to keep a king in safer custody, or (117) Ibid. pag. 402. in a stricter prison, than he kept himself? The cages, in which he kept others, were about eight foot square, and he that was so great a king, had (118) Ibid. pag. 404. only the small court of a castle to walk in, though he seldom came there, but kept in his gallery without going from thence, except through the chambers; and went to mass without passing through the aforesaid court. Would not one say, that this king suffered as well as others? who thus shut up himself, and had guards about him, who was thus in fear of his children, and of all about him, and of his relations, and who changed continually his servants which he had brought up, and who had all their dependance upon him, so as to confide in none of them, but thus condemn himself to such strange confinements, and enclosures?' What he says in the thirteenth chapter is wonderful. 'The poor and the vulgar ought to place but little hope in any thing in this world, since so great a king has suffered and laboured so much, and at last left all, unable to keep off death one hour, with all the diligence he employed to do it. I have known him, and have been his servant in the flower of his age, and in his greatest prosperities; but I never saw him without trouble and care. Above all pleasures, he loved hunting and hawking in it's season, but he took not so much pleasure in this, as in dogs (117). . . . (119) Ibid. pag. 405. And even in hunting he had almost as much trouble as pleasure; for he took great pains at it, he kept up with the hags, and rose very early, and rode sometimes a long chace, and would not leave the sport whatever weather it might be; and thus he sometimes returned very weary, and almost always in a fret with some body or other . . . He was continually at this sport, and lodged in the villages till some news came of a war; for most commonly every summer, there was something to do betwixt the duke of Burgundy and him, and in the winter they made a truce (118) . . . Thus the pleasures he took were but (120) Ibid. pag. 405. for a short season of the year, and were very laborious to his person, as I have said; at the time that he repined ‘reposed himself, his understanding was at work; for he had business in a great many places: and as willingly concerned himself in the affairs of his neighbours as in his own. When he was in war, he longed for a peace or a truce; when he had made a truce, he could hardly endure it: he concerned himself with many little things in his kingdom, which he needed not to have done; but such was his temper, and so he lived (119).’ The life of this prince, before he was king, was not very happy. Comines shows it (120), after which he makes this conclusion: ‘Now in what time of his life could it be said he enjoyed any pleasure, considering all the things above-mentioned? I believe that from his infancy to his grave, he had nothing but anguish and fatigues; and that, if all the good days of his life, in which he had more joy and pleasure than labour and trouble, were reckoned up, they would be found but very few; and that there would be twenty of pain and labour, for one of ease and pleasure (121).’

There is no reader so stupid as to want a comment upon what I have been relating; every one is able to imagine that there is no condition more miserable than that of a sick prince, who dares not own he is so, who suspects every thing, and is forced to use a thousand stratagems, to persuade people he is not dead. Note, that Philip de Comines shews, by the example of four great princes (122), who died in his time, that man is but an inconsiderable thing, that this life is short and miserable, and that grandeur is nothing (123).

[U] He performed an act of religion, upon which a modern author has had some thoughts which deserve to be examined.] Lewis XI made a contract, which was called the donation of Lewis XI, to the Virgin Mary of Boulogne, of the right and title to the fief and homage for the county of Boulogne, on which the county of St Paul depends, to be paid before the image of the said lady by his successors, in 1478 (124). The abbot of St Real pretends, that ‘all antiquity, whether Greek or Roman, never saw any man pretend to honour himself before the people, by bestowing bounties on the gods . . . and that this refined devotion was reserved for Lewis XI (125).’ He maintains (126), that an excess of this nature in such a one as he was, ought rather to be reputed an artifice, than an extravagance.

. . . (127) That this action, however bold it appears, ought to be looked upon by us as the fruit of a consummate wisdom, and a long experience of the judgments of men: that there is nothing extraordinary in a prince’s consecrating . . . the revenue of lands to the service of God and his saints, to the use of his ministers, to the ornament of their temples and their altars, nor even in putting his estates under their particular protection . . . (128). That all this is agreeable to reason; but not so as to make choice of celestial powers for the objects of our liberality: that instead of asking any thing of them, or pretending to have received from them, one should take upon him to be their benefactor; as if they had need of our benefactions, as much as we have need of theirs; and could actually enjoy them as we can theirs, their light and intelligence, when they please to communicate some rays of them. That however this has had a good effect; for (129) though Lewis XI made open profession of insincerity, as we see by his motto, yet it does not appear that at that time any one suspected the least artifice in so extraordinary a devotion. So true it is . . . that the bare shadow of an imaginary interest, that heaven has in such sort of actions, and the sanctity of names, that are mingled with them, may so blind the world, as to hinder it from perceiving the extravagance and mockery. This is wonderful; but it serves the better to discover the nature of the human mind by its weak and whimsical side, that no one should at that time reflect on the extravagance of a man’s contracting with the holy Virgin, just as one man does with another, and making her at least, in fiction, accept of a present which he remained as much possessor of after this pretended liberality as before. For, after all, were the Bailiffs, Provosts, and other officers of the county of Boulogne, tho’ they had been called the Virgin’s Bailiffs, Provosts, and officers, less obliged to obey the king? Did the church of Boulogne enjoy the revenue of the land, so that she was better served than before? Was the king ever the less count of it, for having given this county to the Virgin? Not at all? Did not the people at that time see this as we see it? they might if they had pleased; but Lewis XI saw all these things much better than they or we. In the mean time, this prince, so dextrous in the use of all the instruments of policy, who had so profoundly studied that of religion in particular, and plaid this engine in all the known methods, thought he might safely try it this one way more, when once he had invented it, and carry it so far without danger; he judged in short that his people were capable of bearing with it. He must have been well acquainted with their nature, to venture so far. I do not copy any of the rest of this long passage, though it be very solid.

I find in some respects a great deal of solidity in these reflexions; but considering the practice that has prevailed in all times, and which the abbot of St Real has commended, I do not find any thing wonderful in this conduct of Lewis XI, nor any reason to suspect more artifice in it, than in the rest of his devotions. The Heathens made donations to their gods, not only of precious stones, and of vessels of gold and silver, but also of lands (130). The Catholics daily give the holy Virgin, some a pearl-necklace, others a crown, or a robe beset with diamonds, &c. They disseize themselves of the property of these goods, and convey them to the mother of the son of God. Why will not you allow then, that a man may as well convey the title of sovereign of a certain fief to her? Is it strange that Lewis XI should declare himself her vassal, her liege-man in respect of a county whereof he was sovereign? What mighty wonder is it, that he should from henceforth command homage to be paid this saint? I own he reserves to himself the profitable demesnes, and all the other advantages of possession; but this hinders not his granting away an honourable right; and the conveyance he makes of it comes under the same species of liberality, as the gift of a heart of silver, or a crown glittering with precious stones. The instrument of this conveyance, hung up in a church in letters of gold, would be as glorious an ornament as a statue of silver. Wherein then lies the extraordinary whimsicalness of Lewis the eleventh’s devotion? and why must it be said, that he would not have had the boldness thus to impose upon the public, if he had not profoundly known the folly and weakness of the people. If he had consecrated to the holy Virgin the revenue of this fief, to be employed to the use of ecclesiastics, and the adorning of altars, he had practised a sort of devotion, which the abbot of St Real had judged very solid (131). This therefore is a laudable way to abuse the celestial powers for the objects of our liberality; it ought therefore to be permitted, to offer them the sovereignty of an estate, and to convey it to them, in order to hold it from them, back again, by fealty and homage; for this right is what a man may as well divest himself of, in honour of them, as of the revenues of that estate. Remember that the victims sacrificed to the gods, and all the other offerings of devotion, were always considered as a present, and that the priests employed them neither for food, nor any other use, otherwise than in quality of the ministers of those celestial powers. They were not the proprietors, they were only the usufructuaries, and that by a kind of secondary conveyance. The first consisted in this, that the man who offered a victim, or any thing else, gave up to the gods all the right he had in it. The second in this, that the gods transferred to their ministers the administration and use of these offerings. So that at bottom, the conduct of Lewis XI had nothing extraordinary in it, as not being a liberality of a new invention, and we need not wonder that his subjects were not offended at it. It is true, he might have been censured, because his donation alienated nothing from him; for he still remained master of the land, he reserved the real profits, &c. wholly to himself. But they would be to blame, in imagining that he sought only to deceive; this act of religion might in him be as sincere as any other. It is very probable he believed he had made a donation terate man, and no way countenanced learning, have been sufficiently confuted by Gabriel Naudé (n). I do not give a chronological series of his principal actions; this you will find in Moreri, copied almost word for word from Father Anselm (o); this ought also to be understood of the other French monarchs. Mr Varillas is mistaken as to the cause he alledges of the antipathy between the French and Spaniards [X]. He has succeeded pretty well in discovering the machinations of the war against Lewis XI, and the arts by which they were defeated, and that terrible conspiracy was destroyed (p). That subject was suitable to his genius, and the turn he had given to his studies: but there is a little book, where we see more distinctly the plan of this enterprize, and the means used by that prince to defeat it [Z].

The reflexions of Mr Joly (q), on the life of this king, are very judicious. I shall recite a passage of it, which will give me occasion to rectify a remark concerning the Rozier des Guerres, the rose-tree of the wars [Z].

donation which would highly please the holy Virgin, dispose her to protect him, and be liberal of her favours towards him; his principles and acts of piety might all be wrong, and yet attended with a sincere persuasion of mind; one proof of this is, that he never durst swear falsely upon the cross of St Laud (132), being struck with a vulgar tradition, that they who swore upon this cross, and were perjured, died a miserable death before the year's end (133). The confessor of St Pol prayed him to swear upon that cross, that he would neither do, nor suffer any other to do him any harm (134). The king answered, that he had sworn he never would take that oath, for any man alive; but that there were no other oaths; but he would willingly take to satisfy him (135).

I wish this reflexion may serve as a warning to all my readers, that there are no thoughts so much to be suspected, as those which are put off in an assuming manner, and with a majestic tone. The foregoing reflexions of the abbot of St Real are, of this kind, the fittest in the world to dazzle; but divest them of their ornaments, and take a near view of them, and you will find nothing solid in them.

[X] Mr Varillas is mistaken, as to the cause of the antipathy between the French and Spaniards. Most of the accounts both French and Spanish, that were published upon occasion of the interview of Lewis with Henry IV, king of Castile, assign for a reason of the strange change that happened there, Lewis's extreme negligence in dress, unbecoming the dignity of a prince of his rank; and to say the truth, before that interview, the French and Castilians practised, towards each other, all the duties of good neighbourhood. They mutually succoured each other, and performed all the good offices that decency and charity required (136). Mr Varillas gives several instances of it, after which he goes on in this manner, 'but when the court of Henry IV, king of Castile, which appeared in so magnificent an equipage, that the like was never seen, nor any thing near it, for three or four hundred years before, saw Lewis dressed in a drab de Berry, that was not new, and his head covered with an old hat, which had nothing remarkable in it but a leaden image of the Virgin, that was sewed to it; the Castilians conceived such a contempt for the French, on account of their king, that they took the first opportunity of breaking with them; and the antipathy betwixt the two nations, may be dated from that time, which has since become immortal (137).'

I doubt not but Mr Varillas would have been hard put to it, to shew us any accounts of this interview, which say, that the hatred that has lasted so long between the French and Spaniards, is derived from thence. I am certain Philip de Comines is the first who has made reflexions thereupon, and that almost all other writers are his transcribers in this particular; but he is far from giving any ground for the pretended discovery of Mr Varillas. He has made a digression (138) tending to shew that the interview of princes is more prejudicial than profitable. He gives several instances of it, the first whereof is the interview of Lewis XI, and the king of Castile: 'Thus these two nations, says he (139), which had been so strictly allied, ridiculed each other. The king of Castile was ill-favoured, and his dress displeasing to the French, who laughed at it. Our king was dressed in a short jerkin, and so mean that nothing could be more so; and sometimes he wore very sorry cloth, and a sorry hat, different from the rest, with a leaden image tacked to it. The Castilians laughed at it, and said it was out of singinefs. Thus, in effect, that interview broke up, with scoffing and satire on both sides, and those two kings afterwards never loved one another.' What he has said of the interview of the emperor and Charles duke of Burgundy, is equally strong (140). Should we hence conclude, that the Germans and Burgundians have hated one another ever since? Would not this be false? Were not they good friends, after the death of the duke of Burgundy? Did not they act in concert against France? We should have seen the same betwixt the French and Castilians, had not stronger reasons intervened than the discontent at this interview. Castile, Arragon, and several other estates of Spain were re-united: and hence proceeded the hatred of the French and Spaniards; for ever since that re-union, France has been obliged to act either upon the offensive or defensive against Spain.

[Y] There is a little book where we see more distinctly the plan of this enterprize, and the means used by that prince to defeat it. It was printed in the year 1694, under the title of Miroir historique de la Ligue de l'an 1464, où peut se reconnoître la Ligue de l'an 1694, pour y decouvrir ce qu'elle a à craindre des propositions de paix que la France lui fait. Par l'Auteur du Salut de l'Europe. — An historical Mirrour of the League in the year 1464, where the League of the year 1694 may view itself, in order to discover what it has to fear from the propositions of peace which France has made to it. By the author of the Safety of Europe. You see that he who published this book, describes himself not by his name, but by a preceding piece, intituled Le Salut de l'Europe considéré dans un état de crise, avec un Avertissement aux Alliez sur les conditions de paix que la France propose aujourd'hui, par l'Auteur de la Réponse au Discours de Mr de Rebenac. — The Safety of Europe considered in a state of Crisis, with an advice to the allies on the conditions of peace which France now proposes, by the author of the answer to the discourse of Mr Rebenac. This answer (141), which contains 117 pages in 8vo, was published in the year 1692, and was very much relished by the enemies of France: which doubtless is the reason that the author made it his distinguishing title and character at the head of his second performance, which he intituled Le Salut de l'Europe, &c. Since that second piece, he no longer described himself by his first title, but by that which he founded on his Salut de l'Europe. I do not know whether he is the author of two pieces which appeared in the year 1694, one under the title of Avis d'un Amy à l'Auteur du Miroir historique de la Ligue de l'an 1464. — Advice from a friend to the author of the Historical Mirrour of the League of the year 1464; and the other under the title of Pensées sur l'Avis d'un Amy à l'Auteur du Miroir historique de la Ligue de l'an 1464. — Some Thoughts on the advice from a friend to the author of the Historical Mirrour of the League of the year 1464. I only know that he continued to describe himself by his second quality, in a piece which came out in the year 1695, intituled, Lettre au Gazetteur de Paris sur le Siege de Namur, par l'Auteur du Salut de l'Europe. He seems to know pretty well the character of Lewis XI.

[Z] I shall recite a passage of it, which will give me occasion to rectify a remark concerning the Rozier des Guerres. We desire to have a prince who is addicted to the Catholic truth, but of whom it cannot be said what the holy bishop of Geneva said of some body resembling Lewis XI, that he was a good Catholic, but a very bad Christian. We must however say this of Lewis XI, which, in my opinion, is the 'finest and most royal action of his life, that he seriously acknowledged his faults before he died, as we are assured by Comines. And to hinder his son, who was afterwards Charles VIII *, from falling into the same faults, he left him an instruction, under the name of Rozier des Guerres, which having been found in the castle of Nerac, has been published by Mr d'Espagnet, president of the parliament of Bourdeaux, in 1616, where he particularly recommends to him to make himself more loved than feared, considering that he had chiefly erred in that important point (142).'

You see that Mr Joly does not positively say, that Lewis XI composed that instruction himself, and yet insinuates that he did so. The title of the book in the edition of the president d'Espagnet (143) is still more fallacious. I said in the preceding editions of this Dictionary (144), that Mr d'Espagnet believed that Lewis XI was the author of this book; but I have blotted it out. I should have expressed myself with some restriction, since he only believed that this prince had some hand in it (145).

LEWIS XII, king of France, great-grandson to Charles V [A], succeeded Charles VIII, on the seventh of April 1498. He had the title of duke of Orleans, and had gone through many disgraces in the reign of his predecessor. Nor paid he all the submission due to his sovereign: for he had taken up arms against him, and was taken prisoner in a battle gained against those of Brittany, by the army of Charles VIII (a). He was in love with the heiress of Brittany, and hoped to marry her; but he had not that satisfaction till after the king his predecessor's death, and it obliged him to an action altogether odious and unjust, to wit, the dissolving his marriage with the princess Jane of France [B]. His reign was remarkable for great events, some prosperous, and others unfortunate [C]; but take him all together, he was one of the greatest men that had been [A] He was great-grandson to Charles V. He was son to Charles duke of Orleans, who was son to Lewis of France, duke of Orleans, assassinated in Paris by his uncle the duke of Burgundy, the twenty third of November, 1407 (1). This Lewis, son of Charles V, had married Valentina of Milan; so that Lewis XII, grandson to Valentina, had the justest pretensions in the world to the duchy of Milan, and yet he could never maintain himself in that country.

[B] He was obliged to dissolve his marriage with the princess Jane of France. She was daughter to Lewis XI, and sister to Charles VIII. She was married at twenty two years of age, to our Lewis, in 1476. She behaved herself very well with respect to him whilst he was in disgrace, and it was she, who, by her entreaties, brought him out of prison, in 1491 (2); but that was not sufficient to balance, in her husband's heart, the violent inclination he had for Charles the eighth's widow: this was Anne of Brittany. He had loved her, and was beloved by her, before she married Charles; therefore, to gratify his passion for her, he caused his marriage to be annulled, and promised such rewards to Pope Alexander VI, that he obtained of him all he had a mind to. There are few but believe he was perjured, in maintaining he had not known her. 'He protested he had married her by force, fearing the indignation of Lewis XI, her father, who was a man of an absolute will, but that he had never known nor touched her (3)'. This Brantome says, but he adds, 'I believe her husband, as I have heard say, had known her very well, and sensibly touched her, though she was somewhat deformed in her body; for he was not so chaste as to abstain, having her so near him, and so close to his side, considering his temper, which was a little lustful, and very prone to the pleasures of Venus, as his predecessor had been; but he was minded to recover his first love, which was queen Anne, and that fine duchy, which threw great temptations into his soul, and therefore he divorced that princess, and his oath was believed and received by the Pope, who gave him a dispensation, which was received by the Sorbonne, and by the court of parliament of Paris (4)'. Mr Varillas will give us the particulars of the injustices which were committed in this affair. 'Lewis XII had solicited the dissolution of his marriage with Jane of France, daughter and sister to the two last kings, though he was obliged to her for his liberty and life; he had sworn before the commissioners of the holy see, that the marriage had not been consummated, though this princess had sworn the contrary; and the miracles she afterwards wrought, seem to confirm the truth of what she had said; he had maintained, in writing, other facts upon this subject, which were not more probable: he had corrupted, by his money, the secretary of the legate , and understanding, from him, that the permission to marry again was expedited, he married the queen, without waiting till this permission came to his hands, which was the cause of the legate's poisoning his secretary (5)'. Even those who will not allow that this princess wrought miracles, will be obliged to acknowledge, that she lived an exemplary life after her divorce, and that her moderation under so sensible an injury was wonderful; for which reason her word is more to be depended on than the oaths of her husband. For it is certain that she declared to the commissioners, with all that modesty which her virtue and her sex required, that the marriage had been consummated. Jane of France being interrogated in her turn upon the same articles, answered. . . . That modesty would not permit her to explain herself clearly upon the third article (6), and nevertheless that her conscience did not suffer her to assent to it (7). If it were true, as a Jesuit affirms, that great prodigies were observed upon the dissolution of the marriage, no one could doubt of the injustice and perjury of Lewis XII. The declaration of this divorce 'was followed, or at least attended, with terrible prodigies, as earthquakes, storms, tempests, thunder, and, above all, with so great a darkness, that, in the day time, says this author (8), they were obliged to make use of torches, to be able to read the sentence of separation and nullity of the marriage (9). These are surprising events, of which the cotemporary writers ought not to have been silent; their general silence would have been a stranger prodigy than the rest. However, it is plain they have said nothing of them; for if they had, the knowledge of a thing of this nature would not have been so ill preserved, as that almost every one should look upon it as a new discovery in the Jesuit's book. We shall here mention a reflexion of a modern author: 'How is it possible, says he (10), that an event of this nature should be unknown to Brantome, or Mr Varillas, who have known or read so many secret memoirs? we may observe this small difference between the two, that the latter says expressly, queen Jane wrought miracles; whereas the first only says, she was reckoned a saint, and almost a worker of miracles. In matters of this kind, the farther we are removed from the fountain-head, the more we know.' Note, that 'the people of Paris murmured openly, at the king's divorcing the daughter of Lewis XI, and that there were scrupulous doctors, who blamed him in the pulpits (11)'. Judge then whether the prodigies would have passed in silence. It might be said that since Brantome's death, several miracles were wrought at the queen's tomb (12), and therefore Mr Varillas might be more positive than he. Be it how it will, the sentence that declares the marriage null, being pronounced the twenty second of December, 1498 (13), the king married Anne of Brittany the eighth (14) of January following.

[C] His reign was remarkable for great events. . . unfortunate.] Among Lewis the twelfth's greatest misfortunes, must be reckoned the loss of the kingdom of Naples, and that of the Milanese. He was the dupe of the king of Arragon, as to the first of these losses; but it could not be wholly attributed to the frauds of the court of Spain. The French were beaten in several engagements, been seen for some ages. The republic of Venice being grown very powerful, and the haughtiness great power is attended with, having appeared too much in her conduct, several states confederated to bring her to reason [D]. Lewis XII, who came into this league, had almost the sole glory of humbling this State [E], which was grown formidable and odious to all its neighbours. After so noble a success, a league was formed against this monarch, by the intrigues of a Pope (b), who was not only a great warrior, but also a refined Politician. Lewis so confounded this confederacy, that if the duke de Nemours had not been killed in the battle of Ravenna, this haughty and warlike engagements, so that it may be said the court of France suffered itself to be wretchedly imposed upon by that of Spain, and that the French soldiers suffered themselves to be beaten by the Spanish soldiers. The bad conduct of Lewis the twelfth's generals, the manifest cause of these disgraces, is no ground of comfort or apology, but rather another mortification for this prince, as shewing that he made an ill choice of those he employed. The other loss, to wit, that of the Milanese, plainly manifested the same defect: he gave the government of it to a man very much

[state.] 'The Venetians saw him beyond the Alps, with forty thousand men, beginning the war with them, and the Pope at the same time thundering against them his excommunications, which make great impression upon people, when seconded by the terror of arms. The king, having passed the river Adda, pursued their army so closely, as to fight it the fourteenth day of May, and gained that memorable battle of Giera-d'Adda, near the village of Aignadel, four miles from Caravaz. Their infantry were all cut to pieces, and their general, Alviana, having lost an eye, was taken prisoner. In a fortnight's time, the king, almost without striking a stroke, reduced all the places they kept from him. He might also have taken Vicenza, Padua, Verona, Trevis, and all the places that belonged to the empire, or the house of Austria, if his justice had not exceeded his ambition. He sent back the deputies of all these towns, who brought him the keys, to the emperor, who received them under his obedience, and put garrisons in them. The Pope had sent an army of ten or twelve thousand men, into Romagna (26). King Ferdinand had only a small naval force in the gulph, and hoped to make his advantage, as he did, of the labour, and at the expence of the French. Now the loss of the single battle of Aignadel, put the state of Venice into such a consternation, that despairing to keep any thing on the Terra Firma, they resolved to shut themselves up in the islands of their gulph, and in this despair commanded all the governors of the places that had belonged to the Pope, or Ferdinand, to open their gates to them, and recalled their magistrates from Verona, Padua, Vicenza, and other places, to which the emperor had pretensions. Thus you see how these three potentates, by the valour of the French, rather than by their own forces, recovered all that had been taken from them: and how the ambition of the Venetians, by keeping no bounds, saw those of their dominions in a small time reduced to the very brink of their canal (27). You will tell me, it is a French Historian that says this, who may be suspected to flatter Lewis, in attributing to him all the effects of the league of Cambray. Let us therefore cite Paul Jovius, who acknowledges that the emperor had sent little more than envoys, when the French army had already confined all the Venetian forces within their canals. This Historian, to excuse the Pope for abandoning the league, and re-uniting with the Venetians, represents his action as the only means of preserving Italy. He does not say, that there was any thing to be apprehended from the emperor, or the king of Spain, but only speaks of Lewis XII. His expressions are very strong. 'In præaltis animi recessibus graves vires causæ pontificem cunctis sensibus peracrem, strenuum, indomitum, vehementer excitabant, ut falluti Italiæ maturè prospiceret, diligentissimeque caveret, ne deletis Venetis, impotenti demum barbaro foret serviendum. Namque Ludovicus ubi uno secundo prælio Venetas opes contrivit, ac ademptis tot urbibus continentis, gentem adverso rerum successu contreritam intra paludes, ipsaque Venetias circumflui maris beneficio permunitas compulsi, cunctis formidandis evaserat: præsertim quum ad id bellum Maximilianus Cæsar nihil ferè præter legatos & Augusti nomen attulisset. Noverat Julius Galli regis ingenium proferendi imperit maximè avidum: noverat inexhaustas Gallorum opes: videbat florentissimum Mediolanensium imperium exactis Sfortianis Galliæ attributum; Ligures verò suos, armis planè domitos, ac arce cervicibus imposita in servitum redactos. Porro Venetos, quorum toto orbe terrarum paulò antè summa & inveterata fuisset auctoritas, unius horæ momento, copiis, imperio, ac dignitate penitus esse spoliatos. Quibus rebus adductus (uti pium æquissimumque & verè Italum pontificem

Pope had been forced to seek a sanctuary out of Rome [F]. France would even have caused him to be deposed, notwithstanding the death of the duke de Nemours, if almost all Europe had not conspired against her. Never was seen against a single kingdom, such a multitude of enemies [G]; so that it must be confessed, France saw itself reduced to great extremities (c). But besides that it was very glorious for Lewis XII, to have been so much the terror of his neighbours, as that they should believe it impossible, without an unanimous opposition, to stop his career; he had also the glory of dissolving this formidable league by his negotiations [H]. The peace he made with the English,

'pontificem decebat Venetos, ne se tantis fluctibus obrutos, planè demersos, ac penitus extinctos vellet, suppliciter deprecantes, sublevandos censuit (28). Some important reasons induced the Pope, an active, stout, and resolute man, to provide betimes for the safety of Italy, and use his utmost diligence, lest when the Venetians were ruined, Italy should be subjected to a fierce barbarian. For Lewis having in a battle overthrown the forces of the Venetians, and taken many towns on the continent, they being affrighted by their misfortunes, had resolved to retire to the islands of their gulph; so formidable was this prince become to every body: especially seeing that the emperor Maximilian, had contributed nothing to this war, but ambassadors and the Imperial name. Julius knew how desirous the French king was to extend his dominions, he knew the inexhaustible riches of France, he saw that the flourishing state of Milan, by the expulsion of the Sforza's, was fallen into the hands of the French; that the Genoese had been subdued, and were bridled by some fortresses; moreover, that the Venetians, who some time before had a vast power all over the world, had, in one hour's time, been stripped of their troops, dominions, and authority. By which things being moved (as became a most equitable and truly Italian Pontiff) he thought fit to assist the Venetians, who humbly intreated him not to suffer them, after having endured so many calamities, to be utterly ruined.

[F] If the duke of Nemours had not been killed . . . the Pope would have been forced to seek a sanctuary out of Rome. Even before Gaston de Foix (29), that thunderbolt of war, who probably would have excelled the two Scipio's, if he had lived as long as they; before, I say, he had gotten the victory of Ravenna, Julius II was upon the point of leaving Rome, that he might not fall into the hands of the French; and he had abandoned it, if Lewis XII had not suffered himself to be enchanted by the charms of superstition. This we learn from Mezeraï. In this conformation, seeing no security for him in Rome, if the victorious army of the king advanced, he had thoughts of proposing an accommodation, but when he found that the king, tired with troublesome scruples of his wife, had given orders to Trivulzio, to make an attempt upon the lands of the church, he showed himself more intractable and implacable than ever (30). The victory of Ravenna cast Rome into a like conformation, though the commander, who was most to be feared, had lost his life in the battle. And the Pope was intreated to embark as soon as he could, and betake himself to flight (31). The charms of the same superstition, gave him new confidence once more, and delivered him. The astonishment was so great in Rome, that the cardinals in a body came and desired the Pope to make peace with the king. Ferdinand and the Venetians having given him some courage, he had recourse to his ordinary artifices, which were to amuse the king, by propositions of accommodation, and to employ the queen, who, by motives of conscience, caresses, intrigues, and importunities, frequently disarmed him, and cooled his courage (32). Who would not pity the fate of Lewis XII, who had so dangerous a domestic enemy, in the person that was most dear to him? this is a strong confirmation of what I have said above (33), concerning the scruples of Lewis VII. Nothing is so capable of stopping an arm ready to lay an enemy under foot, or reaching to gather the fruits of an important victory, as the artifices or bigotry of a confessor. It is said indeed, that Lewis XII once imposed silence on his wife, who continually importuned him; What, Madam, said he, do you think that you are wiser than so many famous universities, who have approved the council of Pisa? do not your confessors tell you, that women are to be silent in the church (34)? but what could it signify to say this once? a woman so tenderly beloved by her husband, as Anne of Bretagne was, is not discouraged at three or four refusals. She still returns to the charge, till her demands are granted. These are birds of the bed, or the night, whose warbling is much to be feared, it persuades sooner or later. The historian whom I have cited, observes, that some monks, who governed this queen's conscience, so filled her soul with scruples, that she never ceased to importune her husband (35). Had Juvenal known such things, he would have bid people beware more of the superstitions, than of the pedantry of a wife.

Non habeat matrona tibi quæ juncta recumbit,
Dicendi genus; aut curtum sermone rotato

Torqueat enthymema, nec historias sciat omnes (36).

O what a midnight curse has he, whose side
Is pester'd with a mood and figure-bride!
Let mine, ye gods! (if such must be my fate)
No logic learn, nor history translate.

The queen we speak of, so obstinately maintained her point, that her husband was forced to grant her all she desired, that is, to submit meekly to the court of Rome. Here is another passage of Mezeraï (37). The spirit of the king bore up against all these adversities, but he had one domestic trouble, which was greater than what all his enemies gave him. This was his own wife, who touched with scruples common to her sex, could not suffer him to be at variance with the Pope, or to support a council against him. As she continually teased him upon these two points, he was frequently forced for peace sake, to stop the progress of his arms, when his affairs went best, and he was upon the point of bringing Julius to reason. At last, being totally vanquished by her importunities, and by the remonstrances of his subjects, whom she excited on all sides, he renounced his council of Pisa, and adhered to that of Lateran, by his proxies, who caused his mandate to be read the eighth session, the fourteenth of December, the Pope presiding in it (38).

[G] Never was seen against a single kingdom, such a multitude of enemies. Lewis had at the same time a war to maintain, against the Pope, the republic of Venice, Spain, and England; or against the Pope, England, the emperor, and the Swiss; and for an over-charge, he was to support a miserable dethroned king (39), who brought him no other assistance but the justice of his cause, which signified nothing: this is a common case enough.

[H] . . . he had the glory of dissolving this formidable league by his negotiations. (40) France was then in greater danger than it had been of a long time before. For, on one hand, the Swiss, extremely flushed with the victory of Novara, entered it by the dutchy of Burgundy, and he (41) with the English, attacked it on the side of Picardy. The Swissers besieged Dijon with twenty five thousand men, to which the emperor had joined the nobility of Franche-Comté, and some German cavalry, commanded by Ulric duke of Wirtemberg. La Tremouille having defended it six weeks, thought it more advisable to divert the course of this torrent, which after the taking of the place would have overflowed all to the gates of Paris, than render it more violent by opposition. He entered into a negotiation with them, and managed it so well, as to send them back into their own countries, undertaking that the king should pay six hundred thousand crowns, and renounce the council of Pisa, and the duchy of Milan. He had no express orders to grant them

English was a decisive stroke. It is true, that by accident it became fatal to him, having engaged him in a marriage, which did him more prejudice, than an army of an hundred thousand men could have done: for this prince having married Henry the eighth's sister, a very lovely princess, gave himself up too much to the pleasures of matrimony [I]. He did not proportion his conjugal benevolence, either to his own strength or age, but to the youth of his wife. Having only daughters, he earnestly desired that she might give him a successor. He quickly wore out, in that exercise, his weak constitution. He consummated the marriage the tenth of October, 1514 (d), and died of a looseness the first of January 1515 (e), in the fifty third year of his age (f), without being able, by so many efforts so prejudicial to his life, to get the queen with child. This was very happy for France; for if the queen had brought him a son, instead of Francis I. they would have had an infant-king, who would have been a weakly prince all his life [K]. Lewis XII was so inclined to ease his subjects, that he deserved the surname of Father of the People, an eulogy a thousand times more glorious than that of Great, August, Magnificent, Hardy, &c. He bore satires against his own person with patience, but not against the queen [L]. He passionately loved this princess, and had such

‘them these conditions; but he thought he ought to do it to save France, and gave them six hostages, two lords, and four citizens (42). . . . At the same time, towards the middle of July, the emperor and the king of England had besieged Terouenne with above 50000 men. The French army successfully enough, threw a convoy of provision and ammunition into the ditches; but upon their return, not being sufficiently upon their guard, they were charged and routed. The battle was fought the eighteenth of August, near Guinegatte. It was called the battle of the spurs; because, on that occasion, the French made more use of their spurs than of their swords.’ Terouenne capitulated fifteen days after (43). Tourmay quickly surrendered. The peace therefore came very seasonably: it was concluded at London the second of August 1514 (44).

[I] He gave himself up too much to the pleasures of matrimony. Guicciardin and Paul Jovius make this observation. ‘Coelib Ludovico, says the latter (45), supra solenne pacis ac amicitiae foedus, Maria Henrici regis soror eximie venustatis virgo despondetur. Qua in Galliam perducta, Ludovicus incredibili sumptu & mira adorum varietate nuptias celebravit. Sed dum ætatis & valetudinis quæ ei tum erat tenuissima, pendè oblitus, intemperantius (ut ferunt) procreandis liberis operam daret, concepta edaci febricula non multis post dies interiit. — The peace being made, Lewis who was a widower married Mary, sister to Henry, a young princess of an exquisite beauty; as soon as she arrived in France, Lewis celebrated his nuptials with incredible expence, and an admirable variety of entertainments. But not considering his age, and his constitution, which was then but weak, he indulged too much, as they say, his desire of begetting children; and falling sick of a fever, died a few days after.’ These are Guicciardin’s words: ‘Il re di Franchia, mentre che dando cupidamente opera alla bellezza eccellente & alla età della nuova moglie, giovane di diciotto anni, non si ricorda dell’età sua, e debilità della complessione, oppresso da febbre, e sopravvenendogli accidenti di flusso, partì quasi repentinamente della vita presente, havendo fatto memorabile il primo giorno dell’ Anno MDXV con la sua morte (46). — While the king of France was woefully taken up, with the charms and youth of the new queen, who was but eighteen years old, without regarding his age, or his weak constitution, he fell sick of a fever, attended by a flux; which very soon put an end to his life, and rendered memorable, the first day of the year 1515 by his death.’ Mezerai agrees with these two Italians. ‘Many believed, says he (47), that his too much caressing the young queen, was the cause of his death.’ Mr Varillas observes, ‘that the Physicians and courtiers, who saw him marry again, unanimously foretold, that he would not long survive this second marriage (48).’

[K] If the queen had brought him a son . . . they would have had an infant-king, who would have been a weakly prince all his life. We do not lay down this as certain, but only as probable, grounding on the reason assigned by good authors, of the infirmities of Charles VIII. ‘There is no reason to doubt, but Charles VIII was of as weak a constitution, as we have said, since Comines assures us*,

‘that this prince was always infirm in body and mind, and Gaguin † has gone farther than he, in saying, teneris atque imbecillibus membris adeo Carolus fuit, ut sedulo duci illum & gestari molliter priusquam solide incedere oportuerit. — Charles was of so weak and crazy a constitution, that they were obliged to lead or carry him, with a particular care, before he was able to walk steadily. Which we may reasonably believe, proceeded from the great age of his father, since, according to Dominicus Mennius’s observation,

[L] He patiently suffered the satires against his own person, but not against the queen. For this we will cite Brantome’s memoirs: ‘The king, says he (50), had that consideration for Anne of Brittany, his wife, that being one day told how the clerks of the Baloché du Palais, and the scholars had acted plays, into which they brought the king and his court, and all the grandes, he made no more of it, than to say that they must have their pastime, and that he allowed them to speak of him and his court, but however not disrespectfully; and above all, that they should not speak of the queen, his wife, in any manner whatever; otherwise he would have them all hanged.’ Thus you see what honour he paid her. I add to this passage these such regard for her, as was prejudicial to his kingdom. She filled him with scruples which had ill effects (g), and which strengthened Julius II, the most mortal enemy that ever France had in Italy: excepting this, she was a great queen, and of rare chastity [M]. They recite several witty sayings of Lewis XII (b). I shall only mention one of them [N]. I shall also give the description of his person [O], as we find it in a book these words of Costar. 'Our Lewis XII, who deserved the title of Father of his people, was not he brought upon the stage in his good city of Paris, and represented as an insatiable miser, who drank in a great gold goblet, without being able to quench his unreasonable thirst? He praised the invention, and made himself merry with it, and perhaps was glad that his love of riches, which had never given the least of his subjects occasion to weep, furnished them with a matter of laughter and agreeable diversion (51).' In general this monarch was of so sweet and debonaire a temper, that the rigour he exercised against the duke of Milan, was thought to be a divine judgment. 'He caused him to be removed from Lyons to Loches, where he was shut up for ten years together to his death, with a rigour so contrary to the mercy of this good prince, that it was believed to be a visible chastisement of God (52).' This miserable duke of Milan was shut up in an iron cage, where he had not so much as the comfort of being able to read or write. This one severe action made many conclude, that Lewis XII was of a cruel temper. 'Eum tamen pervicacis obstinatæque naturæ, & proinde sævum & inexorabilem plerique existimarunt, vel ob id præcipue, quod Lodovicum Sfortiam erepto omni scribendi, & quæ cuperet legendi solatio, ferrata in cavea omnium miserrimum mori cogeret (53).'

[M] His wife . . . was a great queen, and of rare chastity. You may see her elogium in Brantome (54), and in Hilarion de Coste (55); I only point out these authors; but I shall do more as to Peter de St Julian, I shall copy him concerning a very curious fact: 'Queen Anne, says he (56), duchess of Brittany, and Madam Anne of France, duchess of Bourbonnois, (the former twice queen of France, and the latter daughter to king Lewis XI, and regent in France, during the minority of king Charles VIII her brother) so virtuously banished immodesty, and planted honour in the hearts of the ladies and gentlewomen, citizens wives, and all other sorts of French women, that they who were known to have blemished their honour, were so disgraced and discarded, that the virtuous women would have thought they injured their reputation, should they suffer them in their company.' I do not think there is a surer way to make modesty flourish than this. If once it were the fashion for all women of good reputation to refuse the company of those who were suspected of gallantries, would any of our ladies venture to discredit themselves? It would be very easy, in my opinion, for queens to place their sex upon a good foot; they need only banish the ladies their preference, who were accused upon good grounds; in a word, they need only imitate Anne of Brittany. A modern author (57) points out the most fruitful source of the corruption of our age, when he says, that whereas heretofore a woman who was jealous of her reputation, would have scrupled the company of another, whose virtue was suspected, at present the same respect is shewn to those of an irregular conduct, as to those of a regular. It is discouraging virtue, to rob it of its temporal recompence (58), which is done by paying the same respects and civilities to a woman of a tattered reputation, as to another of virtue and honour: but, this is almost the pass that things are come to. 'In effect, what can we instance that is easier obtained by those who are continually on their guard, than by others who are under some disgrace? Do the former go more confidently than others to great feasts, or ceremonial meetings, or do they receive greater civilities at them? Is it any obstacle to a great marriage settlement, that one has been the discourse of a whole nation? Is one less praised in an epistle dedicatory, or a funeral sermon? By no means; and we may say with Solomon upon all this, that the same thing happens to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not (59). See the remark [C] of the article GONZAGUE (ELEONORA DE).

But to return to queen Anne of Brittany: her chastity was not unserviceable to the supporting her haughty humour. These are the words of one of her panegyrist (60). 'I am not ignorant that some have written, that this good king finding his princess was very fond of ruling, let her quietly govern her duchy of Brittany; and understanding that she was carrying on some intrigues against his inclination and service, he would not however resent it, saying, to those that pressed him to it: 'Some allowance is to be made to a chaste woman.' There are those who had rather their wives were given to gallantry, provided they were submissive, than have them chaste, and imperious with all (61). Lewis XII was not of this humour. See the tenth satire of Boileau, in the place, where he speaks of the price, at which a virtuous wife knows how to rate her modesty.

[N] I shall only mention one of his witty sayings. 'After the league of Cambray, the Venetians made a deputation to him to endeavour to bring him off. The senator, who was the chief of the embassy, made him a speech full of the wisdom of their republic; and Lewis, who would neither contradict, nor grant what he asked, answered pleasantly, I will play such a number of fools against your wife men, that all their wisdom shall not be able to resist them; for our fools are a sort of people that strike on all sides, without minding where, or hearkening to any reason for it (62).' He might well say that he would oppose fools to the Venetians: for all that the French did in Italy under Charles VIII, and Lewis XII, was an effect of that martial fury, which foreigners themselves own to be the temper of the French soldiers at the first onset. That ardor and briskness did produce very good successes; but as their generals were not men of judgment, and very little conduct was then observed in the affairs of France, their conquests were as soon lost as gained. There was not much prudence at that time, either in the head or members of the council. This it was that saved Italy, as has been lately acknowledged by a famous professor of Friesland. 'Si Carolus VIII & Gallum temporis ita fuissent animati, sicut est Ludovicus XIV & ejus consilium, cujus instituta rationesque fere sunt mathematicæ, actum fuisset de Italia, cujus nulla amplius erat vis militaris. Sed ut Galli hanc expeditionem impetu magis quam consilio, facti non prudentiæ docti susceperant & executi erant, ita mirum non est, idem fatum, deficiente constantia, illos destituisse (63). — If Charles VIII and the French at that time, had been as active as Lewis XIV, and his council, whose designs and measures are almost mathematical; Italy had been lost, it having no longer any military forces: but as the French had undertaken the expedition out of impetuosity, rather than deliberation, and left the conduct of it to fate, rather than prudence, it is no wonder if the same fate, when they had no steadiness, did forsake them.'

[O] I shall also give the description of his person. Naudé has inserted it in his additions to the history of Lewis XI (64), and observes, that he found it in a very scarce book, which was printed 120 years ago (65). We shall see the title of it in the margin (66). 'Caput non magnum, acutum, frons angusta, oculi grossi eminentes, facies macra, capilli curti nares amplæ & elevatæ, labra grossa, & mentum acutum, collum curtum & subtile, humeri angusti, manus & brachia subtilia & longa, epiglottis eminentes, furcula pectoris stricta, pectus angustum, statura potius curva quam erecta, corpus colericum, & motus oculorum velox & sursum revolventes sc, & crura subtilia. — His head was little and long, his forehead narrow, his eyes large and prominent, his face lean, his hair short, his nostrils large and elevated, his lips were thick, his chin was sharp, his neck short and small, his shoulders were narrow, with long and small arms and LEWIS XIII, king of France, son and successor to Henry the Great, was born at Fontainebleau, the seventeenth of September, 1601, and began his reign the fourteenth of May, 1610. If the ten first years of his reign were disturbed by several factions, which sometimes degenerated into Civil-wars [A], the twenty three others were no less agitated by religious or foreign wars: so that what Job says in general, of all men, is applicable in a more particular manner to this prince (a). His reign, which was so much disturbed by wars, was extremely glorious; nor had France for a long time gained so many signal victories. And yet in the midst of all these triumphs and glories, this monarch was very unhappy [B]: for his own family occasioned him perpetual vexations.

(a) See Job, chap. vii, ver. 1.

[A] His reign . . . was disturbed by various factions which sometimes degenerated into Civil-wars. When a man examines the history of Lewis the thirteenth's reign, from the beginning to the end, he is a thousand times tempted to ask himself these questions: But is it true, that I am reading the transactions in France? Have I not before me a book, wherein the writer, from a romantic fancy, has thought fit to characterize a mutinous people, a nobility inclined to rebellion, and to publish these characters under the name of France, to conceal that of some other nation? A man is the more tempted to ask these questions, who suffers himself to be prejudiced, either by the raileries of strangers, who represent the French as the idolaters of monarchy and of their monarchs, or by the eulogies which several French authors bestow upon their own nation, as if naturally dutiful to their kings, with an unparalleled zeal and loyalty. Nothing is saller than these raileries of foreigners, and encomiums of French pens. The author of Mr de Louvois's Political Testament, knew the genius of the nation much better; he lays it down, that the only and true way for France to avoid Civil-wars, is the absolute power of the sovereign vigorously supported, and armed with all the necessary force to make it feared. 'As for turbulent and rebellious people, says he (1), it is certain

'there have been as many seen in France, in the preceding reigns, and in the beginning of your majesty's, as in any other country.' He establishes the same maxim, when he makes this observation concerning the English (2): 'It is well known what disposition they are of at bottom, they are as inconstant and unruly as other nations; but when all is said, they are not more so: it is the occasions and the form of their government, the impunity and the means that are left in their hands, which make them turbulent. We should see, in other states, subjects who are the most submissive, grow mutinous and factious, if the prudence, the authority, and vigour of their sovereigns, did not keep them under, and cut off all opportunities.' Consider how he reasons upon the difference there is in France, betwixt this and the preceding reigns. 'What is become at present of those multitudes of turbulent and seditious spirits? Have they not all the pretences they ever had? Do not the wars and other expences, with which your majesty is obliged to maintain the lustre of your glory, oblige you to impose upon the people more excessive taxes, than ever were raised by Lewis XI. Have not the Protestants been more provoked than under Charles IX, and Lewis XIII? Is not the nobility heavier laden than ever? Does not the clergy contribute to the necessities of the state more than ever they have done, either in this age or in all ages passed? And has not your majesty as many controversies with the see of Rome as any of your predecessors ever had? and yet all is quiet and submissive; there is no revolt or treason heard of. War and confusions are kept off at a distance; whereas heretofore they were at home and in our bowels. . . . (3). Whence proceeds this difference? . . . Whence comes this change? From the difference wherewith your majesty manages the royal authority; from your prudence to make a right use of it, from your skill in riding that brute beast the people, which being unbridled, would run at random every way, whither it's instinct drove it; but which is infensibly accustomed to be governed by bit and bridle, and moves surer where it feels an even and strait rein.

(3) Ibid. pag. 338, 339.

'It is absolute power that is the true and only curb to check the intemperate heat of a blind and capricious multitude (4).' He says in another place (5), 'that the limited authority of a king, and of republics, has more inconveniences, and is subject to more ill consequences to the state and people than arbitrary power. Factions, seditions, tumults, civil-wars, frequently do more mischief in one year, than all the excesses of an absolute monarch can cause in a whole life.' He may be mistaken with respect to some countries; but there is no probability that he is mistaken as to his own nation, which is of such a genius, that the worst state that can befall it, is to live under an effeminate and weak government; in that case every gentleman is the tyrant of his village; every great lord is the tyrant of his lordship, and nothing but seditions and insurrections are to be heard of (6). Read the History of France, and especially observe the minorities, and you will be convinced of what I have been saying; you will find that the character of this nation is the very same that Mr de la Bruyere gives of children. See the margin (7).

[B] In the midst of so much . . . glory, this monarch was very unhappy.] A modern author, designing to shew the vanity of human prosperities, makes use of two great examples; he runs over the life of Augustus, and then proceeds in this manner (8): 'Let us come to the second instance, and behold the most glorious potentate of this age, with such a series of the blessings of heaven, as all the earth has reason to be astonished at. One may easily judge that I mean Lewis XIII, whose prosperities doubtless will be admired by those who come after us, if they judge of them by the lustre of his heroic actions, by the number of his trophies, by the extent of his conquests, and by the greatness of his triumphs. In effect, whether you consider the monsters he has subdued at home, or cast your eyes on the advantages he has every where reaped abroad, you will be forced to confess, that France never had a more fortunate king than he. There is not a frontier but he has far advanced into his enemies country. France has subdued the pride of those who envied her, and confounded their designs. And if you observe what has passed on the ocean, as well as the Mediterranean, you will conclude, that all the elements fought for us, under the command of this prince. Now the instances of his good fortune were no less conspicuous in his domestic affairs; and here doubtless he had great advantages above Augustus on that account. God gave him for a companion of his bed, a princess, whose singular goodness, together with many other extraordinary and truly heroic virtues, might have made her beloved, though she had not been in other respects one of the most perfect and most agreeable persons of her time. He saw himself the father of two sons, most worthy of his affection; as being so beautiful and well formed by nature, that he could not wish them more accomplished; besides the season in which he had them, ought to have rendered them still more dear to him. He was respected by all the world; and on what side soever he turned himself in his Louvre, he saw nothing but testimonies of love and reverence. Could any thing then be wanting to his felicity, to make it more entire, if we judge by appearances? And yet with all this, what should we say, if by his own confession, he never spent one day without some mortification, nor ever tasted in his life a joy that was vexations. He could not confide either in his mother, wife, or brother [C]; three persons who suffered themselves to be governed by turbulent, factious, and ill-designing men. His very sisters were against him, especially she whom he had married to the king of England: for she received with open arms all the malecontents, and cherished her was not dashed with the bitterness of discontent? I shall here take care, not to commit the fault of him, whom the Athenians treated so ill for having obliged them to deplore a second time the misfortunes of their allies, by representing them on the stage. And indeed, my imprudence would be greater than his, if I should at present enlarge on so ungrateful a subject, as would be that of the sorrows, and continual inquietudes of this monarch. But however, since his last words at the point of death, which the Catholics call sacred, and which are reckoned oracles in mouths less sincere than his, have assured us, that his satisfactions were never pure, nor his pleasures exempt from sadness and affliction, may we not well conclude, that all his happiness, as well as that of Augustus, had nothing real in it, and was only of the nature of those things, which subsist no where but in opinion? I make no reflexions on this long passage, though it were easy perhaps to find in it some subject of criticism; I shall content myself with observing, that we here see the most convincing proof imaginable of my text. Lewis XIII confesses he was unhappy; no body could know this so well as himself, and he had no reason to dissemble, in the condition he was in. See in the remark [E], my citation from Mr le Laboureur.

La Mothe le Vayer says one thing, which obliges me to give a short supplement. 'Augustus, says he (9), had the mortification to leave for his heir to the greatest part of his estate, and successor to the empire, the son of his mortal enemy' This is false (10); but it is very true, that Lewis XIII, left the regency of his kingdom to a person he heartily hated, and consequently his mortification was greater than that of Augustus. It is easily guessed why this author did not carry on the parallel between the misfortunes of the Roman emperor, and those of the king of France on this head. The following remark will acquaint us with the little affection Lewis XIII had for his wife, whom yet he declared regent.

[C] He could not confide either in his mother, his wife, or his brother.] Here is matter enough for dividing this remark into three parts.

I. Lewis XIII, for the good of his kingdom, that is, to deprive factious spirits, of the means of forming dangerous cabals, was forced to give order for his mother to depart France; nor did he come to these extremities, till after he had gone thro' a long course of disturbances, in which the royal authority was very ill used. It was necessary more than once to subdue by force of arms, the partisans of Mary de Medicis.

II. As to his wife, I refer you to the memoirs of the duke de la Rochefoucauld. 'I have been assured by Mr Chavigny himself, says this duke (11), that waiting upon the king, from the queen, to beg pardon for whatever she had done; and even for what had displeased him in her conduct, beseeching him particularly not to believe, that she had any hand in the affair of Chalais, or had ever listened to any propositions of marrying Monsieur, after Chalais should have made away with the king; his majesty answered Monsieur de Chavigny, without any emotion, in the condition I am in, I must pardon her, but I must not believe her.' Note, that the king was at the point of death when he spoke these words. It is a time, in which men generally speak what they think, especially in matters where a lie is of no use to them. We must conclude then, he died fully persuaded, that his wife was an accomplice in a most horrid conspiracy, in which it was resolved to take him off, and to marry her to the duke of Orleans his successor. Now as the affair of Chalais happened in the year 1626, judge whether this prince lived a few years in distrusts, with respect to this queen, and in the anguish of a melancholy resentment. Nor ought it any longer to be thought strange, that she continued barren for so many years. Could the most incontinent husbands resolve to approach their wives, if they believed them guilty of so black a treason? It would require a great deal of time for a prince to digest this thought: his confessor must return again and again to the charge (12), even though a long course of years should have allayed the wound. Whether Lewis XIII was in the right or no, it was the same thing. His heart equally suffered. The duke de la Rochefoucauld says (13), that the king, when he gave this answer to Mr de Chavigny, believed, that the queen was still in a correspondence with the Spaniards, by means of Madam de Chevreuse, who was then at Brussels. He observes also, that they were obliged to play an hundred engines, in order to procure the regency for the queen. She believed the king very far from such a thought, considering the little inclination he had ever shewn for her (14). . . . She and Monsieur, who had had but too many proofs of the king's aversion, and who de la Rochef. almost equally suspected, that he designed to exclude them from the management of affairs, fought all possible ways to obtain it (15). She never would have obtained the regency, if the king must have left her in full authority; but in hopes of leaving her only the shadow of it, he passed the declaration (16). 'He could not consent to declare her regent, nor could he resolve to divide the authority betwixt her and his brother. The correspondence of which he suspected her, and the pardon he had lately granted Monsieur for the treaty of Spain, held him under an irresolution, which perhaps he could not have overcome, if the conditions in the declaration which cardinal Mazarine and Monsieur de Chavigny proposed, had not furnished him with the expedient, he sought to lessen the power of the queen, and to make her in some measure dependant upon the council he designed to establish (17).'

III. As to his brother, all the world knows his falls and relapses; he was engaged in all sorts of conspiracies, whole provinces made insurrections in his favour; he corresponded with Spain. In a word, since the king believed him an accomplice in the affair of Chalais, he could not chuse but look upon him with an evil eye: this object brought to his remembrance, that a design had once been formed to take away his life, and marry his widow to the duke of Orleans, who was to have succeeded him. I do not know whether jealousy, mixed with all the other discontents of Lewis XIII, but it is positively said, that the queen was highly civil to the duke of Orleans. Let us hear what some memoirs, published in 1685, inform the world (18). 'Monsieur made his court daily to the queens, who resided at Paris during the siege of Rochel, carrying himself with a great deal of freedom, even to the reigning queen with whom he had always been in a good understanding, and never observed much ceremony. When he came into France, she called him, Monsieur, both speaking to him, and of him, and always continued that stile, with which some found fault, for in writing to him, she only called him her brother. During the short journey that the king made to Paris, Monsieur having met the queen one time as she was coming from a nine days devotion to obtain children, told her, by way of raillery, Madam, you have been soliciting your judges against me, I consent you should carry your cause, if the king has interest enough.' As he is represented in these memoirs, he had some need of the advice that was given the duke of Valois (19). The same book acquaints us, that the king was at least as much displeased at his brother's having children, as at the barrenness of the queen. Here what alarms were given him upon the marriage of the duke of Orleans with the heiress of Montpensier. 'Tronfon, secretary of the cabinet, and some other particular servants of the king, who only considered the interest of his royal person, and not that of the state, having represented to the king of what dangerous consequence it was to him to marry Monsieur his brother to a rich heiress, allied as she was to the house of Guise, which had heretofore aspired to the crown, and with so large a revenue as was settled upon him; by which means, his majesty, having no issue, would only be considered as a languishing king, and the court, which is wholly conducted by her husband's inclination for the interests of Spain. Lewis XIII, having not a head strong enough to reign by himself, and suffering himself to be always led by favourites, furnished but too many pretences to restless spirits; and if in the necessity he found himself of depending on his ministers, he had not at last fallen into the hands of the Great Cardinal Richelieu, he had run the risk at least of his crown [D]; but this able minister being obliged by his own interest to support the authority of his master, applied himself with so much vigilance to dissipate the conspiracies, that he soon made them all vanish into smoke. Some great men were beheaded; but this severity was absolutely necessary at that time [E]. Clemency, so useful on many other occasions, had been very interest, would abandon him, to go over to Monsieur, as a vigorous prince, who quickly promised issue, upon which every one would found his hopes, and form designs, which must needs be to the prejudice of his royal person. His majesty was hereby so affected with jealousy, that father Souffran, his confessor, coming to wait on him one morning in his closet, his majesty just rising out of his bed, threw himself on his neck all in tears, telling him, that he knew, to his cost, that the queen his mother would remember all her life, what passed at the death of marshal d'Ancre, and that the advantages she procured to Monsieur, permitted him not to doubt, but that she loved him much more than himself. The Father being much surprized at this discourse, endeavoured gently to remove this diffidence in the king's mind, and assured him to the contrary, &c. (20). He was pacified, and the marriage was concluded (21); from which quickly proceeded a daughter: all this vexed the king, and it was a happiness to him, that his sister-in-law died a little after her lying-in: however, he appeared to be much afflicted by it. See the margin (22). He was afterwards very far from consenting to a second marriage of his brother (23).

(20) Though the king found his account in that loss, and that he was probably less sorry by reason of the jealousy he had entertained of that marriage, which the pregnancy of madam had afterwards much increased, being free from all his fears, his majesty nevertheless expressed a great concern, for he had always had a particular esteem for the virtue of that prince, but he was not sorry that she had only left a daughter. (21) If he had not fell into the hands of Richelieu, he had run the risk at least of his crown.] They who beset the two queens and monsieur, had no expectations under the ministry of cardinal de Richelieu, but hoped for every thing, if his royal highness should ascend the throne. There were two ways of placing the crown upon his head; one by making away with the king, and the other by treating him like Don Alphonso, king of Portugal. The second could not easily be executed, in a nation so jealous of its fundamental laws (24), and under so vigilant and able a minister as cardinal de Richelieu. Therefore the other expedient was agreed on, if it be true, that Chalais had the design above-mentioned (25), in the passage of the duke de la Rochefoucauld. It was impossible to convince a great many people, but there was a most horrible mystery of iniquity in agitation, to give at once the crown and the queen to the duke of Orleans. I know not what to think of it. See the Life of cardinal Richelieu, printed at Amsterdam, in 1694, Tom. I. pag. 304.

[E] He was forced to behead some great men; but this severity was necessary at that time.] Of all those that were beheaded for rebellion in the reign of Lewis XIII, none was so much lamented as the duke of Montmorenci (26). And truly he was a lord of great merit, adored in Languedoc, his government, and admired by all France, as appeared by the zeal with which they solicited his pardon. But this was the very thing, which, in good politics, ought to induce the king, not to pardon his treason. It was dangerous to let a person live who was so generally admired, and who might so easily draw all Languedoc into a second rebellion. Had he done it at the time that the Spaniards besieged Leucate (27), what would have become of France? do not tell me that gratitude would have fixed him to this prince's service, or the weakness he had discovered in the duke of Orleans have cured his fondness of revolting in favour of him. These are poor reasons. The duke of Montmorenci, received into favour, would never have been able to bear the power of the cardinal, and would have taken his measures a second time to destroy him. He would have taken advantage of the testimonies, the grandees and provinces had given him of their extraordinary esteem, during his imprisonment, &c. There was a necessity of using great severities, under a reign in which the French nobility were so familiarized to this sort of conspiracies, insurrections, and correspondencies with Spain, that one would think that the idea of infamy, or even of a fault, did not enter into this sort of crimes. It would be in effect turning a monarchical government into anarchy, to let such abuses go unpunished. Mr le Laboureur relates a thing which is very curious; to wit, that the king consented to the duke of Montmorenci's death, only from a spirit of servitude. I will give the whole passage; because it serves to shew, that Lewis XIII, with a sceptre in his hand, and the crown on his head, was under greater constraints, and more unhappy, than if he had had irons on his feet. This reflexion ought eternally to renew the tears of France, upon the fate of Henry duke of Montmorenci, and Damville, admiral and marshal of France, only son to this constable, who fell rather by misfortune than inclination, into a small fault, and who was overwhelmed with all the rigour of the laws; though it had no ill consequences, and there was no danger of any ill effect from it: I say farther, though the king was to lose by it the ornament and glory of his court, the honour of his nobility, and delight of his kingdom, and what still ought to be more dear to a great prince, the most august and worthy subject of clemency that will ever be seen. I have it from the mouth of the late prince of Condé, that Lewis XIII, expressed to him his sorrow on his death bed, not with tears, but with sobs, and conjured him to believe, that violence had been done him in that unhappy journey to Toulouse, which he made against his will, and where against his resolution, he was overpowered by a multitude of pretences, or rather delusions of state, which disappeared after that fatal tragedy, and left him under a most stinging uneasiness, which he had ever since concealed in his bosom. Ah! my cousin, said he to him afterwards, this is not to reign, but rather to be the slave of tyranny, at least to feel all the pains of it in a lawful royalty, to hear only sinister reports, and to be always in distrust of those who are nearest to us, of our principal officers, and of those on whom we place our affections; and to submit and regulate our conduct, by the phantoms of politics, which are frequently only another's private interest (28).

There are, I question not, many truths in this discourse. I am persuaded that cardinal Richelieu, more than once, represented to the king, his master, the designs of his rebellious subjects, greatly heightened and exaggerated; for in the numerous conspiracies that were formed in this reign, there were many that designed only the ruin of the cardinal, and meant no harm either to the person or authority of the prince; and yet his eminence had the policy to insinuate (29), and even to persuade him, that they were contriving to take the crown from him, and give it to the duke of Orleans. Hence it was that this prince was brought to consent to the taking off so many heads. He afterwards found he had been imposed upon, and secretly lamented it. He was to be pitied; but it is very probable, that he was sensible he could not deliver himself from one slavery, without submitting to another yoke, still more inconvenient; and this was the reason that hindered his displacing the cardinal, though he really hated him. The removing of this minister would have delivered the king bound hand and foot, into the power of the duke of Orleans. They might perhaps have left him the title of king; they might have governed in his name; but all affairs would have been managed according to the caprice of this duke's favourites. It would have been a strange government. The two queens and their creatures, the duke of Orleans and his, would have perplexed and confounded every thing, and no great design could have been formed for the glory of the monarchy, and against the interests very pernicious in this. We must not believe those who dare affirm, that people were put to death, whose only fault consisted in their having had the misfortune to displease the prime minister [F]. They would perhaps speak more reasonably, and the charge would rests of Spain; and if any glorious events had happened, the king would have seen the duke, his brother, carry away all the honour of them; a cruel subject of jealousy, and a thousand times harder to bear, than the ascendant of the cardinal. We are not ignorant how often jealousy of authority, made Lewis XIII uneasy. He fell sick, when he was told, that the English had landed in the isle of Rhe; and could not go in person to the coast of Poitou. He was advised to send Monsieur thither as his lieutenant-general (30). Monsieur's first enterprise having not succeeded well, the king wrote to him 'a letter full of resentment, his camp as soon as possible (31). Here follows a still greater effect of the same jealousy. 'The king having declared the duke of Orleans general of the army in Italy †, at the solicitation of the queen, his mother, afterwards repented his having given him this command, from an apprehension, that his brother might reap a great deal of glory in Italy, which would eclipse his own. This thought ran in his head to such a degree, that it even broke his sleep. Coming to Chaliot †, where the cardinal was, he told him he could not suffer his brother to be generalissimo of the army in Italy, and that a way should be found to remove him from that post. The cardinal answered, that he knew but one way of getting this command out of the duke of Orleans's hand, which was, that the king should go himself into Italy; but if he took that resolution, it was necessary to depart in eight days at farthest. The king said he would do it, and immediately prepared for his expedition (32). A man must know but little of princes, to deny that the jealousy they conceive against their sons or brothers, and in general against their successors, is not a more afflictive evil, than the chagrin of depending too much on the first minister. See in Brantome (33), the furious jealousy of Charles IX, against his brother the duke of Anjou, general of the troops, that beat the Protestants at Jarnac, and at Montcontour. There is no doubt but it was a less evil for Lewis XIII to be governed by cardinal Richelieu, than it would have been to see his brother, his mother, or his wife, in too great credit at court. The creatures of these three persons were only capable of forming little court intrigues, which would have ruined the general affairs. So that the good of the kingdom required, that severity should be used against the heads of the rebels, who would put the government into hands which were too much in the interest of the Spaniards (34).

[F] We must not believe those who dare affirm, that people were put to death, whose only fault consisted in their misfortune to displease the prime minister. The author of the memoirs of Mr d'Artagnan affirms, that the marshal de Marillac, and several others, were judged and condemned by commissioners, though no other crime could be imputed to them, but their having presumed to displease the cardinal (35). He afterwards relates, what we have seen above (36), concerning the priest Grandier, and then adds, St Preuil's case exactly resembled that of this unfortunate priest; a thousand and a thousand witnesses were produced against him, both from the government of Dourlens, which he had enjoyed before that of Arras, and from several other places. Le Meunier was often confronted with him, but though all his crime, as well as Grandier's, consisted only in displeasing the higher powers, he nevertheless lost his head (37). Observe here three great falsehoods: for if we examine, without prejudice, all the parts of marshal de Marillac's trial, we shall easily see, that he was guilty of infinite extortions and depredations, and within the ordinance, which condemns those guilty of speculation, to the confiscation of body and goods (38). It is true, that interpreting this law in the most mild and favourable sense, by the confiscation of body, might be understood the loss of liberty, and not of life, but from the judges not taking it in the milder sense, but following the most severe interpretation, it does not follow, that the marshal was innocent, and that all his crime consisted in having rendered himself disagreeable to cardinal Richelieu. Many irregularities are alleged in his trial (39), and all to prove that the commissioners were bribed, and that the innocence of the accused was oppressed; but we must know also, that other authors affirm the trial was agreeable to the exactest forms of law (40). Consider well Mr du Chastelet's observations upon the life and condemnation of marshal de Marillac; it is an answer to a libel which the cardinal's enemies had published. We should be too rash, either to believe without examination what they maintained, or the narratives of his friends in favour of him; the satires on one side are as much to be suspected, as the flatteries on the other. Let us mistrust both, and determine nothing till after a thorough discussion of the facts; let us also distrust that natural bias we all have to presume in favour of those, who incur the disgrace of a too potent minister.

It is a fault too common in those who are not called to the helm, to endeavour to cross the steersman; and as if the confidence of the prince, and the favour of the people could not be united in the same subjects, we see not a man in place, or who has the least share in the conduct of affairs, whose person and actions are approved till after his death or disgrace. The various accidents of the marshal de Marillac's life, and the different affections towards him according to his fortune, furnish our age with a certain proof of this ancient maxim. All France found fault with the choice the king made of him, spoke publicly of his depredations, blamed his promotion to honours, said he wanted courage, and could observe no merit nor quality in him worthy so high an advancement. As soon as his majesty was resolved to punish him, and for weighty reasons withdrew his protection, his former accusers supported him against justice, affirmed he was innocent, worthy of his employments, and so well stored with valour and piety, that he deserved every thing except his fall (41). Thus Mr du Chastelet speaks, at the beginning of a book I have cited above. It is said that cardinal Richelieu understanding that the commissioners had passed the sentence of death upon him cried out: 'It must be owned that God grants an understanding heart to judges, which he does not give to other men, since they who have tried the marshal de Marillac, have discovered actions in him worthy of death; I did not believe there was enough against him to whip a page for (42). If I had heard the cardinal say this, I should believe he spoke it. Many people believe that he very well knew that in a conference, wherein it was debated what course should be taken with the cardinal, this marshal had given his vote for killing him; it is even said, that he offered his hand for such an exploit (43). Such a man as this would have been actually punishable, and would have appeared to especially to the cardinal.

As to what concerns St Preuil, the memoirs I have cited are much more unreasonable: he was a gentleman of Angoumois, who had raised himself by an extraordinary bravery; as nice on the point of honour, and the reputation of a good duellist and bold cavalier, as he was little conscientious in point of debauchery and extortion. It is confessed in Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs, that he had run away with a married woman. Who after this will venture to say, that his crime only consisted in having displeased the higher powers? Is not a rape punishable with death by the laws of the kingdom? Are not they who steal a woman, though with her own consent, reputed, in France, worthy of death? St Preuil, with much more reason, had incurred the same punishment, having carried off a woman whose husband was still alive. I pass over his extortions and violences, of which he was convicted, and which were so much the more odious as he commanded in a place but lately reduced under the French power, and which was to be reconciled to their new dominion, by a moderate administration.

would be severe enough, should they say, there were some beheaded, whose crimes had all gone unpunished, if they would have adhered to his interest. They who spake equitably, were content to complain in behalf of some of these unhappy persons, that the court had subjected them to the most severe interpretations of the law, and had not pardoned them. They who listened only to their passion, extended their complaints and revenge even to the judges themselves, which could not be just with regard to him; who presided in the trial of the duke of Montmorenci [G]. Notwithstanding the domestic conspiracies the cardinal had to struggle with, he omitted not applying himself usefully to foreign affairs. He procured the king, his master, the glory of humbling the house of Austria, which was the terror of all Europe. To induce him to make war with Spain, he removed the scruples of conscience which had restrained him before [H]; for as Lewis XIII hated the Protestants, he could not easily bring himself to disturb the house of Austria, which was then struggling with them. The cardinal turned him

The truth of this maxim of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, was never more manifest than in the reign of Lewis XIII. In causis majestatis hæc natura est, ut videantur vim pati etiam quibus probatur. It is usual on all trials for crimes against the state, that even they who are duly convicted, are thought to have been oppressed (44). Most people are so indolent as not to give themselves the trouble of examining who is in the right, or who is wrong, however they will be judging of things, and in order to do it the cheapest way, they take up with probability, and think it very likely that they who have the greatest power are the unjust side. Dion Chrysostome has made this observation: Οὐ γὰρ ἀποῦσιν ἐνίοι σκοπεῖν, ἀλλὰ τίνας ὄντες εἰς τὴν ἀδικίαντας, ἢ βιαζομένους ἐβέλυσιν ἐξετάζειν πολλὰκις, ἀλλ' ἐς εἰκὸς βιάζεσθαι τῷ δυνάσθαι πλέον. Quidam enim non considerant quæ faciunt, sed qui sint; neque injuriam facientes, neque violentiam passus volunt examinare plerumque, sed quibus verisimile sit injuriam fieri ab iis qui plus valent (45). A compassion for the miserable, and the envy men bear to men in power, are a source of deception. Τοῖς μὲν γὰρ δυσυχύσασιν ἐλαφύ, τοῖς δὲ κρατύνουσιν φθόνος παρορμητικὴ καὶ τὸ μὲν ἡττηθῆναι, τοῖς τοιαύτοις ἀδικεῖσθαι, τὸ δὲ νικῆσαι, ἀδικεῖν δοκεῖ. Quippe infelices misericordia, potentes invidia sequitur: ac vidus accepisse, victor attulisse injuriam videtur (46). But that which gives occasion to this, is the too frequent experience that they who are in authority, are apt to abuse it, to revenge themselves on their enemies by oppressing them with false accusations.

[G] . . . this could not be just with regard to him, who presided in the trial of the duke of Montmorenci.] It was Mr de Chateaufeuf keeper of the seals. He was in disgrace, when Lewis XIII died, and great endeavours were used to recal him after the prince's death; but cardinal Mazarin opposed it to the utmost, in which he was wonderfully assisted by Madam the princess, who upon an additional pride occasioned by the victory of Rocroy, thought every thing due to her, and preposterously published that all their family would retire from court, if the queen restored a man to the council, who had presided at the condemnation of the duke of Montmorenci her brother (47). Could any thing be more unjust than this princely's pretension? Did Mr de Chateaufeuf deserve to be exposed to the least resentment of the duke of Montmorenci's sister and relations? Could he possibly avoid presiding at this trial? Did not his place require him to accept of this commission from the king? And could he be of a different opinion from that of all the judges, who, notwithstanding the vehement desire they had to save the duke of Montmorenci's life, gave all their votes for the sentence of death. The prince of Condé, his brother-in-law, and the princely of Condé, his sister, had they been his judges, could not have given their opinion otherwise than Mr de Chateaufeuf did. Nothing is more evident, than that a governor of a province, who rebels against his king, and gives battle to the king's troops, and is taken prisoner in such a battle, deserves death. It was evidently true, that Mr de Montmorenci's case was this: the proofs were as clear as the day, besides his own confession. There remained therefore no shadow of uncertainty, either upon the question of right, or that of fact, and therefore there could be no difference in opinion; the princely therefore had no reason to complain of Mr de Chateaufeuf, and yet she expressed her resentment openly, as if it had been a reasonable thing; so true it is, that the great suffer themselves to be blinded by their haughty passions, so far as to glory in that which is really a vice, and a lamentable weakness.

[H] The cardinal Richelieu removed from the king those scruples of conscience which had restrained him before from attacking Spain.] Mr Silhon informs us of this: 'How just soever, says he (48), was the ground of this rupture (49), they had hesitated upon it, but for the violent instances of the Dutch, and the zealous offices of some friends they had near the king and cardinal Richelieu, the king was averse to it upon religious scruples, which were removed by an assembly of doctors, summoned upon this occasion.' This prince's dispositions in his alliances with Protestants will be better known, if we consult the Museum Italicum of two famous Benedictines. 'They had the sight of a letter of the late king Lewis XIII, in cardinal Francis Barberini's library. Pope Urban VIII, had complained to his majesty of his alliance with the Swedes, whose victorious arms at that time ravaged Germany. The king secretly answered the Pope with his own hand, and offered to break off his alliance with the Swedes, provided the Catholic king would cease to protect the duke of Orleans, who was then retired to Brussels, and would join his forces with those of France, to turn them against the Protestants of Germany and the French Huguenots. His holiness communicated the king's letter to the Spanish ambassador, who wrote about it to Madrid, and received no answer. Had it not been for this original letter the public would have been unacquainted with this curious piece of our history (50).' This passage is taken from Mr Cousin's journal. Add to this what we find in one of Mr Gallois's journals, which will inform us, that if Lewis XIII had followed his own inclination, he would have suffered the Protestant religion to be destroyed by the emperor in Germany, since before the ministry of cardinal Richelieu, he did great services to the Catholic cause in the empire. Here follow the words of Mr Gallois in the abstract he gives of the embassy of the duke of Angoulême, the count of Bethune and Chateaufeuf, sent by Lewis XIII into Germany, in 1620. 'The motive of this embassy was as glorious to France, as the success of it was advantageous to the house of Austria. Ferdinand II succeeding to the empire, saw himself dispossessed of the crown of Bohemia by the prince Palatine, and of that of Hungary by Bethlen Gabor. He saw at the same time the upper Austria revolted, and most of the Protestant princes in arms against him. The king might have peaceably waited the ruin of a prince, whose designs could not but be suspected to him; but because the Catholic religion might have suffered some diminution in Germany by the loss of this prince, he chose rather to support him in his fall, than to suffer religion to fall along with him. He offered him a powerful assistance, and at the same time to succour him with his counsels, and the authority of his name; he sent the duke of Angoulême, and Messieurs de Bethune and Chateaufeuf, ambassadors into Germany. Upon their arrival they made the treaty of Ulm, by which a cessation of arms was concluded betwixt the Catholics and the Protestants; which was the cause of gaining the battle of Prague, and afterwards of the re-establishment of the emperor's affairs (51).' Do not imagine that this language is an artifice of the journalist; for the Protestants acknowledge (52): that this embassy was very serviceable to the emperor, and prejudicial to the princes, who were confederated against the house of Austria.

him from these views of religion, and engaged him in a league with Holland. This was concluded in the year 1635, and at the same time war was declared against Spain. People will not allow that the preffing sollicitations of the United Provinces, was that which overcame the repugnancy of the French to this league. On the contrary, it is pretended, that it was the French who expressed the greatest earnestness for it [I]: Some say that the cardinal drove on this affair too fast (b), and ground themselves on the perplexity he was in the very second campaign; but they do not consider, that the bluntest human understanding could never have foreseen, that the first campaign would have gone as it did: it began with a compleat victory over the Spanish army, and according to all appearance must have disabled them for several years: and yet in the issue was the pitifulest campaign that ever was [K]. The French have long since imputed the

[1] It is pretended it was the French expressed the greatest earnestness for it. Mr Huber, who has been some time dead (53), professor of Law in the university of Friesland, pretends (54) that the court of France, fully resolved upon the war, politically concealed that design as long as the duke of Orleans was at Brussels. She made herself be courted by Holland, and this game lasted above a year; but after the return of the duke, and the defeat of the Swedes at Nortlingen, cardinal Richelieu expressed an earnest desire to enter into league with Holland. 'Neque tam aliter se com-
'miscere, quam ubi præter Sacras, etiam Belgas federa-
'tes stabili & fidenti federe sibi conjunxissent, à quo
'multi in Hollandia imprimis, adhuc erant alieni.
'Mirum est, quanto studio & fervore Richelius extre-
'mo tempore, cum prius se rogari passus esset, in
'hoc federe fabricando versatus sit, quod tandem con-
'secutum die 8. Februar. MDCXXXV (55).' If you believe the French, the cardinal was not drawn out of his irresolution but by the meer force of the engines the Hollanders played. We have already heard Mr Silhon (56) upon this; the following passage will tell us much more of it. 'That which drew us out of 'that state of uncertainty, and turned the scale against 'several considerations which were of weight in the 'king's and cardinal's mind, was the truce the Holland-
'ers gave clearly to understand they would make, un'less we resolved on a war. The consequences of this
'truce (if it had been made) were doubtless to be feared
'by us and our allies, but not so much as was then
'apprehended at court, and as father Joseph and Char-
'naisé, who laboured mightily at this wheel, endea'voured to represent it. . . . The presents which 'were not spared on the part of the States, during 'this pursuit, and afterwards, removed all the obstacles 'that stood in the way. Besides this, as the fear of the 'inconveniences, with which the truce threatened
'us, had been the most powerful motive to make us
'hearken to the war, the hopes of the fruits we 'might reap by it, was no small charm to draw us in.
'Almost one half of what Spain possesses in the Ne'therlands, was to have accrued to us by the articles
'of the treaty, and the division between the Holland-
'ers and us, was drawn up so nicely, that each had 'what lay most convenient for him in this imaginary
'spoil. With these engines they worked just as they 'pleased, and the zeal we manifested to follow all their 'motions was so great, that whereas they would have 'given us money to oblige us to break, if we had 'kept up the market, they obtained a great sum from 'us, and would not receive it except in fifteen penny
'pieces and by weight, that they might more advanta'geously convert it into their own country coins. The 'best of all was our consenting that the prince of O'range should have the whole management of the war,
'and that our generals should be only his subalterns,
'and receive their commands from him (57).'

[K] It was the pitifullest campaign that ever war[.] Let us hear an historian who is neither a Frenchman nor a Hollander, nor Spaniard: 'As the French, saye he (58), marched towards Maelfricht with above thirty thousand men, and forty pieces of canon, prince Thomas with some troops which were not very strong, attempted to dispute their passage at Avelines (59), where he was beaten, and lost a great many men. Afterwards the victors advancing without opposition, joined the prince of Orange, who expected them with twenty thousand foot, six thousand horse, and eighty pieces of canon. This army appeared terrible, both for it's numbers and valour, and the world was already in expectation of successes answerable to the greatness of it's forces.' But what were it's exploits? It forced a little pitiful town (60), where horrid barbarities were committed (61). 'It pretended to

' march to Brussels; but the prince of Orange having retarded the march, gave the Spaniards time to come up with their army to it (62). It befieged Louvain with the following success (63): ' The boldness of the assailants having been at first a little checked, the French army began to disperse; for the Hollanders ordering provisions to be punctually brought from the neighbouring places for their own troops, did not leave enough for the French, who tho' by their bravery and strength they might have surmounted all other perils, yet experienced that hunger was an invincible enemy. A great part died for want of bread, a greater part deserted, who were afterwards killed by the peasants; so that their forces being extremely weakened, and provisions failing, the generals agreed upon the necessity of raising the siege, and permitting of all to escape the best they could. The commanders and the remnant of the French army were reduced to come and take shipping in Holland, where the people laughed at them, seeing no more remain of a great army, which expected important conquests, than a handful of dispirited people all in confusion, and forced to take sanctuary among their allies . . . (64). (64) The French army was no sooner dispersed, but the terror, which before seized the provinces depending on Spain, seized the Hollanders in their turn, and pierced them to the heart. The count of Embden surprized the fort of Schenk . . . which opens a passage into the heart of Holland. The prince of Orange, without losing time, went to lay siege to it.' Mr Nani commits a gross fault here, he supposes, on one hand, that the Spaniards did not take the fort of Schenk till after the dispersion of the French troops; and on the other that the French had no share in the re-taking of this fort. These are all falsehoods (65); Silhon speaks of them in a quite different manner: ' But farther, says he (66), having first related the inferiority of which he accuses the Hollanders, as if fortune had meant to put an opportunity into our hands of revenging our selves generously on the Hollanders, and returning good, for the ill which they had done us; the Spaniards permitted the Spaniards to surprize the fort of Schenk in the Betau, that is to give them entrance into the very bowels of Holland, . . . (67). In these hard and melancholy circumstances France was not wanting to them; and without remembering the treatment our army had met with from them, sent orders to marshal de Breze, who was the only commander left, not to separate from the prince of Orange till the reduction of the fort of Schenk, which was done several months after it's attack.' (65) Relation des Points, and figures, which the French army, says he, were employed in the siege of Schenk. (66) Silhon, in supra, pag. 134. (67) Ibid pag. 134, 135.

But here follow more mysterious reflexions. I have read in a book printed in 1664 (68), that the French complained that the Hollanders had suffered the fort of Schenk to be taken, in order to have a pretence of separating the armies, whose conjunction gave them umbrage. Here follows the words of this book (69): 'If you will believe the French they will give another account of it; for they say that this loss was suffered by the consent of the states who being jealous to see the forces of so potent a king come too near their frontiers, let this fort be lost on purpose, that they might have a pretence of separating from the French army, to re-take the key of their country; and in maintenance of their position they alleged two reasons, the first is, that no considerable garrison was left in it, and that two men of war had retired the very day it was taken. The second, that they designedly starved their army; so that of forty thousand men, there returned not above five thousand into France; which words are not to be taken for an article of faith.'

fault to the prince of Orange [L], generalissimo of the army, and have also said, that cardinal Richelieu, with all his great genius, was deceived by the Hollanders [M]. The famous cavalier Nani has given too far into these French notions, as a Friesland Civilian has shewn [N]. Lewis XIII died the fourteenth of May 1643, after a tedious

[L] the French have imputed the whole blame to the prince of Orange.] I do not cite the authors that have written since the year 1672; neither de Pontis (70) who represents this prince extremely vexed at the victory of Avein; nor abbot Bizot (71), who accuses Holland of having acted a treacherous part at the siege of Louvain, and on some other occasions. I shall cite a book printed in 1651, which speaks after this manner (72): 'The Hollanders did not wait long to make us feel the effects of this jealousy. The gaining the battle of Avein which attended the first motion of our arms, contrary to the expectation of all the world, no less alarmed them, than the Spaniards, who lost it; and for fear this advantage should draw others after it, as is usual, and that our generals, marshal Chastillon and marshal Brezé, should push the victory farther, the prince of Orange sent them orders to come and join him. However, if Chastillon, who acted honestly in the things he was concerned in, had been hearkened to, they had gone and besieged Namur, and there made a good establishment, notwithstanding the orders of the prince of Orange. But Brezé, who was in the confidence of the cabinet, and in the secret of affairs, opposed him, and made his colleague resolve to obey their generalissimo according to the intention of the court. This was the first seed of division, which afterwards flourished between these two generals, that they came at last to draw their swords one against the other. . . . (73). The prince of Orange marched our army so long about, without any other action except the siege of Tirlémont, and left it so destitute of subsistence, tho' he was obliged to furnish it (74), that it mouldered away of itself; or rather we may say, that for want of succouring it the Hollanders destroyed it without fighting, and had the spoils of it, which was very great and rich, almost for nothing. Besides this, the conduct of the prince of Orange, and the tedious round-about marches of his army and ours, without any meaning or design gave the Spaniards leisure to recover from the consternation the battle of Avein had cast them into, and to call a potent assistance from Germany, which put us almost upon the defensive.'

which promised to leave the Catholic religion, in possession of the places where it was established. It was agreed also to make neither peace nor truce, but with joint consent, and to enter into no accommodation nor treaty, till the Spaniards were entirely driven out of the Low-Countries. They were to besiege the places alternately, first one of those that was designed for France, and then one of those assigned to Holland; and to leave the generals of the army the choice of attacking, which they thought fit. They were besides this to maintain jointly a naval force at sea. France was to declare war with the emperor, or any other prince, who upon this occasion should attempt to disturb the States of the United Provinces (76). This occasions a dilemma: either cardinal Richelieu was persuaded that the Hollanders would observe this treaty, or he was not. If he was persuaded of it, where was his understanding? Does not the least common sense dictate, that it was incomparably more the interest of Holland, that Spain should preserve a part of the Low-Countries, than that they should be entirely divided betwixt France and the United Provinces? If cardinal Richelieu did not think that Holland was simple enough to consent, that Spain should lose all this country, he was very simple himself to make a treaty, which he knew Holland would never execute, and which the public good, the sovereign law of states, could never permit them to execute. I confess, that it is hard to draw the cardinal out of this labyrinth, and not to see, that he committed a gross blunder, unless we say, that the poor condition the Swedes were reduced to, and the barbarous affront France had received, by the detention of the archbishop of Treves, would not suffer this crown to leave Spain at rest, but engaged it in a league with Holland upon conditions, which it knew would never be entirely executed. The present evil required, that France should be satisfied with the execution of one part, and let time work out the rest. Here follows Mr Silhon's reflexions (77).

(78) That is to say, by the treaty concluded with France.

Let us copy here a passage from a work I have often cited: 'much about the same time came the news of the defeat of Prince Thomas at Aveins, which caused a great consternation in all the country; the French army afterwards advancing to the very gates of Brussels, never was such a terror known among these people. The cardinal infant had already caused the most precious furniture of the palace to be removed to Antwerp, and ordered all his army to line the canal, being resolved to abandon Brussels himself, if hunger and Piccolomini, who arrived with the German succours, had not forced our army to retire. It was also said, that the prince of Orange was not overjoyed to see them so far advanced into the country. The queen-mother and Madam, were already fled to Antwerp, where their officers were forced to conceal themselves a good while, to avoid the fury of the people, who detested the French nation since the lack of Tirlémont (75). What might not a general have done, who had known how to make use of this strange consternation, which had seized the court of Brussels? A Roman consul in the like case would have given a good account of a whole province, before the end of the year.

[M] Cardinal Richelieu was deceived by the Hollanders.] They were to attack the Spanish provinces with fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse . . . they had divided the conquests after this manner: Luxembourg, Namur, Hainault, Artois, and Cambresis were to be the portion of France, with a part of Flanders on this side the line that was to be drawn from Blachembert, betwixt Bruges and Dam, including in it Ruremond. The rest was to fall to the States of Holland,

The Hollanders by this means (78) compassed two points, which were very much to their advantage; one was the embarking us in the same war they were engaged in, which it was in all appearance impossible for them ever to get out of but by a peace, which would make them be acknowledged for sovereigns, by those who looked on them as subjects; which was what was proposed in their treaty with us. The other, that though the division agreed on, if it came to be accomplished, must be an eternal principle of jealousy; and they must believe, that the having us for their neighbours, instead of the Spaniards, was only changing their fears, and perhaps making their condition worse; yet they thought it more eligible to expose themselves to a certain evil, against which there were many remedies, to obtain a present and very important good, namely, that of making us partners in their fortune; that is to say, of giving themselves by this alliance, a more firm and solid basis than they had before. It is true, they would have allowed us to make our selves masters of the maritime towns, which were so fatal to their commerce in the hands of the Spaniards, or even of some other places which were frontiers to ours. But for us to establish ourselves in the heart of Flanders, and in the places which were near them, was that which made them uneasy, and which they hoped the course of the war would hinder of itself, or that they themselves should find means to divert it, either by ceasing to act against the Spaniards, and employing, as they always did, a great part of their forces; or taking an opportunity of reconciling themselves to them, under any plausible pretence, which the state of affairs might offer.

[N] A Friesland Civilian has shewn it to the cavalier Nani.] This cavalier imagined, that prince Frederic Henry suffered the French army to perish, to revenge himself of an injury he had received from cardinal Richelieu; and that he sought an occasion of making vered a great delicacy of wit [2]. I shall transcribe the character given him in the History of the Edict of Nantes [R]. The same reason which, in several other articles, hinders my relating a series of actions, according to the order of time, has hindered my doing so here; which is, that I would not repeat what is to be found in Moreri. I am surprized, that he should forget the solemn act, by which Lewis XIII put his person and kingdom under the protection of the holy Virgin (*). Mr Godeau exercised his muse on this subject, with little judgment. A learned critic attacked him upon it with great force [3].

I forgot

curian life and death of Vauquelin des Yvetaux, first preceptor to Lewis XIII, is a certain proof, that Henry IV, who had made choice of him, was not a good judge of men of merit (93). He adds, that a year after the death of Henry IV Vauquelin lost this employment, through the jealousy of some people, and that Nicolas le Fevre succeeded him, a man distinguished for his learning and piety, and died a year after, and that Fleurance Rivaut, an able Mathematician, say they, ascended from the post of sub-preceptor, to that of preceptor in chief. A young man, continues he, who passes through so many different bands, seldom makes any great proficiency.

It is certain, that Nicolas Vauquelin, Sieur des Yvetaux, had wit and learning. He was son to Mr de la Frenaisie, president to the Bailliwick, and presidiai seat of Caen, in the year 1605, of whom a great collection of verses had been printed at Caen (94). Nicolas le Fevre was of Paris, a man of great merit, and of an exact, profound, and extensive knowledge, great probity, and incomparable modesty. Moreri's article of him is good. See also the elogies, which Casaubon hath given him (95). He was chosen by Henry IV to instruct the prince of Condé (96), but not to be preceptor to the Dauphin, as le Grain affirms (97). He was raised to this preferment, under the regency of Mary de Medicis (98). He died the third of November, 1612, aged sixty eight years and some months. But let us suppose, as much as you please, that both he and des Yvetaux were men of great merit, and that the quality of a good preceptor, a quality more rare than that of preceptor is common, was united in them to that of being learned: we could not thence conclude, that Lewis XIII had been well educated; for they were but a very small time directors of his studies. We should know how they acquitted their charge, who came after le Fevre. We cannot be over-prejudiced in their favour, when we consider, that they persisted in making him read Fauchet's works, which disgusted him. This was not the way to form his taste, but discourage him. It is said however, that he grew very nice upon the point of eloquence, and that the harangues of that time infinitely displeased him, though his own encomiums were the subject matter. Here is my witness (99): Always to praise, always to admire, and to this purpose to make use of periods a mile long, and exclamations that reach the skies, vexes even those whom we praise and admire. The victorious complain of it in the midst of their triumphs. And I know from good hands, that the late king beholding himself one day in a glass, and wondering at the great number of his grey hairs, charged them upon the complainers of his kingdom, and their long periods. He said to the person from whom I have it, these remarkable words, I fancy, it is the harangues that have been made me since my coming to the crown, and particularly those of Monsieur le  that have made me grey so soon.

[2] On many occasions he discovered great fine-ness of parts. If what Balzac has been telling us, does not seem a good commentary upon this text, what will you say after reading these words of the chevalier de Mercé? How comes it then that this court is so different from what it was heretofore? Henry the Great, who judged well of every thing, though he had hardly studied any thing but military affairs, and the late king, in my opinion, have not a little contributed to it. This prince, whom we have seen, had a delicate wit, and said excellent things. Can any thing be more agreeable than this saying: put on your hat, Brion; my brother gives you leave. And so many others which I could cite. As he loved good railery, he very much disliked that which was bad; and the C. D. R. bad like to have been disgraced, for having written to M. D. E. in a kind of railery, though all the guilt of it consisted in its being dull (100). A great many readers will better understand the meaning of, Put on your hat, Brion, &c. if I tell the story a little at large, as Mr Bourfault has related it. 'The late duke of Orleans, Gaston of France, was so jealous of the rights belonging to his quality, that upon this head, he never excused any body. To have the pleasure of seeing the princes of the blood uncovered before him whenever he found an opportunity of speaking to them, he kept them as long as possibly he could, and never uncovered himself one single moment, for fear of forgetting his own quality. Lewis XIII going one day from Paris to St Germain, in the extensive heat, in company of the duke of Orleans, the lords, who were bare-headed at the sides of the coach, were hardly able to bear the violence of the sun. The king perceiving how they suffered, had the good nature to say to them; Cover yourselves, gentlemen, cover yourselves, my brother gives you leave (101).'

[R] I shall transcribe the character that is given him in the History of the Edict of Nantes. 'He was jealous of his power even to excess, though he could neither understand nor enjoy it. He could never, in the whole course of his life, either exercise it himself, or suffer it in the hands of another. It was equally impossible for him not to raise his favourites to an exceeding power, and to bear with them in the grandeur, to which he himself had raised them. By enriching them, he made them disagreeable to him. The excess of his complaisance to them, was the first degree of his hatred; and I do not know, whether we can find in his history, the example of a favourite, whose death or fall he lamented. But he always concealed his sentiments; and because he communicated them to few people, they who will have the conduct of princes to be always mysterious, accuse him of a black and profound dissimulation. To say the real truth, the reason of his silence was, that he neither trusted himself, nor any body else; and was very timorous and weak. Almost all that have spoken of him, acknowledge he had courage; that in danger he lost not his judgment; that he loved and understood war; that he was master of much fine knowledge; but that he had not the art of reigning (102). This picture seems pretty well drawn to the life.

[S] A learned critic attacked Mr Godeau with great force. The king's declaration concerning this act of devotion to the holy Virgin, is dated the tenth of February, 1638. You will find it entire in the French Mercury (103); I will only take this part of it: FOR THESE CAUSES we have declared, and do declare, that taking the most holy and glorious Virgin, for the special protectress of our kingdom, we particularly consecrate to her our person, our state, our crown, and our subjects, beseeching her to inspire us with a holy conduct, and to defend this kingdom so carefully against the efforts of all its enemies, that whether it suffers the scourge of war, or enjoys the calms of peace, which we beg of God with all our heart, it may never depart out of the ways of grace, which lead to those of glory. And that posterity may never fail to pursue our desires upon this subject, for the immortal remembrance, and in testimony of the present consecration, which we make, we will cause the great altar of the cathedral church of Paris to be built anew, with an image of the Virgin embracing her precious son in her arms, descended from the cross; we will be represented at the feet of the son and of the mother, offering them our crown and scepter. We admonish the archbishop of Paris, and enjoin him, that he annually, on the day and feast of the Assumption, make a commemoration of our present declaration, in the high mass, which shall be said in his cathedral church, and after the vespers of the same day, that a procession be made in the said church, at which all the sovereign companies shall assist, and the body of the city, with equal ceremony, as is observed at the most solemn general processions.

fions. Which we will also have done in all churches, both parochial and monastical of the said city and suburbs; and in all towns, boroughs, and villages, of the said diocese of Paris. We in like manner exhort all archbishops and bishops of our kingdom, and at the same time enjoin them, to cause the same solemnity to be celebrated in the episcopal churches, and other churches of their dioceses.

Mr Godeau made a hymn upon this occasion, in which the king, speaking to the Holy Virgin, sets off the extraordinary merit of cardinal Richelieu, and acknowledges him not only as his colleague, but as a colleague who watched in order to let his associate sleep. The Jesuit (104) who censured Mr Godeau, exceeded the bounds of modesty and moderation; but at the bottom he had reason for censuring this conduct. I will give you his censure somewhat at large, and do not fear being blamed for it, as I may possibly be for several other citations out of books, which are very common; for this Jesuit's book is scarce known, and hardly to be met with. We will therefore boldly cite a large piece of it, which will inform us, that Lewis XIII did not love to have his first minister praised at his own cost. He was sensible of his dependance, but he did not care that any body should know it, and it is even certain, that the cardinal dextrously managed his master's delicacy, both in his words, and his external conduct. So that Mr Godeau made use of flatteries, which were neither agreeable to decorum, nor to prudence (105). 'Cum Ludovicum XIII offerentem se ac regnum Mariæ Virgini, induceret, huic de isto sermone affinxit, qui totus abhorreat à regis sensu & consuetudine, Cardinalis prudentia, ac voluntate, rei natura. For what grounds did his majesty give him to mix with his most religious and pious prayers to the mother of GOD the praises of any mortal? What necessity was there for exaggerating, or distinctly, and minutely dwelling upon them? Why this waste of panegyric in so short a poem . . . But these errors of that wretched Poet, I forgive and pass by. But who, Mr Godeau being either a good subject, or a man of any spirit, will not observe that you have most invidiously given the king a partner and associate in power.

While this statesman grave and great Guides with me the helm of state.

What say'st thou, traitor? Hold the helm with the king, to possess equal power and authority with his prince? For this is not to act as a viceroy, but to be a king as well as his master. If you had said this of the king's only son, the next and indubitable heir of the crown, in the life-time of his father, you had certainly trespassed upon majesty; but when you say this of another, of a subject, a servant of the crown, one who cannot entertain a thought of this sort without guilt, do you either think yourself innocent, or that you shall escape without reproof? Are you ignorant that Lewis still retains his authority? That he is extremely nice in these things, and will not bear the least encroachment on his power, that the cardinal, well versed in such things, fears nothing more than that such wicked and inconsiderate speeches, should either come to the king's ear, or be diffused among the people, so that it is to be wondered, if either of them thought your poem worth reading, you did not grievously offend both, especially when you have no excuse left, and cannot palliate your imprudence, by pretending that this dropped from you unawares, or that your verse required it, and that you were under a necessity of writing in that manner, since it was so easy, so natural to observe the rancour and mischief of these words, and to have taken the roughness away, or to have softened them in this manner: While to wife a minister under me holds the helm. . . . What follows is ridiculous enough, the cardinal alone is made a match for hell, and all the powers of darkness. I fear not what hell or the devil can do against me. And again, what is not only arrogant, but impious. Thro' him every thing is to me possible. So then if the cardinal had been present the king had not died. It was fit to omit a passage, in which open flattery is the least thing which deserves reprehension, and wherein it is said, that he would have been a king if he had not been an assistant and coadjutor to the king. And you yourself had been a king, &c. Neither can I avoid being angry with you, Godeau, because in such a torrent of praises as you have bestowed upon the royal servant, you at the same time depress the king, and represent him to us a drowsy indolent prince, nay make him confess this of himself:

In peace I sleep my time away.

But what king was this? One the most vigilant, the most indefatigable, the most patient under the injuries of the weather, and who, by frequent journeys into the most distant parts of his dominions, impaired his health, and wasted his body, nor could produce his thread of life, to a greater length than forty four years.

[T] The royal authority was more powerfully exerted . . . than it had ever been in France. A remarkable thing! The royal power was more strongly established

Paris ever suffered a more shameful mortification, than what it was forced to submit to in 1631 [U]. It is true, this illustrious body seemed a little to have forgot its duty, and had the misfortune to suffer it self to be carried away by the artifices of some factious spirits. I shall examine perhaps in another place (f), the Horoscope, that is found in Sully's Memoirs.

It is very probable that Lewis XIII was not sorry for the death of cardinal Richelieu; for he was a man he feared but loved not; and whom he would have been gladly rid of, if powerful reasons had not prevailed. He imagined, amongst other things, that his troops being established under a prince who neither enjoyed authority nor absolute liberty himself, than it had been under monarchs least depending on their ministers, and the best skilled in the art of Governing. It is properly under Lewis XIII, and not in the reign of Lewis XI, that the kings of France had their manumission. This must be ascribed to cardinal Richelieu; it is he that began the work of arbitrary power, and carried it on pretty near to perfection; but not so near, as was then complained of; the succeeding time has shewn, that several things were wanting to this work, which have been since added, or are adding at present. The people and magistrates were sensible of this innovation, and murmured at it (107); it was the subject of a thousand discourses. Costar argued once against a with them, register them, and cause them to be observed by the people, and that the declaration in question ought to have been published with so much the less difficulty, as there is a great difference betwixt a commission which is delivered for the trial of any person; and a declaration which is published by his majesty, to let his subjects know who they are he complains of, the reasons he has for so doing, and for which they are guilty of high treason; considering moreover that in a declaration of this kind, his majesty allows them a certain time, during which they may obtain the favour of his clemency, if they have recourse to it, and even after that all the formalities necessary in criminal causes are observed, before condemnation. This was done in the Louvre, the king sitting in his council, and the parliament in a body, kneeling in his presence; and after the keeper of the seals had given them to understand from his majesty, that they had no authority to judge of the declarations of state that were sent to them, he tore with his own hands the decree of division which had been entered in the registers, and commanded to substitute in its place that of his council, by which he annulled it, with prohibition to deliberate for the future upon such like declarations; and finally to expiate the fault of this body upon some particulars; the presidents Gayan and Barillon, and the Sieur Lesne, counsellor, were commanded by the king's order to remove for some time from Paris, and were suspended from the exercise of their employments, for having spoken of his actions, and the conduct of the state with too little respect (117).

In foreign countries a great many people, imagine that the excluding the parliaments of France from a share in the sovereignty is a new thing; there are many Frenchmen under a like mistake. It will not be amiss therefore to shew here by certain and indisputable facts, that the parliament of Paris has for a long time had the bounds of its jurisdiction declared, and that upon the foot of an antient custom. The parliament being in the Louvre, in 1631, in the posture above-mentioned (118), the keeper of the seals, de Châteauneuf highly blamed the proceedings of the parliament of Paris, and proved to them, by many reasons, AND BY DIVERSE EXAMPLES, that the parliament neither can nor ought to take cognizance of any but private affairs, and differences betwixt man and man, and not meddle with the affairs of state, of which the sovereign reserves the sole cognizance to himself. That even in the business of trials of princes, dukes, and other officers of the crown, for their male-administration in the direction of the finances, and the management of the state, to the end that the parliaments may take cognizance of them, it is necessary the king should send them an express commission, which in that case extends their ordinary jurisdiction; or else that his majesty assist in person, and authorize by his presence the institution of these extraordinary proceedings. That moreover, there being a great difference between a commission to make out a trial, and a declaration, only mentioning those the king complains of, it was never doubted, but the parliaments ought to take cognizance of the cause, before they judge upon a commission; and that on the contrary, they are obliged, without any delay or deliberation, to record a declaration, which always leaves criminals a certain time, in which they may return to their duty, and thereby stop the proceeding any further in their prosecution. The remonstrance of the keeper being at an end, the king ordered the register of the court to be brought him, and the leaf shewn him, wherein was the decree of division, which he himself tore out, and instead of it, caused the decree of the council to be inserted the same day, the twelfth of May; by which most express prohibitions were made to the said court of parliament, ever after to deliberate upon such like declarations, being commanded by the creatures of his eminence, he could not dispose of them as he pleased [X] if he broke intirely with him. He was often solicited either to give orders, or give leave, to kill that cardinal [Z], but could never be brought to it. Nor would he even clarations, concerning affairs of state, its administration and government, at the peril of losing their places, and greater if necessary; and for the fault committed in this instance by the said court, it was ordered, that the said letters of declaration should be withdrawn from it, with most expresse inhibitions, to take any jurisdiction or cognizance of their contents. No body was ever better acquainted with the laws of the kingdom, than chancellor de l'Hospital; and yet observe how he makes Charles IX speak (119). Bodin will tell you, that this prince made a decree the twenty fourth of September, 1563, forbidding the parliament of Paris to put it to the question, whether they should or should not record the edicts his majesty sent them (120). Francis I. made a like ordinance in the year 1528 (121).

[X] He imagined that his troops being commanded by the creatures of the cardinal, he could not dispose of them as he pleased. Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs inform us that Cinq Mars, the king's favourite, conceived a great aversion for cardinal Richelieu, after he had observed that his eminence prevented his marrying a princess. He endeavoured to induce the king to dismiss this minister, and he thought he had observed that if his majesty did it not, it was not so much for want of good will, as because he was afraid of him. His majesty had answered, when he spoke to him of it, that what he proposed was very difficult, that he did not consider that this minister was master of all the places of his kingdom, and of all his forces both by sea and land; that they were his relations and friends who commanded them, whom he could cause to revolt against him, both as often and as long as he pleased (122). Let us add here a reflexion: the favourites of princes, or those who have the greatest share in the government, labour commonly with an incredible diligence to procure to themselves, or their relations the most profitable and honourable employments. One would say, that they look upon themselves as the heirs of mankind: there is no place vacant, but they beg it for themselves or for some of their creatures. Some there are who attribute this only to an insatiable avarice, and an unbounded ambition; but it is certain, that if in the beginning these are the only motives of this conduct, prudence obliges them to continue it after; for the envious and the enemies of a prime minister daily increase in proportion to his authority; he has therefore new and hourly occasions to make himself supports and ramparts; for which reason he incessantly turns out of places persons who are suspected, and advances such as devote themselves to his fortune. Cardinal Richelieu maintained himself this way, and so strengthened his power, that it lasted longer than his life. You have seen in the passage of Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs, that this hindered the king from gratifying his own desire of ruining him. Observe now from these words of the duke de la Rochefoucaud, in what condition affairs were, after the death of his eminence (123): I came to court, which I found as submissive to his will (124), after his death, as in his life-time. His relations and creatures had the same advantages that he had procured them; and by an effect of his fortune, of which few examples are to be seen, the king who had hated him, and wished his destruction, was obliged not only to dissemble his sentiments, but also to authorize the disposal the cardinal had made in his will, of the principal employments, and of the most important places of his kingdom. He farther chose cardinal Mazarine to succeed him in the government of affairs, and thus he was assured of reigning more absolutely after his death, than the king his master had been able to do for the thirty three years that he wore the crown. But to omit nothing, it must be observed, that it was for the king's interest at that time, that the armies and fortified towns should not be under the direction of the cardinal's enemies. This minister's abilities could not have been sufficient to support him, had it not been for the good successes which attended the king's arms; he must necessarily have fallen if Lewis the thirteenth's wars had been unsuccessful. It was therefore the interest of his enemies, that the Spaniards should triumph, and put the kingdom in continual frights. What had not France to fear, if the French generals had wished the ruin of the cardinal, and if their particular fate had not depended upon that of the minister? They who wished his ruin, were wonderfully pleased with the successes of the Spaniards in 1636. And the count de Soissons, a prince of the blood, performed his duty very ill, when it was necessary to oppose their progress; for he would not have been sorry if they had succeeded so far as to force the king to sacrifice the cardinal to the public indignation. We could never have believed, these are the words of the king's declaration (125), that after we had pardoned the count de Soissons, our cousin, the ill behaviour he had been guilty of towards us, in the year 1636, when we trusted our arms in his hands; that he would have embarked himself again, &c. See what has been said above (126), concerning the raising the siege of Fontarabia.

We have seen in the beginning of this remark, that cardinal Richelieu proved Cinqmars, by opposing his marriage with a princess. Not to engage the reader in the trouble of consulting another book, we will say here that this princess was the same Mary de Gonzaga, who married the king of Poland some time after. She had been courted by the duke of Orleans, his majesty's only brother; but the queen-mother, to prevent the match, caused her to be sent to the Bois de Vincennes (127). This detention ended a little after by the king's order, who promised his brother, in 1631, that he should have leave to marry her (128). The duke of Orleans made no advantage of this consent; he meditated a rebellion, which was quashed in its birth, and he retired into foreign countries, and engaged himself to a sister of the duke of Lorraine. One of the fix things which gave Cinqmars an implacable aversion to cardinal Richelieu, was, that in speaking of the princess Mary de Gonzaga, he added, that his mother had a mind to marry him to her. Your mother, answered his eminence, is mad, and if the princess Mary has such a thought, she is madder than your mother; when she has been proposed as a wife for Monsieur, would you have the vanity and presumption to pretend to her? It is a ridiculous thing (129). Note, that the author of the Galantries of the kings of France, has vented a thing devilish satirical concerning the amours of Cinqmars.

[Y] He was often solicited to give orders or give leave to kill the cardinal. I have mentioned in the preceding remark, Lewis the thirteenth's answer to the proposition of dismissing the cardinal. This answer made his young favourite conclude (130), that when he should have killed the cardinal, the king, instead of revenging him, would be the first that would be pleased at the deliverance. Thus continually fortifying his resolution of sacrificing this first minister, he endeavoured to engage Treville in the execution: (131) but Treville, who was wise and prudent, answered him when he spoke to him of it, that he had never been concerned in any assassination, and that it was as much as he could do if his majesty should declare to him, that the good of the state depended on it. Cinqmars replied, that if nothing was wanting but that, the thing should be quickly done, even before he was two days older, and only desired his promise on that condition. Treville gave him his promise without making much reflexion on what he did; in the mean time, whether he only did it because he believed the king would never consent to such a thing, he who was daily shewing how much disturbed he was for having caused the marshal d'Ancre to be taken off as he had done, or whether he gave too much way to his resentment, Cinqmars had no sooner his word for it, but he founded the king upon the matter. The king, who was plain and sincere, acknowledged that he should not be very sorry to be rid of his eminence, not thinking on what design he made that proposition. He thought that what he said to him was only a thing at random, as when one is asked whether he would be glad or sorry that this or that should happen. However, Cinqmars taking advantage of this answer, went back to Treville, . . . and desired him to found the king . . . Treville spoke to his majesty upon this subject that very day. He answered even after the death of this minister, suffer his family to lose any of its lustre; and it was believed, he designed by this, to persuade the world that he had not raised it out of a slavish condescension [Z]. The same reason should have induced him to leave in prison, or banishment, the persons which the cardinal had put out of his majesty's favour; yet perceiving himself near his end, he consented to the liberty or return of most of them. It is said some economical motives mingled in this affair [AA]. The short time that he survived answered nothing but what was agreeable enough to what Cinquars had endeavoured to persuade him . . . (132) Cinquars who had the art of deceiving, and putting off a look or a wink for an assertion, thought that instead of making Treville repeat what he had promised, it was enough to make the king declare to him the same thing he had said. Treville who had heard the king say as much, not once, but an hundred times before, was not so thoroughly satisfied as he imagined; he desired that his majesty would explain himself more positively upon it; and the thing being spun out till his departure, it was resolved to execute their design at Nemours. The one engaged only upon the other's promise, which he constantly made of the king's declaring himself; and the other made him this promise only, because he thought to amuse and insensibly oblige him to do the thing, without making much reflexion on it. When the court was come to Melun (133), Treville challenging Cinquars with his promise, he refers him to Fontainebleau, where the king was to stay a day. He actually spoke of it to his majesty, and pressed him to consent to it; but the king, detesting the proposition, answered, that he wondered he should offer to speak to him of it; Cinquars concealed this from Treville, telling him that his majesty's answer was, that hints were sufficient, without obliging a king to give a positive command: That so did the marshal de Vitry, when he took off the marshal d'Ancre . . . (134) Treville was not at all satisfied with this answer; and though all the measures were taken for this assassination, he broke it off, as soon as he saw the king would not consent to it. After this the author relates, that Cinquars had a dagger made to kill the cardinal, himself: that he banged it to the hilt of his sword, as was the fashion of that time; that the cardinal having notice of the design stood upon this guard; that thence, however, ordered it so that he was twice side by side with Cinquars on the road; but whatever resolution this favourite had taken, he was so confounded when he was to strike the blow, that he had not the power to lay his hand to the poinard, which yet was made on purpose to take away his life.

I do not pretend that every thing in Mr d'Artagnan's memoirs is to pass for truth, but it is certain his eminence was persuaded that Cinquars had resolved to execute this assassination at Lyons. See the letter he wrote to his majesty the seventh of July, 1642 (135). And it is plain from the king's letter, that Cinquars made no scruple to make an attempt upon the life of the cardinal; and that he not only proposed it to the king, as a thing necessary, but also offered to execute it himself; at which his majesty was astonished, and condemned so wicked a thought (136).

chellieu, that it cost the author's eldest son his life, who was a very worthy man, and this on account of a passage concerning Antony du Pleffis de Richellieu, in the first tome under Francis II, in the year 1560. . . . This passage begins thus. Antonius Richellius vulgo dictus Monachus, &c. The facility with which so many people believe Guy Patin's assertion in these two passages, may convince us, that on some occasions it is enough to make a thing be believed if it contains an excess of extravagance and crimes: it becomes credible on this very account, that it shocks good sense and probability. But omitting that, let us reason a little upon it. It is certain, that Cinquars had undertaken to destroy cardinal Richellieu; his eminence was convinced, that he intended to do it even by assassination. It is certain, that Thuanus was Cinquars's intimate friend, at least, that he was privy to the design of this favourite, as to the point of destroying the cardinal (139). Is not this searching for mid-day at twelve a clock (if we may use this proverbial phrase), to go so far as the expressions of Thuanus the historian, in quest of the cause of Thuanus's death, the confidant of Cinquars. Could the prime minister, as vindictive as he was, found his resentment upon a phrase of the father, when he knew his mortal enemy, had so much intimacy with the son. Must not the spirit of revenge have arisen from that intimacy? Patin talks like a man who should affirm, that Mævius having been cudgelled by Titius, chastised him only because Titius's father had not saluted a relation of Mævius with respect enough (§ a).

[Z] Nor would he suffer the family of the cardinal to lose any of its lustre . . . to persuade the world that he had not raised it out of a slavish condescension. It was believed, as soon as he was dead, that as the king had hardly ever loved him, his family would not long shine with that lustre he had given it. But his majesty, who foresaw, that if he did such a thing, it would be showing too openly, as it had been often said in the world, that this minister had always kept him as it were in tutelage, from which nothing but his death had freed him, he not only supported that cardinal's family, but gave it additional honours. He caused the Marechal de Brezé's son to be received as duke and peer into the parliament (140). We have seen above (141), the duke de la Rochefoucauld's observation concerning the power the cardinal's creatures were in, when he passed returned to court after his eminence's death. Mr de la Chastre has spoken of it in the same strain (142).

[AA] He consented to the liberty or return of most of them . . . It is said some economical motives mingled in this affair. The king, whose displeasure increased every day, being desirous to give, at the end of his life, some marks of his clemency, whether out of devotion, or to show that cardinal Richellieu had had a greater share than he, in all the viglences which had been committed since the disgrace of the queen-mother, consented to the return of the most considerable of those who had been persecuted; and he was the more willingly induced to it, as the ministers, foreseeing some disorders, endeavoured to oblige persons of condition, to secure themselves against all that might happen in a revolution like that which threatened them. Almost all who had been banished, returned (143). The author I have this from, is very considerable, being a great lord, who was then upon the place, and who was as much distinguished by his parts as by his birth. Another person of quality, and much concerned in the intrigues, will help to confirm our text: here follow his words which contain a satirical stroke upon the king (144): Some time before, cardinal Mazarin and Monsieur de Chavigni, had induced the king to set at liberty the marshals de Vitry and Bassompierre, and the count de Cramail.

vived the cardinal, was perhaps the most uncomfortable of his whole life; for besides his bodily infirmities, he had a great many troubles of mind. And as it is very probable, he was not ignorant of the queen's intrigues [BB], we may reasonably believe that his mind was

The means they made use of on this occasion, deserve to be mentioned, being pleasant enough; for finding that his majesty had not much inclination to it, they attacked him on his weak side, representing, that these three prisoners were a great expence to him in the Bastille; and that not being in a capacity of cabaling in the kingdom, they might as well live in their houses, where they would cost him nothing. This took; the king being possessed with so extravagant an avarice, that all who had a demand of money upon him, were a burden to him; inasmuch, that after the return of Treville, Beaupuy, and others whom the late cardinal's resentments on his death-bed had forced him to abandon, he sought an occasion of snubbing each of them, to deprive them of all hopes of being rewarded for what they had suffered for him. The liberty of the prisoners was followed by the recalling the exiles (145). Facts of this kind are such, as many think most deserving the readers curiosity. Wherefore I imagine the putting them in my Dictionary will be approved.

[BB] It is very probable he was not ignorant of the queen's intrigues. Her conduct, from the death of cardinal Richelieu, to that of the king (146), shows that she was very ambitious, and that it was not without reason, that the cardinal herein conforming to the sense of his master, kept her short; for had she been suffered to meddle in public affairs, she would have had her dependants and confederates, the ready way to multiply factions, which were already but too troublesome. Let us shew in general, what she did to obtain the whole regency, notwithstanding the desire and intention of the king her husband. The cardinal had remonstrated to this prince, that considering the last conspiracy against the state, in which Cinqmars had employed the name and authority of his royal highness, to give greater weight and credit to his faction . . . it would not be proper, in case of his majesty's decease, to suffer the duke of Orleans, his brother, to assume the regency and government of the kingdom, much less the tutelage and education of the sons of France (147). The king very much approved this advice of the cardinal; and understanding on the first or second of December, 1642, that the recovery of this first minister was despaired of, he made haste to act according to this advice; so that on Wednesday the third day of the month, he sent for the presidents of the parliament of Paris, and the attorney and solicitor general, and told them, 'that he had caused a declaration to be drawn up, (in case God should dispose of him) to exclude the duke of Orleans, his brother, from the regency, whom he had already pardoned, even to the sixth time, and to whom he did not think he ought, after this, to intrust what was most dear to him, his kingdom and his two sons: that the parliament must register, as soon as possible, this declaration so important and necessary to the public tranquillity (148). It was registered the fifth day of the same month to be fully and entirely executed (149). The king's health declined every day, and no body judged he could live long: hereupon the court was filled with cabals and intrigues; some were very forward in offering their services to the queen, others were contriving to restore the duke of Orleans to favour. Father Sirmond, the king's confessor 'was induced to propose to him his brother's co-regency with the queen . . . but this proposition so violently displeased the king, that after having sharply rejected it, and said something of it to the queen, he would hear his confessor no more, and dismissing him, under another pretence, took father Dinet in his place (150). At last the king was reconciled both to the queen and the duke of Orleans. He made a declaration, in which 'he appointed (God calling him to himself) the queen, his wife, to be regent, to have the education of their children, with the administration of the kingdom; and the duke of Orleans, his brother, to be lieutenant-general of the minor king, in all the provinces, under the authority of the queen. He orders that the queen-regent, and the lieutenant-general, shall determine nothing, without the advice and sovereign council of the regency, composed of his cousins, the prince of Condé, and the cardinal Mazarin, and the Sieurs, Seguire, chancellor of France, Bouthillier, superintendant of the finances, and de Chavigni, secretary of state, all styled ministers of state; and that the prince and the cardinal be the chiefs in the order as they are named, in the absence of his royal highness. It is his pleasure also, that every thing be deliberated and resolved in his council, by the plurality of voices; and that by the same plurality, provision be made both for the most important employments, and principal offices of the crown, and also for the places of superintendant of the finances, first president, and attorney-general in the parliament of Paris, and secretary of state (151). This declaration being read aloud in his majesty's chamber, in presence of the princes, and the dukes, and peers, &c. the nineteenth of April, 1643. The king signed it, and addressed the following postscript: This above is my most express and last will, which I will have to be executed. The queen and the duke of Orleans signed it likewise, after having promised and sworn to each other, not to infringe it. Which was not done with respect to the queen, without a flood of tears, the testimonies of her grief and affliction . . . This being done, the deputies of the parliament were introduced. The king, sick as he was, declared to them himself, that he had caused letters for the regency to be drawn, which he desired might be speedily registered, to which purpose he would send the next morning Monsieur, his brother, and the prince of Condé, and the chancellor, the grand chamber. In effect, they were read and published the same morning, in a full house (152). The king's letter, which accompanied the declaration, enjoined the parliament to register it without any delay or difficulty . . . Afterwards to take from the registers, the declaration against Monsieur the king's only brother, immediately to put it into the hands of the chancellor, to be cancelled or torn (153). The queen, very much displeased with the limitations made to her regency, thought of nothing but how to get the declaration annulled, and the king had scarce closed his eyes, but she was pompously conveyed to the parliament of Paris, to obtain a full and entire regency. It was the ancient custom, that the widows of the kings of France should keep for forty days together in their chamber, without seeing sun or moon till their husbands were buried (154). Anne of Austria, Lewis the thirteenth's widow, did not shut herself up in that manner; but went to Paris the next day after the death of the king her husband (155), and three days after appeared at the most pompous and splendid ceremony that could be seen at the parliament of Paris, and by the intrigues she had formed before, caused the last will of the king to be annulled, that very declaration of the foregoing month of April, which she had sworn to observe, and which had cost so much labour and pains (156), and was undoubtedly the work of the chancellor Seguire . . . and the first president Molié (157).

It is observable, that one of the means which the queen's servants used to arrive at their ends, was to induce her to employ the creatures of cardinal Richelieu, and like a good Christian to forget the injuries she had received from them. Montaigu, a de-votee by profession, mixing God and the world together, and joining to the reasons of devotion, the necessity of having a minister instructed in the affairs of state, added farther, (in my opinion) another consideration, which absolutely gained her, which was to represent to her, that cardinal Mazarin was the best qualified of any one to negotiate a peace, and that being born a subject to the king, her brother, he would make it advantageous for her house, which she ought to endeavour to maintain in power; in order to make it a support against any faction which might arise in France in the time of her regency (158). No prophet could have spoke truer than Montaigu; for it fell out, that de la Chastre, at sixteen years end, cardinal Mazarine concluded the peace with Spain, so advantageous to that crown, and disadvantageous to France, that the most intelligent have thought, that that conduct of his was tossed with a thousand disturbances. The Dauphin himself vexed him without the least design [CC]. We have not as yet seen a good history of his reign, which makes us impatiently wait for that, which Mr le Vassor has undertaken; the first volume of it (g), which reaches to the time of this prince's coming to age in 1614, has been well received by the publick.

The first addition I shall make to his article in this third edition relates to what I have said concerning the little advantage which was got by the victory of Avein [DD].

was owing to the entreaties or commands of the queen-mother, in whom the king, her husband, had always observed a Spanish heart; the reason, in part, why he was willing that her regency should depend on the council he joined with her (159). 'Lewis the Jult did not so much insist upon precedents, as upon reason. He knew that the queen, his wife, understood nothing of affairs, and that she could not have any experience in them, having never had any share in the government. As the regency, said he, is a thing of great weight, and the queen has not the ability that is necessary for the resolution of difficulties, inseparable from government; we have thought fit to conjoin with her, and under her authority, a council that may determine. Besides, that which was particular on this occasion was, that there being a rupture between the two crowns, the queen would be obliged to make war against her own brother, the Catholic king. Lewis XIII had heretofore upbraided her, that she could not forget her country, and that she interested herself too much in the news and affairs of Spain (160).'

[CC] There was no body, even to the Dauphin, but vexed him without the least ill meaning or design. Mr Bourfaut having said, that kings are so nice, that the least thing wounds them, and that they who are most dear to them, are sometimes those who vex them most, gives this instance of it. 'One day, as I was with the president Perrault, in his fine gallery, Monsieur de la Villiere, secretary of state, came to see him, and from him I have the following story. The king, who was then but Dauphin, was baptized at St Germain, the twenty first of April, 1643, being four years of age, seven months, and some days. Lewis XIII, could not assist at that ceremony; he was sick, and died three and twenty days after. The Dauphin, as he came from baptism, was brought to the king, to whom he said, that he had been just baptized. I am glad of it, my son, said the king, but what is your name? My name, replied the young prince, is Lewis the fourteenth, without thinking on what he said, and perhaps even not knowing the consequence of it. And yet this answer afflicted the king: in the condition he was, he took it for an ill omen, and turning to the other side: Not yet, said he, not yet. Some flatterer (for princes have the misfortune to have such before they can speak) had already possessed this royal infant with the great name he was soon to bear; which was the cause of this little mortification he innocently gave the king his father (161).'

[DD] What I have said concerning the little advantage they got by the victory of Avein (162). I cited Mr Silhon, who assures us, that the artifices of the prince of Orange, had hindered the French from making an advantage of that victory, and I have observed, that this author said this in the year 1651, and that I would not cite those who have written after the year 1672: I still follow the same method, and this is the reason why I shall not at present alledge Mr de la Neuville, who said (163), among other things, that the prince of Orange had found means, without appearing to do so, to sacrifice to his jealousy the finest army that had been seen in that age (164). But I may alledge the testimony of an Italian, whose book was printed the year 1640: It is count Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, a well known Historian; he relates (165), that the French generals were of opinion, that instead of besieging Louvain, they should march directly to Brussels. That advice was followed, but the prince of Orange having found the execution difficult, retook the rout to Louvain, and shewed that the taking of that place would be very important. The Historian adds, that some people discovered an artifice in that proceeding, since it was believed, that the Dutch had rather have the Spaniards for their neighbours, than the French. Que sia benche buona opinione, e uscita di bocca d'un Capitano tanto prudente, nondimeno non trascurarono alcuni di dividerla per artificiosa; conciosia che gli Hollandesi credevano, che amassero bene la corrispondenza colli Francesi per cavarne aiuti, ma non già la vicinanza, e maggior loro grandezza, perche stando quelle Provincie sotto all' obediienza d'una Corona, la cui potenza era lontana, e disunita, essi erano stolti, e tuttavia vedevano bastanti a difender la loro liberta: il che più difficile sarebbe riuscito loro, quando avessero dovuto da fare con un Potentato di forze, e di Stato unito, e loro confinante (166).

LICINIA, a vestal, punished for her leudness, about the 640th year of Rome. There were three vestals all at the same time, who behaved themselves ill. Lucius Metellus, the Pontifex Maximus, not having punished this disorder so rigorously as he should have done, was prosecuted for his remissness on an impeachment of Sextus Peduceus, tribune of the people. The high priest condemned only one (a) of the three vestals, and acquitted the other two (b). Licinia was one of the latter, tho' no less guilty than she that was condemned. They were both mightily exclaimed against for the numbers of their galants, and they accused one another. At first, they had to do with but a few of their best friends, and that in great secrecy, declaring to each, that he was the only person, who had received the favour: afterwards, the number of sharers increased, at a strange rate; for the longer they lived in this disorder, the easier it was to convict them of it. They had then reason to fear informers; and could think of no better way of obliging all to silence, than granting to all the last favour. This did not please the first galants: However, they durst not make a noise; too loud complaints would only have betrayed them. The evil took such a head, that the two vestals made no longer any difficulty of giving themselves up to several galants, and that in the knowledge of each other (c); and I believe that for some time they lived together in a good understanding, and that then Emilia introduced her brother to Licinia, and the latter introduced her brother to Emilia. However it be, it is certain, that each had the other's brother for galant (d); a great many of both sexes, freemen and slaves, were privy to the intrigues of these vestals; nevertheless, their crime remained a secret for a long time, as to what we call the public. At last, one Manius, who had been the first instrument or pimp to the amour, turned informer. He had not been made free, nor recompensed according to his expectation; and besides, was a man, who delighted in mischief (e). I have already said, that the high Pontif, the proper judge of offences of this kind, had not used the necessary severity. The discontents, which his remissness had occasioned, was the reason of giving Lucius Cassius a commission, to re-examine the process [A]. He was a rigorous, inflexible judge, as I have shewn in speaking of him. Licinia could not escape him: For how could she hope to escape the sentence of death, when Martia, her companion, who had but to do with only one Roman knight [B], could not escape? Cassius's severe methods for the discovering and convicting the accomplices, were so extraordinary, that they were thought to have exceeded the just bounds (f).

(f) See, in the remark [A] the words of Alconius Pedianus.

[A] Lucius Cassius was commissioned to re-examine the process (1).] Alconius Pedianus gives us this account of it: 'Ob quam severitatem quo tempore Sextus Peduceus Tribunus plebis criminatus est L. Metellum Pontif. Max. totumque collegium Pontificum male judicasse de incestu Virginum Vestalium, quod unam modo Æmiliam damnaverant, abfolverat autem duas, Martiam & Liciniam, populus hunc Cassium creavit qui de eisdem virginibus quaereret, sique & utraque eas & præterea complures alias nimia etiam, ut existimatio est, asperitate usum damnavit. — On account of which severity, when Sextus Peduceus, tribune of the people, accused L. Metellus, the Pontifex Maximus, and the whole pontifical college, of judging ill in relation to the leud actions of the Vestals, in that they had condemned only Æmilias, but had acquitted two, Martia and Licinia, the people commissioned Cassius to inquire into the matter, who not only condemned those two, but many others likewise, using, as it is thought, too great severity.' Instead of alias, I should read alios; for the number of the Vestals was too small, to say, after the condemnation of two, that many others were condemned. We must say then, that these many others of Alconius were the galants, the bawds, &c. of the Vestals. Dion observes, that the criminal Vestals involved abundance of people in their misfortune: Αἱ ἑρπείαι τὸ πλείον αὐταὶ τὰ τε ὀλέθρου καὶ τῆς ἀσχύνης ὄφρον, συχνοὶς δὲ διὰ καὶ ἄλλοις μεγάλων κακῶν αἰτίαι ἐγένοντο. ἢ τε πόλιν ἅπασα ἀπ' αὐτῶν ἐπαρῆν. Virgines Vestales ipsæ quidem maximam mali ac dedecoris partem tulere, sed tamen alios quoque plurimos in gravissima mala conjecere, & universam civitatem suo scelere perturbavere (2).

(2) Excerpta ex Dione, pag. 626.

[B] Martia, her companion, who had to do only with one Roman knight.] If her companions had been as cautious as she, it is probable, they might have violated their rule with impunity. Possibly even Martia would neither have lost her reputation nor her life, if, to redress the remissness of the former judges, the too rigid Lucius Cassius had not been commissioned. Marcia μὲν τῇ τε καὶ αὐτὴν καὶ πρὸς ἑνα τινὰ ἰππία ἡσχύνθη: καὶν δὲ λαβὼν εἰ μὴ περ ἡ ζήτησις ἐπὶ τῶν ἄλλων ἐπὶ πλείον ἀρθεῖσα καὶ ἐκείνην περσκάτελαθεν. . . . διὰ τὸ τοιοῦτον καὶ τὰς κολασεις ἢ μόνων τῶν ἐλεγχθέντων μίσει ἀλλὰ καὶ τῶν ἄλλων πάντων τῶν αἰτιαθέντων μίσει τὸ συμβεβηκὸς ἐποίησαντο. Marcia quidem seorsim cum uno equite Rom. rem habuerat, ac fortassis latere potuisset, nisi latius porrecta questio eam quoque involvisset. . . . Itaque odio admitti tanti sceleris non modo de convictis, sed de omnibus qui delati erant supplicium sumptum (3). — Marcia had to do with but one Roman knight, and perhaps might have escaped, had not the enquiry, being carried farther, involved her likewise. . . . Therefore, in detestation of the crime committed, not only those convicted, but all those informed against, were punished. It is a remarkable thing, and which shews very well the power of constitution, that the Vestals fell into incontinence, in spite of the dreadful punishment, and prodigious infamy, they were exposed to (4), and in spite of the actual punishment of their companions. Minutius Felix has touched upon this. 'Cum pæne in pluribus virginibus & quæ inconscienti se viris miscuissent, Vestæ sane nesciente, sit incestum vindicatum; in reclusis impunitatem secerint, non castitas tutor, sed impudicitia felicior (5). — When incest was punished in many Vestals, who had indiscreetly prostituted themselves, the rest escaped, not because they were chaster, but more fortunate in their amours.'

considerably. It was translated into English, Flemish, and High-Dutch (8). Note, that the French translation of the two books above-mentioned, has been several times printed. I make use of the first edition, which is that of Paris, 1582, in 8vo, and I have an edition in twelves of the three books of the Embellishment and Ornaments of the human body. It is of Lyons, 1594. There are abundance of particulars in this work, whether relating to the characters of the beauty of each part of the body, or to the means of rectifying disagreeable accidents. You there find a chapter (9) concerning the stink of excrements, and first of ordures. The author maintains, that this is a matter of importance; therefore, adds he, to render a damsel amiable, and in all respects agreeable, and to crown her beauty with all the perfections that can be desired in a handsome body, we shall enquire into the means of correcting the stink of her excrements, if excessive. It were ridiculous to complain, that delicate ears are offended at such discourses: but Physicians would be still more ridiculous, if they had regard to such complaints. They are obliged to write in this manner; it is their profession; Father Coton's reserves (10) are no rule to them.

[C] He returned into his native country.] Here is a passage of Patin. 'As for John Liebaut, he was a Burgundian Physician, who never made his fortune here. He was son-in-law to Charles Stephens, who died in the Chatelet greatly in debt. After his death, Liebaut went to Dijon to lay his bones in his native country. His wife was called Nicole Stephens, she was niece to the great Robert Stephens, who left Paris after the death of Francis I, finding himself deprived of his good master, and persecuted by the Sorbonnists, and retired to Geneva. Liebaut's book of the Distempers of Women is only a translation of Marinello, who had written it in Italian, under the title of the Comara (11). I know not, how to reconcile this with la Croix du Maine's words. Liebaud flourishes at Paris this year 1584; for if he lived then at Paris, he did not quit it a little after Charles Stephen's death, which yet Guy Patin's words seem to import. Note, that Charles Stephens died in 1566. It is not true that Liebaud's book upon the Dissemers of Women is only a translation of Marinello. I have not the first edition of this Italian's book, but only that of Venice, apresso Giovanni Valgriso, 1574, in 8vo. It is an edition, augmented and corrected (12), though not intitled la Comara, but le Med-

cine partenti alle infirmità delle donne. I have compared it with John Liebaud's book, and found it very different. It is true, the French author says several things, that were said by the Italian: but after all, he cannot be reputed a meer translator (13). Marinello had not the same scruples, as he who translated John Liebaud's book: he explained a hundred things in the vulgar tongue, which he had better have suppressed or have written in Latin (14). Mercklinus did not know this work of John Marinello, nor that de gli ornamenti delle donne, published a second time, by the same author, in 1574.

LIGARIUS (QUINTUS) lieutenant to Caius Confidius, who commanded in Africa in quality of proconsul, acquitted himself so well in this post, that the people passionately desired to have him for their governor when Confidius was recalled. They obtained their desire, and continued very well satisfied with the conduct of Ligarius. They would have made him their commander in chief, when they took arms at the beginning of the civil-war betwixt Cæsar and Pompey; but as he had a mind to return to Rome, he refused engaging in public affairs. He rested for a while, after Publius Accius Varus had accepted that command (a). This is what Cicero lets forth in his oration for Ligarius. He passes over other things in silence, and only confesses in general, that his party had embraced the interests of Pompey. It is probable that Ligarius had shewed himself very averse to Julius Cæsar's designs, who nevertheless gave him his life (b), after the defeat of Scipio, and the other generals, who had renewed the war in Africa, in favour of that cause, which Pompey had defended. This favour did not prevent Ligarius's living concealed out of Italy. His brother and friends, and particularly Cicero (c), omitted nothing to obtain Cæsar's leave for his return to Rome; and they had hopes of accomplishing it, when Tubero, in the midst of these transactions, formally declared himself Ligarius's accuser. Then it was that Cicero made that admirable oration for the accused, which in a very singular manner changed the intentions of Cæsar (A). Ligarius † Plutarch, in Cicero.

‡ Nihil foles obliuisci, nisi injuria. pro Lig.

Extat Ciceronis oratio, says he (3), satis pulcherrima, que inscribitur pro Q. Ligario. — There is extant a good pretty oration enough of Cicero's for Q. Ligarius. Beudeus thinks the word satis, ill placed before a superlative. It is answered (4) that the positive is often put instead of the superlative on such occasions. Very well, Pomponius's meaning then will be, that Cicero's oration for Ligarius is well enough. But this is a disproportionate encomium, and too dry. Cicero out-did himself both in the composition and in the action, and perhaps the success of his orations was never more remarkable. Cæsar did not deign to acquit Ligarius, and yet he did it, unable to withstand the emotions and workings in his soul, whilst Cicero was speaking. The accuser was vexed at the issue of his cause, that he renounced the bar (5), and betook himself to the profession of the Civil-law. Let us examine a passage in the work of a Jesuit upon the comparison of Demosthenes and Cicero. Consult also the Chevreauana (6).

Cicero . . . undertook the defence of Q. Ligarius, his friend, accused of having born arms against Cæsar, tho' he was obliged upon several accounts to continue in his interests. Cæsar, who had already condemned him in his heart, having however a curiosity to hear Cicero, whom he had not heard of a long time, by reason of his presence in the war, which he had now finished, said to one of his friends, who would have dissuaded him, What signifies it? Let us even hear him; my resolution is taken, and nothing that can be said for him shall alter it one way or other †. But this Orator spoke with so much force in his friend's defence, that he moved Cæsar's heart in spite of all the opposition and the resolutions he had taken not to suffer himself to be persuaded: and Cicero saying something of what passed at the battle of Pharsalia, in Cæsar's praise, this prince felt an extraordinary emotion throughout his whole frame; and, as if he had been perfectly enchanted by Cicero's discourse, he let fall the paper he had in his hands. In fine, he was not able to resist so many charms, nor that fine and delicate manner, in which he commended him ‡; and whatever resolution he had taken to withstand the Rhetoric of so powerful an Orator, he was forced to pardon Ligarius. I say nothing of a like favour, which Cicero obtained for king Dejotarus, and for his friend, Marcellus from this same emperor, who was such a master of his resolutions, and so hard to be persuaded (7).

Father Rapin is here by no means guilty of the fault so incident to the Sieur Varillas, an Historian, who never related an adventure, as he found it in his authors, but flourished and embroidered it after his own way: it is certain Plutarch expressed himself no less strongly than this Jesuit, as we may judge from the following words (8): 'It is reported, that, when Quintus Ligarius was prosecuted for having born arms against Cæsar, and Cicero had undertaken his defence, Cæsar said to his friends, what hinders, but that after so long a time (9), we should hear Cicero speak? It being long since concluded, that Ligarius is an ill man, and our enemy. But when Cicero began to speak, he wonderfully moved him, and proceeded in his speech with such a vehemence, and admirable grace, that Cæsar's countenance often changed; and it was very evident, that all the passions of his soul were in commotion. At length, the Orator touching upon the battle of Pharsalia, he was so transported, and agitated, that some of the papers he held fell out of his hands; and thus, being overpowered, he acquitted Ligarius.' Let us note two mistakes of father Rapin. He supposes that Cæsar had not heard Cicero of a long time: he is mistaken; for a few months before, Cicero had spoken the oration pro Marcello before him. Here is the proof of it: 'Fac igitur, quod de homine nobilissimo & clarissimo, M. Marcello fecisti. NUPER in curia, nunc idem in foro de optimis, & huic omni frequentie probatissimis fratribus. Ut concessisti illum Senatui, sic da hunc populo' (10). — As you lately pardoned M. Marcellus, at the request of the senate; so now pardon this man, at the request of the people. It would be some excuse to this Jesuit, if we could say that he followed Plutarch's narration; but after all, it is no entire justification, since he has followed him in a false fact. I add, that it is not certain, that this Greek author imputes to Cæsar, what the Latin and other translators pretend he does: the Latin version, printed with Plutarch's original, runs thus: Quid obstat quin Ciceroem tanto intervallo audiamus dicentem? This Latin answering to this Greek: Τί καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν ἀκούειν δὲ Χρῆνον Κικέρωνος ἀκούσαι λέγοντος. The question is, whether δὲ Χρῆνον in this place signifies, after a long time, was absolutely acquitted. He was no slave to notions of gratitude, for he became one of the accomplices of Brutus and Cassius [B]. I shall have two faults to charge upon father Rapin (d).

or whether it would not be better rendered a little time, as the learned Fabricius has done: Quid est causæ, he translates it (11), cur Ciceronem orationem aliquamdiu non audiamus? It may be objected perhaps, that this sense is somewhat absurd, since Cæsar did not mean to hear a part of Cicero's oration, and go out of the assembly before he had made an end. I answer that ἡδὲ χρόνος might, be a way of speaking amongst the Greeks, much like our English expression a little. Now when one says, Let us go a little to see such a thing; Let us go hear this preacher a little; what hinders, but we may go and hear such a one's funeral sermon a little? he does not mean to see or hear by halves, nor has he any design to go out of the church before the end of the sermon. This methinks is the most natural idea we can fix to Cæsar's words. The other error of Father Rapin is his supposing, that Cicero obtained the same favour for king Dejotarus, and Marcellus, as for Ligarius. Nothing is more untrue; for, in the first place, he did not procure Dejotarus's discharge (12); and, in the second place, it was not he, but the senate, that obtained Marcellus's pardon. The oration for Marcellus was only to give thanks for a favour, which Cæsar had granted at the request of the whole assembly. See what Cicero himself relates in a letter to Sulpicius (13).

[B] He was one of the accomplices of Brutus and Cassius. Plutarch will not permit us to doubt of this. Among Pompey's friends, there was one Caius Ligarius, whom Cæsar had pardoned, tho' accused for having been in arms against him. This man not being so thankful for having been forgiven, as is censured at that power, which made him need a pardon, hated Cæsar, and was one of Brutus's most intimate friends. Him Brutus visited, and finding him sick, O Ligarius, says he, what a time have you found to be sick in? At which words Ligarius raising himself, and leaning on his elbow, took Brutus by the hand, and said, But, O Brutus, if you are on any design worthy of your self, I am well (14). LIMEUIL (ISABELLA DE LA TOUR DE TURENNE (a), DEMOISELLE DE) maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, verified by her conduct a witty saying in the Menagiana (b), viz. that the function of maid of honour to a queen is a very difficult part. She sunk under the weight of it, in the face of the whole court; for she lay-in at the queen's palace without having been married. The Prince of Condé was the father of this child. A chronological dispute arose hereupon [A]. And besides, writers are divided

[A] A chronological dispute arose hereupon. This doubtless the too lovers never expected; they little imagined, that their carelessness should afford matter of dispute between authors a hundred years after; the fact is this. We will begin with these words of the General Criticism on the History of Calvinism (1). 'The prince of Condé, falling in love with one of the queen's maids, called Mademoiselle de Limeuil, said so many moving things to her, that they soon came to what we call the conclusion of the romance. She had a son by him, of whom she lay-in, in the reign of Charles IX, the twenty fifth of May, 1561, in the very palace of the Louvre: but the queen, who at that time had occasion for the prince to balance the overgrown power of the house of Guise, had compassion on humane frailty. Thus one of our wits speaks of this adventure in a kind of romance, intitled, The Prince of Condé, where we find several other very curious strokes of history, and very faithfully related. Another of the queen's maids had just such another disaster about two or three years after. Catherine de Medicis, perceiving that the prince loved this young lady, resolved to lay hold of this occasion for penetrating into his designs; and therefore advised her, who probably had no need of incitements, not to overact the part of a prude. Mezerai will tell you this story much better than I †. The queen endeavoured to captivate the prince of Condé by the charms of pleasure, and by the lure of one of her maids of honour, who, sparing nothing to serve her mistress, found herself indisposed for nine months, and was for some time the whole discourse of the court, where such sort of accidents give more diversion than scandal. The prince had another intrigue of note with the widow of the marshal of St André, and had married her, if the admiral had not ward-off the blow by proposing another match. . . (2) He made him such remonstrances † as obliged him to break off, by the conjugal bond, all his pernicious engagements with the marshal's widow, who, endeavouring to enamour the prince, fell so in love with him, as to purchase her satisfaction at the price of her estate of Valery, which she made him a present of.'

Several persons have found two remarkable falsities in this account; for it is not true, that Mademoiselle de Limeuil lay-in in the year 1561, and that another of the queen's maids of honour made the same slip with the prince of Condé some years after. Yet some opinators maintain, that the date in the romance, cited by Mr Maimbourg's critic, is just; and consequently, that the prince of Condé debauched two of Catherine de Medicis's maids of honour, one after another, in a short time. This consequence is most certain, if the author of the romance be not mistaken; for it cannot be denied, that one of this queen's maids of honour lay-in in 1564, after her familiarity with the prince; but once more, the author of the romance tells an untruth. It is neither a fault of the press, nor a poetical fiction, but an historical falsity. The whole series of the book manifestly shews that the author speaks of an intrigue, which preceded the imprisonment of the prince, and the sentence of death passed upon him in November 1560. The author therefore alone is answerable for the number 1561 and not the Printer. It cannot be said, that he antedated it designedly, from a liberty allowed in an epic poem, or in a romance; for, as his book has every where as exact dates, as those of Mezerai, whether concerning the death of Francis II, and of the king of Navarre, or concerning the prince's pardon, &c. we must suppose, that he designed to give the true date of the young lady's lying-in. The circumstances of the day, and month, and place, which he has carefully collected, confirm this opinion, since they signify nothing to the æconomy of the piece: he only touches upon them by the by, to quicken the attention of his reader, by a particularity seldom found in such sort of books. To what end should he antedate her pregnancy two years? The romance gains nothing by it: the intrigue might have been carried on as well by laying the scene of it two years after. The tenor of the book manifestly shews this. Our author therefore must have been deceived by his memoirs, in which 1561 had been put instead of 1564. I know those, who, after some reflexions on this matter, have imagined, that the Demoiselle de Limeuil was twice got with child by the prince, and that the author of the romance speaks of the first pregnancy, and Mr Mezerai of the second. I cannot think them in the right: for though the court of France was at that time very dissolute, it cannot be conceived, that a maid of honour should lie-in at the Louvre in 1561 and make the same false step three years after in the quality of maid of honour. Some measures were divided about the consequences of this adventure [B]. Some pretend, that the young lady was expelled the court [C], and others, that she lost not the queen's good graces were still observed, and some regard had to the public. Brantome, who speaks of this court, from his own certain knowledge, expressly affirms it (3). The most natural signification of his words is, that the maids of Catherine de Medicis had never a better time than while they lived with her, because they had full liberty either to taste of all the joys of marriage, or abstain, provided they had the art and industry to prevent pregnancy. There was therefore some disgrace to be feared, when they wanted this point of skill; for that queen acted almost like the Lacedæmonians, who did not punish the theft, but the want of cunning to conceal it. We shall presently see, that Mrs Limeuil was disgraced. They, who require proofs of it, form a horrible idea of Catherine de Medicis.

[B] Writers are divided about the consequences of this adventure. The best historians agree, that the queen-mother lent an hand to the amours of the prince, and of Mrs Limeuil. See, in the preceding remark (4), a passage of Mezerai: It is taken from his chronological Abridgment: here is another from his great history (5). 'The queen, having gained nothing by this method (6) . . . bethought her of another more subtle, which was to gain the prince by the lure of love and pleasures, by which the haughtiest souls are captivated without a struggle. She treated him with all the demonstrations of a cordial friendship, and entire confidence; she gave him the government of Picardy, the first subject of his discontent, and had all the respects paid him that are due to the first prince of the blood. Besides this, she had people suborned to amuse him with all kind of diversions; and the charms of the fair Limeuil, one of her maids, were so serviceable to her designs, that for some time he had laid aside all thoughts of any thing but her; which his wife Eleanor de Roye, a woman of severe chastity, discovering, died of grief; an accident that gave the queen a deal of joy, because this lady being of an imperious temper, and very zealous for the Huguenot religion, was the sharpest spur to quicken the courage of the prince. But, on the other hand, the royal palace, and her self, suffered great scandal from these love-intrigues; for Mrs Limeuil giving too much way to the prince's passion, was so imprudent, and so ill concerted her measures, as to lye-in in her wardrobe, in the face of all the world; for which reason she discharged her with disgrace, though she could not hinder her speaking somewhat too plainly of the occasion of her misfortune.' Mr Varillas has not forgot this intrigue. Let us see what he says of it.

(8) Id. ibid. pag. 343, 349.

'Love entred into the cause, and seconded the artifices of the queen. Mademoiselle de la Limeuil was the handsomest of her maids of honour, and the prince grew so fond of her, that the prince's his wife, perceiving it, died of jealousy. The queen, attentive to the least occasions of strengthening her power looked upon this conjuncture as the most favourable that could ever present itself. She fancied that, as the Chatillons had engaged the prince in heresy, by marrying him to their niece, so she might reduce him to the communion of the church, by giving him a young lady to wife, who had the honour to be her relation, whose charms might fix his inconstancy, and get out of him all the secret designs of Calvinism. In this thought, she ordered the young lady to omit nothing that might contribute to captivate the prince. But it was exposing a moderate virtue to too great a risque, to make it grapple with a lover, who took the least advantages in love, as well as in war, to push things to an extremity. The lady, feigning a kindness for the prince, became in love with him in good earnest, and, to her sorrow, was not the only person at court, whose heart was insensibly engaged (7). He afterwards relates the amours of the marechal de St André's widow, with this prince, and her extraordinary liberality to him, and then adds (8): 'Mademoiselle de Limeuil made reflexions, very wide of the truth on so uncommon an adventure; she supposed the prince less amorous, or more interested, than he really was, and imagined that, since he had accepted the estate of St Valeri, he designed, in good earnest, to marry the marechal's widow, her jealousy increased, to such degree, that, not having fortune enough to equal the liberality of her rival, she resolved to out-do her in granting the prince what was dearest to her in the world: the pregnancy, which soon followed, made her shame public, and she was ignominiously discarded the court.'

[C] Some pretend, that the young lady was expelled the court. Mezerai and Varillas affirm it, and there is no room to doubt the truth of it. A satirical author is of the same opinion, in a writing that is very injurious to the queen-mother: he owns, that the young lady was sent to a convent (9). Mr le Laboureur cites a fragment of this satire, which will stand properly enough in this place. I shall add to it Mr le Laboureur's preamble, because it assigns another cause of this prince's amour, and fixes the time when the lady was brought to bed (10). 'Amongst the other news, there was a talk of the fair de L . . . 's lying-in, one of the maids of honour; upon which occasion it may not be amiss to observe, that, after the peace of Orleans, the prince of Condé, continuing at court, thought he could not better remove all suspicions, than by plunging himself into the pleasures of the times, and getting a mistress. The queen, who thought it the surest chain to bind him, was not displeased that this maid, of one of the first families of the kingdom, hearkened to his vows and offers of service, not thinking perhaps, that this friendship would ever pass the bounds of gallantry. But, whether the maid could not resist his quality, and reasons of state conspired together, or rather the esteem of the prince; or that he hoped one day to marry him, as it is said he had promised her, in case Eleanor de Roy his wife, whose life was despaired of should die, as it happened the same year, she could not long hold out against ambition and love, and all was revealed by the birth of this son, during the progress to Lyons.' Thus speaks this libel (11).

I believe Mr D'Holier made those notes.

'The queen was the more offended at this disorder happening in her family, as it was too public to be concealed; but time wore it off, and the lady was married some time after.' The court came to Lyons, towards the middle of June, 1564. So that, since the lady lay-in, during the time of this progress, it may reasonably be supposed, that her child was born the twenty fifth of May the same year. Therefore the author of the romance has guessed right at the day, though not at the year.

[D] . . . and others, that she lost not the queen's good graces.] This is the opinion of the author of the forementioned romance. The queen, says he (12), who at that time stood in need of the prince of Condé, to balance the over-grown power of the house of Guise, had compassion on human frailty. He supposes, that the lady continued maid of honour to the queen, and that she tried to dissuade the prince from taking arms. 'Mademoiselle de Limeuil, says he (13), companion of Mademoiselle du Rouet (14), and maid of honour, as well as she, with whom the prince of Condé had formerly lived, even to a familiarity, which for some time incommode her, did all that was possible to change his passion for war, into a passion of another kind, in which the combat, to her knowledge, had something much more agreeable. She knew his inclination, and, valiant as he was, she doubted not but he was as sensible to love as glory. She wrote to him, and desired him to consider, that he was going to make war with a person, with whom he had some time been upon better terms, since her religion placed her in the number of his enemies.' This author is mistaken; for it is certain, the queen put her in a convent, and ordered her to be close confined (15). This ought not to be suppressed in the Discours merveilleux de la vie de Catherine de Medicis. Let us see what the author of this saître observes concerning la Limeuil. He says (16), that the prince of Condé began to be in love with her during his confinement, and that this young lady 'was one of the maids the queen-mother had set on to debauch him, every thing being lawful to ambition, provided it can compass its designs.' Having mentioned the peace concluded the eighteenth of March, 1563, he says (17), that the queen, 'to destroy the prince of Condé's reputation with his party, constantly treated him at the expence of the honour of Limeuil, who grew big with child. And the queen, to put the best face upon it that she could, pretending to storm at Limeuil, this young lady had the boldness to tell her, that she only followed the example of her mistress, and observed her commands.' This is all he says: sincerity required that he should have owned, that Limeuil was banished and cloystered.

[E] There are great variations on this head.] In the Discours Merveilleux, it is said, that the prince loved the lady Limeuil, from the time of his imprisonment, after the battle of Dreux: but Mr Mezerai, and Mr Varillas affirm, that his love commenced not till after the first peace. Varillas says, that the queen proposed to marry her to the prince, and that the young lady flattering herself with the hopes of this honour, stuck at no means for attaining it; but the other Historian attributes the hopes of marrying the prince to the wife of the marshal of St André alone. Varillas says, that the prince was loved by both these ladies at the same time, and that they rivalled each other, the one bestowing on him her estate, the other her maidenhead. Mezerai says nothing of this contest; he supposes (18), that the prince was a widower, when the queen projected a match between him and the marshal's widow: if so, what becomes of the rivalry mentioned by Varillas; that rivalry which made these two ladies strive which should be the most prodigal of her favours to the prince? This is only a chimera, according to Mezerai's opinion; for Eleanor de Roye was still alive (19), when Limeuil lay-in: and thus, before the prince was a widower, this lady had left the court in disgrace, and retired to a monastery. She did not therefore dispute the point with the marshal's widow, nor oppose the present of her maidenhead to the grant of the estate of Valeri Gatinos.

[F] She afterwards married Scipio Sardini, baron of Chaumont on the Loire, &c. a noble Lucchese.] I trust much more to the authors I have cited, than to the publisher of the Galanties of the kings of France.

Mademoiselle de Limeuil, says he (20), having lain-in, endeavoured to comfort herself for the loss of the great hopes she had conceived, by marrying Jeoffrey de Causac, lord of Fremon, who had loved her a long time, and whom she had neglected, ever since her intrigue with the prince of Condé. For the rest, Scipio Sardini had been one of the Italian farmers of the revenues, who made their fortunes in France, under Catherine de Medicis. I have read a contract (21) passed between the clergy of France and him, the fourth of March, 1588, for the offices of alternate receivers, and two comptrollers of the hereditary tenths in each diocese of this kingdom, and of other subsidies and duties. He is there called the noble Scipio Sardini, a Lucchese gentleman, living in the city of Paris, in the parish of St Severinus. It is doubtless the same Scipio Sardini, who took Badius into his house, and allowed him a pension (22); the same also, whom Bassompierre sometimes mentions in his memoirs, of whom I find this particular at the twenty first page of the Thusa. 'The life of Castruccio Castracani de gli Interminelli, written by Aldo Manucci, is very fine, and quite different from that written by Machiavel. . . . This life is very well worth the looking after: I never saw but one copy of it, and that was in the hands of the lord Scipio Sardini: he had it from one Interminelli, the same who had prevailed on Manucci to write this life.' I believe it is printed at Lucca, in 4to, in Italian. It is a fine piece.

[G] She rebuffed the constable of Montmorency.] I will tell the story just as I find it in Brantome. 'One day at the siege of Roan (23), as the queen went to the fort of St Catherine of Rouën, attended with her maids of honour, the constable having said something to her, and taking his leave of her, met Mademoiselle de Limeuil, one of the handfomest maids of the court, and who had wit at will, and he came on horseback to salute her, intending to have some discourse with her, and always called her his mistress, and would ride close by her side; for the good man was no enemy to beauty or love, either in words or deeds; for he had played some pranks in his youth, which I will not mention. Mademoiselle de Limeuil, who was not in her best humour that day, took little notice of him, for she could be proud enough when she pleased, and began to huff him strangely, and bid him be gone about his business, who said to her, Truly, my mistress, I am going; you rebuff me severely: it is but fit, answered she, that you should meet with somebody to rebuff you; since you make it your business to rebuff all mankind. Adieu then, said he, my mistress, I will leave you; for you have given me my own (24).'

shall set down a passage of Brantome, which is curious enough [H]. Her eldest sister, maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, died at court. Brantome speaks of her [I].

[H] I will produce a passage of Brantome concerning her, which is curious enough. I do not fear that the judicious will declare against my conjecture, when they have well examined the circumstances of the following story. It is difficult not to find in it Mademoiselle de la Limeuil, and the prince of Condé.

(21) Brantome, Memoires des Dames Galantes, Tom. II, pag. 332.

(25) He had been just speaking of the adventure of a certain very great foreign prince.

(27) I can scarce believe, that Mr. Limeuil continued her intrigue with the prince, after he was a widower; for he became so when she was in a monastery.

(25) I have known another prince, but not so great (26), who, during his first marriage, and his widowhood (27), fell in love with a very handsome young lady, to whom he made, during his amours and caresses, noble presents of carcanets, rings, jewels, and abundance of other fine things, and amongst them, a very fine and rich looking-glass, in which was his picture. Now the prince happened to marry a very handsome and virtuous princess, who made him disrelish his first love, though they were equally beautiful. This princess intreated and teased her husband to that degree, that he sent to demand of his first mistress, all the fine presents he had made her. This was a heart-breaking to the lady; however, she had a soul so great and noble, though she was not a princess, but of one of the best families in France, that she sent him back all his presents, and, amongst the rest, the looking-glass with his picture; but first, to grace it the more, she took a pen and ink, and fixed a pair of horns to the temples of his forehead, and delivering all to the gentleman, said to him; Here, friend, carry this to your master, which I send him just as I received it, having, for my part, neither added nor diminished, though something has grown to it since of its own accord; and tell that fine princess, his wife, who has so much importuned him to demand what he had given me, that, if a certain lord in the world (naming him, as I could do, if I pleased) had served her mother so, and re-demanded and resumed what he had given her for lying with her, she would be as poor in trinkets and jewels, as any lady at court; and her head, which is so loaded with them at the cost of such a lord, and heretofore of her mother, would be only decked with flowers out of the garden, instead of these jewels: but let her make her best use of them, I scorn to keep them. They, who knew this lady, would easily judge she gave this answer; and she told it me herself, for she was very free of discourse; however, she had like to have come by the worst, as well from the husband as the wife, who were equally affronted; but they ought to blame themselves; for why would they thus provoke and enrage this poor lady, who, it was said, had earned these presents dearly enough with the sweat of her brow. This young lady being one of the finest and most agreeable persons of her time, notwithstanding the use this prince had made of her body, met with a very rich match, though not of an equal family; so that happening to upbraid one another with the honour which each had done the other, she, who was so great, in marrying him; he answered her, I have done more for you, than you for me; for I have dishonoured myself to retrieve your honour, meaning, that, as she had lost it when a maid, he had repaired it, by making her his wife.

In these words (28); The elder Limeuil, at her first coming to court, happened to make a lampoon, (for she spoke and wrote well) upon all the court; which however was rather diverting than scandalous; but assure yourself, she (29) had her soundly jerked, with two of her companions, who were privy to it; and, but that she had the honour to be related to her by the house of Touraine, allied to that of Bologna, she had been ignominiously chastized, by the express command of the king (30), who detested such writings. In his elogy (30) of Catherine de Medicis, he observes that this young lady died at court. He tells us, in another place, a remarkable thing of her. 'During her sickness, says (31) Brantome, she (31) of which she died, she never left off discouraging; for she was a great talker, and of a satirical wit, which she exercised very seasonably and well, and was very handsome withal: when she came to her dying hour, she called her valet (for each of the maids of honour had one) whose name was Julian, and who play'd very well on the violin. Julian, said she, take the violin and play, till you see me dead (for I am going) The Defeat of the Swisse, the best you can. And when you come to the word all's lost, play it four or five times over in the dolefullest note you can; which he did, and she assisted him with her voice, and when they came to all's lost, she repeated it twice, then turning herself to the other side of the bed, she said to her companions, all's lost this instant in good earnest, and so expired. Here is a merry pleasant death; I have this story from two of her companions, who are worthy of credit, and who saw the scene.' They, who would give a catalogue of persons, who have died jesting, must not forget this young lady.

He lived afterwards at Rome, and was in great esteem with Hermolaus Barbarus. Being returned to England, he was appointed preceptor to prince Arthur, eldest Son to Henry VII, and dedicated to him the Latin Version of Proclus's Sphere [B]. He was pitched upon with two other Englishmen (a) for the translating of Aristotle: but this design was abandoned by his companions. He translated some tracts of Galen into Latin, and published a learned work de emendata Latini sermonis structura (C). He was Physician to the king of

[A] One of the learnedest persons of the XVth century. Consult Baillet and Pope Blount, who have collected the praises that had been given him, the former in the IVth Tome (1) of the Judgments of the Learned; the latter at the three hundred and seventy sixth, and three hundred and seventy seventh pages of his Censura celebriorum auctorum.

[B] He dedicated to prince Arthur, the Latin version of Proclus's sphere. Paul Jovius (2), and George Lilius (3), affirm it; and yet Erasmus tells us, this book was dedicated to Henry VII, who made no account of it, because an envious person had told him that it was not the first translation of Proclus. Thomas Linacero pessime cessit quod Proclum à se de novo versum Regi hujus patri dicat. Andreas quidam Tolosates (4) preceptor Arturi principis & in regnum paternum successuri, nisi mors anteverit, cecus adulator, nec adulator tantum, sed & delator pessimus, Regem admonuit hoc libelli jam olim fuisse versum à neicio quo; & erat, sed misere. Hanc ob causam Rex & munus aspernatus est, & in Linacrum velat in impostorem inexpiabile concepit odium (5). — Linacer succeeded very ill in dedicating his new translation of Proclus to the king, this prince's father. One Andrew of Toulouse, tutor to prince Arthur, who would have succeeded his father, if he had lived, a blind flatterer, and not only a flatterer, but a scandalous informer, told the king, that this book had been translated before; and it is true, it had been; but wretchedly. For this reason the king not only rejected the present, but conceived an inveterate hatred to Linacer as an impostor. Erasmus tells us on this occasion, a mad freak of Henry VII.

[C] He published a learned work de emendata Latini sermonis structura. It was often printed. I have only the Venice edition, apud Aldum, 1557, in 8vo. The preface preface is wanting. It had been dedicated to the princefs Mary, as we are affured in the following words (6): 'Sed & de emendata Latini ſermonis ſtrutura, ex præſtantiffimorum aucthorum obſervatione compoſitum volumen paulo antea, quam vita excederet, publicavit, adſcripta præfatiuncula Mariæ Henrici Octavi ex Catharina Hiſpana conjuge filia, laudiffimæ indolis & admirabili virtutum omnium contenta ad omnem gratiam promerendam natæ Principi, cui renovato prudentiffimi patris exemplo Henricus Rex Linacrum à tuenda ſanitate præſectum adhibuit. — Beſides, a little before his death, he publiſhed a book, De Emendata, &c. from what the beſt authors had obſerved, with a ſhort preface to Mary, daughter of Henry VIII, a princeſs of great abilities and virtues, to whom king Henry, after the example of his moſt prudent father, aſſigned Linacer as her Phyſician.' Mr Baillet (7), citing the page, from whence I take this Latin, ſays, that the author relates, that Erasmus and Budeus praïſed Linacer for having written this treatiſe. I do not find this in my edition.

[D] He bequeathed a houſe to the college of Phyſicians.] Theſe words are a tranſlation of thoſe of Georgius Lilius: Londini obiit, beneſta domo in ea urbe Medicorum Collegio ex teſtamento reliſta (8). Paul Jovius expreſſes himſelf thus: Honeſtam domum Londini Medicorum Collegio dedicavit (9). Neither of them have been exact; for it ſhould have been ſaid, that Linacer built the College of Phyſicians at London, and was firſt preſident of it. This is what is affirmed in his epitaph (10). It is ſaid alſo, that he founded three public lectures in Phyſic, two at Oxford, and one at Cambridge.

[E] He died at the age of ſixty four.] I ſhould have ſaid that he died in February 1525, had I followed the account of an Engliſh author, which has been priated with Paul Jovius; for theſe are his words, 'Londini obiit . . . ſepultus eſt in divi Pauli templo maximo, ad Septentrionalis portæ ingreſſum, eo ſere tempore, quo Franciſcus Gallorum Rex ad Ticinum in Ciſalpinis pugnans, à Cæſareanis ducibus capſus eſt (11). — He died at London . . . was buried in St Paul's church, at the entrance of the north gate, about the time when Francis, king of France, was taken by the Imperialiſts, at the battle of Pavia.' But it is better to ſay, with Mr Moreri, that Thomas Linacer died the twentieth of October 1524. Pope Blunt ſays ſo too (12); and yet he mentions this Phyſician's epitaph, in which the day of his death is fixed to the ſeventh of October 1524.

[F] Erasmus bigbly commends him, but makes him guilty of the ſame fault as Paulus Æmilius.] I paſs over the encomiums he has given him. They are to be found in his Ciceronianus, and in ſeveral places of his letters. I ſhall confine myſelf to his blaming him for having too nice a taſte. Nec multum abſuit ab hoc viro, ſays he (13), after the words you have ſeen above (14), where he deſcribes the humour of the hiſtorian Paulus Æmilius, Thomas Linacrus Anglus, vir undequaque doctiſſimus. He wrote a letter to him in 1521, in which he intreats him not to make the public languish, and deprive it ſo long of the works which were impatiently expected from his pen. He tells him, that it is to be feared his conduct will be rather thought a cruelty, than a modeſt precaution. 'At tu, ſi mihi permittis, ut libere tecum agam, ſine ſine premis tuas omnium erudiſſimas lucubrations, ut periculum ſit, ne pro cauto modeſtoque crudelis habearis, qui ſtudia hujus ſeculi tam lentâ torqueas expectatione tuorum laborum, ac tam diu fraudes deſideratiſſimo fructu tuorum voluminum. Fortaſſe terret te noſtrum exemplum, ſed etiam atque etiam vide, dum ſtudioſius vitas noſtram culpam, in diverſum deſectas (15). — But, to be free with you, by ſuppreſſing your learned writings, you run the riſque of being thought cruel, inſtead of cautious and modeſt, in that you keep us ſo long in expectation of your works.'

'Perhaps my example deters you; but take care, leſt, by carefully avoiding my fault, you run not into the contrary.' The fault our Linacer is blamed for is not very common with authors; and yet in ſome reſpects it may be thought too frequent; in general, it is not the bad or middling authors that are guilty of it, but the moſt excellent pens. It were to be wiſhed, that they, who publiſh ſo many bad pieces, and ill digeſted works, which are hardly of any uſe to the Republic of Letters, would overſtrain the maxim, That one ought to let a writing lie by in his cloſet for nine years (16). It were well if ſuch would run into an exceſs of delicacy, and never think they had finiſhed a compoſition. It rarely happens that they have a thought of this kind, though, if they frequently had, no one would be ſorry for it. But it is a miſfortune that a moſt ingenious man ſhould be like that famous Painter, who never knew when his pictures were finiſhed, and whoſe ſailing Apelles knew ſo well: 'Cum Protopogenis opus imenſi laboris ac curæ ſupra modum anxie miraretur (Apelles) dixit . . . omnia ſibi cum illo paria eſſe aut illi meliora: ſed uno ſe præſtare, quod manum ille de tabula non ſciſet tollere: memorabili præcepto, nocere ſæpe nimiam diligentiam (17). — Apelles, admiring the too laboured and over-finiſhed work of Protopogenis, ſaid . . . that himſelf either equalled, or was excelled by Protopogenis; but that in one particular he exceeded Protopogenis, in that the latter never knew when to have done: a remarkable precept, that too much diligence is hurtful.' Theſe words of Pliny are excellent; they contain a proverb, which Erasmus applies to the learned, of Linacer's taſte, and teach us, that a too forced and obſtinate exactneſs often marſ the whole work. I will give you Erasmus's application of it. 'Peculiariter autem conveniet (proverbium, manum de tabula) in quodam ſcriptores plus ſatis accuratos, & moroſe cujuſdam diligentia, qui ſine fine premunt ſuas lucubrations, ſemper aliquid addentes, adimentes, immutantes, & hoc ipſo maxime peccantes, quia nihil peccare conantur (18). — The proverb (manum de tabula) is very applicable to certain writers, more accurate than enough, and auſterely careful, who are for ever altering their works, and offending in the very endeavour not to offend.' But what comes of this over ſcrupulous exactneſs? why, much loſs to the public, and much prejudice to the authors who aim at it. The public is too long deprived of the good it might reap from the compoſitions of great authors, even tho' they ſhould fill ſhort of the perfection which they might have given them; nay, it is often deprived of them for ever; becauſe they die, before they have diſpoſed of them in a method, from whence their friends, or executors, might draw any advantage. They, who compoſe with too difficult a judgment, and correct their productions with extreme ſeverity, are at laſt diſcouraged by the labour, and afraid of touching their own work. They look on it as a rack, and painful buſineſs, and delay as much as poſſible the ſetting their hand to it; the remembrance of the fatigue they have been at in altering one page, makes them dread the event; ſo they ſuffer whole months to paſs without returning to the painful task; and thus, while we imagine that their book is far advanced, becauſe we know it has been in hand for ten or twelve years, nothing is found except perhaps ſome rough draughts, and diſjointed pieces; and it often happens, that they die before the work has received it's form. Hereby they deprive themſelves of the glory they might aſpire to. Some are more happy: they are indefatigable, and by aſſiduous filing and poliſhing their compoſitions, without any intermiſſion, they at laſt find them worthy of public notice; but the pains they are at to pleaſe themſelves very often marſ all; for there is a certain degree of correctneſs, beyond which nothing can be done, but what, inſtead of perfecting the work, and giving it more nerves and ſtrength, weakens and diſpirits it. 'Perfectum opus abſolutum, que eſt, nec jam ſplendescit limâ, ſed atteritur (19).

is, of being not easily satisfied with his own works, and revising and touching them over too often.

— It is a perfect and finished work; but the file, instead of brightening, has worn it away. Pliny the younger, who uses these words in one of his letters, makes use of the same thought in another place, to shew his friend the mischief of an over-correctness. Diligentiam tuam in retractandis operibus valde probat. Est tamen aliquis modus, primum, quod nimia cura deterit magis, quam emendat; deinde, quod nos à recentioribus revocat, simulque nec absolvit priora, & inchoata posteriora non patitur. Vale (20).

(20) Id. ibid. Epist. xxxv. lib. ix.

I very much approve your diligence in revising your works. Yet is there some measure to be observed; first, because too much care rather spoils, than amends; in the next place, because it neither suffers you to finish one piece, nor begin another. Quintilian, another great master, lays down the same principle, and explains it admirably, and declares, that a writing, by continual mending and new molding, loses its natural force. The sound parts, says he, are cut off, the blood drained, and it looks like a body covered with scars: how fine is his expression! Et ipsa emendatio finem habet. Sunt enim qui ad omnia scripta tanquam vitiosa redeant; & quasi nihil fas sit rectum esse quod primum est, melius existiment quicquid est aliud, idque faciant quoties librum in manus resumpserint, similes medicis etiam integra secantibus. Accidit itaque ut cicatricosa sint, & exanguia, & cura peiora. Sit igitur aliquando quod placeat, aut certe quod sufficiat; ut opus poliat lima, non exeret (21). The Orator Calvus was an instance of this. He set up too severe a court of Inquisition against his own writings, and by disciplining them over rigorously, and to a degree of superstition, broke the constitution, and even the heart of them. *Accuratus quoddam dicendi & exquisitus afferebat genus: quod quamquam scienter elegantissime tractabat, nimium tamen inquirens in se, atque ipse sese observans, metuensque ne vitiosum colligeret, etiam verum sanguinem deperdebat. He set the example of a more accurate and correct style; in which though he excelled, yet, by too severely criticising himself, and studying, to avoid faults, he lost real beauties. Thence his style was weakened thro' too much niceness. Quintilian calls it self-calamny (23). Here is a metaphor, which a modern author has made use of on this occasion. There are some barren wits, says he, who, having made an effort once in their life, never leave combing it, till they have plucked the very hairs off, and after all it proves an abortion (24). We may reckon Sannazar in the number of the moderns, who have been troubled with Calvus the Orator's distemper. We cannot forbear blaming this Poet's making his poem groan and cry under the file for so long together, and his having too much worn and weakened it, under pretence of polishing it more and more (25).

The remarks I have made on this occasion, will not be thought foreign by those who consider what I had to prove. I was to shew, that the pains Linacer took to satisfy himself in his compositions was a fault. This seeming a paradox, it was necessary to reason upon it, and to produce authorities. But I desire it may be remembered, that this does not universally respect all those, who vigorously apply themselves to refine and reform their writings. They do well, and are very commendable, provided they run not into excess (26). The only thing that can with any colour of reason be blamed, is the intemperance in this point. Nem amo nimium diligenter, said a noble person among the ancient Romans (27). I have two things to say before I conclude. There are some authors, who are a hundred times harder to be pleased in the beginning, than in the sequel of their work. Rasures, blots, alterations, and other symptoms of a dissatisfied judgment, appear chiefly in the first lines of the original. This has been observed in the manuscript of a tract of Plato (28), and of that of Petrarch. Here is a passage of Muretus, in which Ariosto is taxed with the same nicety. Audi vi à maximis viris, quique id facillime nosse poterant: Ludovicum Ariostum, nobilissimum nobilissime domus præconem, in duobus primis grandioribus illius poematis sui versibus plus quam credi potest laborasse, neque sibi prius animum explere potuisse, quam cum illos in omnem partem diu multumque versasset. Idem accidit & nobilissimo Etruscorum poetarum Francisco Petrarchæ: cujus ex autographo, quod habuit vir præstantissimus Petrus Bembus, facile cernitur, eum in limando secundo item poematum suorum versu sæpe sudasse (29). I have been told by very great men, and such as could very easily know it, that Lewis Ariosto took incredible pains about the two first verses of that greater poem of his, nor was satisfied till he had turned them every way. The same happened to the famous Tuscan Poet Francis Petrarch: from whose own manuscript, in the hands of Peter Bembus, it is easily seen, that he took repeated pains in polishing the second verse of his poem. Mr de Vigneul Marville says, 'there are writers, who are infinitely at a loss how to begin, but run apace, when once the way is opened. The first lines of Thuanus's history cost him more pains than all the rest; but, when once he had conquered that difficulty, he made great speed.' The other thing I have to say, is, that there are authors, who, revising a work they desire to reprint, are at greater pains, than at the first composition. They apply themselves with more pleasure and scrupulousness to correct a printed copy, than a manuscript. But for the most part it is lost labour; for there are few, who compare editions, and, unless they be patiently and skillfully compared, the importance of the corrections is not perceived. Such a place of a second edition, which contains no more lines than the first, or even not so many, is changed from lead to gold (30); but where are those, who perceive this? I have spoke elsewhere (31) of those, who write with difficulty, or without it, and I shall speak of them again elsewhere (32).

LINGELSHEIM (GEORGE MICHAEL) Preceptor, and afterwards counsellor to the elector Palatine (a), flourished in the beginning of the XVIIth century. He was born at Straßburg (b). He has been reckoned the author of a book, intituled, Idolum Hallense, in which Lipsius is severely handled [A]. He held a correspondence by letters

[A] He has been reckoned the author of a book . . . in which Lipsius is severely handled.] He sent copies of it to his friends (1), and demanded their opinion of it with an eagerness, as if he had been the author. It was therefore excusable to judge him the author of the Idolum Hallense. Scaliger, that great critic, went upon other reasons; he thought he discovered Lingelsheim's genius in this work. Autor de Idolo Hallensi est Lingelsheim, said he (2). He it was that sent me a copy . . . I discover in the Idolum Hallense the turns of Lingelsheim's wit; I know him very well; he sent me the book, and desired me to write him my judgment on it. This was what he said in conversation; he confirmed it in a letter he wrote to Lingelsheim, concerning the Idolum Hallense (3), in which he ascribed this work to him, and commended him much for it; but he was afterwards informed, that Denaisius was the author of it. Lingelsheim, said he (4), wrote to me, that

Denaisius, assessor of the Imperial chamber, is the author of the Idolum Hallense; and, because he lives among the Jesuits, he desires not to be named. Mr Placcius has very well observed, that the judgment of this top-critic was not always to be relied upon. Hæc sane vice erravit, & infeliciter crisin suam, quam ipse semet tantopere prædicare solebat, exercuit Heros ille Criticorum Hypercriticus (5). For this time at least he was mistaken; and this hypercritical hero of critics employed his judgment, which he so cried up, unsuccessfully. He cites Melchior Adam (6), who has ascribed this work to its true author Peter Denaisius: he observes, that Colomies was ignorant of the truth of this affair, having said, in two places (7), that Lingelsheim was the author of this book. Baudius conjectured like Scaliger, affirming, that the public voice was agreeable to his conjecture; so true it is, that the skillfullest are subject to err, in conjectures of this kind. 'Viro gravi & sapienti Johanni Lingelsheimio officiosam salutem nunciari cupio. Conscientia fama est eum esse auctorem libelli de Idolo Hallensi adversus Lipsium, & id ipse conjeceram cum primum in manus meas venit. Non est quod patrem pudeat suæ prolis, cum non puduerit tantum virum tales nugæ effutire in dedecus antepartæ famæ (8).

— I desire you would complement the learned Lingelsheim in my name. It is generally reported, that he is the author of the book intitled, The Idol of Hall, against Lipsius, and I guessed so when it first came into my hands. A father need never be ashamed of his offspring, since so great a man was not ashamed to publish such trifles to the disgrace of the character he formerly obtained. Mr Teissier (9) has followed the crowd. In all appearance, Lingelsheim told Bongars, that Denaisius was the author of this Idol of Hall; see his 157th letter. For the rest, this book was printed in 1605, in 4to, with this title, Dissertatio de Idolo Hallensi Justo Lipsii mangonio & phaleris exornato atque producta. I have read in a letter of Lingelsheim (10), that Goldast was thought the author of this book, and that the Amphitheatrum honoris ascribes it to Scaliger. Another letter of Lingelsheim informs us, that Goldast had the care of the impression, and that this created him many enemies; for this book exasperated the Jesuits beyond measure. 'Quam gaudeo probari tibi scriptum de Idolo, certe omnium bonorum cum magno applausu acceptus est; sed faciet illæ scholasticæ commoverunt nostros Academicos, adeo ut Rector distractionem libelli edicto inhibuerit, & jam vindictam spirant magistri, eo quod nimis contumeliosus sit interpres in totum ordinem, & quia Goldastum editorem hujus ludi ex typographo cognoverunt, & filius & telis in illum insurgunt, atque etiam aulicos in partes trahunt, quos nimis rusticatim ille tetigerit (11).

— I am pleased that you approve the book of the Idol; it meets with a general applause; but our Academicians are so offended at these scholastic jests, that the rector has prohibited the sale of the book, and the masters now breathe revenge, because the commentator is too severe upon the whole order, and they know that Goldast published it; and they even draw the courtiers to their side, whom he has too bluntly attacked. In another letter he observes, that the Carmelite (12), who answered for Justus Lipsius, cast a thousand reproaches upon Bongars, and looked on him as author of the Idol. Lingelsheim would have had Bongars demand justice against him from the French ambassador: 'Indignatus sum quum reperi anagramma sus obnigra, ubi monastico acumine suspicionem suam prodit quasi tu autor esses. Cogitavi, an per Oratorem Regium qui Bruxellæ est, si est tibi amicus, negotium bestia illi creari posset ob atroces injurias quas in te effundit, cum tamen author libri non sis, & quam voluptatem in maledicendo cepit, eandem in lite molesta & infamia quæ condemnatos injuriarum manet, perdat (13).

— It moved my indignation, when I met with the anagram sus obnigra, in which, with a monkish sharpness, he betrays his suspicion as if you were the author. I considered, whether you might not harass him by means of the king's ambassador at Brussels, if he is your friend, in revenge for the reproaches he throws upon you, though you be not the author of the book, and rob him of the pleasure he has taken in calumniating by the disgrace attending those who are convicted of calumny. Lipsius answered nothing: it was the best thing he could do; his friends turn this silence to his honour; they said he generously despised his adversary, and, like a mastiff who keeps on his way, without turning aside to worry a little cur that barks at him he would not lessen himself by a contest with this anonymous author. This is the general way of speaking, when people know not what to answer. Exinde maledicta acerbiora nescio quis terræ filius, Idoli Hallensis (6) Lucianeam blasphemiam igne Tartareo expiandam! titulo ementito, sparsit in vulgus. Sed prudentioribus amicis suadentibus, Lipsius filuit, & judicio contempsit, atque adeo contemptu solo novum istum Porphyrium vincendum esse censuit. Sic fere generosior molossus importunum catulum flolide adlatrantem præterit, nec dente aut pugna dignatur (14).

[B] It is a mistake to affirm, that he was Bongars's secretary, and that he published the letters, which passed between them. I say this against the learned Mr Morhof, whose words are these (15): 'Bongarsii & Lingelsheimii (16) epistolæ, editæ sunt Argentor. ann. 1660. in 12 (17). Erat Bongarsius vir suo tempore magni nominis sub Henrico IV, negotiis publicis sæpe admotus. . . . Lingelsheimius iidem vir in publica dignitate constitutus, & ad Helvetios legatus, olim Bongarsio ab epistolis literas Bongarsianas una cum suis publicavit; fuit enim inter illos commercium literarum mutuum. — The letters of Bongars and Lingelsheim were published at Strasburg in 1660, in 12mo. Bongars was a man of a great reputation in the reign of Henry IV, being often employed in public affairs. . . . Lingelsheim likewise bore a public character, being sent ambassador to the Swiss: he likewise published the epistolary correspondence between himself and Bongars. Compare this with the Bookeller's preface, and you will wonder how ingenious men should be imposed upon in so egregious a manner. The fate of authors is deplorable; for even when they fancy they apply their strongest attention, they mistake the sense of a most easy passage: I much fear, this has often been my own misfortune. Here is what the Bookeller of Strasburg declares before his edition. 'Leges hic Bongarsii & Lingelsheimii Epistolas multa eruditione & variis prudentiæ documentis plenas, beneficio Nobilissimi Amplissimiæque dignitatis viri qui Inclytæ Reip. ad Helvetios legatus à clarissimo viro Dn. Francisco Veyrazio eas ut lucem viderent, accepit. Has venerandus hic senex qui in contubernio illustri Bongarsii duodecim annos, eadem ab epistolis vixerat, descripsit integras. — You will here read the learned and judicious letters of Bongars and Lingelsheim; for which we are indebted to a very great man, who, being ambassador to the Swiss, received them from the learned Francis Veyraz, in order to publish them. This venerable old man, who lived twelve years with the illustrious Bongars, and wrote his letters for him, transcribed them entire. The Bookeller speaks here of two persons; of the first without naming him, and of the second under the name of Francis Veyraz. The latter gave the letters to the other, who had been sent on a deputation from the town of Strasburg to the Swiss cantons. It is doubtless of Veyraz, that we must understand what the Bookeller declares in the last part of the passage before-mentioned: it is he who was secretary to Bongars twelve years; it is he who copied the letters, which this Bookeller published. Lingelsheim had been long dead, when they saw the light. Thus Mr Morhof is mistaken several ways (18).

LINGENDES (CLAUDIUS DE) one of the most famous preachers of the XVIIth century, was born at Moulins in 1591, and became a Jesuit at Lyons in 1607. He taught Rhetoric and the Belles Lettres for some time; but, as he had a wonderful talent for the pulpit, he applied himself mostly to preaching, and got such a reputation, that few preachers were thought to equal, but none to excel him (a). He was rector of the college of Moulins for eleven years, and afterwards provincial of the province of France. He was thrice deputed to Rome, to the general assemblies of the society, and died at Paris, superior of the professed house, the 12th of April 1660 (b), not in the year 1666, as Moreri assures us. His sermons were published after his death. I shall say something of them them that is very remarkable [A]. He published but two books [B].

[A] I shall say something of his sermons that is remarkable. I shall only set down what Mr Gallois has said, speaking of the sermons upon all the Lent gospels, by the reverend Father de Lingendes, printed at Paris in two volumes in Octavo, in 1666. It is very surprizing that Father de Lingendes, whose eloquence all France admired, should never study his expressions, but was so unconcerned in this point, that he composed in Latin, the sermons he was to preach in French: the truth is, this great man considered only the force of reasoning, the vehemency of the passions and the nobleness of his figures; he was of the opinion of that antient, who looked upon a discourse as finished, when he had nothing to provide, but the words. After the death of this father, several of his sermons were published, which were found written with his own hand, and there are already two editions of them (1). But that language not being understood by every body, a great many wished they might see them in French. The thing seemed to be the easier, as there would not be so much as the trouble of translating them. For his sermons, having been copied by several transcribers, as he preached them, it was thought there was no more to do, but to collect and publish them just as they found them. Nevertheless, the diversity, which appeared between the different copies of the same sermons, shewed that they were not faithfully taken; it was therefore thought proper to translate these sermons from the original Latin, yet without neglecting these French manuscripts, the expressions whereof have been retained as near as possible. The transitions have also been added, the polishing, and some few ornaments, with which the heat of discourse furnished him, and which are found in all the manuscripts of the writers, though not in the Latin text: so that the French edition is not a bare translation of the Latin. But the difference between them is, that the Latin gives these sermons just as the author wrote them; the French as they were delivered from the pulpit: the first shews the analysis of the discourse, the second the parts joined together; the one is more useful to those who would make sermons, the other proper for those who would only read them. The Latin edition is also much larger than the French. For of all the sermons in the former, only the most excellent have been culled out, and just as many as are to make a course for Lent (2).

[B] He published but two books. One in Latin, and the other in French. Votivum monumentum ab urbe Molinensi Delphino oblatum anno, 1639, in 4to. Counsels for the conduct of life.

(2) Journal des Savans, April 4, 1667, pag. m. 154.

LINGENDES (JOHN DE) native of Moulins, and cousin to the former, was a celebrated preacher, and by that means rose to the bishopric of Sarlat, and afterwards to that of Mâcon. He made the funeral oration of Lewis XIII at St Denis. It was printed a little after (a). He was preceptor to the count de Moret [A], natural son to Henry IV in 1619. The poet de LINGENDES was his cousin [B]. This family is still in being [C].

[A] He was appointed preceptor to the count de Moret. He did not stay long with him the first time; for by I know not what underhand management, against the intention even of Madam the countess of Moret, and her brothers the chevalier de Buell, and de la Perrière, Croisilles was substituted in his place, who had formerly been the most agreeable person in the world to them. The count suffered this change, though he loved de Lingendes; but he did not hate Croisilles, and thought it best to obey the king cheerfully. . . . Afterwards de Lingendes was restored (1).

[B] The poet de LINGENDES was his cousin. Here is what the same abbot de Marolles says of him (2). He wrote with reputation in 1607, and 1610; and we have a poem of his upon the birth of the duke of Retelois, and that other so famous upon the banishment of Ovid, which is prefixed to Nicolas Renouard's translation of the Metamorphosis. By striving to imitate Politian, if we believe Colletet (3), he became at last more polite in some of his pieces, than Politian himself.

[C] This family is still in being. NICOLAS DE LINGENDES, brother to the bishop of Sarlat, was steward of the king's household. He was sent into Spain to negotiate the marriage of Lewis XIII with Anne of Austria. His first wife was Mary d'Abra de Raconis, aunt to Charles de Raconis, bishop of Lavaur, and he had by her CHARLES DE LINGENDES, steward to the king, sub-dean of the knights of St Michael, and father to JOHN AUGUSTINE DE LINGENDES, captain of horse (4).

LIPPOMAN (ALOISIO) a native of Venice [A], was one of the learned prelates of the XVIth century. He discharged several nunciatures with the reputation of an able minister. The first was, as I take it, that of Portugal. He was bishop of Modon, and coadjutor of Verona, when he was sent from Bologna to Rome, together with some other prelates (a), to plead in the cause about translating the council in 1548 [B]. He gave his opinion peremptorily in this assembly against the plurality of benefices, as Father Paul observes (b), who, besides, gives him the commendation of having lived exemplarily (c). After the interruption of the councils (d), he was sent nuncio into Germany in 1548, from whence Pope Julius III recall'd him two years after (e). The year following, he made him one of the three presidents of the council (f). Paul IV sent him into Poland in 1556, to stop the progress of the protestants (g). He preferred him to the bishopric of Bergamo in 1558, and made him his secretary (h). Lippoman died the 15th of August 1559 (i). He published several books [C]. It is said, that he exer-

The Catena in Genesim, was printed at Paris, in folio (3), 'by Charlotte Guillard, in the year 1546. It is a very good impression. He came himself to Paris to speak with the widow, and prevailed with her to postpone a great work (4), which the university impatiently expected, to go on with the impression of the second volume, Catena in Exodus, which was finished in 1555. It is printed in the same form, and with the same beauty, as the former. These editions are intermixed with Greek, Hebrew, and all sorts of good characters.

'characters.' I know not how to reconcile this with several good catalogues, which say, that the Catena in Exodus was printed at Paris, in the year 1550. Lippoman's other works are, Catena in aliquot Psalmos. A compilation of lives of the saints, in eight volumes. Confessione di tutti gli dogmi Catholici, con la subversione di tutti i fondamenti de' moderni heretici, at Venice, 1553. Espostioni volgari sopra il simbolo apostolico, il pater noster, &c.

[D] It is said, that he exercised great cruelty against the sectaries in Poland.] According to the author, whom I am about to cite, Lippoman was the first apostolic nuncio, that was seen in this country. He put to death some Jews, to terrify the Heretics. He suborned and bribed certain accusers, who made oath, that a woman had sold an host to some Jews, and that these miscreants had, with the prickings of needles, drawn a vial of blood from it, to heal the wound of circumcision. The king's order was (unreputiously obtained for burning them. They insisted on their innocence at the stake. The king, being informed how the matter was carried, conceived a great indignation against Lippoman. Nevertheless, a narrative of the whole affair was drawn up in the king's name, and sent to Rome, to swell the catalogue of miracles in the archives. I shall set down the words of a Polish writer, who tells us this. He begins by reproaching Lippoman with his mean extraction (5). 'Primus id officii apud nos gessit Aloysius Lippomanus Venetus, homo, ut facta testantur, perversax & crudelis. Quod tanto minus mirandum, quando Asperius nihil est humili cum surgit in altum. Dicebatur enim cum incerto parte fuisse natus. Hunc quamprimum Nuncios Terrarum in Comitio viderent, extemplo eum compellunt: Salve progenies viperarum. Talem se reipsum fuisse Lippomanus probavit. Videns enim dogma eorum de Sanctissimo, ut vocant, Sacramento in magno verari discrimine, coacto Loviciano Pontificum omnis generis conventu, e re sua iudicantur exemplum severitatis, vel potius feritatis, ad incutendum populo sibi parenti metum, & dissentientibus horrorem in aliquo ex infima vulgi fece ideoque impuniis statui. Hinc impetu in Judæos quam odio publico laborantes, tam innocentis præditi defectos, factos, tres de grege eorum & feminam quandam Dorotheam Laziciam in vincula coniecerunt. Capita accusationis hæc fuerunt: Laziciam cum de more solenni ante Paschatos festum ad Sacram communionem accederet, occulatam in ore hostiam Judæis vendidisse: hos acubus eam confixisse: inde ampullam sanguinis, quo ad sanandum infantium circumfisorum vulnus opus habeant, collegisse. (6). Mandata nomine Regio ad Borcum (7) per dispositos equites misere, ut Judæos ex mente Legati Apotolici & Spiritus S. (scilicet) concilium Lovicensis regentis ad rogum damnetur. Lata in Judæos sententia. "Hi ad rogum deducti palam liberè dicere: Nunquam nos hostiam emimus vel acubus confiximus: Nos enim nequaquam credimus hostiæ ineffe Deo corpus: Imò scimus Deo nullum corpus, sanguinemve esse: et more Majorum credimus, Messiam non futurum fuisse ipsum Deum, sed ejus unctum & Legatum: Comptum quoque habemus farinæ nihil ineffe sanguinis. Testamur ad ultimum nos nullo sanguine opus habere." His auditis crudelitatis Lippomanianæ & Pontificiæ administri picem ardentem ori miserosum infuderunt. Tam horrendum omni ex parte facinus monumentis Romanis infernum & pro miraculo vulgatum, Regis nomine, ad conciliandum rei fidem, adpositio. Id scripti a Myscovo traditum

‘ Regi, indignationem & iram ejus excitavit, animum-que a Lippomano avertit. Huic rex in os dicere non erubuit, se facinus illud imane detestari; & nequaquam adeo mente captum esse, ut hostie illi languinem ineffe credat. ——— Alfio Lippoman was the first, who bore this office among us; a man, as his actions testify, of prudence and cruelty. Which is the less to be wondered at, as nothing is so insolent as a mean man exalted to a high station. For it was said, that it was not known who was his father. No sooner did he appear in the assembly, but he was saluted, by the nuncios of the Palatin-nates, with, Hall offspring of vipers! And indeed Lippoman proved himself such. For seeing their doctrine concerning the most holy sacrament, as they call it, to be in danger, they, in a general assembly of the Roman Catholic priests at Lowitz, resolved to make a severe example of some one among the vulgar, in order to terrify the rest; which they thought they might the more safely do Hence taking occasion to attack the Jews, who were not only publicly hated, but destitute of the defence of innocence, they imprisoned three of them, together with a woman named Dorothea Lazinski. The heads of their accusation were, that Lazinski, coming to the sacrament before Easter, had sold the host, which she kept concealed in her mouth, to the Jews; that the latter had pricked it with needles; and thence had collected a vessel full of blood, which they wanted to cure the wounds occasioned by circumcision in infants They sent the king’s mandate by horse-men to Borcus, the governor, ordering him, in obedience to the decree of the apostolic nuncio, and the Holy Ghost (an’s please you) presiding in the council of Lowitz, to condemn the Jews to be burnt. Sentence was accordingly passed upon the Jews. When they were brought to the stake, they made this free and open declaration: “ We never bought the host, nor pricked it with needles; for we by no means believe the body of God to be in the host; nay, we know, that God has no body, nor blood; and, after the opinion of our forefathers, we believe, that the Messiah will not be God himself, but his anointed, and messenger: we likewise know full well, that there is no blood in bread-corn: and we affirm to the last, that we have no need of blood.” When they had said this, the ministers of Lippoman’s and the Papist’s cruelty, poured burning pitch down these poor wretches’ throats: and this horrid act was inserted in the Roman archives, and published as a miracle, the king’s name being put to it, to gain belief to a fiction. The king being informed of the matter, by letters from Miscowski, was enraged, and conceived great indignation against Lippoman. He even told him to his face, that he detested that abominable action, and that he never was so senseless, as to believe there was any blood in that host.” Du Saussai takes notice, that Lippoman was so hated by the sectaries, that he had like to have lost his life several times by assassinations (8).
Spondanus (9) pretends, that the miracle, manifested at that time on the host in the hands of these wretched Jews, was founded on three reasons: the last was, that the nuncio Lippoman, vilified by the libels of the Heretics, and running the risk of his life, stood in need of such a providence, to procure him a greater authority. Stanislaus Hosius, bishop of Warmia, expressed great indignation at Peter Paul Vergier, who dedicating a book to the king of Poland, had challenged Lippoman the apostolic nuncio to a public dispute, whereof the king was to be judge (10).

LIPSIUS (JUSTUS) was one of the learnedest critics that flourished in the XVIth century. I could relate a great many curious things concerning him; but as others (a) have already collected them, and have not even forgot what relates to his education, and early attainments (b), I think my self obliged to speak only of their omissions. One of the greatest faults Lipsius is reproached with, is his inconstancy in point of religion [41]

[A] One of his greatest faults is his inconstancy in point of religion.] Dr Schlusselfburg's account will not stand amiss in this page, which teaches us, that Lipsius reckoned it the same thing to be Lutheran, Calvinist, or Papist. 'Talis ambiguae Pe-lagicæ fidei erat Luciani similis, cothurno versatilior & Epicureus Philofophus, Iustus Lipsius, olim

 torem Lutheranæ religionis agebat, & jurjurando

 & divinam veritatem agnoſcere, Romanicæ antichriſtianæ idolatriæ

They ground that reproach on this, that being born a Catholic, he embraced Lutheranism, whilst he was professor at Tēna (c). Afterwards, being returned into Brabant, he lived there as a Catholic, and then having accepted a professorship in the university of Leyden, made profession of what they call Calvinism. At last he quitted Leyden, and returned into the Spanish Netherlands, where he not only lived in the Roman communion, but even fell into an effeminate bigotry; which he discovered in his printed books [B.] The idololatram & blasphemiam damnare. At Lugdunum Batav. veniens, fiebat Apostata, ut Pelargus, abnegabatque agnitam & adprobata veritatem; quamvis hoc diffiteretur, dicens se Christianum esse, nec Christum deseruisse, nec abnegasse. Id de hoc viro verè dicere & testari possum. Nam cum ad ipsum anno Christi M.D.LXXXII. æstivo tempore in reditu meo ex Antverpia, in Academia Leideni, ubi Professor erat, inviserem, ut veterem amicum, & ex illo quærerem, qui rationem reddere posset, defectionis suæ à vera Religione, quam Jenæ anno M.D.LXXXII. confessus esset, à Christo, quem abnegasset & deseruisset; respondebat mihi in domo sua & in præsentia M. Henrici Latomi Ecclesiastæ olim Antverpiensis: Mihi Schlussemburgi, vetus amice & Collega; Ego Christum non abnegavi, nec deserui, licet hic Lutheranam doctrinam non profitear, & cum Calvinianis converter. Nam omnis Religio & nulla Religio sunt mihi unum & idem. Et apud me Lutheranæ & Calvinistarum doctrina pari passu ambulant. Cohorrens ad hæc, dicebam: mi Lipsi, si ea in opinione maneris, malè tecum ageatur, facileque credo, cum hæc Religio æquè tibi probetur ac illa, te tandem Pontificum futurum, qualis initio fuisti. Ad quæ respondebat, sibi perinde esse. Sicuti & evenit, teste illius libro de invocanda Hallensi Maria (1). —

Of this unsettled Pelargic way of thinking in religion was that other Lucian, the subtle Epicurean Philosopher, Justus Lipsius, formerly my colleague, and professor of Rhetoric in the university of Tēna, in Thuringia, where he pretended to be very fond of the Lutheran religion, and swore that he looked upon the doctrine of Luther to be the one, eternal and, divine truth, and condemned the idolatry and blasphemy of the Romish Antichrist. But, coming to Leyden, he apostatized, like Pelargus, and denied the truth he had acknowledged and approved; tho' this he disowned, saying that he was a Christian, and had neither forsaken, nor denied Christ. This I can with truth say and affirm of this man. For, when, in the year 1582, in the summer season, upon my return from Antwerp, I paid him a visit in the university of Leyden, where he was professor, and asked him what account he could give of his apostasy from the true religion, which he had confessed at Tēna, in 1572, and from Christ, whom he had denied and forsaken; he answered me in his own house, and in the presence of Henry Latomus, formerly preacher at Antwerp; my friend Schlussemburgi, once my colleague, I have not denied nor forsaken Christ, tho' here I do not profess the Lutheran doctrine, but follow the Calvinists. For all religion and no religion are alike to me: and with me the Lutheran and Calvinist doctrines walk an equal pace. Being shocked at this declaration. I said: my friend Lipsius, if you continue in this opinion, it will go ill with you; and I easily believe, since you are indifferent to both religions, that you will at last be a Papist, as you was at first. To which he replied, it was equal to him. And so it happened; witness his book concerning the invocation of the Virgin Mary of Hall. Observe, by the way, in these words, the extravagant zeal of a rigid Lutheran. Schlussemburgi calls the change from a Lutheran to a Calvinist, apostasy, and the denying of Jesus Christ. I might cite a great many writers, who, upon the chapter of religion, look upon Lipsius as a weather-cock; but let it suffice to produce here the judgment of Boeclerus, and the advice he gives young students. Non fuerit operæ pretium, jays he (2), singula examinare, cum potius univerfum monendi sint Juvenes studiosi, ne tales quæstiones Lipsio velint magistro discere, qui ubique sibi similis est, id est, in Re Theologica aut quocunque modo ad Religionem pertinetem lubricus, anceps, vagus, in omnes formas mutabilis: qui modo aliquid largiri, modo adimere rursus cupiat, id quod necesse est accidere homini vera religione serio nunquam imbuto, Sacrarumque litterarum penitus experti. — It would not be worth while to examine particulars, when young students are rather to be admonished in the general, not to study such questions under the instruction of Lipsius, who is every where consistent with himself, that is, in matters of Divinity, or any way relating to religion doubtful, wandering, and ready to take any shape: who now consents, now retreats; which must necessarily be the case of a man who never thought seriously about the true religion, and quite ignorant of the holy writings.

[B] He discovered his bigotry in his printed books. One of these books is intitled, Justi Lipsii Diva Virgo Hallensis: beneficia ejus & miracula fide atque ordine descripta (3). Another is intitled, Justi Lipsii Diva Siebemiensis sive Apriollis: nova ejus beneficia & admiranda (4). He adopts the most trifling stories, and the most uncertain traditions that can possibly be found upon this subject. Some of his friends dissuaded him from this attempt, alledging the uncertainty of these traditions, and the injury he would do himself; but all their counsels could not divert him from his enterprize: 'At mali aut morosi quidam & pravè sapientes non occultè deterrent aut improbant, tanquam à narrationibus parum certis, ut a-junt, & opinione sæpe nixis. Non debere talibus obsolescenti auctoritatem nostratam si quam habemus, dissentio (5).' The verses he made, when he consecrated his silver pen to our Lady of Hall, are strangely singular, as well on account of the praises he gives himself, as the excessive homage he pays to the holy Virgin. Ipse pennam argenteam (nec potuit pretiosius quidpiam) in templo ante aram Virginis suspendit, & pios hosce versus subscripsit:

Hanc, DIVA, PENNAM interpretem mentis meæ,
Per alta spatia quæ volavit ætheris,
Per ima quæ volavit & terræ, & maris:
Scientiæ, Prudentiæ, Sapientiæ
Operata semper, ausa quæ CONSTANTIAM Describere, & vulgare; quæ CIVILIA:
Quæ MILITARIA, atque POLIORCETICA:
Quæ, ROMA, MAGNITUDINEM adfluxit tuam:
Variæque luce scripta præci sæculi
Affectit, & perfudit: hanc PENNAM tibi Nunc DIVA, merito consecravi LIPSIVS.
Nam numine istæ in choata sunt tuo.
Et numine istæ absoluta sunt tuo.
Porro ô benignitatis aura perpetim
Hæc spiret! & famæ fugacis in vicem,
Quam PENNA peperit, tu perenne gaudium
Vitamque DIVA, LIPSIO pares tuo (6).

He hung up with his own hands a silver pen (the most valuable gift he had) in the church, before the altar of the Virgin, and wrote under these pious verses:

GODDESS, this PEN, my mind's interpreter,
Which bent it's flight o'er earth, and seas, and skies,
Ever employ'd on science, prudence, wisdom,
Which dar'd describe, and publish CONSTANCY:
Which treated both the arts of WAR and PEACE;
Which aggrandiz'd thy GREATNESS, ROME; and spread
A various light o'er works of ages past:
This PEN, I, LIPSIVS, consecrate to thee,
And justly, since thy influence first inspired,
And to perfection brought, thy Poet's works.
O! ever smile propitious on the same,
This PEN produc'd, and on thy LIPSIVS, GODDESS, Bestow long life, and never-ceasing joy.

strangest thing of all in his conduct, and which has not been pardoned him, is, that living at Leyden in the external profession of the Reformed Religion, he publicly approved the principles of persecution, at that time exercised all over Europe against this very religion. He left by his will his furred gown to the same, our Lady; which gave occasion to say, that he made her this present, because the miracles he had so much celebrated, were ready to die of cold (7). Some Protestants writ with great force against him; he let them talk on, and only answered one of them in a few words: See his Rejeksiuncula, at the end of his Virgo Aspricellii. He was desired to defend himself against the author of the treatise De Idolo Hallensi (8), and against Thomson (9), who confuted him among other things about the Virgo Sicbemiensis: but he refused to engage in these disputes (10), and acted wisely. See, in the remark [E], what Baudius said of the books of devotion of this critic. See also remark [N].

It must not be forgot, that Lipsius was said to have composed such books only to convince the world, that he was not lukewarm and indifferent in religion, as many suspected he was (11). It was also believed, that these works were pure injunctions, and that the Jesuits extorted them from him. 'Κέρπες Lojolitæ precibus, quæ vim imperii apud Lipsium habent, hanc operam ab eo vel extorserunt, vel eblanditi sunt; vel utrumque. Nam ut ipsi hominem totum possident, ita ipse illis εὐχαριστίας nihil negare potest (12). — The artful Loyolites (Jesuits) either extorted this work from Lipsius, by intreaties, which with him carry the force of a command, or wheedled him into it; or perhaps both; for as he is entirely devoted to them, he can decently deny them nothing.' If this was his case, he might be compared, to hired mourners, who cried more bitterly than the relations of the dead. The Poet Lucilius takes notice of these.

Mercede quæ
Conductæ flent alieno in funere præfixæ
Multo & capillis scindunt, & clamant magis.

As women, who for hire
Mourn at the funeral of one unknown,
And greater marks of grief in public shew.

And, Horace says little less:

Ut qui conducti plorant in funere, dicunt
Et faciunt propè plura dolentibus ex animo: sic Derisor vero plus laudatore movetur (13).

As hired mourners, at a funeral, speak,
And as, with more extravagance of grief,
Than those, whose hearts a real sorrow know,
So flatter'ing hypocrites more zeal betray,
Than real friends.

[C] He was strangely confounded, when he was shewn the consequences of his doctrine of persecution.] See what is found hereupon in the Philosophical Commentary upon, compell them to come in (14). 'I have seen another perplexity, which has relation to these matters, in a treatise of Justus Lipsius. This man, having been ruined by the wars of the Netherlands, found a very honourable retreat at Leyden, where he was appointed professor; making no scruple of outwardly abjuring his Popish religion. During that time, he printed some books of Politics, wherein he advanced, among other maxims, that only one religion ought to be suffered in a state, and no clemency used towards those, who disturbed religion, but that they should be prosecuted with fire and sword, that one member may perish, rather than the whole body. Clementine non hic locus. Ure, seca, ut membrorum potius aliquod quam totum corpus intereat.' This was base, for a man entertained, as he was, by a Protestant republic, which had newly reformed its religion; for this was openly approving all the rigours of Philip II, and the duke D'Alva. It was besides a horrible impudence, and execrable impiety, since, on one hand, it might be concluded from his book, that only the Protestant religion was to be suffered in Holland, and, on the other, that the Heathens were to be commended for hanging the preachers of the Gospel. He was taken up upon this head by Theodore Cornheit (15), and pushed to great straits; for he was obliged to answer by tacking about, and declaring, that these words, Ure, seca, were only a phrase borrowed from Phisic, to signify, not literally fire and sword, but a very strong remedy. All these tergiversations are to be seen in his tract De una Religione. It is the most paltry book he ever writ, except the impertinent histories and silly poems, he made in his old age, upon some chapels of the Virgin, his wit beginning to be moped like that of Pericles, when he suffered his neck and arms to be tricked out with amulets, and womens nostrums; being wholly infatuated by the Jesuits, into whose arms he threw himself, when he saw, that this little paltry book was looked upon with an ill eye in Holland; this made him escape by stealth from Leyden. To return to this little book; it is a wretched rhapsody of passages, which authorise all the heathen impieties, on which was founded the horrible persecution of the first Christians, and of other passages, which say the quite contrary. And as the author durst not avow the force of these two words, Ure, seca, he used some pitiful distinctions, which came to this, that Heretics ought to be put to death, but rarely and secretly; but as for fines, banishments, marks of infamy, and degradations, they ought not to be spared. All this falls to the ground, by the reflexions already made hereupon. By way of addition to this remark [C], we shall relate, more at large, what concerns the dispute between Koornhert and Justus Lipsius.

Koornhert is not the only person, who treated him roughly on this subject. For the Jesuit Petra Sancta, having made complaints against the author of the Striaturæ (16) Politica (17), the answer returned him was this (18): 'Conqueris de autore notarum five Striaturarum in proditoriam Justii Lipsii epistolam quæ quum in Belgio foederato vixisset, & Illustrissimorum Ordinum stipendiarius fuisset, postquam infalutatis hospitibus bene meritis abiisset, Asylum in eos convertit, & adversus Rempublicam eorum, consilia subministravit. a great patriot, and saw thro' Lipsius's frauds. I know not whether you, who are so fond of Lipsius's works, and seem to take a pleasure in Poetry, will be willing to read those verses, which, in the year 1579, he prefixed to a book against a certain obscure person. They were then published at Leyden for Andrew Schouten, and shew what disposition he either was or pretended to be of. Hear him:

*The western Tyrant's double chains are broke:
By arms your country bravely ye assert;
Religion too with vigour ye defend:
But the fierce Spaniard breaks your land's repose;
And lo! this wretch religion would disturb.
Let other arms your country's battles fight;
This thine, Feugæus, to defend the faith,
And by your pen detect it's latent foes;
This task thy office, and thy genius suits.*

You see what Lipsius then thought of the king of Spain, of the Romish faith, and of religion: who afterwards became a deserter of religion, faithlessly, and thro' a wavering, uncertain, disposition, as Montaigne expresses it. These verses of Lipsius dishonour his memory, when we compare them with his own confession, that he was only a Protestant in appearance at Leyden, and that his heart was Catholic. These are his words: 'Sed altera æmnia, in religione mutavi. Nego, in sede veluti, non in sensu fui, & ut in peregrinatione corporis non animi requiem illic elegi. In tempore, ut meum ingenium est, vestro modestoque me habui: an in sacra aut ritus vetuste transivi? nec impudentia hoc dicet

(20) Lipsius, in Rejectionis, ad calorem Virginis Africollis.

*(20). — Another calumny is, that I have changed my religion: I deny it; I sat with you, but did not think with you; and, as being upon a journey, I sought the repose of my body, not of my mind. I befooled myself, as I always do, quietly and modestly. Did I go over to your religious rites? Impudence itself will not say this.' Let him have done and said what he pleased; he and all his apologists were unable to elude the proofs alledged, to shew that this still answered his external profession, as long as he passed for a Protestant. The author of the Idolum Hallense proves, that Lipsius, having protested, at Iena before Tilemannus Helmshius, who was then (21), rector of the university, that he sincerely embraced the Lutheran religion, communicated publicly (22), and in a funeral oration of his, which had been printed, declared, that God had given to his church the house of Saxony, to ruin the pest of the Papacy. 'De bello Smalcaldico locutus cause bonitatem à Saxone, fortunam & martem ab Imperatore stetit dicit & . . . Saxoniam generosam stirpem ad Dei hostes extirpandos, errores eventendos PESTEM PONTIFICIAM excindendam donatam divinitus & concessam ECCLESIAE esse (23). It is owned, that he never communicated while he was at Leyden; but it is proved (24), by several extracts of his letters, that, whilst he lived there, he looked on the cause of the Spaniards as unjust, and wished the ruin of it, and that many expressions fell from him, which bespoke him a Protestant (25).*

Here are some farther circumstances of his controversy with Theodore Koornhert. When his treatise of politics, wherein he approved persecution on the account of religion, came out in 1589, Koornhert, a great stickler for toleration, writ him his opinion of this book; and replied to the answers he received, and at last published a book, with the title of Processus contra hereticum & coalitionem conscientiarum. He dedicated it to the magistrates of Leyden, sent copies of it to the magistrates of other towns, and exhorted them to take great care of this writer's opinions. The publishing of this book vexed Lipsius; but, as he was a great ornament to the university of Leyden, he obtained of the magistrates an act of complaisance, which might have comforted him. They published at the town-house, that they did not accept of Koornhert's epistle dedicatory, and that this author, by dedicating his book to them, did them neither service, nor honour, nor friendship; that they did not however prohibit his book, but permitted the inhabitants to read it, and at the same time advised them to read Lipsius's excellent answer. They declared, they had a very particular esteem for this professor. This act did not fully satisfy him, nor was he at all pleased at hearing, that Koornhert, being recovered from a long indisposition, was preparing a reply. It is said too, that by the favour of some towns, he endeavoured to get the States of Holland to forbid the answering his political writings; but that Gerhard de Lange, Burgo-master of Tergou, opposed it with this reason. 'If what Lipsius has written be true, he can be but weakly answered, and we shall be confirmed in the truth, by the very weakness of the writings that are published against him; but if any one discovers in them, what we do not now perceive, any falsity prejudicial to the country, what harm can there be to correct them?' Lipsius quitted Holland soon after, under pretence of taking a turn to the Spaw-waters, for the sake of his health. Nor did he ever come back thither more, but returned to Popery, and protested in a letter, which he writ from Mayence (26), that he had always been of the ancient religion, though he had professed another, when he was in places, where the ancient was not received. This made many believe him a hypocrite. Some were of opinion, that the discontent which Koornhert gave him, and the apprehension he had, that the Hollanders, might be worsted in the war against Spain (27), made him change sides. How- ever it be, Koornhert, detained in his bed, and seized with a distemper, of which he soon after died, failed not to go on with his reply, and to finish it. His executors got it translated out of Flemish into Latin, and published it (28).

(29) Boecerus, de Polit. Lipsii, pag. 55, 56.

It must be observed, that Lipsius had let fall some words against the Spanish inquisition in the first editions, but struck them out of the following. Boecerus had told him his own upon this, in the chapter De novis Lipsiani operis, which is the fifth of his treatise De Politicis Jussi Lipsii. Read these words (29): 'Illud non omittendum est, quæ seipsum prodic damnatque Lipsius; æterno cum dedecore famæ, quam unam videtur in omni vita quæsitisse. Cum enim in prioribus Politicorum suorum editionibus, lib. iv, cap. iv. pro libertate religionis, adversus Pontificiam crudelitatem & Hispanicam inquisitionem (quam nemo bonus unquam probavit) quadam scripserat: in posterioribus editionibus, tanquam non à religione modo sed à sana simul mente defecisset, partim omisit ea (scilicet quæ in Freinsheimiana editione reponuntur, n. 7, 9, 12.) partim simpliciter & ingenuè dicta mutavit. — That must not be omitted, in which Lipsius betrays and condemns himself, to the eternal disgrace of his fame, which seems to have been the sole pursuit of his life. For, whereas, in the former editions of his Politics, book iv, chap. iv. he had written in defence of liberty of conscience, against the Popish cruelty and the Spanish Inquisition; (which no good man ever approved of) in the later editions, as if he had not only abused religion, but even his senses, he partly left out what he had written on that subject (to wit, what is replaced in Freinsheimius's edition) and partly altered what he had plainly and ingenuously said.' Boecerus mentions some other alterations in this man's expressions.

[D] He was offered a professorship at Pisa, with a promise of enjoying his liberty of conscience. Acidalius relates (30), that Mercurialis, the negotiator of this affair, told him, that the Great Duke had offered Lipsius a professor's chair in the university of Pisa, with the privilege of believing what he pleased in matters of religion; and that this prince had obtained for him a toleration at Rome. At the same time Acidalius adds, that a report was spread, that this professor had embraced the Romish faith in Germany; and affirms, that Lipsius alledged no other reason for refusing the chair at Pisa, than the infirmity of his health, and the distance of the place, via longinquitatem, & valetudinis imbecillitatem. He was far from alledging his being a Protestant; for he was readily enough disposed to the public profession of the Romish religion. Yet

(30) In his second Letter, written from Bologna, in January, 1592.

but he refused that employment. He settled at Louvain, where he taught the Belles Lettres in a way that was much to his reputation; and he died there, the 23d of March, 1606, in his fifty ninth year. There were those among the Protestants, who never would second the passion of some of their brethren, in defaming this learned man [E]. He married a widow at Cologne about the year 1574, but had no children by her. Some say, she was a very

Yet by this we see that he was looked on in Italy as a very good Calvinist, since his liberty of conscience was negotiated at Rome. There are two letters of Lipsius (31), from which we may infer, that Acidalius was well informed of what he said; but they do not mention the offer of a liberty of conscience.

[E] There were some Protestants, who never would second the passion of some of their brethren, in defaming this learned man. One Lydius, a minister, designing to publish the letters which his father had received from Justus Lipsius, was earnestly entreated by Baudius not to do it; by Baudius, I say, who understanding, that Lydius persisted in his design, prepared to write against him, in favour of Lipsius. 'Perfrat

' in incepto, ut sermonem tuum audio. Sed quia sibi sumit eam licentiam ut faciat quæ sunt contra morem bonorum, contra fas gentium, contra jus humanitatis: saxo dicat se nactum, qui hac in parte causam amici & quondam doctoris indefensam esse non patitur (32). — He persists in his design, as you inform me: but since he takes a liberty contrary to the behaviour of good men, contrary to the law of nations, and the rights of humanity, I will make him even be met with one, who will avenge the cause of his friend, and (formerly) teacher.

Not that Baudius approved Lipsius's two books upon the miracles of the holy Virgin; on the contrary, he spoke of them with the utmost contempt; but, he thought that letters between friends ought to be an inviolable secret (33). 'Non quod ejus Divas ullo colore defendi posse censeam, sed interim non est tolenda ÷ vita vitæ societas, quod faciunt qui literas, hoc est amicorum colloquia absentium, foras eliminant . . . (34) Deest scilicet hostis, & seges ac maties metendæ gloriæ non suppetit, nisi ex labe & ruina celebratissimi in literis viri, & honorifice à bonis nominandi, tametsi famam suam misere decoxerit duplici illa publicatione Virginum, quibus sæpe incolumi auctore lumbisfragium exoptavi (35). —

Not that I think his goddesses can upon any pretence be defended; but in the mean time, society is not to be broke in upon; which they do, who publish the private correspondence of absent friends . . . There is no enemy, and please ye, nor any opportunity of earning fame, but by the disgrace and ruin of the most learned of men, and of whom good men ought to make honourable mention; tho' he miserably injured his character by that double publication of Virgins, towards whom I often declared my ill wishes during the life of the author.' Tho' Lydius was a great preacher, Baudius hoped to come off cheaply enough with him. 'Etiam si multum in concionibus valeas, vereor tamen ut hic stare possit. Fervida ingenia plerumque violentiam naturæ & profundam ambitionem velare solent præclaro schemate zeli, quod est evitriculum & mantile multarum fraudum. Sed non desunt nobis rationes quibus saculo planum & perspicuum fiet, Quid solidum crepet & pictæ testoria linguæ (36). — Though he be a great preacher, I fear he will not maintain his ground on this occasion. Men of passion often cover the violence and ambition of their nature under the fine pretence of zeal, that cloak of many impostures. But I can convince the world of the difference between sincerity and hypocrisy.' In the same letter he informs us, that Scaliger took it very ill, that Thompson should write so violent a book against Lipsius. 'Opus est sane non ineruditum, & quod arguat scriptorem multæ lectionis: nisi quod supra modum modestiæ effervescit, quo nomine etiam serio reprehensus est ab herodæ Scaligero (37). — It is certainly no unlearned work, and argues a writer of great reading; except that he flies out beyond the bounds of modesty: for which fault he is seriously reprehended by the hero Scaliger.' He says also, that he is a stranger to the laws of humanity, and the rights of literature, who fancies that the learned ought to espouse state wars, and differences in religion, one against another, and that, for his part, he shall never follow such maxims, as long as he has a grain of good sense left. 'Non dissimulo, nec unquam dissimulabo, intercedere mihi cum Lipsio, extra causam religionis & libertatis, ob quam publice bello decertamus, omnia jura summæ necessitudinis, quæ cum ullo mortali esse possunt. Nunquam litantur Gratiis, & ignorant quid humaniores literæ, quid humanitas ipsa flagitet, qui ob eam rem tellas inimicitias promiscue omnibus indicendas esse arbitrantur. In eo censu non erit Baudius, quamdiu sanam animi mentem obtinebit (38). — I confess, nor will I ever deny, that, setting aside the cause of religion and liberty, for which we publicly fight, there is the strictest friendship imaginable between Lipsius and myself. They, who think that a sufficient reason for quarrelling with all the world, never sacrificed to the graces, nor know what polite learning and humanity require. Baudius will never think in that manner, as long as he shall enjoy a sound mind. Gruterus, who had some of Lipsius's letters, would never communicate them to those, who desired them, with a design to make them public. He would not furnish arms against the honour of this learned man.

Lipsius epistolæ amici multi à me petierunt, quibus semper negavi, quod nollem quidquam ex iis depromi unde ei aliquid inureretur infamæ (39). — Several of my friends have asked me for Lipsius's letters, whom I always refused, because I was unwilling any thing should be taken out of them, which might be made use of to injure his reputation. But Lingelheim (40) was not so nice, since, after he had made use of some of Lipsius's letters, which he had written to Camerarius from Iëna, he offered them to Goldast, to be printed (41). Goldast had already played Lipsius a trick, which I have mentioned in another place (42).

It must be owned, as Baudius says, that the laws of generosity do not permit us to take advantage of what a man may have written as a secret to those he corresponded with; the Heathens themselves were not ignorant of this truth; for observe how Marc Antony was censured for reading before the senate some letters he had received from Cicero. 'At etiam literas, quas me sibi misisse diceret, recitavit: homo & humanitatis expers, & vitæ communis ignarus. Quis enim unquam qui paulum modo bonorum confectum diem nosset, litteras ad se ab amico missas, offensione aliqua interposita in medium protulit, palamque recitavit? Quid est aliud tollere vitæ vitæ societatem, quam tollere amicorum colloquia absentium? Quam multa joca solent esse in Epistolis, quæ prolata si sint incepta videantur? quam multa seria neque tamen ullo modo divulganda (43)? — He even repeated letters, which he said I sent him, being a man void of humanity, and ignorant of common life. For who is there so little conversant with good men, as, upon a quarrel, publicly to produce and read the letters of a friend? What is it but to destroy society, and put a stop to the correspondence of absent friends? How many jests are there in letters, which, when made public, will be thought insipid? How many serious things are there, yet by no means fit to be divulged?' Several think that this excellent law may be dispensed with in favour of religion; that is, when it is in our power to decry a man who has written against our religion, or who by his revolt may shake the faith of the weak; and thus they make no scruple of publishing his very billets or notes, if copies of them fall into their hands. They would perhaps be more scrupulous, if they were themselves the persons, who had received them; for it is not so contrary to the law we speak of, to publish a letter another has received, as one that is written to one's self. See the advertisement to The General Considerations upon Mr Bruy's book, printed at Rotterdam in 1684. There is a secret divulged in it, which Mr Bruy had written to a friend. having printed several letters he had written to him (45). See Father Quesnel against the sentence of the archbishop of Malines, founded partly on his papers, which had been seized. He cites Nicol. de Clemangis, Epist. XLIII.

[F] Some say, she was a very ill woman.] 'The good man Lipsius, who had a naughty wife, has said somewhere in his Epistles, that there is a fatality in marriage (46). Here is the passage which Patin refers to: 'Uxorem duxi, says Lipsius (47), mei magis animi quam amicorum impulsu. Sed, ut ille ait (48), τοῦ καὶ ἐμὲ ἐκείνην ἔσθ' αὐτοῖς, ἀδύνατον, fructus tamen matrimonii, id est liberorum, exsortes. — I married more to please myself than at the instigation of my friends: but, as he says, it was so decreed: and indeed we live in concord, tho' without the fruit of matrimony, children.' It was believed by some, that Lipsius changed his religion purely from a principle of ambition, and the importunity of his wife, who was strangely superstitious. Mr Teissier (49) asserts this upon Scaliger's credit, citing his 120th letter of the second book. I my self have conversed with those, who have told odd stories of the cross-grained humour of this woman. They had them from old men, who had seen Lipsius.

Some Merchants of the Low-Countries told Florimond de Remond, in 1600, that Lipsius was married. He wished him joy of it; but Lipsius answered him, that the thoughts of being congratulated at this time of day made him laugh, and that he had been a long time in the noose. 'At de conjugio, quod tu à Mercurialibus nostris audieras, quàm risum mihi movit? Ego, vir optime, non recens in eam nassam veni, sed annos jam vigintifex custodia hæc me habet. Liberos tamen nullos genui, nec hunc conjugii fructum aut lenimentum Deus dedit (50). — As to my marriage, which it seems you have heard of, how does it make me laugh? My good friend, I am not a bridegroom, but have been married twenty-six years. Yet I have got no children, nor has God given me this fruit and consolation of wedlock.'

[G] He wrote a very bad hand.] He confesses it himself, and thereby confutes those, who pretended to have printed from the original the oration of duplici concordia; from the original, I say, very fairly written. 'Ego belle & mundule scribo? says he (51), Vellem, fed totam Europam testem καλῶς γραφῆς hujus habeo, & querelas quod autographa mea ægre vel non legant. — I write a fair and neat hand! I wish I did; but appeal to all Europe for the beauty of my hand writing, and to the complaints that my manuscripts are scarce, if at all, legible.' This is confirmed by a passage of Gabriel Naudé (52). 'This worthy scholar of our Muretus M. Antonius Bonciarius of Perugia once complained, that he could read but two or three of the first lines of the letters Lipsius wrote to him; all the rest was so horribly scrawled. Nancelius said as much of Ramus's writing.'

[H] His conversation and aspect answered not the idea, the world had conceived of him.] Here is Aubertus Miræus's testimony in this point (53). 'In gestu, cultu, sermone modicus fuit: adeo ut plerique, quibus magnos viros per ambitionem æstimare mos est, viso aspectoque Lipsio quærerent famam, pauci interpretarentur. Constat certe exterius, quos ab ultimâ etiam Sarmatia, ejus videndi audiendique gratiâ (ut olim magni illius Livii) frequenter venisse scimus, cum Lipsium viderent, eundem sæpe requisivisse. — His behaviour, dress, and conversation were mean: inasmuch that many who are wont to estimate great men by the standard of ambition, when they saw Lipsius, were disappointed in their expectations: few formed a just idea of him. It is certain, that foreigners, who came, we know, from farthest Sarmatia, for the sake of seeing and hearing him (as formerly happened to the great Livy) found their ideas of him not answered.'

See his Oribodoxæ fidelis controversiæ, his Defensio Lipsii postuma, &c. Claudius Danqueus, a canon of Tournay, published, in 1616, a book intituled, D. MARIE ASPRICOLLIS ΘΑΤΜΑΤΟΤΡΟΨ Scutum . . . alterum item 7. Lipsii Scutum: utrumque adversus Agricola Tibracii satyricas petitiones. He means, that he answered a book, which George Thomson, a Scotchman, published at London in 1606, with this title, Vindex veritatis adversus Justum Lipsium libri duo. Prior infamam ejus religionem politicam, satvam nefariamque de Fato, sceleratissimam de fraude doctrinam refellit. Posterior Levodraphe Sibemientis, id est Ioli Aspricollis, &c. Dea lignæ miracula convellit. Uterque Lipsium ab orco Gentilissimum revocasse docet. See the remark [A] of the article LINGELSHEIM, citation (12). I speak not of those, who have attacked or defended him upon the subject of learning. Vincent Contarini, successor to Sigonius in the chair of Padua, criticized him (55) learnedly enough in 1609, 'circa frumentarium Romanorum largitionem & militare Romanorum stipendium. — In relation to the largesse of corn among the Romans, and their military pay.'

Garasse, who gave him two bites, was sturdily repulsed. He pretended (56), that Lipsius's doctrine about fate is a mere chimera without the least foundation, and blamed him (57) for having erected Mausolean monuments to his three little dogs, the first whereof was called Mopsus, the second Sapphirus, the third Mopsulus, as is seen in the book intituled, Deliciae Christiani orbis. I cannot, continues he, approve all these ridiculous and prophane inventions, forasmuch as this is plainly to declare, though the intention of authors may be very different, Unus interitus est hominis & jumentorum, & æqua est utriusque conditio. — Men and beasts die alike, and the condition of both is the same. The censurer of this Jesuit's Doctrine Curieuse strenuously maintains (58), that the destiny, taught by Lipsius, is conformable to Thomas Aquinas's notion. He says (59), that 'Aubertus Miræus . . . did not forget the love that Lipsius had for dogs, and even the names of the three, which he cherished above the rest . . . He had caused them to be painted in a piece, with the names, age, colour, and flag, of each, with some verses underneath, wherein he had no less ingeniously, than pleasantly, hit upon verses and inscriptions mentioned in the book called Selectæ Christiani orbis deliciae. This is what Garasse takes for a mausoleum and an epitaph; so that whoever has his parrot painted, his dog, his cat, his wife, &c. with an inscription or verse, erects an epitaph, a mausoleum to them. . . . As for the epitaph of Sapphirus alone, which is found in the said book, Selectæ deliciae, &c. It is a supposititious piece, which even the compiler, F. Swertius, durst not place with the three inscriptions, which are found under the title Lovanensia, and which doubtless some one might easily have composed by Lipsius's inscription on his dog Sapphirus, to exercise his wit, as plainly appears from the bare reading.' The censurer adds, that the pretended prophaneity, which Garasse finds in it, is a chimera: he is pretty large upon this, and shews the impertinence of the reason, founded on the unus est interitus, &c. Mr des Marets (60), who thought this criticiser of Garasse to be an anonymous doctor of the Sorbonne, is mistaken: he plagiarism, but never would acknowledge, that he was justly accused [K]. A fit of sickness he got at a feast, has been reckoned one of the greatest dangers, he was ever exposed to [L]. [L] A fit of sickness he got at a feast. Here is what Niclus Erythraeus says (61): 'Sæpius in vita manifestum vitæ discrimen adiit; ter in puerili ætate . . . deinde lethali morbo pene sublatu est Dolæ, quæ Sequanorum est Academia, ubi quum luculenta oratione Victoris Giselini, inter medicos allectum, laudasset, ac statim deinde, opiparo convivio exceptus esset, in quo, ut mos est illarum regionum, convivæ invitare se pluculum solent, & in sese largius merum invigere, repente, insolito horrore correptus, cum febri domum rediit. — He had often been in danger of his life; thrice whilst a boy . . . afterwards he was very near being taken off by a mortal disemper, at Dole, which is an university of the Francie Comte, where, having made a fine oration in praise of Victor Giselinus, on his being admitted a Physician, and being afterwards splendidly entertained at dinner, on which occasion the guests are apt to encourage one another in eating and drinking a little too much, he was on a sudden taken with a shivering, and returned home with a fever.' Lipsius, having made an oration at the promotion of this Physician, was doubtless considered as one of the principal heroes of the feast: they made him drink the harder, and had like to have killed him. The matter would not have been so strange, had he been an Italian or Spaniard; for it is certain, that an academical banquet, or treat, upon taking a degree, in the northern universities, might be as dangerous to men of those countries, as a set battle to a colonel, unless they are excused from pledging every health. But Lipsius was a Fleming: no matter for that: he was worried; he was conquered in a tournament of Bacchus by those of the Franche Comté. It had like to have cost him his life. The most general rules have their exceptions.

[M] It is strange that a Latin style, so bad as his, should found a new sect in the Republic of Letters.]

(62) Scaligerana, voce Lipsius, pag. m. 143.

Lipsius has put Cicero out of fashion. When he was in request, there were greater masters in eloquence, than there are at present (62). Scaliger says this: an evident proof, that the sect of the Lipsians was very much increased. But here we ought to cry out;

O imitatores, servum pecus, ut mihi sæpe Bilem, sæpe jocum vestri movere tumultus (63).

(63) Horat. Epist. xix, lib. i, ver. 19.

Ye imitators, slavish herd, how oft
The stir ye make excites my spleen! how oft Provokes my laughter!

People must dote upon ill models, when they can prefer Lipsius's style before that of Paul Manutius, or Muretus; a style, which proceeds by starts and bounces, and is full of points and ellipses, before a style smooth and flowing, and which unfolds every thought. Lipsius is the less excusable, because he changed from a good taste to an ill one. He wrote well in his youth; as appears by a book he dedicated to cardinal de Granvelle (64), and by the funeral oration of the duke of Saxony. He degenerated as he grew old. 'His third century of Epistles, said Scaliger (65), is good for nothing; he has forgot to speak; I know not what Latin it is.' A learned humanist thought he did his father, who was a famous divine, some honour, by shewing he expressed a contempt for the style, which Lipsius had brought into fashion. 'Imprimis vero fastidiebat scribendi illam novam formam, quam magnus cæteroguin vir Justus Lipsius

seculo nostro obstruit, quemque servum pecus imitatores plurimi arripuerunt, quamvis impari felicitate (66). — But he was particularly disgusted at that new way of writing, which Justus Lipsius, otherwise a great man, forced upon our age, and which many have servilely imitated, but not with the same success. He relates the judgment, which James Pontanus, and Marc Velferus made of the same style. Nos Justus Lipsii excellens ingenium, summamque doctrinam suspicimus, & prædicamus, nec de studiis nostris quemquam melius meritum statuimus. Ab ejus autem idiotismo, & excogitata hæresi in scribendo, pluribus, & opinor iustis de causis refugimus, & horremus. Marcum Velferum ipsi Lipsio amicissimum profitemem meis auribus audivi: malle se in scribendo Muretum, quam Lipsium posse exprimere. Adeo, cujus probabat ingenium, & scientiam summopere, ejus novitiam, & plus æquo exquisitam & affectatam dictionem non probabat (67). — I applaud the great wit and learning of Justus Lipsius, and think no man deserved better of the learned. But I scorn and abhor, for many, and I think just, reasons, his peculiarity of style, and new manner of writing. I have myself heard Marcus Velferus, a great friend of Justus Lipsius, declare, that he had rather imitate Muretus, than Lipsius; blaming his novel and affected style, at the same time that he highly applauded his wit and learning. He afterwards shews how Scaliger, being ready to give up the ghost, declared his abhorrence of that affectedness in style. He must needs take it much to heart, since in that condition, in which his attention ought to have been fixed on objects infinitely more important, he would let the company know how much it troubled him. 'Jam in agone mortis constitutus (ut refert Clarissimus Daniel Heynſius, in Epistola ad Isaacum Casaubonum) hoc xaxxvñs novi stili admodum execratus est. Sic enim de eo scribit Heynſius: Justus Lipsii affectationem in stilo vehementer fastidire solebat: in iis præsertim, quæ senex scripsisset, & nonnunquam literas ejus cum indignatione legebat; eodem modo te quoque judicare, certo scio (68). — Upon his death-bed (as Daniel Heynſius informs us, in a letter to Isaac Casaubon) he expressed his abhorrence of that itchy writing in a new style: for thus Heynſius writes concerning him: He greatly disliked Justus Lipsius's affected style; in those pieces especially, which he wrote in his old age; and he sometimes read his letters with indignation: I know you judge of him in the same manner.' Henry Stephens published a book of five hundred and sixty pages against Lipsius's Latin (69); but this book is so full of digressions, that the author seldom comes to his point. However he gives us to understand, that he extremely disapproved Lipsius's style. See, in a book of Balzac (70), the Viri magni judicium de imitatione Lipsianæ latinitatis: see also the words of Grotius. 'Sua quadam eloquentia ple-

There is no fear, that such an affectation in French would ever make a sect, though the president de Novion (72) should return into the world.

[N] What Joseph Hall published concerning his Histories of the Miracles of the Holy Virgin, deserves to be related. Having given an account of a prodigy, which served for the punishment of a provost, who had caused the tongue of a Protestant martyr to be cut out, he thus exclaims: 'Come now, Lipsius; go and write the new miracles of the goddess, and confirm confirm the superstition by strange events. All you, who have seen it, judge, whether ever the chapels of Hall and of Zichem, have produced so remarkable a thing. We every where meet with pilgrims going to pay their devotions towards these ladies: I know not whether I ought to call them two ladies, or rather one in two shrines. If they are two, why do they adore but one of them? if they are but one, why does she perform the cure at Zichem, which she cannot at Hall? what great pity it is, that a genius so lofty and elevated to the last act of his life, should be subject to raving. We have cherished and admired, if need were, all the good fruits, and manly offspring of this brain: but who can bear these foolish virgins, the weak and abortive productions of doating old age? one of his greatest favourites told me, having heard it from his own mouth, that the elder of these two virgins was begotten, conceived, brought into the world, and baptized, by him, in the space of ten days: I believe it, and was not at all surprized at it. These acts of superstition have an invisible father and midwife; besides, that it is not fitting that an elephant should be three years begetting a mouse. It was told me in the shop of his Moret, not without some indignation, that our king (73) having well considered the book, and read some passages of it, threw it upon the ground, with this curse, Damnation to him who made it, and him who believes it. I do not concern myself whether it be a true piece of history, or one of their fables: but I am certain, that this sentence did not cause them so much discontent, as me joy (74).

L I S M A N I N (FRANCIS) a native of Corfica, doctor of Divinity, and a famous Franciscan (a), entered into the Protestant church, but did not stop where he ought to have done; for he drove on to Arianism. This was done by degrees. He was confessor to Bonna Sforza, queen of Poland, and her preacher in the Italian tongue, &c. (b), [A], when John Triceffius, a man of learning and quality, clandestinely sowed the seeds of the reformation at Cracow (c). Lismanin, much shaken by the reading of a book, the queen had given him (d), was confirmed in the ill opinion he had conceived of the church of Rome by some conferences with John Triceffius (e), who besides lent him the reformers books (f). He soon became suspected of Heresy, but managed it so artfully, that the bishop of Cracow could never convict him of having Luther's and Calvin's books. He avoided the snares, which this prelate laid for him at Rome. Lismanin went thither in 1550 to congratulate the new Pope Julius III, in the name of queen Bonna (g). The bishop wrote to Rome that he was a secret Heretic, and that he ought to be cast into prison, and hindered from ever returning into Poland. This advice came a little too late; Lismanin was already returned to the queen his mistress. When he was arrived at Warsaw, where she resided, he received letters from Sigismund Augustus, king of Poland, her son, charging him to endeavour to pacify her; for she was much provoked at this prince's marrying Barbara Radzivil [B]. He made three journeys to bring about a peace between the two queens [C]. The king was so satisfied with him, that he promised him the [A] He was confessor to the queen of Poland, and her preacher in the Italian tongue, &c. To explain this etcetera, I shall set down the list of all Lismanin's titles: Theologiae Doctor, Monachus Franciscanus. Circiter anno 1546 jam erat Bonæ Reginae (matris Sigismundi Augusti Regis) a concionibus Italianis & confessionibus factis: nec non Franciscanorum seu Minoritarum in Polonia Provincialis, & omnium cenobiorum monialium regulæ Claræ Epborus, qui vulgo Commissarius dicitur: atque Parochus Cboienfis (1).

[B] . . . that queen . . . was provoked at this prince's marrying Barbara Radzivil. The author I cite, observes, that they who began the great work of the reformation in Poland, made a strange false step; they opposed this marriage of Sigismund, whilst the bishops, their greatest persecutors, gave their consent to it. By opposing the prince's inclinations, and his darling passion, they gave him a dislike to the reformation, while they, who applauded his marriage won his heart, and qualified themselves for obtaining of him an absolute liberty of persecuting the Lutherans. Impedebat veritatis in Regio corde progressum industria & vigilantia astutiaque Pontificum Romanorum, latera Regia semper claudendum, aures ejus occupantium, insignia Regni & cor Regis, custodiam legum tenentium, oracula Regia edentium . . . & quod tum ferè maxime tempori & rebus eorum accommodum erat, matrimonium Regium cum Barbara Radzivilia, Stanislai Gafoldi Palatini Trocensis relicta vidua, femina ad invidiam pulcherrimam initum, approbantium & defendentium. Nam cum multi etiam ex illis qui veritati & reformationi favere ceperant, concubium illud, utpote cum privata & privatim, inconsulto Senatu, contractum destruerent, contra Maciejovius ille, tum Andreas Lebridovius . . . Episcopi, alique Primores Pontificii illud adstruerent, factum est, ut Rex aversum ab illis animum ac favorem in hos converterit . . . Itaque boni illi Viri, Veritatis fautores graviter in eo, quod in hoc negotio Regi tanto conatu se opposuerint, erraverant: olores verò ejus & adversarii eorum contrariæ patri se applicantes Regis gratiam in se derivarunt. Ad eò & hic verum apparuit illud Christi oraculum: filios tenebrarum prudentiores esse in generatione sua quam filios lucis (2). — What hindered the progress of the truth in the king's heart, was the industry, assiduity, and artifice, of the Roman Catholics, who were always about the king, engrossed his ear, had the king's regalia and heart, had the custody of the laws, and gave out his edicts . . . and what greatly forwarded their interest at that time, was their approving and defending the king's marriage with Barbara Radzivil, relicta of Stanislai Gafoldi, palatine of Treckie, a most beautiful lady. For, when many, even of those, who began to favour truth and the reformation, were for dissolving that marriage, as having been contracted with a private person, privately, and without consulting the senate, and, on the other hand, Maciejovius and Andreas Lebridovius . . . bishops, and other Popish lords, were for confirming it, the king turned his favour and affection from the former to the latter . . . Those good men therefore, favourers of truth, were greatly mistaken in so strenuously opposing the king in this affair; but it's haters, and their adversaries, taking the contrary part, insinuated themselves into the king's favour: so that in this case likewise appeared the truth of that oracle of Jesus Christ: the children of darkness are wiser in their generation, than the children of light. If it was not so advantageous, it was at least more glorious to the reformers of Poland, to have been so impolitic.

[C] He made three journeys to bring about a peace between the two queens. His negotiation was more honourable than successful; for if it pleased the king, it highly displeased the queen mother, who was nothing less than what her name signified (3). Quo officio postquam susceptis anno 1551. m. Januarius Febr. & Martio Cracoviam tribus itineribus majori cum Regis quam Reginae Bonæ gratia (publicè enim in templo arcis, & in magna Aula frequentia, impudens tamen, Rege scilicet procurante, Legationem conciliationis Reginarum focus & nurus peregit) perfunctus est, Rex ab eo tempore cum carum sibi habuit (4). — After he had acquitted himself of this commission (for which purpose he had undertaken three journeys to Cracow, in the year 1551, in the months of January, February, and March, more to the satisfaction of the king, than of queen Bona; for he had publicly, in the great church, and in a full court, negotiated the first bishopric that should be vacant. During these transactions, Lelius Socinus, who came into Poland in 1551 (b), advised Lismanin to throw off his monk's habit, and retire into the reformed countries, and particularly into Swisserland. Lismanin would have followed this advice, but that he found in the king's mind a strong disposition to a reformation. He cultivated these dispositions, and received a commission from him to travel, in order to acquire all the necessary knowledge for establishing a better ecclesiastical government (i) [D]. He saw Italy, Switzerland, Geneva, Paris, and faithfully discharged his commission; but being returned to Geneva, he there married a wife, by the advice of John Calvin and Socinus, and in spite of the most judicious remonstrances of Budzinius, his secretary [E]. The king of Poland was so angry at this action of his, that he gave his Polish majesty answered the letters of, the three doctors I have named. 'Literæ illæ (12) ad Lismaninum per Budzinium Ministrum ejus missæ fuerunt, qui & litteras Regias quibus Gesnero, Calvinus & Bullingeri respondit, ad eos pertulit (13).' My author complains of the person, who published John Calvin's letters. He accuses him of having suppressed the praises, which Calvin gave Lismanin in his letters to the king of Poland. 'Moneo amantes veri ex officio viri Christiani & fidelis scriptoris, ut qua ratione in legendis celeberrimorum Auctorum scriptis, circumspiciat eos esse oporteat, videant non bona fide in edendis illis Epistolarum gravium apographis ab infestis veritati hominibus actum esse. Nam ne quid dissimulem; Epistola, quam ad Regem Augustum Calvinus Nonis Decembr. 1554 dederat, satis cordate contra Pontificiam arrogantiam scripta, extat quidem inter Epistolas Calvinæ, pag. 139, sed Lismanini nomen initio Epistolæ parum candidè agens editor ejus omisit (14). — I think it my duty, as a Christian and a faithful writer, to admonish lovers of truth to be cautious in reading the works of celebrated authors, since certain enemies to truth have acted unfairly in the publication of those letters, for, to conceal nothing, the letter, which Calvin wrote to king Augustus, the fifth of December 1554, full of warmth against the arrogance of the Roman Catholics, is extant indeed among Calvin's letters, page 139; but the editor has unfairly suppressed the name of Lismanin in the beginning of the letter.' He produces a letter of Calvin according to the tenor of the original: If you compare it with that which was printed, you will find many omissions in the latter; wherein this whole passage is left out (15): 'Euidem optimo viro & fideli servo Christi Franc. Lismanino, quum à me consilium peteret, auctor esse non dubitavi, ut isthuc statim concederet, si quis forte opera ejus usus fuerit, saltem pio ejus desiderio libenter subscripsi: nec veritus sum ne ejus profectio quasi intemptiva Majestati Vestræ displiceat, ejus præsentiam multis modis utilem experientia ipsa ostendet. Quod si palam à Rege ipsum profiteri mox à primo ingressu nondum commodum videbatur, mihi tamen per sacrum Christi nomen rogan- da suppliciter & obtestanda est V.M. ut recte currenti saltem aliunde patefactam viam curet (16). — For my own part, when Francis Lismanin, that very honest man and faithful servant of Christ, consulted Calvin in dated me, I made no scruple to advise him, immediately to repair thither, if perhaps his assistance might be wanted; at least I readily came into his pious desire nor did I fear lest his going thither a little unseasonably should displease your majesty, experience having showed that his presence is many ways useful. But if it shall not yet be thought proper, that he should, upon his first entrance, appear openly as commissioned by the king, yet I humbly implore your majesty, by the sacred name of Christ, to countenance his right undertaking some other way.' This is a convincing proof of the mission of Lismanin, or rather of the commission, which the king his master gave him to get intelligence among the reformers, and instruct himself in the best means for reforming Poland. At the same time, here is a deplorable instance of the frauds made use of in the printing of posthumous books. Whatever displeases is retrenched. And who can assure us there are no additions and alterations made to them?

[E] He married. . . . In spite of the most judicious remonstrances of his secretary (17). I grant that our gentleman was strongly persuaded of the nullity of his vows, and that his spirit, no less than his flesh, felt a repugnance to the law of celibacy. Yet it was but fit, he should put off his marriage, till over his project of reformation, tho' Lismanin had sent him the letters of several ministers upon this affair (k). The first synod, which was held in Poland (l) by the reformed, writ Lismanin, who was then in Switzerland (m), a very obliging letter, desiring him to return. He left Switzerland in 1556, and came back to Poland, where he concealed himself some time; for he was not ignorant, that there was a sentence of proscription against him (n). Several great lords interceded for him, so that he was suffered to shew himself. He did not at first declare for either of the two innovators, one of which (o) maintained, that Jesus Christ was not mediator, according to the divine nature; the other (p) maintained the pre-eminence of God the Father. But after some conferences with Blandrata in 1558 [F], he began to doubt of the mystery of the Trinity; and became so suspected of Arianism, that he was accused in the consistory of Cracow (q). He defended himself but ill, and as Blandrata had his favourers, and other disputes had already divided mens minds, nothing but confusion ensued in the synods. Lismanin offered a medium for reconciling the parties; which was, that they should stick to the authority of four fathers of the church (r), and for this end collected several passages from these fathers, which might serve for a sanctuary to various interpretations. This project was rejected; whereupon Lismanin retired to Königsberg in Prussia, where he died miserably about the year 1563 (s) [G]. Most of those, who speak of him, do not know his name [H]. He

he had given an account of his commission to the king of Poland. All that is lawful is not expedient: the great matter is to time a thing well. Budzinus represented this maxim to his master, with great judgment, but found him inflexible, and could not prevail with him to defer his marriage. The Socinian, I am going to cite, judiciously censures this precipitation, and takes it ill, that Calvin and Socinus's counsels got the better of those of Budzinus. 'Quod tamen (mandatum regis) paulo post neglexit, postquam Genevam reversus, ne cum horrido cucullo in Polonia rediret, uxorem duxisset, auctore Calvino & Lælio Socino (qui paulo postquam Cracoviam sementem veritatis jecisset, Genevam eodem anno redierat, quâ tamen mox, Calvini ingenium vel non ferens vel metuens, relicti, Tiguri sedem fixerat) sed contradicente Budzinio, ministro suo, & ob oculos ponente Regis indignationem, qui cum sumtibus suis in exteras regiones ad omnia perulanda & exploranda ablegavit, & tantorum conatum alium eventum quam Ablegati sui, ejusque Monachi, nuptias expectet, fide etiam promissi sibi data, tum & successum ejusmodi matrimonii, quod magis ædificata subruere, quam aliquid ædificare possit, insaufum; quod etiam reipsa evenisse suo loco videbimus. Sed furdo cecinit. Namque Monachus celibatum, & spiritu & carne merito illum damnante, perulosus, & ad cassas, interpestivas tamen, nuptias properans, quod instituit, effectum dedit, & accepta uxore, Genevæ manfit. Quod ejus factum Rex moleste ferens ab incepto de exploranda religione resiliuit (18). Which command of the king he soon after neglected, having, upon his return to Geneva, married a wife, that he might not go back a monk, into Poland: this he did by the advice of Calvin and Lælius Socinus (who, soon after he had planted the truth at Cracow, returned the same year to Geneva; from whence departing, either because he could not bear, or stood in fear of, Calvin's disposition, he fixed his residence at Zurich): but his secretary Budzinus remonstrated against it, and set before him the king's resentment, who had sent him at his own expence into foreign countries, to examine and search into every thing, and expected other consequences of such great undertakings, than the marriage of his agent, and him a monk: he put him in mind likewise of his promise, and represented to him the event of such a marriage, which rather tended to pull down, than to build up; which really came to pass, as we shall see in its proper place. But Lismanin turned a deaf ear to this remonstrance. For, tho' a monk, bating religio, both flesh and spirit deservedly condemning it, and baseness to a chaste, tho' unseasonable marriage, he effected what he had designed, and, having taken a wife, continued at Geneva. Which action of his the king resenting, laid aside all farther searches about religion.' Correct a fault that is found in John Lælius's Universal History. He says, that Lismanin left the cloister of Cracow, with some other monks, to turn Protestant (19). Who would not think, on reading this, that this man, and, after him, some others of his fraternity, abjured their religion in Poland? whereas the thing was otherwise: the Franciscans of Cracow, who turned Protestants, preceded Lismanin (20). The latter dissembled, and threw not off the mask, till he was at Geneva, in his travels, under pretence of purchasing books for his majesty's library. His marriage occasioned Florimond de Remond to say, 'That Francis Lismanin, an apostate monk, who afterwards came near to the Alcoran, favoured these novelties more from a love for a woman he doted on, than for the sake of the gospel (21).' [F] He had some conferences with Blandrata in 1558. I know not whether Lismanin had been a patron of this Blandrata, before his travels above mentioned, and had introduced him to the queen of Poland as a good Physician; but this is certain, that he introduced him to a great prince after his return. It is forsooth Blandrata, qui Medicinam diu in Polonia primum, deinde in Transylvania apud Reginas fecerat cō reverteretur: ubi nimium facile illi aditus ad nostros patuit, quantumvis à D. Joanne Calvino diligenter præmonitis: illum præsertim in illustri. & præstantiss. aliqui Principis ejusmodi gratiam insinuante Lismanino quodam Corycensi, magnæ tum apud Polonicas omnes Ecclesias auctoritatis viro (22). — It so happened, that Blandrata, who had been Physician to queens, first in Poland, then in Transylvania, returned thither; where he had too easy access to those of our party, tho' diligently cautioned by John Calvin; one Lismanin, a Corsican, a man of great authority at that time with all the Polish churches, recommending him to the favour of an otherwise most illustrious and most excellent prince. I here observe a chronological error of Father Maimbourg. He says, that 'Gentilis, being gone to Poland, whither Blandrata had sent for him, Lælius Socini, a Sieneze, and Matthew Gribaldus, went to join him, and that Peter Stator . . . Lismaninus . . . Gomefius (23). . . . and Okinus met them, openly to oppose the Divinity of Jesus Christ (24). He puts in the margin the year 1561; but it is certain, that Lismanin returned into Poland five years before Gentilis was sent for. It is farther certain, that this was not with design to attack the Divinity of Jesus Christ; for he did not appear to espouse Arianism till after he had seen the disputes of Stancar, and conferred with Blandrata, who returned into Poland two years after him. As for Paul Gomefius, he did not go to join Gentilis; for he had been in Poland from the year 1556 (25). [G] He died miserably at Königsberg, about the year 1563. He was seized with a frenzy, and threw himself into a well, where he was drowned. Some say, that his wife, shrewdly suspected of giving him horns, was the occasion of this fatal accident. 'Regiomonti ubi apud Duem Borussie debebat in phrenesin lapsus, (cui à juventute obnoxius erat) in puteum decidit, atque ita submersus est, circa annum ut colligo, 1563. Budzinus cap. 29. hunc casum narrans, dicit, cum ea de re ferretur, retulit sibi esse, uxorem ejus (quæ jam antea adulterio suspecta erat) hujus interitus causam fuisse (26). [H] Most of those, who speak of him, know not his name. We have cited one, who calls him Lisman. Others call him Lismanus (27), or Lismanius (28). 10 F

[I] He writ scarce any thing.] Here is what we find, on this head, in the Bibliothéque of the Antitritinitarian writers (29). 'Literæ ad generosum Dominum Stanislaus Ivanum Karninskium (30), datæ Pinczovæ die 10 Septembris an. 1561. M. S. in quibus sententiam Stancari oppugnat, ac multis testimoniis Patrum, probat, Patrem esse causam ac originem Filii, eoque majorem: porro se ipsum ab Arianismo sibi objecto purgat: Stancaro autem Sabellianismum imputat. Ab hoc tempore ansa ex hac Epistola arrepta, cepit Gregorius Pauli, in Ecclesia Cracoviensi, fortius urgere eminentiam Dei Patris: prout refert Budzinius, qui dictam Epistolam operis sui historici cap. 20. inseruit. Brevis explicatio Doctrinæ de sanctissima Trinitate, quam Stancaro & aliis quibusdam opposuit, præmissa ad Regem Sigismundum Augustum Epistola apologetica Kal. Junii 1563. Cracoviæ scripta. Subscripserunt ei cum ipso, Felix Cruciger Superintendens Ecclesiarum in minori Polonia, alique circiter triginta Seniores & Ministri: inter quos erat, Gregorius Pauli Senior in ditione Cracoviensi. Apologia hæc excusa est typis, anno 1565. — Manuscript letters to Stanislaus Ivan Karninski, dated at Pinczow, the tenth of September 1561, in which he opposes the opinion of Stancarus, and, by many testimonies of the Fathers, proves, that the Father is the cause and origin of the Son, and therefore greater: moreover he clears himself from the charge of Arianism; and accuses Stancarus of Sabellianism. From this time, taking a handle from this letter, Gregory Paul began more strongly to urge the supremacy of God the Father, in the church of Cracow; as Budzinus relates, who inserted the said epistle in the twentieth chapter of his Historical Work, a short explanation of the doctrine of the most Holy Trinity, written against Stancarus, and some others; to which is prefixed an apologetical epistle to king Sigismund Augustus, June 1. 1563; written at Cracow. It was subscribed likewise by Felix Cruciger, superintendant of the churches of Lesser Poland, and about thirty other elders and ministers; among whom was Gregory Paul, elder in the district of Cracow. This apology was printed in the year 1565. The collection of passages, mentioned in the body of this article, was printed; but Lubieniec had not seen it. I shall, for the singularity of the matter, recite the words, which shew Lismanin's design of terminating the differences of the ministers by the authority of the Fathers. 'Lismaninus tamen studia redintegrandæ concordiae vel stabilienæs rei refutem: media ad hanc rem obtinendam idonea quærere: ad ultimum quatuor illorum Ecclesiæ quarti Seculi Doctorum, Ambrosii, Hieronymi, Augustini, & Chrysostomi auctoritatem quasi partibus dissidentibus conciliandis commodum medium proponere: hinc centonem ex illis consuere. Id scripti, licet lucem viderit, videre mihi non contigit (31). — But Lismanin resumed his design of restoring peace and unity; considered of methods for bringing it about; and at last proposed the authority of these four doctors of the church, in the fourth century, Ambrose, Jerome, Augustin, and Chrysostom, as a proper means to reconcile the disagreeing parties; then made a collection out of those writers. This piece, the publisher, never came to my hands.'

LISOLA (FRANCIS DE) became famous by his embassies to several courts of Europe. He was a native of Bezançon, and entered into the emperor's service about the year 1639 (a). From that time to his death, he most zealously stuck to the interests of the Imperial court, and employed all the talents of his pen, and all the vigilance of an able statesman, to the advantage of the house of Austria. He was not above thirty years old, when he was resident in England from the emperor Ferdinand III (b). He discharged this employment so well, that he was continued in it above four years. He was envoy-extraordinary at the court of Spain, at the time of Philip IVth's death in 1665 [A]. The book, which he intituled Bouclier d'Etat & de Justice, — The Buckler of State and Justice, is a very good one [B]. Here he solidly answers what France had published about the rights of the queen to several states of the Spanish monarchy in the year 1667. I do not doubt but he is the author of several pamphlets against France, which are commonly ascribed to him; but I believe too, that several others are fathered on him, in which he was not concerned; the common artifice of Booksellers to give a run to a pitiful piece. He made himself odious to France by this way of writing; and some Frenchmen have abused him in their pamphlets. They complain of his passionate satirical humour, which spared not the person of the Most Christian king. He defended himself very seriously upon this head [C]. I do

[A] He was ambassador-extraordinary at the court of Spain, at the time of Philip the fourth's death in 1665.] The count de Chavagnac observes (1) that the baron de Lisola had put a stop to the conclusion of the marriage of the Infanta with the emperor, and had obliged the king, before his death, by an express article, to keep up an army in the hereditary countries, to succour Flanders, the Milanese, and the emperor: count Marlin was to be general of it. The count de Chavagnac was to command under Marlin: he adds, that the baron received orders to go over into England (2), and went on board a pink at Barcelona, in order to go to Final; that he crossed Piedmont, and came to Franche Comté with his wife and daughter (3), who is one of the worst persons in the world (4). [B] The book, he intituled, the Buckler of State and Justice, is a very good one.] Here is what Mr de Lyonne writ about it to the king, his master; 'I had forgotten to say, concerning a book the Spaniards have published, intituled, the Buckler of State and Justice, (which must be of Lisola's composition) in answer to the tract concerning the right of the queen, that it is Van Beuningen's opinion, that this book has fully and convincingly destroyed all the king's pretensions to the Franche Comté, Namur, Limbourg, Haynault, Artois, &c. so as no good reply can be made on our part; in so much that the king, as he says, has only remaining, his pretension to Brabant, by right of devolution; from whence he concludes, that he ought only to demand a satisfaction answerable to that pretension, and that, having promised it should be moderated, he now draws this consequence, that Franche Comté, and some other places, ought to satisfy his majesty (5). The postscript Mr le Tellier underwrit to this place Mr de Lyonne's of Mr de Lyonne's dispatch, by the king's order, has these words. There is ground to hope, that Van Beuningen's opinion concerning this book will not be followed.

[C] He defended himself very seriously upon this head.] His words are these; speaking of himself in the third person. 'He discovers in all his actions a very particular esteem for the French nation; he acknowledges it to be one of the nurses of arts and sciences, polite in its discourse and writings, agreeable in conversation, fruitful of great men, abounding in good soldiers, industrious, brave, and laborious. His sentiments of his most Christian majesty proceed even to admiration; he speaks of him on all occasions, with as much respect as his own subjects can do; he praises with all possible commendation the glorious regulations he has made in his kingdom, and if he could see him apply his great genius and power to less dangerous and more distant conquests, his most ardent wishes should attend his design (6). do not think any one has written against him in a more ingenious and smart manner than Mr Verjus (c) [D]: it was to retort gross injuries. Let us not forget, that Mr de Lifola was honoured with the title of baron. He died before the opening of the conferences of Nimeguen. He would doubtless have been plenipotentiary of his Imperial majesty, and possibly would have been more successful than his successors, in retarding the treaty of peace. It is said he was fitter to continue a war than to conclude it [E]; and he had such a faculty of alarming mens minds, that he animated to a confederacy even those, who had the greatest inclination to stand neuter. I am far from affirming, what many have said, that he made no scruple of dispersing in several courts, as from intercepted letters, I know not how many schemes, and projects of alliances, and instructions to ambassadors, which shewed, that France designed to swallow up all Europe; which pieces, as they say, were forged in his own study. I would require strong proofs of this, before I gave credit to it. Besides, though these frauds pass well enough upon the people, ad populum phaleras; would pacific see how he justifies himself upon the subject of libels (7). 'This writer accuses him of an unreasonable affectation to appear in public by his writings, and I can say, with all those who know him, that it is one of his greatest aversions: tho' in the whole course of his life, he has employed his leisure hours in composing many works, from which he might have expected as great approbation, as from those he was obliged to make public; yet the solicitations of his friends could never conquer the reluctance he ever had to the appearing in print, and, except the Book-ler of State, which he was obliged to publish, with a dispatch, which did not permit him to polish it as he could wish, no other piece of his writing has come out with his privacy and consent. It is true, the avarice of the Booksellers has put them on collecting some indigested fragments of two or three other of his works, which they sent to the prefs with so many faults, that the author himself can hardly know them; but he has reason to complain, that the malice of some, and the ignorance of others, frequently father on him off-springs, which he never produced (8), and which have characters so contrary to his, that if the world would do him justice, they would readily own, that they are supposititious.'

(8) Compare with this those words of the 23rd page. He shews that he is but a bad judge of style, when he attributes the letter of the States-General to the baron de Lifola. Good judges will not agree with him, and I shall not wonder hereafter, if the ignorant ascribe so many false pieces to him, as they have hitherto done.

LISOLA justified from avarice and violence.

That I may not resume this another time, let me here recite his answer to the reproaches of avarice and violence. He attacks him in his greatest strength, when he charges him, in covert expressions, with being gained by the States, and acting through a principle of interest and ambition; this is misunderstanding both his genius, and that of the United Provinces. He is as little of a humour to receive, as they are to give; it is not the way of popular republics to be so profuse . . . (9). Indeed, every one knows the baron de Lifola's little application to his fortune, and that he is daily subject to the reproaches of his most intimate friends, for the extreme negligence he shews in his own concerns. The present condition he is in, after the fair opportunities he has had to enrich himself, evidently proves, that he has hitherto laboured more for the public than for himself. Some ministers of France could give an authentic testimony of his way of receiving offers of that nature; all the Imperial court will testify in his behalf, that for above three years he has been ardently following his master to grant him a little retreat, as the price of all his services, in which he might spend the rest of his days at ease, free from the hurry of affairs. If the offices of his enemies could procure him that happiness with his master, to which he only aspires, they might rid themselves of him more handsomely, and with a better conscience, than by that cowardly and unworthy way of abuses and calumnies: I know, he would think himself obliged to their hatred, and would heartily say, Salutem ex inimicis (10). This is what concerns the accusation of avarice; let us proceed to the second head. 'As to his conduct in public affairs, all the ministers of the emperor can bear him faithful testimony, that he never proposed any thing violent or unjust, and always promoted union and moderation, while France went upon the ancient maxim, Divide & Impera. In all the controversies that have come before him, he has employed his utmost pains and study in seeking ways of accommodation; he has reconciled the elector of Brandenburg and the king of Poland, and found no obstacle to his negotiation, but what the ministers of France were the authors of. All the world knows how much he facilitated the treaty of Oliva, with 'what earnestness he laboured for those of Portugal, and Aix la Chapelle, and the pains he took to strengthen them, by a solid guaranty. He has frequently solicited defensive leagues, which are the foundations of the peace and security of states: he has always dissuaded the offensive, as much as possible, which may raise jealousies, and create new troubles; nay, he grants, that he wishes the preservation and welfare of the United Provinces, because he looks upon them as the bulwark of the empire, the strongest support of the Netherlands, and the mediators and guarantees of peace (11).'

(11) lb. pag. 14.

[D] No one wrote against him in a more ingenious . . . manner, than Mr Verjus. They ascribe to the baron de Lifola a little book intitled, la Sauce au Verjus (12), a piece extremely severe against the person, whose name is alluded to. This allusion, and the whole title of this libel, have highly displeased Father Bouhours: I shall relate somewhat at large what he has said upon it; in which we shall find the proof of what I advance, that this writing was fathered on Mr de Lifola. 'A punster will not scruple to play upon a name in abusive writings. He will intitle a libel, la Sauce au Verjus, and afterwards say, that grapes, which can never ripen, are good to make verjuice. France approves these designs by her minister at the court of Brandenburg, and the sauce is like to be none of the best, since they have put in it too much verjuice. A man must have a very bad taste, to be pleased with such kitchen-wit. Nothing disgusts more, than these insipid allusions, which have neither wit nor beauty in them; and I do not know, whether I should not relish the impertinence of that famous preacher, altogether as well, who preaching before a great prince, and taking for his text, Omniis caro fœnum, began thus, Monsieur, foin de vous, foin de moi, foin de tous les hommes, omniis caro fœnum.' But to speak seriously, the foolery of the minister of Vienna, and the preacher of Paris, are much alike: the one offends the majesty of the empire, by a foolish and ridiculous pun, while he pretends to support it; the other dishonours the sacred word of God, by a vile and buffoon expression. Both affront the dignity of our language, which will not suffer absurd and gross jesting (13).'

* It is a French pun, which can hardly be expressed in English.

[E] They say, he was fitter to continue a war, than to conclude it. It was therefore a most disagreeable employment, which the emperor put him upon, during the war of Charles Gustavus, king of Sweden, against Poland; for here is what Mr de Wicquefort tells us. 'In the year 1655, during the rupture betwixt the crowns of Poland and Sweden, the emperor sent to offer his mediation to the latter, by count de Pottingen, vice-chancellor of Bohemia. They had already begun to treat without a mediator: the Swedes were persuaded, that the emperor's intention was rather to aggravate things, than reconcile them. They knew, that, if the negotiation must be carried on by mediators, those could not be declined, who had already been employed at Lubec; that the emperor had endeavoured to oblige the Muscovites to declare war against Sweden, and that Lessinski, whom the king of Poland had sent to Vienna, had obtained some assurance of succours. The count arrived at Thorn in September; but the king being in perpetual motion, he could not speak with him till the fifth of April the year following, and saw him no more after that time; and, coming with Lifola into the army of Poland, he himself renounced the title of mediator (14).'

pacific princes suffer themselves to be caught by them? He had the misfortune to disgust the king of Poland [F], as I shall say below, citing Mr de Wicquefort: He was believed to be the author, and principal director of the design, which was executed in Cologne on the person of prince William of Furstenberg [G], during the conferences of the peace the fourteenth of February 1674.

[F] He had the misfortune to disgust the king of Poland. Mr de Wicquefort tells us this, in a way which gives us some touches of our baron's character. 'I will add to the example of Appelboom (15), that of Francis Baron de Lisola, the emperor's ambassador at Warsaw. This minister, who was a man of parts, had made himself at first very acceptable to the king and queen of Poland, and had done them important services, till, seeing, in the year 1661, that the queen took upon her to elect a successor in the king's life-time, and laboured to get a French prince elected, he openly enough opposed the intrigues that were carrying on, in order to it, amongst the senators. The queen, who could not be ignorant of it, and who was at least as fit to reign as the king, caused the bishop of Warmia, and the palatine of Pomerania, to tell Lisola, that the cabals he made in the kingdom, hindered their majesties from admitting him any more to audience. Lisola, to found their intention, and to know whether there was any thing in it more than personal, and whether the prohibition extended to the negotiation he was employed in by the emperor, his master, demanded to see the king, who ordered him to be answered, that, if he had any proposition to make, he might do it in writing. Lisola refused it, and gave advice of the whole matter to the court of Vienna, from whence an answer was returned, that the emperor was astonished at the proceeding of the king of Poland, and that, before he had taken a method so derstanding, dexterously assaulted, or defended himself, was a master of politics, acquainted with all its springs, a man of zeal, wrote excellently and easily and short, published curious pieces, when no body believed he had so much as begun them . . . (22) but with these essential qualities, Lisola was unfortunate, and died perpetually thwarted, when the emperor, moved by his services, and to make him a just recompence, recalled him to Vienna, feeding him with many fair hopes. He shone, being near his end, like the glare of a star that vanishes away, after having enlightened all the earth.

(20) He speaks of Mr d'Ambrun, bishop of Metz, who published a book concerning the right the king had to the succession of Spain, in 1674. The words cited by him are in the preface. He looked on Lisola as the author of a pamphlet, printed at Liege, in 1672, intitled L'Orateur François. It was a relation of the baroque, which this prelate had made to the king at Metz, the thirtieth of July 1673.

[G] He was believed to be the author of a design, which was executed . . . on the person of prince William of Furstenberg. The French always supposed, as an unquestioned fact, that the baron de Lisola was the promoter of this design. He is thought to be the true author of a book, which justifies that action. Deckerhus thus speaks of it. 'Gulielmi Principis Furstenbergii detentio, ad Cæsaris auctoritatem, tranquillitatem Imperii, Pacis promotionem, justa, perutilis, necessaria: auctore Christophoro WOLFFANGO, Anno MDCLXXIV publicata, illustri stylo, experientia profunda, consummata eruditione profus excellens, ab orbe erudito adscribi meruit Præ Illustri Antonio PERIANDRO, Rhetor; qui susceptam modestam nominis detentionem gratiose interpretari non dedignabitur: Causa enim ibi pro honore Imperatoris & Salute Imperii magnifice defensa; neque styli Mais Venusque PORTNERUM serio dissimulare visi; quamvis hodie Illustrem Dom. Franciscum Baronem DE ISOLA, negotiatoribus irritæ pacis immixtum, auctorem videre & eligere, maluerint (23). — The detention of William prince of Furstenberg, just, useful, and necessary, to the authority of the emperor, the tranquillity of the empire, and the promoting of peace: being published by Christopher WOLFFANGUS in the year 1674; and in beauty of style, profound experience, and consummate learning, altogether excellent, it deserved to be ascribed by the learned world to the most illustrious Anthony PERIANDER, a Griefon; who will not disdain to interpret favourably the modest detention undertaken of the name: for the honour of the emperor; and safety of the empire, are therein pompously defended; and the strength and beauty of the style seemed to claim PORTNER as it's author; tho' at present, they chuse to ascribe it to Francis baron D'ISOLA, one of the ministers for negotiating a peace. I shall occasionally say, that he ascribes to the same author an anonymous book against France, printed about the year 1673. His words are these: 'Eodem tempore prodit Consilium status secretius Regis Galliarum, Gallicæ & Germanicæ manifestatum: die Französische Rathstube; non sine veri conjectura, suæque rei, inde spe, hinc metu, à Germanis arreptum, à Gallis cum indignatione rejectum: ut ex libello nuper in contrarium edito Dominum Franciscum Baronem de ISOLA auctorem inculcans, curioso nostræ Reipublice Vindicti patefuit (24). — At the same time was published, in French and German, the Consilium Status, &c. die Französische Rathstube; not without a conjecture of the truth; and greedily seized by the Germans, thro' alternate hope and fear, but rejected with indignation by the French: as appears to the curious defender of our republic, by a book lately published on the other side, accusing the author Francis baron de ISOLA.'

LIVINEIUS, or LIVINEUS (JOHN) was born at Dendermonde; but because in the first part of his life, he was brought up at Ghent, whence he originally sprung, he gave himself the surname of Gandensis. His mother was sister of the learned Levinus Torrentius, bishop of Antwerp. He studied the Belles Lettres at Cologne, and Divinity at Louvain. He afterwards took a journey to Rome, and frequented the libraries, and principally that of the Vatican (a). He applied himself to the Greek language, which procured him the friendship of cardinal William Sirlet, and cardinal Antony Caraffa (b). He translated into Latin some works of the Greek fathers, and if he had lived longer, he would would have published a great many books [A]. He died at Antwerp the 13th of January 1599, at the age of fifty-two years, and was buried in the church of our Lady, where he had been chanter and canon (c). The Jesuits bought his library very cheap.

- [A] He translated into Latin, some works of the Greek fathers, and, if he had lived longer, he would have published a great many books. His Latin version of the treatises of Gregory of Nissa, and of St John Chrysostom, de Virginitate, was printed at Antwerp, for Plantin, in the year 1579, in 4to. (1). That of the Catechesis of Theodorus Studita, accompanied with Scholia, was printed after his death, by the care of Aubert Miraeus, at Antwerp, in 1602, in 8vo (2). That of the disputation of the emperor Andronicus, against the Jews, was printed at Ingolstadt, by the care of Peter Stewart, in the year 1616, in 4to (3). He made corrections and notes on the twelve ancient Panegyrist, and this edition is of Antwerp, typis Plantinianis, 1599, in 8vo (4). He left among his papers a Latin translation of the epistles of St Chrysostom, that of Euripides, and of Athenæus, &c. (5).

We shall have no good opinion, either of his capacity, or his latinity, if we consult the three first chapters of the first book Variarum Lectionum ex adversariis Jacobi Gretseri a Georgio Stengelio Selebarum (6), or if we observe what the journalists of Treux have informed the public of. They say, that Mr Tollius had reason to treat as unfaithful and childish Theodorus Studita's Latin version of the Testament, which he inserted with the Greek in his Insignia Itineris Italici, in 1696. They add, 'that the translator seems to have taken less pains to explain the Greek, than to render his own Latin inexplicable: he applied himself more to search after uncommon Latin words, than to acquaint himself with the sense of the Greek words: but they are greatly surprized, that Mr Tollius should mistake a translation in such a stile as this, for a work of Father Sirmond, many of whose pieces he confesses he had read. How came he not to perceive the difference between this obscure, affected, latinity, and Father Sirmond's stile, which is always perspicuous, nobly simple, and elegant without affectation? They observe, that 'the real version which this Father made of Theodorus Studita's Testament, was printed in the year 1696, in the edition of the works of Father Sirmond, in five volumes in folio: but that it had already appeared in the ninth volume of Baronius's Annals, at the year 826, number 50. That which Mr Tollius ascribes to Father Sirmond, had been published ever since the year 1602, under the name of its true author John Livineius.' They conclude, that it did not become Mr Tollius to exclaim, 'that he had discovered too late, that the learned Jesuit understood neither Greek, nor Latin, and that the esteem he is in, is owing only to prejudice (7).'

In truth, it is a gross mistake, and which would give Mr Tollius great uneasiness, if he were alive. We may see by this, how dangerous a work criticism is; for if we are unacquainted with certain particular facts, all other points of knowledge will not prevent our judging wrong of things.

LIZET (PETER) first president in the parliament of Paris. I mention him, only to illustrate some things which Mr Moreri has not sufficiently enlarged upon. They relate to Peter Lizet's disgrace [A], and to his books of controversy [B]. He died the seventh

- [A] Peter Lizet's disgrace. It is spoken of in Moreri's Dictionary, in such a manner, as to make some think, that the dukes de Valentinois, and the cardinal de Lorraine, were the promoters of it, as two different causes. This is misleading the reader: for the cardinal and dukes ought to be considered, in this point, but as one sole cause. The cardinal interested the ambition and avarice of this lady, in the design he had formed of discharging those from places, who did not please him: and afterwards he picked a sham quarrel with Peter Lizet, the consequences of which were, that this first president quitted his place (1). The Guises were angry with him, because he opposed the giving them the title of prince, in parliament (2); and besides, the cardinal of Lorraine would have a man in that post, who should refuse him nothing. The quarrel he picked with Lizet was this: he accused him of having spoken insolently in his majesty's council. The foundation of the accusation was, that Lizet would not give his vote standing, and uncovered, in a council, where the cardinal presided. He boldly declared, that he saw no person present, who deserved such a submission from him. But he did not maintain the first resolution; he quitted his post, like a coward, and even went and threw himself at the cardinal's feet, setting forth his poverty, and supplicating his compassion (3). That poverty was to his glory, and, if he had not tarnished it by so mean a submission, he might be looked on as one of those noble patriots, who appeared at the head of the first parliament of France. He was not master of a foot of land, after he had been twenty years first president: the very house where he lived was not his own. The compassion they had for his poverty procured him the abbey of St Victor, by the cession of Lewis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise (4). Father du Breul, citing Thuanus, relates the thing, as if all this were transacted the same day, and at the same sitting: but Thuanus says no such thing, but insinuates the contrary. However let us set down Father de Breul's words. 'The president Thuanus . . . elegantly describes the cause of this judge's quitting his place of first president, and accepting the abbey of St Victor, whether he asked it, or whether it was offered him; (for he could not be displaced, except for a crime punishable with death). Being called, says he, to the privy-council (where the cardinal de Lorraine presided with an authority equal to that of a vice roy) and being required to speak his opinion frankly, answered, 'I see no body in this place, before whom I ought to give my opinion standing, and uncovered. At which the said cardinal, finding himself touched, proceeded to ill language, calling him arrogant, and threatening him with the king's displeasure. Which so shook this good old man of sixty eight years of age, and too timorous, that he did not persevere in his resolute answer, but, on the contrary, threw himself at the cardinal's feet, and begged his pardon, Ex viro congesta primo, mulier posteriore factus. He did not however fail to assert his integrity and innocence, and to protest, that, in the three years he had been counsellor in parliament, twelve years advocate to the king, and twenty years first president, he had not acquired as much land as his feet stood upon: a d that he rented his very house of the abbot of St John des Vignes de Soissons, situate at Paris, in St James's Street, near St Yves's church. Which house retained the name of the said abbey, till the time of the alienations of the estates of the church, when Monsieur James Legier, treasurer to cardinal Charles de Bourbon the elder, purchased it (5). Here are several things, which are not to be found in Thuanus, some of which are undoubtedly true: for it is certain, that Lizet was counsellor in the parliament of Paris three years, &c. His epitaph declares it. 'Qui olim ob heroicis animi sui dotes, vir singulari memoria, & summa juris prudentia in supremum Parisiensis centuriae Senatui à Rege Lodoico XII. aditus, Senatoris munere triennio functus est. Deinde Triumviratus Regii Advocati munus XII. annis Duce Francisco I. feliciter obivit. And lastly, being made first president, on account of his honesty, he held the reins of justice with such moderation, during a course of twenty seventh of June 1554, at seventy-two years of age. Consult his epitaph at the 322d page of the Antiquities of Paris. He took priest's orders in the year 1553 (a). Consult the notes upon Sanci's Catholic Confession, at the 424th page of the edition of 1699, and the 185th and 507th pages of Henry Stephens's Apology for Herodotus (b), where he speaks very ill of this president's morals.

'twenty years, that, in the opinion of every one, he was deservedly raised, by Henry II. to be abbot of a religious house.' By this epitaph Mr Moreri is convicted of two falsehoods, contained in these words. He was made one of the king's council in 1515 (7), and two years after was honoured with the post of the king's attorney-general.

[B] His books of controversy. Mr Moreri's indulgence could not stand it out here against the decisive sentence of Thuanus; he has acknowledged, that these books were unworthy of Peter Lizet's reputation. Let us see what Thuanus says of them; 'In quo (Sancti) Floriani carobio) reliquum ætatis exegit extrema clausula minime priori vitæ & famæ respondente, dum litterarum sacrarum homo rudis, Theologicis libris in illo otio scriptis se deridendum propinavit; quibus contrario scripto artificioso ridiculo sub Benedicti Passavantii nomine à Theodoro Beza, ut creditur, responsum est (8).'

I hope it will not be thought amiss to produce here Mr Arnauld's judgment upon Peter Lizet's work concerning the translating the scripture into the vulgar tongue. 'There is but one point, says he (13), where, in they can, it may be, with any foundation complain, that I have unjustly treated Mr Mallet. Which is, that I may have mentioned him in some places, as if he was the first author of a great many imperfections, which I have since discovered he might have taken from a pitiful book, which I had not then seen. But I am willing to give them an example of what a man ought to do, when he has committed a fault. I therefore acknowledge, that I was to blame to look upon Mr Mallet as the first author of all the extravagancies, his book is full of. Some indeed are his own, and those are the grossest. But I have discovered by the book I just now hinted at, that he often has only blindly followed five or six authors of the last age, whose works it is the scandal of ours to preserve, so unworthy are they of the care that has been taken to rescue them from that oblivion, in which some of our ancestors, wiser than we, had suffered them to be buried.' Mr Arnauld here speaks of a certain collection of several tracts, the first whereof is Peter Lizet's. He explains this in another book, in which he tells us (14), that the assembly of the clergy of France, made an order in the year 1660, 'at the request of Mr d'Atichy, bishop of Autun . . . to print, at the expence of the clergy, a collection of authors of the last age, who have condemned the versions into the vulgar tongue, both of the scripture and divine offices. And indeed, adds he, this book was printed with this scandalous title. Collectio quorundam gravium auctorum, qui ex professo, vel ex occasione, sacra Scriptura, aut divinorum officiorum, in vulgarem linguam translationes damnarunt. And with this running-title, Collectio auctorum versiones vulgares damnantium. It is a medley of the most impertinent authors, that have been written upon this subject, mingled with some good ones, but who say nothing of what the title of this collection imports, or who say quite the contrary. It is a book of president Lizet's, which wholly turns upon this foolish notion, that, when the Bible was translated into Latin, in the beginning of the church, there was two sorts of Latin, one conformable to the rules of Grammar, which was only understood by the learned, and the other not tied to those rules, which was the only one the people understood, and that the Latin versions of scripture having been made in this first sort of Latin, was not properly a version into the vulgar tongue; which this president, become an abbot, extends to all other languages.' Mr Simon (15) had nothing to say in defence of this bad writer.

The Epitomy of Gesner makes mention of two other books of Peter Lizet: one De autoritate Ecclesiæ, & potestate Papæ; the other De Hereticis, & eorum penis. After his death was printed (16) his treatise of the Method of proceeding, both in the Institution and Decision of Criminal and Civil Causes, together with the Form and Manner of taking Informations in the said Civil and Criminal Causes. La Croix du Maine, who tells me this, did not know that Lizet died in 1554. He makes him flourish in 1557 (17).

LOGES (MARY BRUNEAU (a), LADY DES) was one of the most illustrious women of the XVIIth century. She was married, in 1599, to Charles de Rechignevoisin, Esq; lord des Loges, who, four years after, was made gentleman of the king's bed-chamber in ordinary. She died the seventh of June 1641, and was buried in a place she had chosen her self, at two hundred paces distance from la Pleau, a house in Limoulin. Her zeal for the Protestant religion, which she made a constant profession of all her life, her piety, and greatness of soul, appeared with a new lustre, towards the end of her life; the last years whereof, and some others, had been exercised by several domestic troubles troubles [A]. This doubtless occasioned her making just reflexions on the nothingness of creatures. She had nine children [B], and a sister that was married to Mr de Beringhen [C]. The remarks will inform us, what esteem she was in, not only with the greatest wits, such as Malherbe and Balzac [D], but also with the greatest princes [E]. We shall relate a curious story, which Mr Menage has rectified [F]. Mr de Wicquefort observes, that Madam des Loges had a great ascendant over the duke of Orleans, for which reason, the assemblies were forbid, which were used to be held in her house (b).

(b) Wicquefort. Mémoires touchant les Ambassadeurs, pag. 542. Edit. Hague 1677.

[A] She met with several domestic troubles. It is the common fate of persons of her sex, who distinguish themselves by a great genius, improved by study, if they engage in conjugal bonds. They ought not to do it; there are others enough besides them, who would take care the race of mankind should not fail. It is much if their country does not do them the same injustice, which Seneca speaks of with regard to Cato (1), of not knowing the value of the treasure it possesses. That which their country does not always do, a husband does much less.

[B] She had nine children. There were but five of them alive, three sons and two daughters, when she died. One of the sons bore arms in Holland (2), and married a gentlewoman there, of the family of Vander Myle. There are only some daughters from that marriage.

[C] ... and a sister that was married to Mr de Beringhen. The marquis de Beringhen proceeded from this marriage, who died at eighty nine years of age, in March 1692, after having been for a long time first master of the horse to the king. This alliance gave very illustrious grand-nieces to our Madam des Loges, by the marquis de Beringhen's sisters. The author of several books lately published, with the title of Voyage d'Espagne, &c. is one of them. There are two others (3), who, out of zeal to the Protestant religion, have quitted all the advantages of their country, and who, by their piety, give a lustre to all the other excellent qualities that they are enriched with.

[D] She was in great esteem ... with Malherbe and Balzac. To have a just idea of the ability and wit of Madam des Loges, we need only consider, that Malherbe was one of her most assiduous courtiers, and constantly visited her every other day (4). Mentioning Malherbe, is mentioning a man, who never praised, nor hardly esteemed, any body, and who is one of the first and greatest masters that has formed the taste and judgment of our nation, with respect to ingenious performances. Balzac was at least equal to Malherbe, and has perhaps more contributed than he to that politeness, which is spread over the kingdom; however, he was equally an admirer of the lady we speak of. The letters he writ to her are a public testimony of it; and his esteem for her, does as well appear by what he said of her to his friends, as by what he wrote to her. He confesses, in one place of his works, that if he was grown more sparing of his praises, he was chiefly obliged for it to the good advice she gave him. 'The good Madam des Loges, says he (5), gave me some terrible reprimands upon this subject some time before her death. She upbraided me, that I was the dope of all reigns (they are her very words); that I lavished my praises upon all those who made a shew of any worth; that I was too credulous with respect to others, upon the first glimpse of goodness, the bare appearance of virtues, and so forth.' In another place (6), where he thunders against burlesque, which was grown too much in fashion, to the great grief of those, who had acquired glory by a grave stile, he does not think he has sufficiently fulminated that fundamental heresy in his empire, unless he condemns it by a decree of this lady. 'This sort of raillery, says he, favours more of comedy than conversation, and more of farce than comedy. This is not rallying like a gentleman. Madam des Loges used to say, that she should be as pleased to see a drunken man, or bravado, acted ...

Nay, more, she said, she looked upon such jargon, as she would upon a wooden sword by a man's side, and meal upon his face.' Mr de Baurtra, who was not naturally a great admirer (7), doubtless admired this lady, since, to shew a man's want of address, who could not profit by the conversation of the wits, by putting them upon things worthy of them, he makes use of these four examples:

I do not believe, that they, who are skilled in proofs, can doubt of the extraordinary merit of this lady, after having considered what I have said.

[E] ... but likewise with the greatest princes.

Balzac shall be my witness. 'If you do not know, says he (9), Urania, the nymph I have so much praised, and whom I bitterly lament, I must tell you, it is my good deceased friend, Madam des Loges, who in her life-time was called more than once, and by more than one academist, the celestial, the divine, the tenth muse, &c. who was esteemed within and without the kingdom, by crowned heads, the demi-gods of our age, by the duke of Orleans, the king of Sweden, the duke of Weimar, &c. I am of opinion, that the verses, which celebrate her memory (I speak of the eloquent Urania) are full as good as those, which one Antipater, a Sidonian, made upon the death of the learned Sappho.'

[F] I shall relate a curious story, which Mr Menage has rectified. It is an adventure, which has been published two several ways. Mr de Balzac tells it thus, in his thirty seventh dialogue.

'Malherbe was one of the most assiduous in making his court to Madam des Loges, and visited her constantly every other day. One of those days, finding upon the table in her closet du Moulin the minister's great book against Cardinal du Perron (10), and being seized with a poetical enthusiasm upon the bare reading of the title, he called for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote down these ten lines:

Quoy que l'Auteur de ce gros livre
Semble n'avoir rien ignoré,
Le meilleur est toujours de fuir
Le Proné de notre Cuié.
Toutes ces doctrines nouvelles
Ne plaissent qu'aux folles cervelles;
Pour moi, comme une humble brebis,

This author may pretend to know
More than a thousand others do;
I follow what our parson preaches,
Believing only as he teaches.
I leave these novelties to those,
Who turn with ev'ry wind that blows;
My shepherd bumble I obey,
Nor ever from his flock do stray.
No change a man of prudence knows,
But in his women, and his cloaths.

Madam des Loges, reading Malherbe's verses, and fired by honour and zeal, took the same pen, and on the other side of the paper wrote these other verses:

C'est vous dont l'audace nouvelle
A rejeté l'antiquité,
Et du Moulin ne vous rapelle
Qu'à ce que vous avez quitté.
Vous aimez mieux croire à la mode:
C'est bien la foy la plus commode,
Pour ceux que le monde a charmés.
Les femmes y sont vos idoles:
Mais à grand tort vous les aimez,
Vous qui n'avez que des paroles.

(9) In the thirteenth Letter of the second book of the Lettres choisies: he writes it to Mr Menage, sending him at the same time the verses he had made on the death of Madam des Loges. They are printed among his Latin poems. Here are some lines of them.

'Tis you, who boldly dare decry,
And set aside antiquity.
Good du Moulin, wou'd but restore
Those doctrines you believ'd before.
But fashion, guide of faith in chief,

Yet vain your worship, since, at most,
But empty talking is your boast.

‘ The conclusion of these two epigrams will doubtless please the prophane, and those who set up for gallants. For my part, I hold, that in matters of religion, the comic stile is always to be avoided. The first is not grave enough for a man, who speaks in earnest, and the other is too light for a woman, that speaks to a man.’

Mr Menage thinking, that the matter thus happened, printed this story in his observations upon Malherbe's poems, just as Mr de Balzac had told it. But mind what he has put at the end of this book.

Since this note was written and printed, I have been informed by Mr de Racan, that it was he, who made these verities, which Mr de Balzac ascribes to Malherbe, and that Madam de Gombaud made those which he ascribes to Madam des Loges, and that the thing happened in this manner. Madam des Loges, who was of the pretended Reformed Religion, had lent Mr de Racan, du Moulin the minister's book, called le Bouclier de la Foi, (The Shield of Faith), and had obliged him to read it. Mr de Racan, having read it, made this epigram upon it, which Mr de Balzac has altered in many places.

Bienque du Moulin en son livre

Le meilleur est toujours de suivre
Le Prône de notre Curé.
Toutes ces doctrines nouvelles
Ne plaisent qu'aux folles cevelles.

‘ Having communicated it to Malherbe, who came to see him at that time, Malherbe wrote it with his own hand in du Moulin’s book, which he returned at the same time to Madam des Loges, as from Mr de Racan. Madam des Loges, seeing these verses written with Malherbe’s hand believed them to be his; and as she was extremely zealous for her religion, gion, would not suffer them to remain unanswered. She therefore desired Mr de Gombaud, who was of the same religion, and of equal zeal, to answer them. Mr de Gombaud (I know it from himself) who believed, as Madam des Loges did, that Malherbe was the author of those verses, answered them by the epigram, which Mr de Balzac attributes to Madam des Loges, and which he thinks too light for a woman who speaks to a man. This is not the first time that Mr de Balzac has ascribed to this lady verses she had no hand in; for in one of his letters he makes her the author of the song of the dying lover. the burden whereof is.

Ah c'en est fait ! je cede à la rigueur du sort,
Je vais mourir ; je me meurs ; je suis mort ;

'Tis done ; my destiny is on my head ;
I'm going to die ; I die ; and now I'm dead.

' which was written by the deceased Mr Habert Cerifi,
' one of the finest wits of our age.'

Who sees not in all this an instance of historical uncertainty? Mr de Balzac thought he had communicated to his friend a most certain fact, an incomparable piece of secret history, and infinitely valuable to all the lovers of what we call personalities. He had persuaded all his readers of it. Mr Menage, having inferred it in one of his books, was just upon dispersing it far and wide, when by chance Messieurs de Racan and de Gombaud, being still alive, disabused Mr Menage, before his observations upon Malherbe were sold off; and thus the public came to be undeceived. If these two gentlemen had been dead, without speaking of this to Mr Menage, or if they had spoken of it at another time, the first narration would perhaps still have had intire credit. How many other facts are there, and much more important, which pass from age to age, and from generation to generation, no body discovering their falldoom; for want of fortuitous occasions, like the conversation of Mr Menage with Racan and Gombaud? However, Madam des Loges is cleared of composing verses in too light a strain. It cannot be denied, that Balzac was in the right, to think the end of the epigram too little consistent with the modesty and purity which ought to reign in all the writings of the fair-sex. Not that we must espouse the hasty and too rigid maxim of those, who pretend, that a woman, who should tax a man with having nothing but words, would as good as declare that she was concerned she had not got, or did not daily get from him, something more real. This maxim is extravagant and false; but who would not wonder at Mr de Racan, if it were true, that he was the author of Malherbe's Life (11), printed with some little tracts in 1672; who would not wonder, I say, that he should tell Mr Menage of Balzac's mistake, and yet insert all Balzac's story (12) in Malherbe's Life, without rectifying it in the

LOGNAC, or LOIGNAC, or LONGNAC, or rather LAUGNAC [A], made himself extremely considerable in the reign of Henry III, and had a great share in that prince's favour. He was brave, and in this point had firmly established his reputation by some duels, and quarrels, which the house of Guise had brought upon him [B], and

[A] LOGNAC or rather LAUGNAC.]

It will appear by the following remarks, that these four ways of writing this gentleman's name, are found in our historians. The last is, I think, the best, as being that which Dupleix, who was of the same country, has used; and it is known, that the diphthong au, is very common in the proper names of that country. This diphthong is pronounced like an o at Paris, and in the neighbouring provinces: and hence the authors put an o, and not an au, in the first syllable of the name of this favourite of Henry III. I shall observe by the way, that one must be very attentive, who would understand the Latin tongue, spoken by the Parisians; for they pronounce in the same manner aurum and borum, auris and oris, and thus of several other words.

[B] He had established his reputation by some duels, and quarrels, which the house of Guise had brought upon him.] The baron de Biron (1) had a quarrel in 1585, 'with the Sieur de Carency, eldest son to count de la Vauguyon . . . for the heirs of the house of Caumont, whom both pretended to. This quarrel ended by a duel of three against three; Biron, Loignac, and Janiffac, on one side, killed Carey, d'Estillac, and la Bastie (2). The author, I have this from, relates in another history (3); ' that after the ' duke of Espernon was retired to Angouleme, the ' king having given the place of first gentleman of his ' chamber to the Sieur de Loignac, this gentleman was as a mark, at which, by the instigation of the duke of Guise, all the princes of the league discharged their envy. The chevalier d'Aumalle, a little before the death of the duke of Guise, returned to Paris, and, before he came there, had contrived a quarrel with the said Sieur de Loignac, upon the subject of some amorous affair, which commonly happens amongst young gentlemen. Loignac was brave, a man well skilled in arms, and who had come off in several duels; his quality of first gentleman of the bedchamber and in which he came off honourably. He was captain of the forty-five gentlemen [C], chosen for the greater security of Henry III's person. He was also master of the wardrobe (a), and gentleman of the chamber to this prince (b). It is generally agreed, That he encouraged him to rid himself of the duke of Guise [D], and was present at the execution; but as to the manner of his being an accomplice in it, it is not so generally agreed [E]; nor are the historians any better agreed about his disgrace: for some only say, he was turned out because he asked a government; and others, That he had a government given him on purpose to remove him from court [F]; adding, that, by the treachery of gave him a right to fight duels with strangers of the greatest quality, and decline them with such as were not of his own quality. This grudge therefore, and the picking a quarrel on a love affair, made Loignac conclude, that the duke of Guise, and the princes of the league, were resolved he should not long enjoy the advantages the king's favour gave him. We find in d'Audiguer (4) more circumstances, than in Cayet, of Biron's and Carenci's duel.

[C] He was captain of the forty-five gentlemen. Let us cite Mezzerai, who tells the reason of raising this new company. 'Esperson raised to the highest degree of favour, in which Joyeuse began to decline, ceased not to spur on the king to the ruin of the Guises; and they, in revenge, having sworn his destruction, formed several conspiracies to complete it. He had the policy to persuade the king, that they were all intended against his sacred person; and by this means induced him to guard himself with the famous band of forty five, which he himself chose perhaps with a design which the event will discover. They were all Gascons, whom the hopes of pushing their fortune made capable of every thing. Lognac was their captain (5).'

[D] It is generally agreed, that he encouraged Henry III, to rid himself of the duke of Guise. At the same time the duke of Nevers, and Lognac, captain of the forty-five, were continually exasperating him; the duke of Nevers, because he irreconcilably hated the duke of Guise, and Lognac, because, having in some sort succeeded to Esperson's favour, as a second, to Bellegarde, cousin german to this duke, he knew that the house of Guise, a constant enemy to favourites, would not long suffer him in this post (6).'

[E] The manner of his being an accomplice in the murder of the duke of Guise, is not agreed on. Some authors say, that the duke 'feeling the council had not yet met, was passing to the king's chamber, and crossing the gallery which led to it, and entering into his majesty's chamber, he saw the Sieur de Longnac sitting upon a trunk, his arms a-crois without stirring. He had long suspected, that the Sieur de Longnac had undertaken to kill him, and thinking that he was posted there to attack him; he resolved immediately to fall upon him, and laying his hand to his sword, drew it half out; but the Sieur de Longnac, and some others, seeing him make such an attempt, at the king's chamber door, prevented him, and immediately threw him down, and dispatched him with their swords, without giving him time to speak a word. This is the opinion of those who have written the history of these matters, as printed at Geneva (7); but the opinion of the league is quite contrary (8). The relation I have mentioned above (9), imports, that Loignac staid with his sword (10) in the chamber, where the execution was to be performed, and where the king had placed eight of the forty-five. These eight had each a dagger. The duke of Guise entering into the chamber, saluted those that were there: 'who rose up, saluted him at the same time, and followed him as out of respect; but when he was within two steps of the door of the old cabinet, . . . he was suddenly seized by the arm by the Sieur Montfery, the elder . . . who at the same time stabbed him with his own hand in the breast, saying, ba! traitor, thou shalt die. At the same instant the Sieur Des Effranats started up, and the Sieur de St Malines gave him another stab with his dagger in the breast, and the Sieur de Loignac run him into the loins (11). Other relations say, 'that nine of the forty five came from behind the tapestry, where they were concealed; and that the duke of Guise, seeing near the chimney, Longnac, whom he knew to be his mortal enemy, made some steps backward to draw his sword; that he at first got rid of the assassins; and that Longnac, perceiving that he came directly to him, gave him a thrust in the belly, on which he fell down, and died some moments after (12). Davila supposes, that Lognac did not wound him at all, and that he only pushed him back, seeing him come forwards to him; that after this repulse, the duke, who had received several wounds, fell down, and died. 'Dopo molte ferite nel capo, e per ogni parte del corpo urtato finalmente da Lognac, al quale s'era impetuoso famente avanzato, cadde innanzi alla porta della guardaroba, & ivi senza poter proferir parola finì gli ultimi sospiri della sua vita (13). Thuanus affirms, that Loniac seeing him come up to him in a menacing posture, opposed him with his sword in the scabbard, and made him fall (14). He was only spectator of the tragedy, if we depend on Thuanus's relation. He was leaning on a trunk, when the duke disingaged himself from the assassins, and came up to him, as it were, with a design to fall upon him: 'Cum in Monestratum Loniacum, qui cum Rogerio Bellagardio Termo in cubiculo aderat, arcu genu altero innixum protensis brachiis & contractis pugnis tendere videretur, quasi ipsum petiturus (15). Duplex is more positive; he makes the eight alone do the execution. 'Laugnac not being one of those, whom the king had chosen, did not strike him, tho' he was particularly his enemy: However he had offered his majesty to attack him in a single combat. But the king thought there would be as much hazard as courage in that, and would not suffer him (16). I have read this last circumstance in no other Historian; the offer made to Henry III of taking off the duke of Guise by a duel, being constantly ascribed to Grillon. Davila relates, that Grillon making this offer, upon refusing the commission to kill the duke, left the king in an extreme perplexity, which lasted till Lognac had promised him to see the execution done. I relate the words of this Historian, because they contribute to the history of our Laugnac. 'Lasciò il Rè grandemente dubbioso di quello dovesse operare, e stette in questa perplessità fino al giorno vicesimo primo, nel quale confidato il negotio a Lognac uno de' gentiluomini della camera sua, il quale già dal Duca di Gioiosa era stato introdotto alla Corte; e per la gratia per le maniere, e per la gentilezza de' collumi già cominciava ad avanzarsi al luogo de' Mignonni, egli senza molto riguardo promise con alcuni delli quarantacinque, che dependevano strettamente da lui di eseguire prontamente quello fatto (17). — He left the king in great perplexity, till the twenty first day, when, trusting the business with Lognac, one of the gentlemen of his chamber, who had been introduced to court by the duke of Joyeuse, and had ingratiated himself by his polite behaviour, he immediately promised him, with the assistance of any one of the forty five, who depended upon him, to see it executed.'

[F] Some say, he was turned out because he asked a government; and others say, that a government was given him on purpose to remove him from court. 'The Sieur de Loignac, a great favourite of the king . . . importuned him to give him a government, and a place of secure retirement, because of the enmity the house of Guise bore him: his majesty asking him, if he had no other reason, than that, to ask of him a place of retreat: Loignac answered, no, and that the enmity of the house of Guise was reason enough. Get you gone immediately out of my court, said the king to him, and let me never see you more, since you desire any other security than being near my person; I have not been mistaken in my opinion of you, I much suspect that you are tainted with ingratitude, and have forgotten the obligations you are under for the benefits I have conferred on you. Loignac, receiving an answer from the king so contrary to his expectation, immediately left Blois, and passing through Amboise, retired into Guienne, where he was killed soon after by a pistol-shot, as he came out of his castle, to go a hunting, by a gentleman his neighbour, with whom he had a quarrel (18). This is Peter Victor Cayet's relation, which at once shews what I have elsewhere promised (19), and is also an instance that Henry III, on some occasions, knew how to shew resolution and greatness of mind. The following relation is very different.

The king, at the beginning of the year 1588, had made two masters of his wardrobe, the lords de Bellegarde and de Longnac; the former from a natural affection he had for him; the latter at the pressing instance of the duke d'Elpernon: but as that affection, which springs from our own nature, takes deeper root, than the liking entertained upon the recommendation of others: so he began to be weary of Longnac, especially after the death of the duke of Guise, and the more because he had been the first, who induced the king to command this murder, which succeeded so unfortunately; so that from thenceforward he began to look on him with an ill eye. I can assure you of one thing, that, three weeks before he left the court, an experienced courier said to me: observe this gentleman; as good a face as he sets upon the matter, he is totally routed. For entering publicly into the king's cabinet, to keep up his good opinion with the people, he immediately comes out by the back door, and retires to his chamber, quitting the field to Monsieur de Bellegarde. The king, who would not entirely discontent Longnac, had formerly given him the government of Anjou and Touraine; and he had often told him, that he ought to retire thither; but he, foreseeing, that if he left his place, he should only be a governor in parchment, and that they, who had the governments of the towns, would have all the power, remained still at court with the king; who at last, not able to bear the sight of him any longer, told him, that he had frequently enough declared how little satisfaction he received from his presence; so that he might take his choice, either to go off immediately, or never appear before him more but on Fridays, a day he set apart to do penance. Longnac, seeing himself totally cut off from his master's favour, and no hopes of any longer respite, began to act the part of a desperate man, who meditated nothing but revenge: a design, however, which he did not execute, but has since been very well managed by another hand. He posted away one fine night, and retired to Amboise (20). This was a town of his government, and where du Guast, whom he looked on as his creature (21), commanded. He was very well received, and proposed to du Guast the design of making an advantage of having the prisoners of Henry III in their power (22). The court suspected this conspiracy, and entered into a kind of negotiation to prevent the consequences: Longnac protested, that he would most faithfully preserve the town, the castle, and the prisoners, for the king. But to say truth, he reckoned without his host; for he had put a thought into du Guast's head, who knew very well how to make his advantage of it (23). There were in the castle two companies; that of du Guast, and another Du Guast, by a bold stroke of policy, gives a false alarm, and makes Longnac believe, that there were people ravaging on the other side of the bridge, who attempted to make themselves masters of it, and that it would not be amiss to play them a trick. Longnac, whose hands itched to be doing something, and who did not at all mistrust du Guast, undertook to clear the coast: he marches out of the castle, followed by the other company, and soon finds there was nothing at all in it. But at his return, thinking to enter at the place where he marched out, he found the gates shut against him, and all his company. You may judge what a miserable condition he was in, to find himself first thrust out of his master's favour, and next out of the only place where he proposed to himself some consolation in his disgrace. Seeing himself thus tricked, he was forced to resume the old road to his house in Gascony, and his company of soldiers, that of Blois. Du Guast excuses himself (as I have learned from his own mouth) by alledging he had certain advice, that Longnac came to Amboise, with a design to kill him, and make himself absolute master of the place. And that, to avoid this danger, he was willing to prevent him (24). We shall make a reflexion below upon this excuse of du Guast.

Were I to chuse between Victor Cayet's and Stephen Pasquier's accounts, I should not imitate Mr Varillas, who gives the preference to the former, without saying one word of what is contained in the latter. He relates (25) the agreement made by du Guast with the league for delivering the prisoners, and the conditions upon which Henry III made that compact miscarry, by granting du Guast considerable advantages, and then adds, that 'the counter blow of these two compacts rebounded upon Longnac The king was insensibly grown cold to him; and though his majesty had hitherto held the balance between Bellegarde and him, as he had formerly done between the dukes of Joyeuse and Elpernon; he now on a sudden inclined wholly on Bellegarde's side, by refusing Longnac the post of master of the horse, to give it the other. The discontent this gave Longnac made him desire his majesty, too plainly that for his lost favour he would be pleased to give him a place of security for his retreat.' Mr Varillas afterwards relates the answer which Cayet supposes the king made. This is all his account. How many essential circumstances are here wanting; and what did he think of, in connecting Longnac's disgrace with the base dealing of du Guast? to what purpose is this? the omission of facts, which might serve to connect these things, and furnish a reasonable transition to an Historian, is not the least of his faults. Nothing is more worthy of a critic's intention, than such omissions; and nothing more proper to mend the taste and judgment of an author, than to be admonished of this kind of mistakes.

Observe these words of Thuanus (26): 'Tum, that is when James Clement stabbed Henry III with a knife, Mompelatus, Lonicus, & Joannes Levias Mirapicensis, qui aderant, hominem istu regis attonitum superanti ira pensum humi sternunt, statim innumeris vulneribus confossum interficiunt. Then Mompelat, Lonicus, and John marquis de Mirepoix (who were present) in a rage, knocked down the assassin, who stood agast when he had struck the king, and, giving him innumerable wounds, killed him.' Davila says (27) that Mompelat, Lognac, and the marquis de Mirepoix, gentlemen of the bed-chamber, threw James Clement's body out at the window. I believe that, in both these Historians, the comma between the two first names is a fault: for Mompelat was one of our Lognac's names (28); but if they mean by their Lonicus, and Lognac, him whom I treat of in this article, they are in an error: he was no longer at court.

By the way, du Guast deserved no credit, when he alledged the excuse, which Pasquier relates. The action, he would excuse, looked so black, so infamous, so perfidious, that there is no lie, but he must have invented to cover it. And it is the common custom of those, who are guilty of such crimes, to maintain that, without that, they had been ruined, and that they had most certain advice of designs formed against their life. They do not always lie; but most commonly they do; and this is sufficient to render all apologies of this kind suspected of imposture, unless they are built upon undoubted evidence. It was not impossible that Laugnac should take measures to supplant the other; for there were few honest men at that time, either at court, or in the league; but the presumption is wholly against du Guast; he was a dishonest man, an arrant villain, and shewed it soon after; since, notwithstanding all his obligations to Henry III, who had loaded him with favours, he treated with the league for the surrendering the prisoners, whom that prince had given him the charge of; and he had actually delivered them, if the king had not prevented him by advantageous offers. Unfortunate prince! who was obliged to recompense

With an ill grace the Iron age we blame;
Our own so base, no metal gives it name.

[G] I know not whether the Laugnacs, who were killed in a duel . . . descended from him.] D'Audiguer affirms it: he had heard say, that one of those, who fought for the baron de Biron, ' was the last to conquer; but ' having at length got his enemy under, he gave him several stabs, without being able to kill him, so that ' he was forced to quit him alive, seeing his companions go off, though he continued alone on horseback ' for some time, on purpose to see him die (30). If (10) D'Audiguer ' this was Loignac, continues he, he was punished for ' it in his successors; for the last Loignacs, father and ' son, were both killed in duels within these four or ' five years; one in Rouergue, by the baron de Me- ' gelas, and the other not far from Bistretre, by the ' baron de Rabat (31). Two brave barons, who are ' no less discreet and courteous than brave, and who ' put an end to two brave men. I did not know the ' son; but the blood he drew by several wounds from ' him that killed him, testifies what he was. As for ' the father, I have sometimes seen him in company ' with baron de Roquefueil (another of the bravest men ' in the world) and at the deceased queen Margaret's, ' where he held extraordinary disputes in Philosophy, ' and greatly manifested his knowledge of good let- ' ters.

LOLLIUS (MARCUS) consul of Rome in the year 733. The emperor Augustus gave him great marks of his esteem; for he not only honoured him with the government of a noble province (a) in the year 719, but made him also governor to Caius Cæsar, his grandson, when he sent this young prince into the East, to settle the affairs of the empire on that side. Lollius's conduct in this expedition betrayed the ill qualities, which he had all along politickly concealed under the false appearance of virtue. His dissimulation was so well acted, that, tho' avarice was his reigning passion, he was ever thought impregnable to money [A]. The excessive free-gifts, which he extorted in his expedition with the young Cæsar, lost him that false reputation (b). He discovered some other of his faults in the same employment; for, in order to make himself more necessary, he fomented the quarrel between Tiberius and Caius Cæsar [B]; and was suspected of being a spy of the king of Parthia, to retard the conclusion of the peace. Caius discovered this treachery [C], when he came to discourse with this monarch in an isle of the Euphrates (c), which made him conceive such an aversion for this governor, as drove him to despair; for he killed himself

[A] He had been thought impregnable to money.] Among other praises, Horace gives him this:

Totve tuas patiar labores
Impune, Lolli, carpere lividas Obliviones: est animus tibi

(1) Horat. Ode IX, lib. iv.

My muse shall consecrate thy name,
Thy virtuous labours, and thy fame.
In ev'ry state of things, we find,
In thee, a prudent, steady, mind:
Impregnable to bribes thou art;
No base corruption taints thy heart.
Nor does a single year confine Thy magistracy's scanty line;
But thy impartial, honest, soul,
Which no oblique attempts controul,
From avarice and ambition free,
Bids thee perpetual consul be.

Though a court-poet makes little conscience of bestowing eulogies on men that are thought unworthy of them, yet we must believe, that Horace here governs himself by appearance; that is, that he proportions his praises to the esteem the person praised was then in; for we learn from a famous historian, that this Lollius concealed his evil qualities to a wonder. ' Sub Legato M. Lollio homine in omnia pecuniarum quam recte faciendi cupidior, & inter summam vitiorum dissimulationem vitiosissimo (2). — ' Under the lieutenant M. Lollius, a man in every thing more fond of money than of behaving well, and, under the biggest appearances of virtue, the most vitious of men.'

(2) Paterculus, lib. ii. cap. xcvi.

[B] He fomented the quarrel between Tiberius and Caius Cæsar.] This we may infer from these words of Suetonius (3): ' Namque privignum Cajum orienti ti præpositum, cum vilendigratia trajecisset Samum (Tiberius) alieniorem sibi sensit ex criminationibus M. Lollii comitis & rectoris ejus. — For Tiberius, having passed over to Samos, to pay a visit to his son-in-law Caius Cæsar, who had the care of the East, found his affections alienated from him by the ill offices of Marcus Lollius, his companion and governor.' This appears still more plain by the testimony, which Tiberius gave Quirinus, governor of Caius Cæsar. ' Datulque rector C. Cæsari Armeniam obtinenti Tiberium quoque Rhodi agentem coluerat, quod tunc patefecit in Senatu, laudatis in se officiis, & incusato M. Lollio quem autorem C. Cæsari pravitatis & discordiarum arguebat (4). — And being appointed governor of Caius Cæsar, who was set over Armenia, he had made his court likewise to Tiberius, who resided at Rhodes; which he then made appear in the senate praising his services done to himself, and accusing Marcus Lollius of instigating Caius Cæsar to misbehaviour and falling out with him.'

(3) Sueton in Tiberio, cap. xli.

(4) Tacit. Annal. lib. iii. cap. xlviii.

[C] Caius discovered this treachery.] Consider these words of Paterculus. ' Quo tempore M. Lollii quem veluti moderatorum juvenatæ filii sui Augustus esse voluerat, perfidia & plena subdoli ac versuti animi consilia per Parthum indicata Cæsari (5), fama vulgavit. — At which time the treacherous designs of Marcus Lollius, whom Augustus appointed his son's governor, being discovered by the Parthian to Caius Cæsar, were the subject of common conversation.'

(5) I place a comma after Cæsari, and not before, as Boetius does; but I should rather read, as several do, indicata, Cæsaris ira vulgavit.

[D] Lollius

(d) Dio, lib. liv, himself [D]. He had vanquished the Bessi in the year 738 (d), and, carrying the war immediately into Germany, received an affront there; but he had his revenge [E], and obliged the Germans to make peace. Marcus Lollius, his son, was consul, we know not in what year, and left a daughter, who was wife to Caligula [F], as I observe in the remarks [G].

[D] Lollius killed himself.] This we learn from Pliny. * M. Lollius infamatus regum muneribus in toto Oriente interdicta amicitia à C. Cæsare Augusti

(6) Plin. lib. ix, cap. xxxv. * filio venenum biberet (6). — Marcus Lollius, having lost his reputation by receiving bribes from kings, all over the East, and being discarded from the friendship of Caius Cæsar, the son of Augustus, drank poison.

(7) Solin. cap. lili, pag. m. 85. Solinus says the same thing (7). Paterculus, who was nearer that time, doubts whether Lollius killed himself: Cujus mors intra paucos dies fortuita an voluntaria fuerit ignoro (8); but he says, that Lollius lived but a short time after the interview of Caius Cæsar, and the king of Parthia. Suetonius seems to make Lollius live some time after his disgrace; for he says, that Caius Cæsar, being angry with Lollius, was reconciled to Tiberius, and contented, that he should be recalled to Rome. It (Caius Cæsar) forte tunc M. Lollium offensior, facili exorabilique in vitricum fuit (9).

[E] He received an affront there, but had his revenge.] The shame was greater than the loss, in our Marcus Lollius's misfortune (10). The eagle of the fifth legion was lost in it (11). Eusebius, not mentioning any disgrace of Lollius, affirms, that the Germans were beaten in the fourth year of the CXCth Olympiad. Scaliger (12) pretends, that Eusebius is mistaken, both as to the fact, and as to the year; but since Dion affirms, that the Germans, being informed of Lollius's warlike preparations, and the march Augustus was making with an army into Gaul, retired into their country, made peace, and gave hostages (13), it is probable, they had been beaten in an encounter, as Eusebius supposes.

(10) Lolliam (claudum) majoris infamie, quam detrimenti. Id. in Augusti, cap. m. (11) Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. xcvi. since Dion affirms, that the Germans, being informed of Lollius's warlike preparations, and the march Augustus was making with an army into Gaul, retired into their country, made peace, and gave hostages (13), it is probable, they had been beaten in an encounter, as Eusebius supposes.

(12) Scalig. Animadv. in Euseb. pag. m. 171. (13) Dio, lib. liv, pag. m. 612. [F] His son was consul (14) . . . and left a daughter . . . wife to Caligula.] There are several authors, who say, that Lollius, governor to Caius Cæsar, was father to this young lady (15); but it is false. Lolliia Paullina was grand-daughter to this Lollius. This we find in Pliny (16) in express terms, and we may moreover solidly infer it from her competition with Agrippina, when the question was about marrying the emperor Claudius. All the ladies that were eminent for their birth, their beauty, and their riches, entered the lists on this occasion (17); at last the dispute was reduced to this, whether Agrippina was to be preferred to Paullina, or to Ælia Petina. Judge then, whether this can agree with a woman about fifty years of age. Paullina could not be much younger, if she was daughter to our Marcus Lollius, who departed from Rome with his pupil, about the year 751, and died two years after; but the dispute I speak of was in the 801st year of Rome. It is not easy to decide, whether he, to whom Horace addresses the second and eighteenth epistle of the first book, is the same, to whom he addresses the ninth ode of the fourth book. Mr Dacier, who affirms it, must suppose, that these three pieces are addressed to Marcus Lollius, governor to Caius Cæsar. He believes also, that Lollius had this charge, when Horace writ the eighteenth epistle to him, which he supposes we may date from the 742d year of Rome (18). There are two things to be observed against this. I. No historian makes mention of Lollius's having this charge, before this young prince was sent into the East. II. It is no way probable that if Horace had written an epistle to the governor of Caius Cæsar, he would have hinted at nothing that related to this honour. Now it is certain, there is nothing in this epistle to shew us, that Lollius was judged worthy of having the education of the emperor's grandson committed to him. Where is the poet, who would presume to give advice to the governor of the presumptive heir of a great empire, without insinuating at least, that he speaks to a man most qualified to give lessons to others upon Social Virtue (19), and who actually instructed a young prince, by the choice of a great monarch? For the same reason, I am persuaded, that Lollius was not governor to the young Cæsar (20), when Horace addressed the ninth ode of the fourth book to him. Could the poet omit the compliments due to him on that head? Besides, Horace addresses himself to a man, who had born arms in his youth, in Augustus's expedition against the Cantabrians.

Militiam puer. & Cantabrica bella tulisti,
Sub duce, qui Templis Parthorum signa rexit,
Et nunc, siquid abest, Italiam adjudicat armis (21).

(21) Horat. Epist. xviii, lib. i, vers. 55.

When young, you served in the Cantabrian war,
Under that chief, who in the Parthian temples
His standard fix'd, and now, if ought be wanting,
To crown the glory of the Roman name,
Adjudges it to the Italian arms.

This people was subdued in the year 729, when our Lollius was governor of Galatia. Hence Father Noris (22) makes it appear that Horace wrote not the aforementioned epistle to Lollius, Caius Cæsar's governor. It will not avail Mr Dacier to say (23), that Augustus undertook his first expedition against the Cantabrians in the 726th year of Rome, and that this expedition lasted four years, and that Puer often signified a grown man; and that Lollius's age was dispensed with, when he was made consul in the year 732; all this doth not weaken Father Noris's proof. Let us say then, with this learned author, that Horace did not write the second and eighteenth epistle of his first book to Lollius, Caius Cæsar's governor, as Glandorpius has pretended, at the 547th page of his Onomasticon, but to this Lollius's son.

[G] As I observe in the remarks.] Here I shall give the article of LOLLIA PAULLINA, grand-daughter to our Marcus Lollius. Her first husband's name was Caius Memmius Regulus, who was consul, when Sejanus was put to death. Some time after, being at the head of an army (24), he received orders to bring his wife to Rome, to be married to the emperor Caligula. I say, to be married to him: for this prince, having heard, that Lolliia Paullina's grand-mother had been a prodigious beauty, immediately commanded Memmius to come to Rome, to give him his wife in marriage, and behave himself in the ceremony, as a father, who marries his daughter. * Lolliam Paullinam C. Memmii Confulari exercitus regi nuptiam facia mentione avæ * ejus, ut quondam pulcherrimæ, subito ex provincia * evocavit, ac perductam à marito conjunxit sibi. This is what Suetonius says in the twenty fifth chapter of Caligula's life; and here is what Eusebius says in his chronicle: * Cujus Memmii Reguli uxorem duxit, impellens eum ut uxoris suæ patrem esse * se scriberet (25). — He married the wife of Memmius Regulus, obliging him to sign himself his wife's father. If you desire to see a note of Calaubon upon this place of Suetonius, read what follows, and remember, that what he relates from Dion, is in the fifty ninth book, pag. 745. * Ait Eusebius, scriberet, nempe in dotali instrumento, nam ut omnia acta legitime viderentur, omnia solennia sunt servata. Maritus igitur pro patre fuit, qui eam Cajo desponsavit, dotem dedit, & ad novum maritum perduxit. Auctor Dio. Hinc intelligimus Suetonii frequentia verba, perductam à marito conjunxit sibi.

(25) Euseb. num. 205b.

Eusebius uses the term scriberet (signed or subscribed himself) to wit, in an instrument of dower; for that every thing might seem to be transacted in form of law, all the forms were preserved. The husband therefore acted the father; who betrothed her to Caius, assigned the dowry, and brought her to her new husband. Dio tells us this. Hence we understand Suetonius's words perductam, &c. This happened the 791st year of Rome. Caligula, quickly disguised with Paullina, divorced her under pretence of barrenness (26), and commanded her never more to have to do with any man. Misam fecit interdicto cujusquam in perpetuum coitu (27). Nine years after this divorce, Paullina displayed all her charms, to supplant her rivals with the emperor Claudius, whom she would gladly have married; but her faction was not so strong as Agrippina's. * Cæde Calig. cap. xxv. * Messallinæ

[A] He was the son of a poor peasant. This mean condition did not hinder his immortalizing his father's name in the title page of his books; for he writes himself Christianus Longomontanus Severini filius. This is rarely practised by the learned, but when the father has been a great man in the republic of VOL. III.

with an uncle, always grappling with ill fortune, and constrained to divide himself betwixt the labours of tillage, and the lessons, which the minister of the place gave him. At last, when he had attained to fifteen years of age, he stole from his father's house, and went to Vibourg, where there was a college. There he spent eleven years, and, tho' he was forced to earn his bread by his labour, he followed his studies with extreme application [B], and, amongst other sciences, made a great progress in Mathematics. After this, he visited the university of Copenhagen, and in a year's time got the esteem of the professors to such a degree, that they earnestly recommended him to the illustrious Tycho Brahe. This recommendation had a good effect. Longomontanus was very well received by this famous Astronomer, who then lived in the isle of Huen. I speak of the year 1589. He lived with him eight years, and was very useful to him, either in observing the stars, or in making calculations, and proved himself so exact, so able an Astronomer, and so laborious, that Tycho Brahe conceived a most particular esteem and affection for him (c), and having quitted his own country, to settle in Germany, passionately desired to have him along with him (d). This appears by letters he wrote to him in 1598, and 1599 (e). Longomontanus complied with this desire of Tycho Brahe, and went to him at the castle of Benach, near Prague (f). He was a great help to him in all his astronomical labours; but being desirous of a professor's chair in Denmark, Tycho Brahe consented to deprive himself of the company and services of this disciple, and gave him a discharge (g), filled with such marks of esteem, as turned greatly to his glory. Nor did he forget to furnish him with large supplies for the expences of his journey. Longomontanus, returning into Denmark, fetched a great compass, to see the places, from which Copernicus had contemplated the stars (h). He met with a kind patron in the chancellor (i); and, after having for some time enjoyed an honourable employment in his family (k), he was promoted to the professorship of Mathematics, in the university of Copenhagen, in the year 1605. He discharged it worthily to his death, which happened the 8th of October 1647 (l). He had lost his wife ten years before, who was sister to Gasper Bartholinus (m). The books he left behind him discover his great capacity [C]. He amused himself with finding out the squaring of the circle, and pretended he had found it: he was vigorously attacked on that account by an English Mathematician [D]. He altered something in Tycho Brahe's system

[B] Though he was obliged to earn his bread, he followed his studies with extreme application. Here is what Gassendus says (1): 'Moratus illic xi. annos partim industria victum parans, partim indefesso labore literis invigilans. — He said there eleven years, partly earning his living by his industry, and partly applying himself with indefatigable diligence to learning.' He forgot, that Longomontanus taught in this school of Vibourg (2). Here is a man, that may be compared to the philosopher Cleanthes (3).

[C] The books he left behind him show his great capacity. Here is the catalogue of them (4): Sytematis Mathematici pars I. sive Arithmetica, Hafn. 1611 in 8vo. Cyclometria & Lunulis reciproci demonstrata, Hafn. 1612. Ham. 1627. Paris 1664, in 4to. Astronomia Danica, Amstel. 1622 in 4to. 1640, 1663 in folio. Inventio Quadraturæ Circuli, Hafn. 1634, in 4to. Coronis Problematica ex Mysteriis trium numerorum, &c. ibid. 1637, in 4to. Problemata duo Geometrica, ibid. 1638, in 4to. Problema contra Paulum Guldinum de circuli mensura, ibid. 1638 in 4to. Rotundi in Plano, seu Circuli absoluta Mensura, Amstel. 1644, in 4to. Trépyeia Proportionis sesquiteritiæ, Hafn. 1644, in 4to. Controversia cum Pellio de vera circuli Mensura, ibid. 1645 in 4to. Admiranda Operatio trium numerorum, 6, 7, 8, ad Circ. mensurandum, ibid. 1645, in 4to. Caput Tertium Libri Primi de absoluta mensura Rotundi Plani, unâ cum Elencho Cyclometrie J. Scaligeri & Appendice de defectu Canonis, &c. ibid. 1646, in 4to. Geometriae Quæstia XIII de Cyclometria rationali & vera, ibid. 1631, in 4to. Introductio in Theatrum Astronomicum, ibid. 1639 in 4to. Dispositio de Matheos indole, ibid. in 4to. 1636. Disputationes Astronomicæ sex, ibid. in 4to. 1622. De Chronologio Historico, seu Tempore, Disputationes tres, ibid. 1627, in 4to. This is the list we find in Albert Bartholin's treatise de Scriptis Danorum. It is not complete. There are many philosophical, astronomical, and chronological dissertations, wanting which Longomontanus had opened in disputation, in his auditory, at several times. You will find the catalogue of them in a book, which Mr Mollerus has intitled, ad librum Alberti Bartholini de scriptis Danorum posthumum hypomnemata bibliorica critica paucula & plurimis selecta (5). You will also find there (6), that Witte (7) had no reason to ascribe to George Lewis Frobenius, Longomontanus's Cyclometry, printed at Hamburg, without the name of the author, in 1627. The manuscript of Longomontanus's apology which he made for Tycho Brahe, against Craigius a Scotch Physician, was deposited in the hands of George Frommius, who succeeded him in the chair of Copenhagen (8). I do not think it was ever printed. Tycho Brahe pressed him in 1598 to hasten the conclusion of it, than it might ever as an appendix to his treatise upon Comets (9); for it is was upon that subject that Craigius attacked him in the year 1592, in a book intitled, Caputuræ refutatio, seu cometarum in ætherem sublimationis refutatio (10).

[D] He pretended to have found out the quadrature of the circle, and was attacked by an English Mathematician. Mr Baillet has mentioned this dispute. 'Mr Des Cartes says he (11), was drawn into an engagement among the chief Mathematicians of Europe, partaking in the famous dispute, which arose that year betwixt Longomontanus and Pell, about the squaring of the circle. Longomontanus . . . had undertaken to demonstrate the quadrature of the circle, that rock, on which the greatest genius's have hitherto split; nor was he more successful in his attempt than others before him, notwithstanding the good opinion he had entertained of his labour. Dr John Pell, an Englishman professor of mathematics in the college of Amsterdam (12), immediately discovered a great deal of false reasoning in it, and seeing that the point of the difficulty consisted in the proof of one single theorem, he first made the demonstration of it by himself, and resolved to propose the thing to all the ablest Mathematicians of his acquaintance, and desired their opinion of it. They who examined it, and sent him their demonstrations, were Messieurs Roberval, le Pailleur, Carcavi, Mydorgius, and Father Merfennus, who was returned from his travels into Italy, about the beginning of July: lord Cavendish, and Mr Hobbes of England, John Adolphus Tassius, a Mathematician of Hamburg, John Lewis Wolzogen, a free baron of Austria, gentleman of the bed-chamber to the king of Poland, a Cartesian in Philosophy, and a Socinian in religion; Father Bonaventure Cavalieri, an Italian, professor of Mathematics at Bologna: Mr Golius, professor at Leyden, and some other Dutch Mathematicians. Mr Des Cartes also sent to Dr Pell, a short demonstration upon the same subject, which served much to authorize what he had advanced against Longomontanus.' Mr Mollerus reports (13), I. that Longomontanus boasted, even in his his epitaph, that he had found out the quadrature of the circle, and that Gaspar Bartholinus made a poem, to congratulate him upon it; but that Thomas Bartholinus, Gaspar's son, was of a different judgment, and found, in Longomontanus's enterprize, more ingenuity and labour, than good success. II. That Claudius Hardy, counsellor in the Chatelet at Paris, refuted (14) Longomontanus's paralogisms. III. that John Pell, this Danish Mathematician's chief antagonist, inserted in his book what the most excellent Mathematicians of the age had communicated to him. *Quorum Suffragia, ac Demonstrationes Theorematum, in cuius Probatione totius Controv. Amsterdam, 1647, in 4to. Mr Møllerus had before observed, that Longomontanus's friends confused his antagonists upon other points. Peter Bartholinus, his disciple, answered, in 1632 (16), the objections of Martin Hortensius, inserted in the preface of Philip Lansbergius's commentary de motu terræ diurno & annuo. George Frommiius, in his treatise de mediis ad Astronomiam restituendum necessariis, published in the year 1642, made the apology to the Introductio in Theatrum Astronomicum; a work that Longomontanus had published against John Baptista Morin, in 1639. But as to the quadrature of the circle, they could not justify him. His labours were not so successful. 'Haud æque felices fuerant Longomontani Conatus Cyclo-metrici, circa veram Circuli Quadraturam, Scopulum tot Ingeniorum Subtilium Naufragiis infamem' (17). 'Longomontanus's attempts to measure the circle, were not equally successful, with regard to it's true quadrature, that rock on which so many subtle geniuses have split.'

[E] He altered something in Tycho Brahe's system. I think the reflexion of a modern author . . . worth relating.] There was a fourth system, which Longomontanus, one of Tycho Brahe's chief disciples designed to bring into vogue, by taking something from all the rest, and endeavouring to avoid the strongest objections against them. He saw, that, in that of Tycho, the inconceivable rapidity of the fixed stars, and, in that of Copernicus, the immense space he put between the heaven of Saturn, and the fixed stars was scarce sufferable; to remedy both which inconveniencies, he made a small change in Tycho's system, by giving the earth a diurnal revolution about it's own axis, by which means the planets, the sun, and fixed stars, did not move round the earth in twenty four hours, but each planet made it's revolution gently from west to east; and the fixed stars had their slow motion round their orbit in 25000 years, as the moon performs her's in twenty seven days, the sun in a year, and others in proportion to their distance, and the greatness of their circle. But though this system, which was only a small reformation of Tycho Brahe's, without disconcerting any of it's parts, might be defended by very good reasons; yet because of the little credit of it's author, and the great reputation of those that preceded him, very few applauded it; some holding, that if the earth be in the center, it must be immovable; but if it does move, that it's motion must be like that of the other planets. In a word, it was believed, that, he who formed this system upon the other two, which at that time divided all the learned, only did it through the natural inclination men have to be always refining upon others, though these reformations generally end in spoiling the whole; they who endeavour to reconcile two opposite opinions, taking a less reasonable method, for the most part, than that which they refuse to submit to (18).

These last words are capable of a large and fine comment, which might be filled up with many reasons and examples.

[A] She was a lady of great merit.] Thuanus makes a very honourable mention of her. 'Sub id tempus Jacoba Lonviana Montpensierii uxor V. Kal. Sept. ex tabe deceffit, virili animo & prudentia supra seculum insignis, quæ semper publicæ tranquillitati studuerat, & si diutius vixisset, motus qui postea secuti sunt impeditura credebatur (1). — About that time Jaqueline de Longvic, wife of the duke of Montpensier, died of a consumption; a lady of a manly genius and prudence above her sex, who always consulted the public tranquillity, and, if she had lived longer, would, it is thought, have prevented the commotions, which afterwards followed.' The president de la Place gives her no less glorious a character.

[B] . . . and great interest.] It is believed (8), that, had it not been for her interest, the duke of Bouillon would not have kept the government of Normandy, after the death of Henry II, as he did. But let us hear Brantome; he will tell us a great deal of this lady's interest. Having told the reasons, why, in the reign of Francis I, the duke of Montpensier had so little success, with respect to his pretensions to the estate of the constable Charles de Bourbon, he adds (9): 'In king Henry's time, he enjoyed some part of it by means of Madam Jaquette de Long-Vic, of the family of Givry, descended from that of Chalon, and from the palatines of Burgundy. This lady, duchess of Montpensier, in king Francis's reign, for reasons and causes at that time talked of, the duke of Orleans serving her, what harm was there in all this? (Monsieur de Rostain, who is still alive, knows it well) had great credit at court; but she could do nothing in this succession for the reasons I have given; besides that she was young, and at that time had not near so much wit as she afterwards had. In king Henry's time, she was in great favour; for she grew more politic, and gained a great ascendancy over the queen. King Francis II came afterwards to the throne; and then too she was in great power; for I have seen her manage so well the king and the queen, as twice with my own eyes to observe, that the king recommended the cause of the said lady, who did all, and her husband little, and solicited for her against his own interest. This was very common at court; inasmuch that once the cardinal of Lorraine, speaking to the gentle- men youngest daughter to John de Longvic [C], lord of Givry, and was married, in 1538, to Lewis de Bourbon, the second of the name, duke of Montpensier (b). She was first favourite to Catherine de Medicis; and had she been alive at the time, when this queen gave into intrigues, which had like to have ruined the kingdom, she would perhaps have made her take better resolutions (c). It is possible too, that her good counsels and address might have had no effect on a soul of such a temper, whose ambition was like a devouring fire. Be it how it will, she died just before the breaking out of the great troubles on account of religion, the twenty-eighth of August 1561. She openly made appear, during a tedious sickness, what her husband had long suspected of her; to wit, that she was a Protestant [D]; and doubtless it was her private instructions, which sowed in the soul of some of her daughters the seeds of reformation, which brought forth fruit some time after: for Frances de Bourbon, her eldest daughter, who was married, in 1558, to Henry Robert de la Marc, duke of Bouillon, openly professed the Protestant religion, and the incredible pains her father took to reclaim her [E] produced no effect. Charlotte, this duke's fourth daughter, had been put into a convent, against her mother's opinion [F], who had a mind to marry her to the duke of Longueville. She was abbess of Jouarre; but as that kind of life did not comport with the instructions she had received from her mother, nor perhaps with her own inclinations, she escaped into Germany in 1572, where she abjured Popery, and was married two years after to the prince of Orange. Of the three other daughters of Jaqueline de Longvic, and the duke of Montpensier, two persevered in

'men of the robe in the name of the king, who had sent for him to his palace of Cluny, when the king went to Orleans, recommended to them the right of the said lady, (who was then present) even so far as to say, that the king would gratify her in that; that he renounced his part and right to that inheritance, and that he would have no part nor portion of it, and that they should manage the matter as little to his interest as they could. In fine, this prince and prince, and their adherents, so laboured and solicited, and pleaded, that they have come in for a snack of every thing, except the duchy of Chastelleraut, which the former kings would never part with, but added to their own estate, which they since gave as a portion to their natural sister legitimated, whom we have heard long called Madam de Chastelleraut, at present Madam d'Angoulême.'

be just, though their father's estate had been divided between them.

[D] Her husband had suspected that she was a Protestant. Let us see what the president de la Place says of it (15). 'She desired, that the duke de Longueville might marry her third daughter (16), designed by her father for a nun at Frontevault, to the great regret of the said lady, as she gave her husband to understand in her last discourses, discovering to him, what he had before suspected, that she was a Protestant, which she had sufficiently discovered during her said illness, which was long, being at Fontainebleau, and the king at Rheims, in order to his coronation, where she desired a minister of the said religion to confer with her about points of conscience. Malo, being sent to her, refused to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper to her, which she desired, so far as she was alone, and had no body to communicate with her; arguing that this sacrament was not instituted to be particularly administered, like baptism, but rather to be communicated to many of the faithful at once; with which, however, she could not be contented, desiring by any means to make declaration of the religion, in which she resolved to die.' Thuanus (17) relates the same thing in substance. Mr Varillas (18) has purely and simply espoused it: an evident sign that he did not believe it was a Huguenot story; for if he had he would have made a long parenthesis to tell us so.

[E] Frances her eldest daughter Her father took incredible pains to reclaim her. Among other things, he caused two doctors of the Sorbonne, and two ministers, to dispute before her, in July and August, 1566. This conference could not be held at Montpensier house, because this prince would oblige the ministers not to pray to God before the action, which they would not consent to. The conference therefore was broke off; but it was again agreed upon some time after, and executed at the house of the duke of Nevers. I speak of it in another place (19). The two doctors were Simon Vigor; and Claude de Saintes; the two ministers were Spina and Sureau. They spent a great many words in replies, rejoinders, &c. and afterwards in printed accounts, in which each party ascribed the victory to itself; but the success of the ministers was, that the duchess continued theirs, which was the prize of the contest. The contrary happened in the dispute between the bishop of Meaux, and Mr Claudé: Mademoiselle de Duras adjudged the victory to the Catholic champion.

[F] Charlotte had been put in a convent, against her mother's opinion. This gives me an occasion to touch upon a contradiction of Thuanus. He says in his twenty eighth book, that Jaqueline de Longvic was displeased at the cloistering of her daughter Charlotte, for two reasons; one, that she was designed for the duke de Longueville; the other, that she had already shewn her repugnance to a religious life (20). In the fifty first book, he says, that she bred her in the Protestant religion, but secretly, through fear of her in the monastic life, to which they had been sacrificed; and one married the duke of Nevers's son (d) [G]. She had followed queen Elizabeth into Spain (e), who loved her entirely [H]. If Jaqueline had converted her husband, she had saved a great deal of Protestant blood, and a great deal of misery to some of her own sex; for he used them with the utmost severity, as we may read in Brantome (f). Their son, though a good Catholic, did not follow the leaguers. Had this lady only procured to France, a chancellor of so much merit, as Michael de l'Hospital [I], her memory ought to be blessed for it; for it was not possible to make choice of a better subject than he, and no body could have so well supported the monarchy in so dangerous a conjuncture. The wisdom and constancy of his counsels would have been the arm of Hector (g), to have maintained the public repose, if the destinies, more powerful than all the industry of man, had not permitted a froward generation to baffle all his designs, and oblige him at last to retire.

husband; and that afterwards this Charlotte, being scarce a year old, was put into the convent of Jouarre: Vix annula in Jovariense Monasterium confecta. If she was but one year old, what has been said of her instruction, and the marks of her repugnance, is false and impossible. Doubtless this Historian must have had some distraction of thought, which was not common to him, or what is more probable, he must have understood by annula an age more advanced than one year. But can we find good authorities for this sense of the word?

[G] One of her daughters married the duke of Nevers's son. He was called the count d'Eu. I do not find at what time he married; but I distrust Father Anselme, who says (21), 'That Anne de Bourbon was married by contract the sixth of September, 1561, to Francis (22) de Cleves the second of the name, duke of Nevers, and that she died without children, in 1572.' For what probability is there, that this prince was married eight or nine days after her mother's death? I insist not on what the president de la Place says (23), that the duke de Nivernois died a little after the marriage of Henry de Cleves, his son, with Anne de Bourbon; from whence we must conclude, that this marriage preceded the death of the duchess of Montpensier, if we did not take notice, that they who fix the duke of Nevers's death to the thirteenth of February 1561, followed the custom, which was not abolished at that time, of beginning the year at Easter (24). Now upon that foot it is plain, the duke died after Jaqueline de Longvic, and so the president de la Place does not contradict Father Anselme.

I had rather depend upon Brantome, who says, that the count d'Eu went into Spain to marry the princess Anne. 'He was, says he (25), in my opinion, the finest prince I ever saw, and the most affable and amiable; we reckoned him so amongst us, and when he went into Spain (26), to marry Madam, his wife, daughter to the duke of Montpensier, he was there also as much esteemed, both by the court, and all the country.' Whom shall we believe, Brantome, who says the princess was married in Spain, or Thuanus, and the president de la Place, who say, the former, that after her return from Spain, she married Henry duke of Cleves; the latter, that the duchess her mother recalled her from Spain, to marry her to this Henry? Thuanus, who observes, that she died a little after her marriage, might have said as much of her husband, who was killed at the battle of Dreux by the going off of a pistol of the duke of Guise's cornet.

This is what Brantome says of it; but d'Aubigné (27) tells it otherwise, and gives us to understand, that this young duke of Nevers had the knowledge of the truth. It is probably for that reason, that Jaqueline de Longvic was willing he should marry her daughter. Beza speaks of the death and religion of this duke somewhat at large (28); and observing, that the marquis of Isles, his brother, and the marchioness, his wife, assisted at the exercise of piety with him, and received the sacrament all together on Easter-day the twenty ninth of March 1562 (29); observing this, I say, without saying a word of the duchess, we might conclude, that she died a little after her marriage, as Thuanus has advanced, did we not see two authors against him; one is Father Anselme, affirming that this lady died in 1572; the other is Brantome, who speaks of her as the widow of the count d'Eu, afterwards duke of Nevers (30), when he gives the list of the ladies of Catherine de Medicis's court.

[H] Queen Elizabeth . . . loved her intirely. Brantome informs me (31), 'that this daughter to the duke de Montpensier, a most prudent, most virtuous, and fine princess, and reckoned for such in France and Spain, had been bred some time in Spain with queen Elizabeth of France, and had the place of her cup-bearer, the queen being served by her ladies and maids of honour, and each having a place.' This queen gave her a diamond worth between 1500 and 2000 crowns. A mistress of count d'Eu, declaring a great desire to have that ring, as she saw it on the count's finger, easily obtained it, and wore it always for his sake. The countess, whom her husband had made believe he had lost or pawned his diamond, saw it in the hands of this gentlewoman, whom she knew to be her husband's mistress, and turned her head aside, and never said a word of it to either of them. Brantome has reason to praise her for it; but what an instance of corruption is here! This count lived but a short time after his marriage, and yet was unfaithful to his wife.

[I] She procured to France the chancellor . . . de l'Hospital. Thuanus (32) acquaints us with that particular, after this manner: 'Id autem factum Jacobus Longvianus Montpensier uxoris commendatione quæ in Catharinæ amicitia præcipue florebat, excelsio ingenio mulier, & quæ crescentem Guisianorum potentiam suspectam habebat. Illa Catharinam Guisianorum violentiam jam expertam proprio metu incubat, & ad imperium anhelanti certissimam viam ostendebat, si aliquem deligeret cujus salutibus monitis eorum perniciofa consilia revinceret. — That was done at the recommendation of Jaqueline de Longvic, who was chief favourite of Catherine de Medicis, a woman of a great genius, and who suspected the increasing power of the Guises: This lady inspired Catherine, who had already experienced the violence of the Guises, with her own fears, and showed her the most infallible way to empire, if she made choice of some person, by whose prudent counsels she might traverse their pernicious designs.' See an ample paraphrase of this Latin in Varillas's Life of Francis II (33), where we find also (34) how this duchess of Montpensier contributed to save the prince of Condé's Life in the same reign. This historian is not so favourable to her, in Charles the ninth's Life. He makes her the cause of the king of Navarre's renouncing the regency, in favour of the queen-mother. 'The persuasions, says he (35), of the duchess of Montpensier, who was called the Siren, carried it above the remonstrances of the Montmorenci's, the Chatillon's, the Calvinists, and the most zealous Catholics. . . The easiness of this prince was the cause or occasion of all the miseries that France so long groined under.' But since he confesses, that the constable and the admiral, instead of dissuading him from so scandalous an acquiescence, confirmed him in it for this sole reason (36), that his inconstancy would too much perplex them, and that they could more easily manage the queen, after having obliged her by a benefit so considerable, as was that of inducing the first prince of the blood to give up the regency to her, there is not so much reason to exclaim against the negotiation of this duchess. Thuanus does not blame her (37), when he gives the list of the ladies of Catherine de Medicis's court.

[H] Queen Elizabeth . . . loved her intirely. Brantome informs me (31), 'that this daughter to the duke de Montpensier, a most prudent, most virtuous, and fine princess, and reckoned for such in France and Spain, had been bred some time in Spain with queen Elizabeth of France, and had the place of her cup-bearer, the queen being served by her ladies and maids of honour, and each having a place.' This queen gave her a diamond worth between 1500 and 2000 crowns. A mistress of count d'Eu, declaring a great desire to have that ring, as she saw it on the count's finger, easily obtained it, and wore it always for his sake. The countess, whom her husband had made believe he had lost or pawned his diamond, saw it in the hands of this gentlewoman, whom she knew to be her husband's mistress, and turned her head aside, and never said a word of it to either of them. Brantome has reason to praise her for it; but what an instance of corruption is here! This count lived but a short time after his marriage, and yet was unfaithful to his wife.

LONGUS, a Greek sophist, author of a book intitled Ποικιλία, that is to say, Pastorals [A], which is a romance upon the amours of Daphnis and Chloe. Mr Huet (a) bishop of Avranches, who was a great judge in most things, has spoken well enough of this book; but he observes several faults in it, the greatest of which doubtless consists, in the obscenities that are found in it [B]. This is still more remote from the politeness of our romances, than the conduct of Longus's shepherds; the loves too hastily, and grants her kisses too soon [C]. Longus is thought to have introduced that silly idea of gallantry

(a) De l'Origine des Romans, pag. 65, 66. Edit. Latine.

[A] He is author of a book, intituled Ποικιλία, i. e. Pastorals. The word Pastoralia, which Mr Moreri read in Vossius, made him think this book was in verse; Longus, says he, left four books of pastoral verse, or eclogues, which Godfrey Jungerman has translated into Latin, with his notes upon them, and has dedicated this work to his cousin Lewis Camerarius. Longus's pastorals are in prose: the Latin translator's name is Godfrey Jungerman; and it was needless to observe, that he dedicated this book to Lewis Camerarius, his cousin. Vossius, from whom Moreri has taken this particular, had reasons for this clause in his book, taken from the time and place in which he writ: for this Mr Camerarius was well known in Holland, where he had been ambassador from the king of Sweden: which Vossius did not fail to add (1). Moreri, who had not the same reasons, ought to have omitted that particular, or at least have said all that Vossius did. Thus he would have given occasion to his readers to form some idea of the person, to whom the translation of Longus was dedicated. Greater men than Moreri have thought, that the pastorals I speak of were in verse. Malincrotius was under this mistake

(2), as Mr Konig observes (3), who for his own part was ignorant, that before Jungerman's edition, (he calls him Jugerman) these pastorals had appeared in Latin.

[B] . . . the greatest fault of which consists in the obscenities that are found in it. I believe it was on this account that Mr Huet did not finish the Latin translation; for he tells us, that he began it in his youth, before he perfectly knew the character of the book, how much the reading it might corrupt young men, and how unfit it was for old. Quam puer essem, hunc autorem Latine interpretandum suscepi, cum nondum satis haberem exploratum, quid in eo laudabile esset, quid vitiosum; & quantum ejus lectio pueritiae damno sit, quam parum etiam ætati proventuri decora

(4). This reason hindered not a professor of Franeker from translating this romance, and publishing it with learned notes in 1660. He was apprehensive of the censure of some, whose austere and morose humour cannot bear that any one should publish adventures of a bad example. Observe how he is beforehand with them. His words deserve relating, because there are several authors, whose virtue and prudence might be contended, did we not oppose this buckler of Longus's translator to the surly and malignant criticism of these pretended Cato's. Dicam hic quod sentio, says he (5).

Non feram judices nostra in causâ, Caperatâ fronte Catones, qui sine dubio me altum stertere, aut cucurbitas pingere mallent, quam tanto conatu, tam immanes nugæ agere, vitioque fortasse mihi vertent, quod logos holcæ amatorios (quid enim quæso est, quod non vellicare malignitas possit?); haud tamen illepidos, nec infectos, latine conversos, grandior ætate, edere fategerim. O formidabilem censorum severitatem! Quorum censura actum erit de Homero, homine ad ipsi gratiis ficto, veneris amores, adulteris, incesta, scelera prolixè describente: quem tamen Alexander tanti fecit, ut suo pulvillo noctibus singulis subdiderit: Actum de Aristophane, quem nihilominus Johannes ille Antiochenus, summorum Theologorum lumen, qui propter aureum eloquentiæ flumen, Chrysofomi cognomen obtinuit, nocturna diurnaque versasse manu, à viris fide dignis memorie prodium est. Nullum equidem poetarum invenias, quin multa mul- torum scelera nefaria narret, non quidem ad bonos labefactandos, corrumpendosque mores; sed potius ad eosdem emendandos, atque flagitia illa detestanda, abominanda. Multo minus vitiligatores, (quorum feges in hoc seculo densa est) homines, ut Plinius ait, ad venena natos, qui nullum aliud abominati spiritus premium novere, quam odisse omnia: At potius rerum humanarum æquos mihi ælimatores exopto. — I will here speak what I think. I will not be judged by those rigid censors, who, no doubt, had rather I were fast asleep, or employed in the most trifling manner, than I should take so much pains to play the fool; and who will perhaps censure me (for what cannot ill-nature find fault with?) for translating into Latin, and publishing, at my advanced age, these amorous pieces, which yet they allow to be elegant and witty. O the formidable severity of these censors! Even Homer must fall before them, a writer formed by the Graces themselves, but who describes, at length, intrigues, adulteries, incests, and base actions: whom yet Alexander so esteemed, that he laid his works every night under his pillow. Nor can Aristophanes escape, whom necertheless Johannes Antiochenus, one of the greatest Divines, who, by the golden flow of his eloquence, obtained the surname of Chrysostom, was perpetually conversant with, as credible authors relate. You will find no Poet, who does not relate many infamous actions, not with the view of corrupting good manners, but rather to amend them, and excite an abhorrence of such actions. Much less will I be judged by cavillers, (of which there is a plentiful crop in the present age) men, as Pliny says, born to poison, who knew no other reward of an abominable disposition, than to hate every thing. I rather chuse to be tried by impartial judges of human affairs. This commentator saw himself indispensably obliged to touch upon Longus's impurities; but he did it with shewing his aversion to them. What could he do more? O pus aliqui tam obscenum est, (as Mr Huet says) (6), ut qui sine rubore legat eum Cynicum esse necesse sit.

A work otherwise so obscene, that he, who can read it without blushing, must necessarily be a Cynic. This otherwise refers to a great fault he had before observed; viz. that Longus begins his book with the birth of his shepherd and shepherds, and continues it to their marriages, their children, and old age (7), which is transgressing the rules of this kind of writing. You do not read above five or six pages, before you find Daphnis ravished with the pleasure of a kiss from his shepherds. Ταῦτο φίλημα χαίρων, says he, ἐκπύδω μὲν τὸ πνεῦμα, ἐξαλλεται ἡ καρδιά, τινέται ἡ ψυχή, καὶ ὁμας παρὰ φίλινδα βαλὼν, Hocce osculum admirabile est; quippe spiritus meus exultat, cor exini, anima liquecit: atamen iterum suaviari cudio (8). — This kiss is admirable; for, my spirit leaps up, my heart dances, my soul melts: yet I desire to kiss again. A chalum, in the same page, does not hinder our understanding the circumstances of this kiss. A little after, we find him, handling his shepherds's breasts (9), without any concealment on her side. This poor girl, seeing him stark naked, melts with desire: she saw nothing but what was amiable in him; she was so little startled at this object, that she boldly approached it, and having killed her shepherd, helped him on with his cloaths. Ἡ μὲν γὰρ γυμνὴν ὁρῶσα Δάφνιν, ἐπαυθὲν ἐνσπιντε τὸ καλλὸν, καὶ ἐπικέτο, μὲν δὲ αὐτὴ μὲν μὲν αὐτὴ δυνάμειν . . . ἡ δὲ τὴν ἐσθία αὐτὴν ἀσπόμεναι καὶ γυμνασθῆναι ἐβόλετο, πρὸς τὴν καὶ αὐτὴν εἰλίσσασα. Illa enim nudum conspiciens Daphnidem, efflorescentem in ejus pulchritudinem incitâ, atque contabuit, cum nullam ejus partem vituperare posset (10). — At illa vicissim, dato osculo, cessavit illius, jam loti atque denudati, indubat (11). These things would be monstrous in the romances of our times. People will not forgive the marquis d'Urfé, the little favours he makes Celadon obtain. The pleasure he procures him of seeing Aïreia naked, is charged on him as an unpardonable crime. Here are the words of the accusation, in which Aïreia speaks. It is you, says she (12), calling her eyes upon d'Urfé; it is you that are the author of the injury which I complain of; your rash pen has made blots in my story gallantry, which we meet with in some Romances: the shepherdes fills out drink, drinks a little first, and afterwards presents the glass to the shepherd, in such a manner, that he must apply his lips precisely to the part, where she had applied her's [D]. None of the antients mention Longus, which is the reason why we cannot tell when he lived. We have several editions and several translations of his work [E].

story, which wound me in the tenderest part. I do not pretend to be more nice than others, continues she; I excuse amorous transports, when proceeding from a pure passion; a kiss genteely snatched, never shocked my modesty, and I know there are little privacies, which love inspires, and reason does not condemn. But when I consider, that I am one of the three shepherdesses, which you present stark naked before Celadon, with what face can I behold an adventure so injurious to my honour? And ought I not to believe, that you have an ill opinion of my virtue, or else took me for a slave, which you meant to sell to this shepherd? I believe, without flattery to my beauty, that my face alone was sufficient to make a conquest: there was fire enough in my eyes to melt a stubborn heart, and I can without vanity say, that my nakedness was not essentially necessary to my victory. This is too common a fault in the deguasti, porrigis ipsi: deinde ipso bibente calicem arripis, & quantum in ipso restat, ebibis, qua parte ipse bibit, & ubi labia applicuit, ut & bibas simul, & osculeris (19).

In Ovid's time, the ladies did not present the glass, out of which they had drank, but the galant endeavoured to take it from them, and applied his lips to the same place where they had applied theirs. It is a precept of Ovid,

Fac primus rapas illius tacta labellis

I believe this is still the fashion in some countries. Moliere introduces the practice of it in one of the scenes of his Etourdi (Blanderer) (21).

St Jerome, describing the impertinencies of lovers, says nothing of this; but he comes pretty near it; for he speaks of estates, which were presented after they had been tasted (22); 'Crebra munuscula & futilia, & fasciolas, & vestes ori applicitas, & oblatos & degustatos cibos, blandasque & dulces literulas sanctus amor non habet. Mel meum, lumen meum, meum desiderium, omnes delicias, & lepores & risu dignas urbanitates, & ceteras ineptias amatorum in comediis erubescimus. — Divine love has nothing to do with frequent presents, handkerchiefs, garters, and garments kissed by the lover; with food offered, and first tasted; or with Bibles & dews. We are ashamed of my honey, my light, my desire, and all the delicacies, the reparities, and ridiculous politeness, and other fooleries of lovers in comedies.' He says in another place (23), 'speculis aliena oscula & prae gustatos cibos, — xlvii. You will see another's kisses, and food first tasted.' Here is the precept of Ovid.

Et quodcumque cibi digitis libaverit illa,

Tu pete: dumque petes, sit tibi tacta manus (24). Ovidius, ubi supra, ver. 577.

And brush her hand in reaching to the meat.

[E] There are several editions, and several translations of his work. This romance, translated into French by Amiot, was printed at Paris in 1559. Hifi. Grecis, Laurence Gambara made a version of it, or rather a paraphrase in Latin verse, which is much blamed by Vossius (25). He observes, that Gambara not only changes, adds, and retrenches, several things, but also frequently mistakes Longus's meaning; Godfrey Jungerman's version in prose is incomparably better. It was printed at Hanau with the end of the 307th Greek text, and notes, in 1605. There had been before this a version of it at Heidelberg, in 1601 (26); and before that, the work had been printed only in Greek at Florence, by Philip Junta, in 1598, from the manuscript of Lewis Alamanni's library, with Raphael Columbanus's notes. There is mentioned an 8vo edition, of it in Greek and Latin, by the Commelins in 1606. I have said something above (27), of the Francker edition. I cannot comprehend what induced Vossius to say, that Gambara had translated Longus 170 years ago; for it would from thence follow, that it was of above two hundred years standing now (28); and yet Thuanus places Gambara's death in the year 1586 (29). It is true he makes him ninety years of age; but it is so much the more impossible to adjust Vossius's reckoning by this, as it is certain, that Gambara set about this work in his old age (30), and whilst cardinal de Granvelle, to whom he had dedicated it, was viceroy of Naples. Mr Teiffier (31) does not mention Longus's translation in the catalogue of Gambara's works.

LORME

LORME (PHILIBERT DE) one of the best architects of France, in the XVIth century, was a native of Lyons. He was almoner in ordinary to Henry II, and to Charles IX (a), and abbot of St Eloi of Noion (b); and of the saints Sergius and Bacchus of Angers (a). Thus his abbeys are called (c), by Antony Mizaldus, in the epistle dedicatory of the Nova & mira artificia comparandorum fructuum, dated at Paris the first of November 1564. He is called abbot of Livry in Ronfard's life, and it is added, that he had a quarrel with this great Poet [A], in which Catherine de Medicis said he was to blame. He published several books of Architecture, the titles whereof you may see in la Croix du Maine.

[(a) Du Chêne has, by mistake, called this abbey St Serge; which, by the way, is without the walls of Angers *. The abbot Châtelain, in his Vocabulaire Hagiologique, says St Serge and St Baeg; which is right. REM. CRIT.]

[A] He had a quarrel with Ronfard. This Poet made a satire called la Truelle croffée, The trowel croffered, in which he blamed the king for giving benefices to Masons and other mean persons, in which he particularly taxes one de Lorme, architect of the Tuilleries, who had obtained the abbey of Livry, and of whom we have a tolerable book of Architecture. And it will not be unreasonable to observe here the malevolence of this abbot, who, to revenge himself, one day, caused the gate of the Tuilleries to be shut against Ronfard, who followed the queen-mother; but Ronfard, who was satirical and biting when he pleased, immediately wrote with a pencil upon the door, which the Sieur de Sarlan caused presently to be opened, these words in capital letters. FORT. REVERENT. HABE. The queen returning and seeing this writing, in the company of learned men, and of the abbot de Livry himself, would know what was the meaning of it. Ronfard, after de Lorme had complained, that this inscription reflected on him, gave the interpretation; he owned, that by a harmless irony, he had made that inscription for him, reading it in French *, but that it agreed better to him reading it in Latin; they being the first words curtailed of a Latin epigram of Ausonius, which begins Fortunam reverenter habe, cautioning him, by it, to look back to his first and vile fortune, and not shut the door against the muses. The queen assisted Ronfard in his revenge; for she sharply reprimanded the abbot de Livry, after some laughter, laying aloud, that the Tuilleries were dedicated to the muses (1). Du Peyrat relates this story, and adds a preamble to it, much to the prejudice of our de Lorme, and which perhaps is not well grounded; for the author of Ronfard's life has not made the like reflexion, though it might have served as a farther justification to Ronfard. However, these are du Peyrat's words: 'as the modelly of this chaplain to William the conqueror, king of England, procured him the honour of the bishopric of Mans, and the praise of every body; the insolence, on the contrary, and the pride of an ecclesiastic of the chapel of the queen-mother, Catherine de Medicis, exposed him to the laughter of the court, and of this great prince: he was called Philibert de Lorme, who, having by his mistress's favour obtained the abbey of Livry, utterly forgot his former condition; and his arrogance occasioned the great Ronfard, the French Homer, to write a satire against him, called la Truelle croffée (2). . . . The trowel croffered. He gives the two verses of Ausonius, whereof we have only the three first words in Ronfard's life. See the margin (3).

LORME (N. DE) one of the most famous Physicians of France, towards the end of the XVIth century, and the beginning of the XVIIth, was of Moulins in the Bourbonnois. He was first Physician to queen Mary de Medicis, and after he had long followed the court, retired to Moulins on account of his old age, and there quietly enjoyed the glory he had acquired [A]. I do not know the time of his death, and I might have made this article longer, if Mr Patin had published the book he designed [B]. Our de Lorme left a son, whose reputation did not fall short of his father's, in the profession of Physic. He practised in Paris with great success [C], and besides did great honour to his art by his own long life. Being loaden with years, he still found himself

[A] He retired to Moulins, on account of his age, where he quietly enjoyed the glory he had acquired. The letter, which the Sieur Bachot writ to him, and published before his book of Vulgar Errors (1), contains as follows. 'If you like it, those must be very nice, who will not like it; since our kings, queens, princes, and princesses of France and Lorraine, have for so long time had, and still have, such an esteem for you, and your merit, that nothing had been able to withdraw you from their ordinary service, but an inability to follow the court, which your great and happy old age, still more loaden with honours than years, has brought you to. When you retired satisfied, and as it were satiated, with so many honours to your own house, and native country, every one saw the honour, which our most august king Lewis the Just did you, in his victorious return from Languedoc in December 1622, together with the queen his mother, by taking their lodgings with you in the beginning of the year 1623, as a testimony of their benevolence.'

(1) See concerning this book, the remark [E] of the article JOUBERT.

[B] I could have made this article longer, if Mr Patin had published the book he designed. He would have inserted in it the elogy of the Physician, who is the subject of this article. 'I formerly collected several memoirs for composing the Latin elogies of the French, who have been famous in their respective sciences, in imitation of Scævola Sammarthanus, upon which I designed to work next winter evenings; but the great number of my patients make me fearful; for which reason I dare not give an absolute promise. You would oblige me, if you would desire Mr de Lorme, that he would be pleased to send me some memoirs concerning his father, whom I know to have been a great man, and of whom I have something material, which I will boldly insert, concerning the distemper of Mary de Medicis, in which Mr du Laurence disapproved bleeding, being deceived by a passage of Hippocrates, who says, that we are not to bleed in a flux, fluente alio venam non secabis; and, on the contrary, Mr de Lorme maintained, and pressed phlebotomy (2). Patin adds, that three Physicians of Paris were consulted, and confirmed Mr de Lorme's advice. The queen-mother was let blood and recovered . . . I design, says he, to make my elogies finer, and more curious, and historical, than those of Sammarthanus, nor shall they be inferior to his, except in expression (3). It is a misfortune, that he did not execute, this good design.

[C] His son practised in Paris with great success. Bachot, in the letter above-cited, expresses himself thus, speaking to M. de Lorme the father. I give you an account of the subject of this work, which you have encouraged by your advice, if you please to look favourably on it; as also your son, one of the soundest and finest wits of his age, and of this century, in our profession, as he is acknowledged by all the court, and by this populous city of Paris. Bachot writ this in 1626. He prefixed to his work a letter, vigorous enough to be willing to marry again [D]: This we find in Guy Patin's letters. I have heard say, that he actually did marry, and chose a very young and pretty woman, and it was thought that this would serve to hasten his death; but on the contrary it only occasioned the death of his young wife. She got a phtisic by her good old man's side, and never could be cured of it [E]. This Mr de Lorme was a man of admirable conversation [F]. He had been Physician to Gaston, of France, duke of Orleans, but did not keep that employment long (a). He was much longer Physician at the waters of Bourbon. We shall see below, that he died in 1678 [G].

letter, which de Lorme, the son, his relation, Counsellor to the king, and his Physician in ordinary, had written to him, sending him a sonnet of his making (4). Note, that he engaged Mr Gaulmyn, his cousin, to write Latin verses in the praise of this treatise of Bachot. They are printed before the book.

(4) It is an acrostic, and is to be seen before the Sieur Bachot's book, with another sonnet of Mr de Lorme, the father.

[D] Being laden with years he found himself vigorous enough, to be willing to marry again.] We shall cite a passage upon this, with all its circumstances. I take it from a letter of Guy Patin dated the eighteenth of June 1666. When you told Mr de Lorme, that Mr Blondel would prove that Antimony was poison, you say he took a great leap. It is very well, if, at his age, he can leap so, and God be praised, that he still is able to leap; but Antimony has made a great many fall, who will never get up again, nor leap more. God preserve him, and bring him from Bourbon in good health; and since he has a mind to marry again, I wish him such a wife, as he would chuse. There is nothing like dying by a fine sword. He must enter with honour into the holy synagoge (5). In a letter of the twentieth of October, the same year, he speaks thus (6); I hear that Mr de Lorme is gone from Lyons, and is returning to Bourbon or Moulins, where he has a design to marry again. He does well, if it be for the health of his soul; for as for his body, I believe he has hardly any need of this piece of furniture. This design was neither executed, nor quitted, when the same Patin writ the letter, in which are these words. 'I saw very lately Mr de Lorme, who was a little indisposed, but with the same vigour of mind, as when in perfect health. So very old as he is, it is said, he has a mind to marry again, and that some body encourages him in this folly, to bring him to the triumvirate, which will be a dangerous yoke to him, and perhaps fatal; I wish it may be for the good of his soul, and for the warmth of his feet (7).'

justice of this decree to the skies. 'Si ipsa æquitas hac de re cognosceret, possetne justius aut gravius pronuntiare? Spermis quos genuit: nobis efficta; testamenti ordinem violento animo confundis: neque erubescis ei totum patrimonium addicere, cujus pollincto jam corpori marcidam senectutem tuam subtravisti (11). — If equity herself was to take cognizance of this matter, could she pronounce with more justice or weight? You despise those you have given birth to: you marry, when past child-bearing you violently confound the order of your will; nor do you blush to bequeath your whole patrimony to him, whom you married in your old age.' We ought perhaps, amongst Christians, to annul, more commonly than we do, those matches, which join together, either two extremes of the same character, or two opposite ones, two decrepits, or old age with the flower of age.

[F] Mr de Lorme was a man of admirable conversation.] Two passages of Guy Patin shall serve for the present comment. I yesterday (12) visited Mr de Lorme at his house: he received me very kindly, and we discoursed together a good hour, we were neither of us mute; he is admirable in his conversation, as well as in every thing else; he has a wonderful memory for his age of eighty five. I think he will die as he lived, with his Antimony in his heart and head, and yet what comforts me, is, that I hope he will never take any, having so little need of it (13). Some weeks after, he paid him another visit. I yesterday saw Mr de Lorme, whose understanding is still clear, and memory prodigious; these two faculties he possesses in great perfection, and savour nothing of age; but I will not answer for the rest. Maximus est aretalogus. I am told, he has no good band at practice; notwithstanding his pretended and mystical Polypharmacy; he is of a powerful conversation; he knows a great many good things, and expresses them wonderfully well; and, which is more, he is very reserved, when the question is about the merits of several learned men, that have lived in France for this hundred years passed: he happily mixes his judgment with his charity; nemini facit injuriam, nulli quidquam detrahit debite laudis: Take him altogether, he is a great man, who for his perfections is greatly indebted to God and nature: I only wish he were not so great a romancer, when the point is to praise some, who do not altogether so well deserve it; but I believe he does this on purpose that he may not be thought vain glorious or flitting, and this in some respects is commendable (14). From the first of these passages we may infer, that he was born in 1584.

[G] He died in the year 1678.] My proof shall be taken from a passage of the Mercurie Galant. 'We have lost a Physician, as old as he was famous; it is Mr de Lorme, who always did that which is passed into a proverb against the Physicians, and which never fails of being objected to them, Physician cure thyself. He brought into fashion a Tisan, which was called the Bouillon-rouge, (red broth), by which thousands have found benefit. The great fums he spent in experiments are tokens of the care he took not to be ignorant in any part of his profession; he died at the house of the marshal Creguy, where he lived, and was above an hundred years old; he was still very lively, and I have seen some well turned verses of his, which I am assured he made within these fifteen days (15). I do not think he was above an hundred, and I rather adhere to Mr Patin's calculation, according to which he died in the ninety fourth year of his age.

(a) Counting the year from January. Moreri, who makes him be born in 1490, is mistaken. His epitaph says that he died viii Kal. Jan. 1574, and that he lived annos 40, menses 10, dies 8, horas quatuor — forty nine years, ten months, eight days, and four hours. See the Nomenclator Cardinalium, pag. 141.

LORRAIN (CHARLES DE) cardinal and archbishop of Rheims, son to Claudius, first duke of Guise, was born in February 1525 (a). He was a person of very great abilities; but abused them to the great prejudice of France [A], in order to gratify his insatiate thirst of riches and preferments. He stepped into a very ample succession of benefices in 1550, by the death of cardinal John de Lorraine, his uncle [B], whose debts he never paid [C], though he had promised the creditors he would. At the same time he insinuated himself, by sordid condescensions, into the favour of the dukes of Valentinois (b), and obtained so exorbitant an authority, as to raise to the noblest offices of the kingdom, the persons, who were at his devotion. He did not always stay, till places were vacant, knowing very well how to divest the possessors. The first president of the parliament of Paris sadly experienced it (c). This cardinal, who, in Henry the second's reign, had an almost boundless power, found himself still more powerful under Francis II, when he, and the duke of Guise, his brother, governed the whole kingdom at their pleasure, under pretence, that they were uncles to the young queen Mary Stuart. He made a great figure at the conference of Poissy, by his eloquence and learning, and it is very probable that he consented to the holding that assembly, only to have an opportunity of shewing his eloquence and wit [D]. He made a great figure likewise in the council of Trent; but he

(b) See the remark [C].

[A] He was a person of very great abilities, but abused them to the great prejudice of France. Here is the character Mr de Mezerai gives of him: 'The cardinal was a man made all of fire, always in action, and continually forming intrigues and factions for the raising his family; as capable of a quick invention of them, as his elder brother was of a prudent execution: extremely bent upon heaping up wealth, lofty in words, and vindictive; nevertheless close, timorous, and dissembling, except in the resentment of injuries: as for the rest, a man who by the help of the learning he had acquired, and by the charms of eloquence, which were natural to him, had that advantage of making himself heard by every body (1).'

(1) Mezerai, Hist. de France, Tom III, pag. 24.

If you would have a copy of this character, read only what follows. 'This prince, whose name is so famous in history, and who had a mind extremely lively and penetrating; a temper ardent, impetuous, violent; a rare natural eloquence; much more learning than could be expected in a person of his quality; and which his eloquence made appear much greater still than it really was; the boldest man in his cabinet, in imagining and enterprising great things and vast designs; but the most timorous and dispirited, when he came to the execution, which he saw to be full of danger; he had all his life an unbounded passion for the greatness of his family (2).' These words of Mr Maimbourg precede the passage, in which he relates, how this cardinal formed in the council of Trent the first plan of the league.

(2) Maimbourg, Hist. de la Ligue, livr. 1, pag. 22. Dutch Edit.

[B] He came to a very ample succession of benefices in 1550, by the death of . . . his uncle. Cardinal John de Lorraine had sought his establishment in France, in imitation of the duke of Guise, his brother, and had made it in contempt of the sacred canons, and the most ancient laws of the church. He was at the same time archbishop of Lyons, Rheims, and Narbonne, bishop of Metz, Toul, Verdun, Tervane, Luçon, Albi, and Valence, and abbot of Gorze, Fécamp, Cluny, and Mar-moutier (3). His nephew did not succeed him in all these preferments, but he did in the greatest part (4). The bishopric of Metz was given to Robert de Lemoncourt, who not long after contributed greatly to the reducing this city under the power of France (5).

Having, by servile compliances, insinuated himself into the favour of the dukes of Valentinois, who was the king's sole favourite, he persuaded her, in order to get the management of affairs into his own hands, to, &c.'

[D] He consented to the holding that assembly, only that he might have an opportunity of shewing his eloquence and wit. Mr Varillas confesses, that this cardinal desired it, out of the too good opinion he had of his own eloquence, and a desire of disputing with those, who had employed all their time in the study of controversy (9). Mr Maimbourg maintains, that this is one of those ill-natured conjectures, which have been so commonly made to the disadvantage of this great prelate, whom they would on this occasion tax with vanity. If he had had as much power, adds he, as he had in the preceding reign, he would doubtless have hindered the holding this conference (10). I believe so too; for, in the preceding reign, he would never have suffered, that the Calvinists should have liberty to complain; but whatever change there was in his interest, he had still credit enough to have broken off the conference, if it had displeased him. Had not he been the cause, by the remonstrances he made to their majesties at the head of the clergy (11), why they durst not maintain the first edict of January (12), that was favourable to the Huguenots, and why they went in person, and sat in the parliament of Paris to find out new expedients? Had not he been the cause, that the resolutions, which were taken in this assembly, produced the edict of July, so terrible and ruinous to the Protestants? Had he not thereby triumphed over the queen-regent, supported by the prince of Condé, the admiral de Coligni, and the chancellor de l'Hospital? When a man could do all this, it could not be very difficult, methinks, to hinder the conference of Poissy. It is therefore probable, that the cardinal de Lorraine, proud of so fine an occasion of displaying his learning and eloquence, contributed much to the holding this conference. Besides that he was assured, the doctrine of the Calvinists would be there condemned by the bishops, which would administer new arms to the zealous and persecuting Catholics.

They, who know this cardinal's vanity by the symptoms he discovered of it in the council of Trent, will doubtless blame Mr Maimbourg. At the concluding of the council, they were willing to imitate the custom practised in the Eastern church of acclamation and prayer, he did not maintain the liberties of the Gallican church, with so much vigour, as the court of Rome apprehended (d) [E]. He found it more for the interest of his family to deal civilly with the Pope. His credit, which had suffered a short eclipse by the death of the duke of Guise, his brother, shone out again some time after [F]. He was looked upon as the principal author of the war of Italy, in which the duke of Guise had like to have lost his whole reputation. I shall cite upon this occasion a passage of Brantome, that deserves to be read [G]. I shall cite another passage from him, which shews the vanity of this cardinal, that is to say, the haughtiness with which he spoke to the dukes

(14) In the same history of Father Paul, among the things that this cardinal was blamed for in France, you will find this, That he might very well have dispensed with composing the acclamations, and much more with pronouncing them. And thus it often falls out, says the same historian, that the vain-glorious, instead of the little honour which they hope to gain, lose all at once, even that which they had acquired.

prayer, and the cardinal (13) of Lorraine not only took the pains of composing these acclamations, but also of pronouncing them, which made him universally censured of vanity (14). that function, which had been fit for a deacon (and which heretofore had been always performed by deacons) seeming but little becoming a cardinal prince. A man, that was capable of falling into so childish an ostentation, in all probability desired to enter the lists with the ministers, in presence of all the court, in order to shew his wit and eloquence. He was so addicted to the government of the state, and political intrigues, that he had reason to apprehend, he was thought a bad divine. Indeed he might believe, that the world would excuse him for having forgot the notions he had learned at the schools; but the more probable it was, that his profound skill in politics made the world believe, that he was not well versed in controversial matters, the more he was persuaded that it would be to his glory, to shew he understood them thoroughly, and that he could discourse eloquently and learnedly upon them. Here then is the rock that his vanity split upon, and, we may say that one vanity cured another; for if he had not had the ambition to have it said, that he excelled even in things the most remote from his continual occupations, he would but too much have despised the rank and birth of the ministers to have vouchsafed to enter into a regular dispute with them. I wish Montagne had spoken of him in that chapter of his Essays (15), in which he observes, that 'it most frequently happens, that every one chuses rather to discourse on another's profession than his own, looking upon that as so much new acquired reputation. Observe how Cæsar exultates, in describing to us his inventions of building bridges and contriving engines, and how short he is, where he speaks of the offices of his own profession, of his valour and conduct as a general. His exploits prove him to be a very excellent general, but he would make himself appear an excellent engineer, an accomplishment somewhat foreign.' Divinity, you will tell me, is a cardinal's profession: I answer, this admits too many exceptions, and if he be a cardinal prince, or a first minister of state, Divinity is no more his profession, than that of the general of an army.

[E] He did not maintain, at the council of Trent, the liberties of the Gallican church, with so much vigour as the court of Rome apprehended. The cardinal of Lorraine arrived at Trent, attended by a great number of bishops, and took upon him such authority, that the Pope, growing jealous of him, called him, amongst his friends, the little Pope beyond the mountains. He knew, that he came with an intention to act in concert with the Imperialists, to procure some satisfaction to the Lutherans, (whom he desired to draw off from the Huguenots, he and his brother having to that purpose discoursed with the duke of Wirtemberg, and other princes of this faith at Saverne) for which reason he had taken care to fortify himself against him, by a great number of Italian bishops, whom from all parts he sent to Trent, before this cardinal arrived there. Some months after his arrival, two great pieces of news came to the council; one concerning the death of the king of Navarre, the other, at some months distance, of the winning the battle of Dreux: both which made the cardinal believe, that his brother would become master of France; and this consideration much heightened his power in the council, and by consequence that of the ambassadors, with whom he had been well united from the beginning. They proposed therefore, according to the commission they had received, thirty four articles of reformation. . . . The cardinal of Lorraine had doubtless strongly supported them, if the death of the duke of Guise had not happened; but as the good fortune of this brother had elevated his courage, the loss of him infinitely cast him down; he thought of nothing now but of compromising matters with the Pope, and abating of his great designs; he obliged all the bishops of his faction to abate too. Thus the legates, and other creatures of the court of Rome, remained masters of the council, and got a great many things to pass according to their intentions (16).

[F] His credit . . . shone out again some time after. Here is one sign of it. 'The guards, designed for the security of the cardinal of Lorraine, had orders not only to attend him into the Louvre; but also not to leave him at the altar; thus to mingle the smell of gun-powder and match with the odour of the incense, and other sacred perfumes (17).' It was Charles IX, who granted him this favour, as Mr Aubert observes (18), speaking of a privilege much like that granted to cardinal de Richelieu.

[G] I shall cite a passage of Brantome, upon the war of Italy, that deserves to be read. 'These two faults happened by the means of people, who would handle arms, whilst they knew nothing of the profession. And for this reason this great duke of Guise, after he had been very much disappointed in his Italian expedition, frequently said, I love indeed the church of God; but I will never undertake any conquests upon the word and faith of a priest. Designing hereby to reproach Pope Caraffa, called Paul IV, who had not made good what he had promised, by great and solemn affirmations; or else the cardinal his brother, who was gone to get intelligence, and to sound matters, as far as Rome, and afterwards had very rashly pushed his brother upon it. It may be supposed, that my lord of Guise meant it of both; for as I have heard say, the duke frequently repeated such sayings before the cardinal, who, thinking it was a stone thrown into his garden, was enraged at it, and could hardly curb his passion (19).' The two faults, Brantome speaks of, are those of Lewis king of Hungary, and Don Sebastian king of Portugal. 'Lewis died in a battle which he fought against the Turks, not so much out of any reason, as through the persuasion and obstinacy of a cardinal, who governed him very much, alledging, that he ought not to distrust the power of God, and his just cause; that though he should have, as we may say, but ten thousand Hungarians, being so good Christians, and fighting in God's cause, he might expect to defeat a hundred thousand Turks: and he so drove, and hurried him to this engagement, that he lost the battle; and, attempting to retreat, he fell into a bog, and was smothered. The same happened to the last king of Portugal, Sebastian, who miserably lost his life, when, not having sufficient forces, he hazarded a battle with the Moors, who were three times stronger than he, and this upon the persuasion, the preachings, and obstinacy of some Jesuits, who laid before him the power of God, who by his look alone was able to confound all the world, though they should be armed against him; as doubtless it is a most true maxim; however we ought not to tempt nor abuse his power; for he has secrets that we are ignorant of. Some have said, that these Jesuits did this, and said it with a good intention, as it may be believed; others, that they had been suborned and bribed by the king of Spain, thus to destroy this young and courageous king, and full of fire, that he might the more easily seize his dominions, as he afterwards did (20).'

For one reader, who will blame me for having drawn out this remark to such a length, by reciting these two particulars more than a hundred will thank me heartily: it is to oblige such, that I sometimes give a greater extent to my remarks, than the text requires; they experience with pleasure, that they meet with more things by the way, than they expected.

of Savoy, kissing her by main force [H]. Note, that the kiss, he struggled for, was a kiss of ceremony; he loved also other kisses [I], as Brantome informs us. I have elsewhere spoken (c) of his hatred to the Protestant religion, and the satirical writings he was exposed to on this account. I might also have observed, that he was compared to Seneca in one of these satires [K]. He was turned into ridicule, for some time, on his receiving an high affront at Paris, from the mareschal de Montmorenci [L]. He died the 26th

[H] The haughtiness which the cardinal shewed to the duchess of Savoy, kissing her by main force. He had naturally a great respect for the ladies (21). But he forgot this respect, and not without reason, towards the duchess of Savoy, Donna Beatrix of Portugal. Passing once through Piedmont, in his journey to Rome, for the service of the king his master, he visited the duke and duchess; after having discoursed some time with Monsieur the duke, he waited on the duchess in her chamber, intending to salute her, and, as he approached, she, who was arrogance itself, offered him her hand to kiss. The cardinal, resenting this affront, advanced to kiss her lips, and she continued to run back, when losing all patience, and coming up closer to her, he took her by the head, and, in spite of her, kissed her two or three times, and though she screamed, and cried out in the Spanish and Portuguese way, she was forced to submit. How comes it, says he, that you use this behaviour to me? Shall not I, who kiss the queen my mistress, the greatest queen in the world, kiss you, who are but a little dirty duchess? I would have you know, that I have lain with as fine ladies, and of as good families as yourself. Possibly he might say true. This princess was to blame in carrying it so high towards a prince of so great a house, or even to a cardinal, considering the high rank they bear in the church, and esteem themselves on a level with the greatest princes in Christendom. The cardinal was to blame, in taking so harsh a revenge; but it is grievous to a noble and generous heart, of whatever profession, to receive an affront.

(22) Ibid. pag. 361, & seq.

[I] He also loved other kisses. The following passage is a piece of a comedy, which the people of the world act: by the people of the world, I mean some princes of the church, as well as the most worldly laymen. Let us hear Brantome speak: he will tell us, that the cardinal de Lorraine was no less liberal in point of charity, than galantry: 'Most liberal, says he (22), I may call him, since he had not his equal in his time; his expences, his gifts, and bounties, have testified it, especially his charity towards the poor; he generally carried a great bag, which his valet de chambre, who kept his money for his little pleasures, failed not to fill every morning with three or four hundred crowns; and as often as he met with any poor body, he put his hand in the bag, and what he took out at adventure he gave, without picking or chusing. It was of him, that a poor blind man said, (when passing thro' Rome, and being asked an alms, he, according to his custom, threw the beggar a handful of gold) crying out aloud, O tu sei Cristo, O veramente el Cardinal di Lorena: that is, Either thou art undoubtedly Christ, or the cardinal de Lorraine. If he was an alms-giver, and charitable that way, he was also very liberal to other persons, and especially towards the ladies, whom he easily caught with this bait; for money was not so plentiful in those times, as it is at present; and for their part, they were more fond of junketing and fine cloaths. I have heard say, that when any new maid came to court, or lady that was handsome, he presently came and accosted her, telling her he himself would have the managing of her. A fine manager indeed! I believe the trouble was not near so great, as managing a wild filly: for at that time it was said, there was hardly a lady or maid of any standing at court, or newly arrived, that was not kissed, and caught by the magnificence of the cardinal; and few or none left this court, either women or maids, with unspotted honour. Their coffers and large wardrobes were then to be seen crowded with more gowns, petticoats, gold and silver, and silk, than those of the queens and princesses of this time. I speak from my own knowledge of two or three, who had gained all this by their bodies, their fathers, mothers, and husbands, having never been able to furnish them with such store.' The same Brantome affirms (23), that the bastard daughter of this cardinal, called Arne (§ 2), followed the princess Elizabeth, daughter to Henry II, and wife to Philip II, into Spain, and was married to Besme, he who assassinated the admiral.

[(§ 2) Perhaps an error of the press for Anne. R. & M. C. & R.]

[K] He was compared to Seneca in a satire. We need not wonder at it, when we know, that the author of the Parallel took this Philosopher for a wicked man. Let us cite Montagne's words: they are worthy of his good taste: 'Among a thousand little books, says he (24), dispersed by those of the pretended Reformed religion, in defence of their cause, which now and then came from a good hand, and which it is great pity was not employed on a better subject, I have formerly seen one, which, to lengthen and fill up the similitude, he pretends to find between the government of our poor deceased king Charles IX, and that of Nero, draws a parallel between the deceased cardinal of Lorraine and Seneca, and compares their fortunes, they having been both the first in the government of their prince, as also their morals, conditions, and deportment. In my opinion he does great honour to the cardinal; for though I am one of those, who greatly esteemed his wit, his eloquence, his zeal for religion, and the service of his king, and his good fortune in having been born in an age, in which it was so new a thing, so rare, and withal so necessary to the public good, to have an ecclesiastical person, of such extraction and dignity, capable of, and sufficient for his post; yet, to confess the truth, I reckon his capacity nothing near so great, nor his virtue so clean and entire, nor so unshaken, as that of Seneca. Now this book, I speak of, to obtain it's end, gives a very injurious description of Seneca, borrowing these reproaches from Dion the Historian, on whose testimony I in no wise depend.'

[L] He received an high affront from the mareschal de Montmorenci. Though Charles IX had forbid the wearing of arms, yet the cardinal de Lorraine came to Paris with a great retinue of armed men, and pretended to enter the city with this guard. 'He had a permission, sealed with the great seal, for riding with armed guards (25). The mareschal de Montmorenci, governor of Paris, knew it very well; but expected, that the cardinal should have made him a compliment upon it; and he sent to him an order, by the provost of the mareschals, to command his people to lay down their arms. The cardinal, neglecting it, still rode on. The mareschal, well attended, went to meet him, and attacked him in St Denis's street. . . . The cardinal's attendants dispersed here and there, and he himself escaped into a shop with his nephew (26). In the evening, they all came together to Clugny-house, which was the cardinal's lodging. The next day, the mareschal passed backwards and forwards in a kind of bravado before his gates. . . . The provost of the merchants, in behalf of the parliament, accommodated this affair: he obtained of the cardinal, that he would quit the town, and of the mareschal, that he would suffer this prince to have armed guards, according to the permission of the king, of which he shewed him the copy (27). The reader will be better pleased with Mr le Laboureur's account of it (28). He ordered that the cardinal should be civilly told, that he would not receive him in that warlike equipage, and the contempt shewn to the message, obliged him the more to come to extremities, which was to repel force by force, and do his duty in putting his guard to the sword, unless they disarmed; and this was done without any other loss, than that of one of the cardinal's men, who put himself in a posture of defence, upon which the cardinal, who not being so valiant, though more violent than his brothers, was so frightened, that he ran and hid himself in a shop in Iron-street, near which the skirmish happened. He was afterwards conducted to his house, which was Clugny-house, where he remained some days, without shewing himself, and at last retired by night

26th of December, 1574. You will find very curious things concerning his death, in the Journal of Henry III (f). The queen of Scotland, his niece, was politic enough to elude the design he had of keeping her jewels [M]. I forgot to observe, that he was the principal promoter of an edict, which made the parliament of Paris of half a year's continuance [N]. This lasted not long. We are told, that the prediction of an Astrologer gave him frequent fears, and contributed much to the pains he took to get the wearing of arms prohibited, in the reign of Francis II. to his archbishopric of Rheims, to meditate more securely his designs of revenge, not public, as his friends hoped, but secret and cloistered, such as are the resentments of those of his condition, when they can make their particular quarrel an affair of state. This adventure was published throughout Europe, and the Huguenots forgot it not in their libels, and particularly in a complaint they put in the cardinal's mouth, of the little assistance that was lent him for the execution of his designs, wherein he speaks thus :

Mesmes Paris entier, duquel le Comperage
Envers mon fere & moy obligeoit le courage,
Me delaisse du tout. Je le puis voir ainsi
Quand pres St Innocent me fit Montmorency
Descendre de vilelle, & gagner une porte,
Ma garde desarma, & mit à pied ; de sorte Qu'elle ainsi me mise en blanc deshonneur en a Et
Ah ! que j'ay de dépit qu'en abaissant ma corne
Il me fit en public recevoir telle escorne, Sans que de se mouvoir nul homme fit semblant En toute la Cité, & que d'un cœur tremblant
A luy le lendemain j'envoyay me soumettre,
Le requérant vouloir octroyer & permettre,
Me retirer armé, de crainte des Mutins.
Ce que de luy encor tant brave je n'obtins,
Ains m'en allay de nuit, emmenant un bon nombre
Des miens : si qu'en fuyant avois peur de mon ombre.
Oh ! quel estois-je lors, ô combien different Estoit Charles nouveau, de ce Charles Parent
De l'espouse à François ! Oh que cette nuit coye Differoit du plein jour auquel remply de joye,
Je condamnay en Roy, inique & déloyal,
A la cruelle mort le juste Sang Royal.

E'en Paris cast me off, that once respected Me and my brother. Then I found it so,
When Montmorency, near St Innocent's,
Made me dismount in haste, and to a shop,
For refuge fly ; my guard, unbars'd,
And ignominiously threw down their arms.

How did it gall me, thus to be affronted,
In public too, and not a citizen
Stir to my aid ; nay to be forc'd, next day,
With trembling heart to send a low submission,
And humbly to entreat his worship's leave,
Arm'd to retire, for fear of mutineers :
Yet this he haughtily refus'd to grant.
So that I fled by night, my servants with me,
So fear'd, that my own shadow frighted me.
What was I then ? alas ! how different From Charles, related to king Francis' queen !
A night how different from that full day,
When joyous, like a king, unjust, disloyal,
I sat in judgment on the royal blood,
And sentenc'd many to a cruel death.

(29) This piece is intitled, Lettre d'un Seigneur du pays de Haynaut envoyée à un sien voisin & amy fuyant la Cour d'Espagne.

Immediately there came out a letter (29), which was presently confuted (§β). This letter was designed to justify the cardinal, and contained several reproaches against the house of Montmorency, and the admiral de Coligni. The answer was very smart ; it proceeded from a better pen than that of the cardinal's apologist. Thuanus makes mention of several pieces published pro and con, upon this affair, and which had been multiplied ad infinitum, if the parliament of Paris had not forbidden the sale of such books. The same Historian observes, that Lewis Reynier, Sieur de la Planche, was reckoned the author of the first piece that appeared, which was a relation of the fact in favour of the marshal. He observes also, that this marshal had not acted like a good Politician, since he chose rather to provoke a most powerful enemy, by a great, but not very prejudicial affront, than ruin him entirely. Morantii prudentiam plerique tunc requirebant, qui potentes inimicos levissimo damno irritare, quam perdere cum posset, maluerit. The prince of Condé blamed him for this conduct (30), and often said, that if Montmorency only meant to divert himself, he did too much ; and if he was in earnest he did too little (31). Perhaps this prince would not have been sorry, whilst he had no hand in it, to have been rid at once of so formidable a family.

The same year the cardinal of Lorraine involved himself in a controversy, in which he did not succeed. The scene of this quarrel was the Pais Messin, where Salcede, who was bailiff of it, vigorously opposed the enterprizes of the cardinal. This was called the cardinal's war, of which there was speedily printed a relation.

(§β) It was printed at Antwerp, by William Richman, in 8vo, and containing but 27 pages. It is dated from Paris, the second of April, 1564, before Easter. The answer to it is intitled, A reply to the Letter of Charles de Vaudevent, Cardinal of Lorraine, who is called imaginary prince of the kingdoms of Jerusalem and Naples, duke and earl, by fancy, of Anjou and Provence, and at present a meer gentleman of Hainault, 1565, in 8vo. It is extremely full of spirit, and contains very curious things, especially in relation to the genealogy of the Châtillons and Lorrains, and touching the causes of the hatred between admiral de Coligni, and the duke of Guise. It is a pity the author of this piece is unknown : perhaps it is the Sieur de la Planche's, whom Mr BAYLE speaks of a little after ; but he the author who he will, he was certainly a good writer.

I only wish he had not highly approved and commended the assassination of Poltrot. * Are you comparable, say, be to the cardinal *, for counsel, resolution, authority, conduct, experience, and bravery, verfo. * Fol. 151, to the tyrant Francis, your brother ? Meray t, our deliverer, has left us a noble and divine example to follow. I know very well, that he need not be as cruel as you are ; but I deny, that it is cruelty to do justice on a tyrant, who had neither pity nor humanity. What have the most furious leaguers said more in favour of the Jureguys, and the Clements ?

does not this shew that passion blinded the writers of both parties ? the title of this answer is very particular, and perhaps Mr du Bouchet copied after it, when he made this : An Answer to the petition, which Mr de Pranzac, imaginary prince of the blood, fancied he presented to the king ; Paris, Jaquin, 1667, in folio. REM. CRIT.]

[M] The queen of Scotland eluded the design he had of keeping her jewels.] Mary Stuart, after the death of Francis II, her husband, went over to Scotland. The cardinal of Lorraine, her uncle, was of opinion, that it was her best way to deposit her jewels with him, till fortune had decided the success of her voyage ; but the knowing very well his intentions, answered him, that whilst he hazarded herself to all the dangers of the sea, she should be to blame, in being more concerned for her jewels than her person. See in the margin Thuanus's words (32).

[N] He was the principal promoter of an edict, which made the parliament of Paris, of half a year's continuance.] Thuanus speaks of it under the year 1554, and observes, that John Daurat, preceptor at that time to the king's pages, made verses a little too bold, to flatter the cardinal of Lorraine. He compared the parliament to Plato's Androgynus. * In eam rem Joan. Auratus, tunc alicorum puerorum præceptor & mox occasion, will inform us, that the insult he received in coming out of a courtesan's house [O], obliged him to bring back the court to St Germain, in contempt of an ancient custom. Let us not forget, that he preached on several occasions; but good God! in a strain how remote from the spirit of the gospel. He handled things according to the tenor of the Alcoran, as a true successor of Mahomet, and not of the Apostles; he preached nothing but war, and the effusion of blood [P]; but while he expressed this barbarous zeal against the Protestants of France, he gave pensions to some Protestants in Germany [Q]. A new farce!

' professor regius, vir divini ingenii, carmen elegantissimum, sed petulantia libertate, in gratiam Cardinalis Lotaringi, qui negotium illud argebat, conscripsit, quo amplius ordinem Androgyno Platónico comparat (33). Note, that Pasquier observes, that things were reduced to their former condition at three years end (34). Thuanus says the same.

[O] The passage I shall allude to on this occasion, will inform us, . . . the insult he received in coming out of a courtesan's house.] The cardinal going very early out of the house of the handsome Roman, a renowned courtesan in Henry's time, who lodged in St Catherine's-street, had like to have been handled very roughly by some ruffians, who generally wait for such adventures. At which his sanctity being alarmed, and persuading himself, and giving out, that the Heretics laid ambushes for him, he led the court to St Germain, and caused the queen-mother, who would not on any account leave the king, her son, for ever so little a time, to break the custom hitherto inviolable, which obliged the queens, upon their husband's decease, not to stir out of their chamber for forty days, nor see the light of the sun or the moon till he was buried. Presently after, when the strangers were gone, he put out an edict, forbidding the carrying any arms, and especially pistols and arquebuses, under great penalties, revoking all particular and preceding permissions, to whomsoever granted, unless they were newly confirmed by the king, so that only the Guises, and their friends remained armed. Besides, suspecting the cloaths that were then in fashion, as long cloaks (35), and large breeches (and indeed they were too excessive; for the cloak reached below the calf of the leg, and without sleeves, and the breeches were an ell and a half large or five quarters) (36) they induced the privy-council to forbid the wearing them, forasmuch as arms might be easily concealed under them. And 'it was said, that the cardinal took that matter more to heart upon the account of a necromancer, who had prognosticated to him at Rome, that he should be killed by an arquebus, out of envy, and by the enemies he should have in France, upon his being exalted to the highest degree of honour, which gave him, great trouble and uneasiness (the true wages of those, who go to conjurers,) even while all things bowed and submitted to him (37). The historian who furnishes me with this narrative, says, that the Guises did not appear at the magnificent entrance of Francis II at Orleans, the eighteenth of October, 1560. And it was said it was for fear of meeting with some desperate fellow; because a Magician (as we have said) had foretold to the cardinal at Rome, that his brother and he should die a violent death and be killed by arquebuses, so that to avoid this, they were afraid of such assemblies, though they had forbidden the wearing any pistols and arquebuses, upon pain of death (38). Note, that the magician's prediction proved false, for the cardinal did not die a violent death.

[P] He preached nothing but war and effusion of blood.] The witness I shall produce, is neither a libeller, nor a Huguenot, but the famous Stephen Pasquier. 'Because, says he (39), the ministers gained the people before, by sermons and exhortations, so the cardinal of Lorraine, thought to do the like amongst us. He first preached in the church of Notre-Dame, to an incredible affluence of auditors, and afterwards in the church of St Germain de l'Auxerrois. All the holy-days and octaves of Corpus Christi-day, every other turn, he preaching one day, and the Minime (40), of whom I have spoken above; admonishing the people above all things, rather to die, and to spill the last drop of their blood, than engage against the honour of God and his church, to suffer any other religion to prevail in France, besides that which our ancestors so strictly and religiously observed. I thought it as great a novelty to see a cardinal preach, as a minister a little before. He has very much animated the people to arms. The pens even of the poets engaged in the same. In short, there is nothing trumpeted but fire, war, murder, and desolation.' If you would see what were the fruits of these languinary sermons, consult the same Pasquier (41). It would be impossible to tell you what barbarous cruelties are committed on both sides; where the Huguenots are masters, they destroy all the images, (the ancient bulwark of the common peoples devotion) demolish sepulchres and tombs, and even passing through Clergy, have not spared that of Lewis XI; plunder all the goods consecrated and devoted to churches. By way of retaliation the Catholics kill, murder, drown all that they know to be of this sect, and the rivers overflow with them. Not but that amidst this, some execute their private revenges upon their enemies, on pretence of the public quarrel. And tho' the heads seem not to approve such actions, yet they let them pass by connivance and dissimulation. Peace is better than war.' Though at present the readers see these things only at a distance, they cannot chuse but conceive some indignation against this barbarous sermon-monger, and especially when they consider his character. He was a great cardinal, who run no risk in kindling a civil-war in all the corners of the kingdom. He was certain always to follow the court secure from any danger or trouble: and that whilst the provinces were a theatre of bloodshed, he could wallow in pleasures; that his luxury, his pomp, his feasting, his love intrigues, would suffer no interruption. This is a subject of scandal, which must prodigiously encrease the horror such an incendiary-preacher gives all truly Christian souls; a trumpeter of war, of torments and butchery; a man who, properly speaking, is not of Jesus Christ's religion, but of Saturn, and who indeed practises the same which the priests of Carthage did antiently to the honour of this false god. They sacrificed men to him, and imagined, that their religion required such victims (42).

[Q] He gave pensions to some Protestants in Germany.] The names of them were found in the book of accounts of this cardinal's steward. A book of Zanchius proves it. 'Certum mihi est, quod jam dicam coram Deo; Audi ex viro harum rerum perito, & fide digno, se in libro Theaurarii illius cardinalis Lotharingi, paucis ante annis vita defuncti, nonnullorum Germanorum Theologie Doctorum & Pastorum nomina vidisse: quibus pensiones annuæ, ex Archiepiscopatu præsertim Metensi assignabantur. In quem vero finem non fuisse scriptum (43). — This I am certain of, which I declare in the presence of God; I have heard from a man perfectly versed in these matters, and one worthy of credit, that he had seen in the accounts of the treasurer of this cardinal of Lorraine, a few years before his death, the names of some German divines and ministers, who had annual pensions assigned them out of the revenues chiefly of the archbishopric of Metz, but on what account was not set down.' There is no doubt but the cardinal proposed to himself to keep up the division betwixt the Lutherans of Germany, and the doctors of Geneva; but this was however but an ill way of maintaining his own religion. It was pure Machiavellism. Compare with this what I have said in another place (44).

I have mentioned some sermons of this cardinal: Languet's letters inform us, that they were not disapproved by the Protestants, and that this cardinal was suspected of Lutheranism. It was in the year 1561, that he preached them at Rheims, in Lent. 'Cardinalis Lotharingicus à rigidioribus Pontificibus accusatur Lutheranismi. Per hanc Quadragesimam concionatus est Rheims cum non parva laude. Utinam nihil aliud unquam egisset (45). He had already shewn that he wished for the reformation of a great many

 Although at present the cardinal of Lorraine very plausibly expresses his desire that some reformation should be made in religion, acknowledging that it is a thing absolutely necessary. Yet for my part I cannot credit him in this matter, but am of opinion, that he does this because he perceives nothing could be brought about by a contrary behaviour: whereas by thus seeming to comply, he hopes more effectually to

LOTICHIUS (PETER) abbot of the convent of Solitar, in the county of Hanaw (a) in Germany, was born in the year 1501. He quitted the schools of Leipfic at sixteen years of age, in order to devote himself to a monastic life in the convent of Solitar.
 He received priests orders in 1523, and peaceably performed the functions of it till 1524, that is, till the peasants war forced him to take sanctuary with his abbot and fraternity, under the counts of Hanaw. The abbot bringing back his society to the monastery, after these furious troubles were appeased, committed the care of his church to Loti-chius (b); who having read Luther and Melanchthon's books, found himself capable of preaching, and doing all the other functions of his place better than before. The abbot died in 1534, and Lotichius, who succeeded him, thinking in good earnest to reform that abbey, opened a school in it, in which a great number of young people were instructed, several of whom became ministers of the Gospel, after having continued their studies at Wittemberg and Marburg. He openly established the Protestant religion in his monastery, and in all the places depending upon it, in 1543, and wrote a fine Latin letter to the abbot of Fulda, to justify his conduct. He was the principal cause of the courageous resolution, which the neighbouring ministers took to reject the Interim in 1549. The rest of his life answered his great zeal by acts of piety and charity. His church, his school, and several learned men, experienced the effects of his liberal temper.
 He died at the count of Hanaw's, the twenty-third of June 1567. His body was buried two days after, in the abbey of Solitar (c).

LOTICHIUS (PETER) nephew to the former, took the surname Secundus, that he might not be mistaken for his uncle. He was born at Solitar the second of November 1528.
 His father (a), though he was only an honest country man, designed him for a scholar; and we need not wonder at it, considering what we have said of the abbot Lotichius. This uncle having observed, by the progress his nephew made at Solitar school, that he was very well qualified for the Sciences, resolved to take a very particular care of him, and sent him to Frankfort, where Micellus taught the Belles Lettres with great reputation.
 After having learnt there a great deal of Latin and Greek, and much better the rules of Poetry, to which his genius strongly inclined him; he was sent to Marburg in 1544, and afterwards to Wittemberg, whither Melanchthon and Camerarius drew a great resort. The young Lotichius quickly gained the friendship of these two famous professors, as also that of George Sabinus, a celebrated poet, and of several other learned men. The war which broke out in Saxony in 1546, obliged Melanchthon and his colleagues to quit Wittemberg. The first retired to Magdeburg (b), and was followed thither by our Lotichius; but when he left that place to seek a better retreat, Lotichius, instead of following him, took up arms.
 This kind of life did not intirely break off his commerce with the Muses, nor did it last long [A]; for we know that in the year 1548, he lived peaceably among his books at Erfurt. A little after he returned to Wittemberg, whither the peace had permitted Melanchthon to go and continue his function. He there finished his studies of philosophy, and afterwards went into France, in quality of governor to the nephews of Daniel Stibar, dean of the chapter of Wirtzburg, a man of great merit, and an intimate friend of Joachim Camerarius. It was in the year 1550 that he began this journey, which lasted near four years [B]. He made a long stay at Montpellier; and probably he and his pupils

You, amidst arms, were my delight,
 My vacant hours for you reserv'd;

For the rest, he did not make much more than one campaign, so that the author, cited by Mr Baillet, les Portes, Tom. had no reason to say in general, that what is remarkable is, that Lotichius composed his verses in the tumult of a camp, and under arms (2).

would have suffered several insults (c), for having eaten meat in Lent, if Clusius, who lodged at Rondelet's, had not interceded for them with a Dominican, who performed the office of inquisitor. They were discharged for a sum of money. He was scarce returned into Germany but he thought of travelling into Italy. He made this journey, as he had done that to France, at the expence of Daniel Stribar; but he had the misfortune of getting acquainted with too many people. He lodged at Bologna, with a young canon of Munich, who though he had a complaisant landlady at home, made love abroad (d). The landlady being desperately in love, and also jealous, prepared a philtre for him; but by misfortune Lotichius finding his soup too far, changed it for that of the canon [C], and grew immediately mad upon it. He was relieved by vomiting up a part of the potion, which however threw him into a malignant fever that made his nails fall off, and had like to have cost him his life. Hubert Languet, his good friend, travelling into Italy, found him in this miserable condition at Bologna. The poison operated so violently upon Lotichius, that every year he had some returns of his first malady, till at last he died of it. Before he left Italy, he took his degree of doctor of Physic at Padua. Some time after his return into Germany, he was invited to Heidelberg to be professor in that faculty; he accepted of this invitation, and went to Heidelberg in 1557. He there got the esteem and favour of the elector Palatine, Otho-Henry, and of every body else; and as he had all manner of reason to be satisfied with his employment, he refused the offers that were made him at Marburg, of a place of professor of Physic or Poetry. He did not long enjoy that pleasant state; being attacked with his old distemper in the beginning of November 1560, and died the seventh of the same month, he was a man of admirable conversation, and was candor and sincerity it self (e) [D]. A collection of his poems were published in 1561 [E]. It contains so many love-verses, that it was thought the author wanted some apology on that account. Hagius undertook it [F]. The fourth elegy of the second book has something

[C] Lotichius changed his soup for that of the canon. According to Hagius's manner of relating the thing, this philtre was given in a soup; but he is strangely mistaken in imagining, as he seems to do, that the Italians give the name Minestra to these enchanting potions, which the Greeks call philtion. Tus parare, says he (6), nescio quod male temperatum ac conciliatum Circæum, Itali minestram illud, hoc philtion Græci vocant. The Italians by Minestra, or Menestra, barely understand pottage or soup.

[D] he was candor and sincerity itself. His Historian gives a most remarkable proof of it. He might, if he pleased, have married very advantageously; but because he believed he should soon die, he could not think of deceiving the woman; and therefore refused all the matches that were proposed to him. Quod se sciret supremi diei sui nec vitæ longioris consilium fallere puellam ingenuam ullam, fœmineumve genus, aut latere spe connubii fortunæque stabilitatis nolle (7).

[E] A collection of Lotichius's poems were published in 1561. Joachim Camerarius wrote the Epistle Dedicatory, in which he gives Lotichius the character of the best Poet, that his age, and Germany had seen. After this edition, many others were made with the addition of several poems. Thuanus (8), who has put three years betwixt Lotichius's death, and the publication of his poems by Camerarius, is two years mistaken in his reckoning. Moreri has copied this fault, and has added a little anachronism of his own on the day of his death, which happened not as he says, on the twenty fourth of October, but on the seventh of November. Thuanus, who has placed his death on the first of November, is not without fault. Freherus (9) also reckons three years betwixt Lotichius's death, and the edition of his poems. Thuanus (10) has placed this Poet below Eobanus Hessus. Camerarius pretends, that if the latter was alive, he would have owned himself inferior to Lotichius. 'Sed & Eobanus & Sabinus, si viverent, cum omnia in Lotichii scriptis magnopere probarent, tum elegantia & suavitate atque expremendi vetustatis similitudinem contentione, se ab hoc alicubi superari non negarent' (11). — But Eobanus and Sabinus both, if they were now living, as they were great admirers of Lotichius's writings, so they would not deny that in elegance and softness of expression, as also in a happy manner of imitating the Antients, they were each of them excelled by him. Hagius affirms, that the greatest Poets of Germany have publicly acknowledged the particular esteem they had for Lotichius's verses; and pretends, that, in the common opinion, Lotichius equalled the most excellent Poets, both antient and modern, and was preferable perhaps to some of the Antients; he cites Paul Melissus's verses, in which the superiority is given to Lotichius, above all the German Poets, with respect to elegy. Melchior Adam (12) is somewhat unexact in his abridgment of this place, since he makes Hagius say, that the greatest men, and particularly George Sabinus, John Stigelius, George Fabricius, Posthius, and Melissus, have given Lotichius the superiority with respect to elegiac verse. Hagius at the most makes only Posthius and Melissus give him this superiority; he says nothing of the other three, either expressly or implicitly that can relate to this matter.

I thought that the edition of Lotichius's poems procured by Camerarius in 1561, was the first; but Mr Kortholt (13) has been pleased to inform me, that there was printed at Paris in 1551, by Valcofan, Petri Lotichii secundi elegiarum liber, & ejusdem carminum libellus ad D. Danielem Stribarum equitem Francum. The letter he writ me thereupon is so mislaid among my papers, that when I was revising this article, I could not find it; however I remember he gave me several particulars of this edition, and told me, among other things, that the dream I shall speak of below (14), is not found in it. Mr Kortholt acquainted me also that he had inserted several things concerning our Peter Lotichius in his dissertation de entusiasmo poetico, printed at Kiel in 1696.

[F] Hagius undertook the apology of his love-verses. He confesses (15) that being very young he made frequent reflexions with some sort of surprize, on the perpetual complaints with which the Poets fill their verses; as that they burn with love, that they are pierced with Cupid's darts, and that they find no remedy for these consuming flames.

Mille fatigatus rerum discrimina vici,
Sæpe graves æstus, frigora sæpe tuli:
Unius haud possum superare Cupidinis ignes,
Nec desideris fortior esse meis.

A thousand changes I have born,
And colds, and heats, I have endur'd,
Yet Cupid doth my courage scorn,
Nor are his flames by patience cur'd.

After these verses of Lotichius, he cites three of Virgil's.

Aspice atrata jugo referunt suspensa juveni,
Et sol crescentes decedens duplicat umbras.
Me tamen urit amor, quis enim modus addit amor?

Releas'd from toil the steers brought home the plow,
The setting sun the length'n'd shadow show,
Me love still burns for love no limit knows.

He

something surprizing in it; it turns upon a dream, which seems to be a prediction of the sacking of Magdeburg [G]. I shall make several remarks on this subject, which yet

He adds, that having asked some Poets the meaning of these things, Lotichius answered him, that it was the fire of divine, and not venereal, love, that burnt the Poets.

Cur vatium pars magna suos decantet amores
Miraris, Hagi candide, & causam rogas?
Accipe, non illos Veneris fax improba, verum Æterni amor generosus urit numinis.

*That of their loves so many Poets sung,
You wonder, Hagi, and demand the cause.
They were not by a lustful passion sung,
But love divine unto their verse gave laws.*

This answer is ridiculous; it was treating Hagi as a child. He does not speak of it as he ought to do; for he only says, that Melissus explained to him all the mystery much better (16). Melissus represented to him, that if any thing was capable of attracting hearts, and conveying invincible charms into the very marrow, it is the love that is kindled by a modest and chaste object. The purest heaven, adds he, formed this love, and assigned it inflamed hearts for its throne (17). The stars take care to keep up this fire; and as the Poets receive the influences from heaven, which inspire their Poetry, we need not wonder that they have so lively a sense of the fire of love; for these influences having the same origin as love (18), both kindle and keep it up.

Sic propagare laborat Indita nature femina quique sue.

*Each but endeavours to make those things grow,
The seeds of which kind nature did bestow.*

To reduce this explication to plain human language, and to its just simplicity, we must suppose that Melissus meant, that the same complexion which disposes a man to Poetry, disposes him to love. This proposition is not easy to be made out; for besides that there are many persons, who have a talent at Poetry without being of an amorous constitution, it is certain there are innumerable people who cannot make a verse, and yet are more furiously tormented with the fire of love than those whose poems are the most amorous. How many love-verses are printed, which are only witty conceits? A Poet never so little touched, appropriates to himself whatever he finds in the most passionate elegies; he tries even to carry things higher than what he has read; he invents new turns, and studies the most mournful characters. His design is to make his verses admired; to exercise his vein upon thoughts, which at once give a reputation to his poetical wit, and flatter the object of his passion. There are even some who are free from love, when they compose this kind of verses. Beza was one of them. 'Ilos bonos viros non pudet quicquid de poetice Candidæ amoribus lusi, (lusi autem certè pleraque, veteres illos imitatus, priusquam etiam per ætatem, quid istud rei esset intelligerem) ad castissimam & leuissimam, fœminam accommodare. Id autem non aliter se habere quàm dico, non si tantum testari possunt quibuscum per id tempus vixi, verum etiam res ipsa declarat: quum nullo unquam liberos ex uxore susceperim, in meis autem illis carminibus, Candidam pregnantem superis commendem: quod tum mihi nimirum illud fictitium argumentum, ut alia subinde multa, occurreret (19). — 'Those good men are not ashamed to apply to a most chaste and excellent woman, what I have ludicrously written on Candida: for certainly I said most of those things in jest, and in imitation of the ancients, being at that time so young, as not to know what the thing meant. That what I say is really true, I can not only prove by the testimony of those with whom I lived at that time; but I can appeal to those very verses, for the thing speaks itself. I never had any children by my wife, and yet in these verses I recommend the pregnant Candida to the favour of heaven, because that fictitious subject then struck my mind as many others

'have done at other times.' You have in these last words an instance of the conduct of Poets; they give themselves imaginary subjects, that they may have an opportunity of saying witty things. But let us come to Lotichius's apology.

He had four mistresses successively; for whom he made a great many verses (20): he never proposed, as (20) Puellas they say, to obtain any criminal favours from them, but it is only from himself, a witness in his own cause, that we know this. 'Non fecit id non honeste, quia & caste amavit Lotichius & sine crimine ac scelere: si modo castissimi Poetæ verbis veribusque dignamur aliquam habere non dubiam fidem, sic etenim ipsemet de amoribus suis canit, & Claudia sua.

Feliciter arsi

Inque meo nullum crimen amore fuit.

Non ego te, mea lux, deceptam fraude reliqui,
Non spoliū raptō turpe pudore tuli.

Dī mihī sunt testes, si mentior, æquore vasto
Obruar, & mutis piscibus esca natem (21).

There was nothing of dishonesty in this, for Lotichius loved chaste, and without crime or guilt, if we allow the words and verses of a most chaste Poet credit, when they are express, for thus himself writes of his passion, and of his Claudia.

*My bosom burns with no dishonest love,
But happily a virtuous passion prove.*

*From thee, my love, I ne'er did perjur'd fly,
Nor bore thy honour or good name away.
Thy witness, heaven, or plunge me, if I lie,
In boundless seas to hungry fish a prey.*

The apologist observes, that the privileges of Poetry allowed Lotichius to exercise his muse upon earthly beauties, it being an art which is exercised in the contemplation, and explication of all that is beautiful in the universe. 'Fecit Lotichius id primum jure poetice optimo, ad quam scilicet rerum omnium pulcherrimarum quæ magna hac universitate orbis continentur, cœlestium terrestriumque spectabilium forum contemplatio, commentatioque rite pertinet.' Moreover, as he was civil and polite, he applied himself to write love-verses, and would not deprive himself of this piece of gallantry, which also was useful towards polishing his muse. 'Ex quo illud saltem concessum est commodi, ut molles amores cantando mollius carmen deduceret.' In fine, he wanted this agreeable diversion to banish the melancholy thoughts with which he was disturbed (22).

[G] The fourth elegy of the second book . . . turns upon a dream, which seems to be a prediction of the sacking of Magdeburg.] That is, of the dreadful sacking which this town suffered in 1631, being taken by the Imperial forces. Mr Morhof has made the following observation. 'Illud singulare in hoc viro & prope modum divinum est, ac plus quam Poeticum epigramma arguit, quod in Elegia 4. lib. 2. ad Joachimum Camerarium scripta tristissima obsidionis & expugnationis Magdeburgensis fata integro seculo prædixerit. Res omnino notatu digna, ac elegia illa pulcherrima est. Hæc ille aurea carmina, quod mireris, inter armorum strepitum ipse miles scribebat (23). — This was certainly singular in the manner of whom we are speaking, and shews something in him divine, at least far beyond a poetic enthusiasm, that in the fourth elegy of his second book, addressed to Joachim Camerarius, he predicted the unfortunate siege and hapless taking of Magdeburg, a whole age before it came to pass. A thing justly deserving notice, the elegy it self being also very beautiful. These golden verses he composed while a soldier, and immoderated with the din of arms which is also somewhat strange.' Lotichius in a dream saw a great town besieged, and a young woman, who called herself the protectress of the place, complaining of the cruelties that should lay it waste, and reduce it to a heap

(20) Puellas quoque facile amavit bellas ac bonas formas morales, ac Claudiam quidem primum suam multo carmine celebratam, mihi vero non incognitam, subsistentem, non inforem nec inamabilem puellam: deinde Callirhoen, alteram Cæciberam tunicatam, formosam: hinc pectoris coludem, regiosolam nimis Italiam Panaridem: ac postremam non vero nomine dictam Phylidam pulchram Nicrogenam. . . . He was inclined to love pretty women; first of all his Claudia, whom he celebrates so much in his verses, one not unknown to me, and who, though she was brave, was for all that no unlikely, nor unlovely woman: afterwards Callirhoe, another dragonian beauty: then an Italian shepherdess, a little too religious: and lastly, under the name of Phyllis, the lovely Nicrogena. yet are rather conjectures, than an explication which fully satisfies me. It was thought strange of afhes. He does not name this town, nor know whether it was upon the Rhine, or the Danube, or the Elbe, but he believes it was upon the Elbe. However, he must have characterised Magdeburg, since this elegy is intitled, De obsidione urbis Magdeburgensis. There is doubtless something surprising in this, though it must be owned, that the condition the Poet was then in, diminishes the wonder. He was in the army of the league of Smalcald (24), probably rather expecting the good successes of Charles V, than those of that league. His imagination extended itself to all the possible consequences of Charles the fifth's victory (25). Perhaps this supposition might have intermixed with his dream, that the emperor would severely chastise Magdeburg, if the confederate army was beaten. The Poet immediately prepared to deplore the miseries of a stormed town; and one of his fictions was, that the tutelar goddess makes her complaints, &c (26). When we awake, we easily confound the images, because we forget their order: those escape us which were the bond of connexion; and hence we imagine, that the ideas, which we ourselves have linked to one another, came all at once by inspiration. It is almost as easy to form systems about general affairs sleeping as waking; abundance of people having read great news in a Gazette, draw an admirable plan of the consequences it will produce. In a quarter of an hour, they conduct the victors to the capital city of the vanquished; they fancy to themselves thrones overturned, and all Europe changing its face at once; and if they are Poets or Orators, they add to all this the sketches of a fine poem, or of an eloquent oration; they have the figures ready in their heads, and represent to themselves the very mien and words of the deputies, who come to deliver up the keys of the towns. We may be certain, that at every hour of the day, such things as these are rolling in some peoples brains: the soul, when they sleep, is no less exercised with respect to these chimeras; it draws imaginary schemes. Such was perhaps the case of Lotichius that night. I have given the reason why, when he awakened, he could not perceive that he was the author of this train of visions, as they who build castles in the air whilst awake, know and perceive themselves to be the true authors of them, without the assistance of any foreign intelligence striking in with them to reveal futurities; which is also the reason why they draw no prefaces from them.

This is an observation that might be made upon admitting Mr Morhof's supposition, namely, that Lotichius had this dream before the battle of Mulberg, in which the confederate army was beaten by Charles V. But this supposition having no foundation, I shall chuse rather to say, that Lotichius dreamed thus, during the siege of Magdeburg, in the year 1550, or 1551. It was easy to imagine that Maurice, elector of Saxony, who commanded the siege for the emperor, would take the town, and treat it cruelly. Lotichius possessed with this fear, imagined the sacking of the town in a dream, and fell into poetic fictions. He failed not to introduce the tutelar goddess, who made protestations of her innocence and fidelity, tho' the emperor expelled her from her habitation, &c. The next day he found this subject so fit to be handled in verse, that he made an elegy upon it, which he himself intitled, De obsidione urbis Magdeburgensis. I believe indeed, he imagined there was something prophetic in this dream, which proceeded from his not remembering the beginning of it, and not knowing that he had tacked all these visions himself, as the newmongers do theirs, in starting all the consequences they are pleased to suppose to sieges and battles (27). Now as the siege of Magdeburg, was terminated, not by taking of the town, but by a treaty of peace, Lotichius doubtless undeceived himself; he discovered the falsity of his dreams, but his verses were preserved and published after his death. But who knows whether he did not feign that he dreamed this? Do not poets daily give themselves this liberty? after having well considered this, I think it more probable, that he did not dream what he related; but, like other poets, feigned he dreamed thus.

Since the first edition of this work, I have been informed by a letter from Mr Kortholt (28), of some particulars, which oblige me to consider this matter over again. In the first place, it is certain, that the elegy De obsidione urbis Magdeburgensis, is not found in the collection of poems, which Lotichius caused to be printed at Paris by Valcofan, the epistle dedicatory whereof, is dated from Paris the thirteenth of February 1551. If he dated it according to the stile at that time received in France, it was in February 1552. He knew then, that the town of Magdeburg was no longer in fear; being delivered from the siege by a treaty of peace in November 1551 (29). If he dated it beginning the year with January, the siege of Magdeburg still continued, and was far from being ended. Whatever stile he made use of, it is plain, he ought not to have published the poem in dispute at that time; the elegy, I say, in which he is supposed to speak of the sacking and burning of Magdeburg; and though we should be certain, that he had already composed it, we should yet believe he would have been very cautious of inserting it in the edition of his Latin poems. In the second place, Mr Kortholt, who understands poetry very well, and who has collated the several editions of Lotichius's poems, finds a great difference betwixt that of Paris 1551, and those that followed the death of the author. He finds Lotichius but a mean Poet in the Paris edition of his poems (30), compared to what they are after they had been corrected, and in comparison of the new poems added to Camerarius's edition. In a word, he finds, that Lotichius in 1551, was not capable of composing so excellent an elegy as that de Obsidione Urbis Magdeburgensis. We must conclude then, that it was made when this town was out of danger, and therefore the dream that threatened it with an entire destruction, cannot be explained by the hypothesis I have alledged. It is a matter which has relation to the time to come, and consequently to the sacking of Magdeburg in 1631, as Mr Morhof pretends. To this I have two replies to make.

I. First I say, that whether Lotichius writ this elegy whilst he bore arms, or composed it during the siege of Magdeburg, and that either in consequence of a dream, or under the fiction of a pretended dream, he ought not to have inserted it amongst the pieces which he published at Paris in 1551. I have given the reasons for this already. But he was not obliged to burn it; he therefore probably preserved it, and having afterwards given it some new touches, and polished it over and over, he worked it to that perfection which he was not able to give it when his poems were first printed. Age, study, and labour, had improved his muse; he changed into an excellent elegy, what at first was but an indifferent poem. It was found among his papers after his death as he had perfected it by his corrections, and it was sent to his friend Camerarius to be printed with his other writings (31). These are very probable conjectures, and therefore those I proposed in my first edition, lose nothing of their due weight. Poets, naturally fond of their own works, would not willingly destroy what they have once writ; but carefully preserve it, even when the occasion is passed; especially when they persuade themselves, that they have treated a subject well, and that it was very capable of ornaments. Mr Menage having heard that Mr Corneille was dead, composed an epitaph for him, which he thought a good one, and would not lose the public honour of it, even after he knew that Mr Corneille was not dead. He preserved this piece so carefully, as to insert it in the editions of his poems, and even after his enemy Cotin had severely rallied him for it. Here follows his raillery, which I believe contains a false supposition; for I am persuaded, the news of Mr Corneille's death was actually spread abroad. It is above ten years ago, says Cotin (32), since Menage made Corneille's epitaph, though Corneille be not yet dead, having collected out of the Greek and Latin poets, abundance of thoughts upon the death of a great Poet, he killed his good friend to exhaust his common place, he made him die of a Peripneumony. Let it be observed, that the subject of Lotichius's elegy was very proper to inspire the author with compassion; it is favourable to the poetic art, and therefore the preservation of Magdeburg was not likely to make him suppress that piece of poetry.

II. But let us grant, that Lotichius had written nothing like this, when this great town was out of trouble, and the peace of Passau had secured the Protestants strange, that Julius Cæsar Scaliger should no where praise Lotichius [H]. We should have more reason to wonder at it, had not Lotichius's reputation been chiefly founded upon the works that were not printed till after Scaliger's death; but this critic's silence is not surprizing, since the first editions of Lotichius's poems (f) are much inferior to that which it was impossible for him to have any knowledge of (g).

testants of Germany; yet must we however in the second place say, that the dream of the author has nothing extraordinary in it. We must remember one thing, which cannot well be called into question, which is, that Poets frequently work upon subjects of pure invention; they describe shipwrecks which they have not seen, and which never were; they feign, as they think fit, times, places, consequences, and incidents. They do the same with respect to the taking of towns. These are subjects, which can exercise their talents to advantage; they make choice of them, not only when they are awake, but also when they sleep. If their nocturnal visions lead them to a besieged town, they fancy a general assault, the besieged forced to give ground; the town carried, plundered, burnt &c. If it be a town, which they are greatly concerned for, their poetical fancy is heated; they deplore the misfortune, they form the draught of a poem; and when wearied with the dream, they awake, and know not whether it be a natural, or an extraordinary one; however they take pen in hand, and give a poetical description of the vision. It sometimes happens, that they have such sort of visions, only because the day before, they had meditated upon the description of the sacking of a town. Experience informs us, that those objects which possess our thoughts in the day time, commonly present themselves to our minds the night following, and there are those who sooner light on a fine turn of poetic thought, whilst they sleep, than when they are awake. Their dreams are vehement, and move and agitate the spirits with a prodigious force. They find themselves, as they awake, in a commotion which astonishes them, they perceive something wonderful in it, which they think deserves cultivating, and immediately fall to versifying. If you examine all these things well, you will find a foundation for conjectures upon the natural causes of Lotichius's elegy. Apply to this what Lucretius says,

Et quo quisque fere studio devinctus adhæret,
Aut quibus in rebus multum sumus ante morati
Atque in qua ratione fuit contenta magis mens,
In fomnis eadem plerumque videmur obire:
Causidici causas agere, &c. (33).

(33) Lucretius, lib. iv, ver. 959.

Whatever most employs our waking thought,
Back to the mind in midnight dreams is brought.
Then Lawyers plead

Let us go on with our conjectures. There are few who have not observed, that they have often dreamed of the same thing; as that they were attacked by robbers, that lightning fell into their chamber, that a mutiny happened in a town, &c. The return of the same dreams is more common, when the objects make a lively impression, and when the constitution of the brain gives way to their making well-pressed and deep-printed tracks. It is probable, that during the siege of Magdeburg, Lotichius had a dream that represented the sacking this town, and, pursuant to it, fell to making verses the next day, or a few days after. If the town had been taken and sacked, he had published them doubtless at the same time; but hearing in his travels the news of the peace, he laid by his poem. We may suppose at three or four years end, the same dream returned; the traces it had left the first time, formed a channel, the mouth of which was open'd by the tumultuous and irregular agitation of the animal spirits; but this irregularity hindered not their running along the same tracks; and thus the view of the sacking of Magdeburg was renewed. Lotichius thinking it perhaps mysterious, new-polished his verses, amplified them, and put them in the condition in which the public has seen them. I do not know but he might have been afraid, from his love for Magdeburg, that this new dream was prophetic and supernatural; but, in my opinion, he ought not to have thought it more so now than at the first time, where, according to the usual course of dreams, he might fancy the burning of a town which was actually besieged. Should a Poet, out of a witty conceit, make an elegy at this time, resembling that of Lotichius, it might well enough happen before eighty years come about, that the town he sung of to divert himself, may be bombarded and ruined.

[H] It was thought strange that Julius Cæsar Scaliger has not praised Lotichius. You will find at the end of the text to this article, the reasons why we are not to wonder at Scaliger's silence. However, let us hear Mr Morhof's complaint. 'Fuit Phoenix Poetarum Germaniæ Lotichius, omnibus exterris si non superior, certe æqualis. Hujus tamen vel ipsi Germanis pene ignotum nomen est: exteri nullam ejus mentionem faciunt.' J. C. Scaliger cum censuram Poëtarum Germanorum instituit in Hypercritico suo ne verbum quidem de hoc nostro, qui tamen omnibus cæteris erat antefereendus (34). Lotichius was the Phoenix of the German Poets, whom all, be it at the least equal to any. Yet the Germans themselves scarce know any thing of him; strangers have never mentioned him. Julius Cæsar Scaliger, in the censure of the German Poets, contained in his Hypercritic, says not one word of our author, notwithstanding that he ought to have been preferred to them all.'

LOTICHIIUS (CHRISTIAN) younger brother to the preceding, discovered in his infancy no less dispositions to study, than he. Therefore his uncle, the abbot, having first caused him to be diligently instructed in his school of Solitar, sent him afterwards to Wittemberg, to study Philosophy there, and especially Divinity. It was not in this university, but in that of Heidelberg that he took his master of arts degree in 1549, after which his uncle gave him the charge of his church and college. Whilst he was thus Vicar to the abbey, he was desired by several learned men, to collect all the poems of Lotichius Secundus, and publish them, with an exact history of the life and studies of this illustrious brother. He was working upon it, when the death of the abbot Lotichius, his uncle, interrupted that work in 1567. It was in his power to succeed him in his abbey; for they who had the right to elect, declared for him; but he rather chose to resign his pretensions to his brother-in-law Sigefridus Hertenus, minister of the church of Groningen. He could not have long enjoyed the dignity of abbot, if he had accepted it, for he died in 1568. He made verses with pretty good success. A collection of his poems was printed in 1602 (a), by the care of John Peter Lotichius, his grandson, who joined them with his own. I have not found in Freherus, who furnishes me with this article, that the poems of Lotichius Secundus, and our Christian Lotichius were ever printed together (b).

LOTICHIUS (JOHN PETER), grandson to the former, made himself known by a great number of books which he published both in verse and prose. He was a Physician by profession, and well versed in Human Literature. The commentary upon Petronius, which he published at Frankfort in 1629, answers these two qualities [A]. The reward he received for the dedication of his epigrams, was very slender [B]. He was invited to Rintell, to be professor of Physic (a).

(a) See the epistle dedicatory of his Petronius.

[A] The commentary which he published on Petronius answers these two qualities. For he there explains by itself, whatever is in Petronius, relating to Physic; and afterwards, in another part, gives critical and philosophical notes upon the same author. He appears to have more reading, and memory, than penetration and judgment. See what an opinion Goldast had of this commentary: 'Mitto tibi Lotichii commentaria in Petronium cum aliorum notis. . . vides quantum abs tuo instituto ac iudicio Lotichius dissideat. Volebam hominem amicum hac occasione ad lectionem veterum Medicorum deducere, quorum illum propterea expertem & negligentem esse advertibam. Sed iudicio destitutus nec in bonis auctoribus versatus, nobis undique compilavit quæ ad grandendum librum convasare ex Cornucopia, Calpino, Textoris officina, Erasmi Chiliadibus & compingit scriptis poterat, ut tandem monstrosum, horrendum, & insanum magnum istud commentum pareret. Adeo sibi philautia placet, ut etiam sordes suas putet mera olere cinnama (1). — I send you Lotichius's commentary on Petronius, with the notes of others. . . You see how far Lotichius falls below you in knowledge, and judgment; I would have advised this man, as a friend, to take this occasion to make himself acquainted with the ancient Physicians, because to me he appears to have been very negligent in that respect; but wanting judgment, and being not at all versed in good authors, he rated together whatever might fill his book, from the Cornucopia, Calpene, Textoris Officina, the Chiliads of Erasmus, and such like authors, by which means his commentary is rendered of a monstrous and frightful size. In fine, he is so full of himself that he thinks nothing nauseous can come from him.' This judgment is very severe, but I think it more reasonable than that of Guy Patin, and I admire that a man, who was incomparably more inclined to despise authors than esteem them, should speak so much to the advantage of this commentary on Petronius. Lotichius, formerly a Physician, and at present a Historiographer, has wrote two volumes in folio, Rerum Germanicarum, and perhaps the third is also printed; if you have them, send them to me. Let me know likewise if he has reprinted his Petronius, in folio, much enlarged, as he designed long ago. This last is an excellent book, and the author a very learned man. He had designed to have reprinted it here, with all his additions, in folio; but I answered him it was impossible, there being too many Monks, Jesuits, and others, enemies to good letters in this place, who would think that they had merited heaven if they had hindered such an impression (2).

[B] The reward he received for the dedication of his epigrams was very slender. He not only dedicated them to Maurice, landgrave of Hesse, but also gave him a copy of them with his own hand. The prince thanked him by an epigram (3), and that was all the present he made him. This was imitating a great emperor (4). He who furnishes me with this particular, says also, that he dedicated a great number of books to princes and republics, without ever getting a penny for them.

LOUDUN, in the upper Poitou [A], in the confines of Anjou and Touraine, and the diocese of Poitiers, is a very antient town, though we must not give too much credit to the opinion of the common people, who ascribe the founding of it to Julius Cæsar (a). It became considerable in the civil wars of the XVIth century [B], as well on account of its castle, which Lewis XIII demolished in 1633 (b), as for its situation. The duke of Anjou in vain attempted to make himself master of it in 1569 (c), but the king of Navarre reduced it twenty years after with the greatest ease (d). There are several convents in it: that of the Carmelites is the rendezvous of several devout persons, who go thither on pilgrimages to our Lady of Reconvrance (e). That of the Ursulines became extremely famous, when, in 1633 and 1634, there was so much talk of the possession of several of these Nuns [C]. The Protestants about this time lost the college

[A] In the upper Poitou. Coulon, in the index of his book of the rivers of France, places Loudun in Touraine. Mr de Marolles is in the same error, when he says (1) that Loudun is part of Touraine, tho' the Loudunois be in the diocese of Poitiers. He ought to have said, that Loudun was also in this diocese. The truth of the matter is, that the election of Loudun depends on the generality of Tours.

[B] It became considerable in the civil wars of the XVIth century. Here is a little story that does honour to this town: d'Aubigné relates (2), that in 1569, Pluvaut, at the head of a company of sixty lances, being in sight of Anville, where the duke of Anjou was quartered, 'saw eighty horsemen come forth, who were the bravest of the court, as the Guises, Brissac, Pompadour, Fervagues, Lanfacc, Jersai, Fontaine, and others. He resolutely stood them, the fight was obstinate, and twice renewed; but not one of Pluvaut's men quitted his post. D'Andelot appearing with twelve troops of horse, obliged the courtiers to retire, leaving two of their men dead upon the spot, and carrying off several wounded. They had a mind to know who they were that they had fought with. La Curée-Jersaut, who with Clermond, la Barbée, and other bold adventurers, gloried in following this captain on extraordinary occasions; instead of naming these gentlemen, answered, 'it was the company of Pluvaut; and Lanfacc replying, What the Sieurs of Loudun? most of them being of this place, and of quality. The duke of

Guise cried out, Let us change this discourse, they are all true gentlemen.'

[C] The possession of several Nuns of Loudun. I have spoke amply of them in another place (3); but I did not then know a thing which I have read a few days ago, and which I shall mention, after having occasionally taken notice of a fault of Father Labbe. He says (4), that in 1566, 'the possessed Nuns of Loudun, so famous, was dispossessed by the holy Eucharist, in presence of above ten thousand men, and among others, of Florimond de Remond, who soon after, of a Huguenot became a Catholic.' Instead of Loudun, he should have said Laon, which is an episcopal town in Picardy: it was there that Florimond de Remond saw this famous possessed person, as he relates in two places of his works (5). Spondanus (6) relates this fact, and uses the word Laudunum, which probably led Father Labbe to believe, that this adventure happened at Loudun. Mr Moreri has committed the same fault in the article of FLORIMOND DE REMOND.

It is affirmed in Mr d'Artagnan's Memoirs, that Grandier was one of cardinal Richelieu's unhappy Victims. Some body had persuaded him that Grandier was a Sorcerer, and had possessed the Nuns of Loudun with a legion of devils. Upon this accusation the Sieur de Laubardemont, at the head of his delegates, against the opinion of a great many of his judges, had him condemned to be burnt alive. He frankly told them, to oblige them to subscribe to so unjust college which they had there [D]. The last national synod was held in this Town, from the tenth of November, 1659, to the tenth of January, 1660. Loudun has been the birth-place of several learned men, as Salomon Macrinus, Scevola Sammarthanus, Julius Cæsar Bulengerus, Ismael Bulialdus, Urbanus Chevreau, &c. Some call it Juliodunum in Latin; but that is not its true name [E]. The Geographer du Val (f) was in the wrong, to say, That it has the title of a duchy; if he had consulted Moreri, he would not have expressed himself in the present tense. That lady of the family of Rohan, in whose favour Moreri says, the duchy was erected, is the lady de la Garnache, of whom I have spoken in her place.

• unjust a sentence, that if they opposed it so vigorously as men of honour ought to do, they should have commissaries appointed to try them, who would soon convict them of being accomplices in his witchcrafts, since he was no more a Sorcerer than they might be. He was much more in the right in talking to them after this manner, than in resolving to put an innocent man to death. All poor Grandier's crime was his debauching these Nuns; and if he had possessed their bodies with any devil, it could be no other than that of impunity (7). Now as these judges had been to see these Nuns as well as he, and might as easily have lain with them, for they were very far from being vestals, they hesitated for some time what they had best do; but being at last prevailed upon, they chose to shew themselves unjust in condemning an innocent person, rather than put themselves in his place by endeavouring to save him; for after all, they might have been accused of Sorcery as well as he, and no one knows what might have happened, his eminence being absolute as he was (8).

I am far from warranting the truth of this, nor can I persuade myself that Laubardemont spoke thus to the judges. He was a wicked man, you will tell me; transeat, be it so; but that had not sufficed cardinal Richelieu, he must have had sense and address besides; but what can be more improbable than to say, that a president of a commission is ingenious in wickedness, and yet speaks as this man is made to speak in d'Artagnan's Memoirs. This, in my opinion, is foisted in, either by him who has put these Memoirs in order, or rather by the corrector of the press (9). Be it how it will, Mr d'Artagnan would give no great credit to the story; for at the time of this possession at Loudun, the figure he made, and the places he frequented, could only afford him the most uncertain and popular reports in this matter. But let us not lose time in apologizing for so brave a man as he was. He does not want it: the Memoirs that have been published under his name are supposititious from the beginning to the end; they come from the same author who published the Memoirs of Mr L. C. D. R. of which I shall speak in another place (10).

I have in another place (11) said a thing that seemed incredible to some people, which is, that the priest Grandier might have appeared in the chamber of a Nun, as a spectre resembling the deceased confessor of the Ursulines, I must now add a word or two, to make my opinion more credible. Nothing can be more proper for my purpose, than the abjuration made at Rome within these two years (12), by a bare-footed Augulline Friar, who had been guilty of Molinism. He was convicted of having deceived Father Benignus by counterfeit revelations: he endeavoured to persuade him, that the things he had told him on several occasions, were true and holy, and that he was a saint greater than any in heaven. For this he referred himself to the testimony of St Gaetan, and shewed himself to Father Benignus, in the figure of this saint. He also contrived false apparitions of the Holy Virgin, and made use of artificial illuminations, and many changes in the tone of his voice. Let us set down the words of his abjuration: 'Confessasti che le Visioni succedenti erano opere tue, e parimente le Revelazioni del Padre Benigno, mentre tu gli apparisti con l'habito di S. Gaetano, con un bellissimo e candidissimo giglio in mano, e barba posticcia. Il tutto facesti e operasti per far gli credere che le cose dette da te in piu e diversi occasioni erano veridiche e sante, e che tu eri un santo maggior di tutti i santi che stanno in cielo. Facesti apparire la Beatissima Vergine a forza di lume contraffacendo la voce hora in un modo, e hora nell'altro, e per questi tuoi e altri milleri il sudetto Padre Benigno credeva fermamente a queste tue visioni, e visitationi celesti, e che dio non le concedeva se non a te puramente.' Dr Silvestre (13)

returning from Rome, communicated to me a manuscript copy of the act of the Inquisition, in which are these words; it is intitled, Ristretto de l'Abjura semipublica seguita nel sant' Officio in persona di Fra Pietro Paolo di S. Gio: Evangelista Romano al Sacello di Casa Granisi, in eta d'anni quaranta, ingiustificata altre volte nella Cita di Napoli, e in quella di Spoleti. I pass over the infamies this Monk was convicted of as a Quietist, and the abominable impurities he confessed he had committed with his female votaries. They make one's hair stand an end, and shew at the same time, that since the Inquisition was satisfied with condemning a bare-footed Augulline Friar, only to perpetual imprisonment, it ought to be acknowledged, on some occasions, a tribunal of extraordinary clemency and gentleness. But leaving these reflexions, I content myself to say, that by facts undoubted and judicially attested, we know that the secret of representing the dead, and counterfeiting apparitions of the Holy Virgin, is a thing known and practised in the monasteries. Why then should we deny that the curate of Loudun appeared to a Nun, as her deceased confessor? I could never persuade myself, that all the stories of the apparitions of the Holy Virgin, with which abundance of books are stuffed, are either fictions or meer illusions; there is a great deal of reality in these stories. The impostors personally enter the chambers, and actually pronounce words in what name and figure they please: vapours and fits of the mother, do not make the Nuns see and hear this or that. Their senses are really affected by the objects; all the deception consists in their attributing to the divine favour, what only depends on human artifice. The engastrimythes, those who speak from their bellies, and who so well manage the air in their lungs, that their voice seems to proceed from a cave or a garret, are very fit for these little mysteries; they are very servicable people; and by their means many are made to believe, that the dead suffer much in purgatory, and come to desire their heirs to cause masses to be said for them. Observe the exceptions which I mention in the marginal note (14).

[D] The presidents lost the college which they had there.] The Historian of the Edict of Nantes relates (15), That the Reformed of Loudun had lost their college in the year 1635, and that Laubardemont had lodged the pretended possessed Nuns there. After that they were never able to get their possessions restored, nor to recover the money it had cost them. But the court being at Loudun, in 1650, they applied themselves to the president Molé, who was then keeper of the seals. The result was, that at the desire of the queen, they were contented with a sum much below the price of their college, which was offered them in the name of the Ursulines. This sum pretty nearly equalled the fourth part of the value of the buildings, and was not one half of the interest. See in the same author (16), the treachery made use of to endeavour to deprive them of the exercise of their religion.

[E] Some call it in Latin Juliodunum (§ a), but that is not its true name.] Mr Valois the younger, says (17) that Macrinus and Scevola Sammarthanus, were the first, or two of the first, who by a poetical licence called Loudun Juliodunum, to make their country participate in the glory of Julius Cæsar. According to him, its name is Castrum Laudunum, that of Loudunum is later. Some have also given it the name of Laudidunum, Laudunum, and Lodunum. William le Breton has given it this last name, in the eighth book of his Philippis.

(§ a) Fauchet, book iv, chap. xiv, of his Antiquities, thinks that Loudun might be a certain place of Touraine, which was, says he, antiently called Castrum Julicense. And he also observes, that this place was called

(14) That is, they are not always the cause; for on the whole I do not deny but they may be so sometimes, and that the bare impression which the little relation or reading of stories of apparitions, or an artificial apparition makes, may produce the persuasion of other apparitions, in which there is no artifice at all.

LOUET (GEORGE) a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, made a collection of arrêts, which was printed at Paris after his death. Sieur de Rochemaillet took care of that edition in the year 1609 in 4to, and dedicated it to Anthony Seguier, who had given the manuscript, and who was president of the parliament of Paris.

LOYER (PETER LE) counsellor in the prefidial court at Angers, was born in the village of Huillé, in Anjou, the twenty-fourth of November 1540 (a). He was one of the most learned men of his age [A], and at the same time one of the greatest visionaries that ever lived. He perfectly understood the Oriental tongues, but was so infatuated with Hebrew etymologies, that he made himself ridiculous [B]. He also pretended to find, in Homer, whatever he had a mind to [C]. He found in him the village of his birth, and his own name; and, for fear he should be taxed with boasting of an extraordinary knowledge, he declared it was the grace of God, that wrought in his mind all these wonderful effects. We see, in his book of Spectres, a prodigious reading; but, as learned as he was, and that with so great a mixture of madness, he was entirely unknown to Vossius and Colomiés [D]. The latter has not inferred him in [A] He was one of the most learned men of his age. This is what Mr Menage says of him. 'Erat quidem Loerius Græcæ, & Latine, Hebraicæ, Arabicæ, & Chaldaicæ doctissimus, sed Juris in quo versabatur, planè ignarus (1). — Loyer was indeed most learned in the Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Arabic, and Chaldaic tongues; but in Law, which was his profession, quite ignorant.' There are abundance of people of this character: they are ignorant of nothing, but of what they ought to know best. A counsellor, as he was, ought to have understood the Law, and had nothing to do with Hebrew or Arabic; and yet he was ignorant in the Law, and deeply learned in the Oriental tongues. Let us go on with the praises Mr Menage has given him (2). 'Excepting these visions, Peter le Loyer was a great man. He was one of the best read men in the world, as his works declare, his Colonies, his Spectres, his Paraphrase on the Magnificat. He likewise had a taste for the Belles Lettres. He wrote Greek, Latin, and French verses: when he studied the Law at Toulouse, he carried the Eglantine garland in the Floral games (3). He made a comedy in French verse, called La Néphelocorgie, upon which Ronfard made this stanza.

LOYER, ta docte Muse n'erre
De bâtir une Ville en l'air,
Où les Cocus puissent voler:
Pour eux trop petite est la terre.

You build a town for cuckolds in the air,
'Cause earth's too little to contain 'em here.

[B] He was so infatuated with Hebrew etymologies, that he made himself ridiculous. In his books of the 'Idumean Colonies (4). . . he derives from the Hebrew or Chaldaic tongues, not only the names of the cities of France, but even those of the villages of Anjou; of the hamlets, houses, barns, fields, and meadows. I shall therefore say, these are his words, at pag. 217, that the village of Huillé (his birth-place) is derived from Ahale, or Ohole of Ezekiel, which is Ada, or Gada, the wife of Esau, and mother of Eliphaz. Near Huillé, about half a mile on the river Loire, there is, on a hill, a little hamlet, called Basse-tas, which I derive from Bassemath, and Bassemtis, another wife of Esau, and mother of Reuel, grand-mother to Jerab, and great-grand-mother to Job (5). Mr Menage, having given three or four other instances of the same stamp, adds, 'all the book is filled with such observations; which makes me boldly say, that we are not much the worse for the loss of ten or twelve volumes of other books of Colonies of the same author (6). I do not know but Mr Bochart wished that the loss had been more general.

[C] He pretended to find, in Homer, whatever he had a mind to. (7) This Peter le Loyer found every thing in Homer. He found in one single verse his own Christian name, the name of his family, the name of the village where he was born, the name of the province in which this village lay, and the name of the kingdom which contained this province. In a thing so incredible as this I speak of, I am obliged to give here his own words in his Idumean Colonies. 'After this great prophecy, which is wholly owing to me, Homer comes to speak this verse', addressing himself to Ulysses:

Σὸν δ' ἔπω τις ἔχει καλὸν γίγασσι ἄλλὰ ἐκπαλῶ.

'And no body, says Anticlea's shade to her son Ulysses, has yet thy (Loyer) reward, in all respects happily reposed; and what follows, which bears another meaning. In all this long verse you will exactly find,

Πιέρω Λωίειο, Ἀνδάντας, Γάλλω, Τλαιν.

'That is to say, Peter Loyer, Angevin, Gaullois, d'Huillé. There is neither more nor less in it; let who will make the trial. This I offer to defend to all that read me; and why should not I defend what is notoriously my own in Homer? there is no satisfaction in a thing, which is not one's own, or doubted to be one's own. Now Homer attributes this verse to me, and by so doing he makes it mine, and not another's. And whatever way we turn this verse in Homer, it will still be mine; and I can claim it for my own. There are three letters, which remain in this whole verse, which perhaps may be said to be superfluous, but they are not so. These are the numeral Greek letters, α, γ, ζ, which denote the time when the name should be revealed, which is contained in this verse of Homer, to wit, the year of Christ 1620. And what is there less superfluous? Now this is sufficient, as to what concerns my self; which I do not relate for the glory I hope from it; but rather because I cannot and ought not to be silent as to what has been revealed to Homer concerning me. This will serve moreover to strengthen my work concerning the originals, migrations, and colonies of people, which had been reserved for me. Homer (8) complains in vain concealed the origin of many nations, under the cover of fables; since there was to be one, in future ages, who should discover what he had attempted to conceal. I do not boast, for all this, to know more than other men. But who will withstand the grace of God, co-operating in me? This is what Homer discovered, even to the naming the little village where I should receive my birth, that I might not glory in my weakness and meanness, but rather in God, who makes me what I am, and renders me so potent and vigorous, in that he comforts me. (8) Nothing could be left out of this long passage, where every thing shews so learned and singular a madness.

[D] He was unknown to Vossius. I have read, in one of his letters (9) a conjecture, which fully discovers his ignorance in this point. He believes that Loerius de Spectris had been said, instead of Lovaterus.

in his Gallia Orientalis. Peter le Loyer died at Angers, 1634, in the eighty fourth year of his age (§ a).

Gabriel Naudé, doing him justice, as to his reading and knowledge, openly laughs at his notion about Orpheus, the greatest Sorcerer that ever lived, said he, and the greatest Necromancer, whose writings were only stuffed with the praises of devils, as particularly of Jupiter Alastor, the revenging and exterminating devil. See also the Chevræana, page 30. of the second part.

I had forgot to say, that the verses, which he made in his youth, did not preface that he would be one day what he became. They did not threaten him with the fate of Postel and Cahier, learned men and fools (b). They were sprightly, genteel, ingenious, and pleasant [E], and by this one would have conjectured, that, if he applied himself diligently to learning, he would have acquired a literature polite and seasoned with agreeableness, and not a morose pedantic knowledge. That kind of genius, which immediately inclines to sport and toy with the Muses, is generally a preservative against the ill effects of too strong an application to study. It spreads a politeness over the learning a man acquires, be it ever so profound, and prevents a great and extensive reading from stifling and oppressing with it's weight natural vivacity and reason. Our Loyer was an exception to this general rule. He spoiled by his studies the good fund of wit nature had given him, if Greek shook his brain, Hebrew compleated it's overthrow.

[(§ a) He was born then in 1550, and not in 1540, as Mr Bayle says. REM. CRIT.]

[E] The verses he composed in his youth . . . were sprightly . . . ingenious, and pleasant. The pieces, which we find in a book intitled (10) The Works and Poetical Miscellanies of Peter le Loyer of Anjou. Together with the comedy Nephelococcy, or CLOUD OF CUCKOLDS, no less learned than facetious, are these: the Loves of Flora: some Odes: some Idylls: first and second grove of the Art of Love: Sonnets political or miscellaneous: the Dumb mad, a comedy: the comedy Nephelococcy: the Sports and Pastimes of youth. There are some Greek and Latin poems in this collection, but not many. The Elégia Virginis vetulae, fol. 250, is very diverting. The author dedicated his book to Mr de la Valette the younger (11), gentleman in ordinary of the king's bed-chamber: the Epistle Dedicatory is dated from Paris the ninth of September, 1578, and informs us, that it was the first time the author published his poems. Ayant piece dans l'obole à la poursuite de mes études . . . in the printed copy, to a essé de ce monde (12) inclusive; and again to (13) Et puis que celui exclusive.

. . . Ainsi quelque temps, j'allay supprimant & cachant . . . in the printed copy, to Le sujet lequel y est exclusive. I know not how to reconcile this either with La Croix du Maine (14), or with Du Verdier Vau-Privas, the one of whom affirms, that Peter le Loyer published, at Paris, in 1576, a work of his in French verse, intitled, Erotopægia, or Love's Past-time. The other, after having particularized the pieces contained in the collection above-mentioned, adds these words; he had before sent into the world part of the said compositions under the title of Erotopægia (15), or Love's Past-time, in 8vo, printed by Abel l'Angelier 1576 (16). If these two authors are not mistaken, Peter le Loyer was very bold, or rather very impudent, since he dared to say, that he deferred the publication of his poems till 1578. Could he well imagine, that Mr de la Valette, a lover of Poetry, knew nothing of the edition of 1576? Du Verdier Vau-Privas has inserted in his work (17) three sonnets of Peter le Loyer, four epigrams, several tetrasichs of the grove of the Art of Love, and several fragments of the Cloud of Cuckolds. These fragments are portraits, in which the character of several sorts of persons is satirically represented. I am surprized he did not make choice of the epigram in the 121st leaf. The reader will excuse me, if I recite it, since it is an imitation, or translation, of the Latin verses which I have cited in the article LYCURGUS (18).

He gave sufficient proofs of his courage at the siege of Pampelona (a), and

(b) Epistle Dedicatory of the Catholic Confession of Sancy.

There are some coarse expressions in the passage, which Du Verdier has taken from the Nephelococcy; but as insupportable as they appear at present, they are honey in comparison of several other passages of the same comedy, which are frightfully obscene. Le Loyer justifies himself the best he can in his preface. He says, that his friends have assured him, that the learned and benevolent reader will easily excuse a little polite smut mixed with learned and serious matters. . . . in the printed copy, to Cemique (20) inclusive.

He confesses, that Plutarch . . . (in the book of the comparison of Menander and Aristophanes) has compared the comedies of the latter to the wanton loves of a shameless barlot; but he appeals from this sentence, and, after having spoken of the merit of Aristophanes, he goes on thus (21): If any Cato's will censure my book. . . . in the printed copy, to Continuant ainsi, exclusive. To idcirco venissi, citation (22), and in the margin.

These excuses do not justify his having followed to excess the custom of his time. His comedy, which is full of invention, and seasoned with a good deal of sprightliness and wit (23), would without doubt be better, if there was less obscenity in it, and if all the descriptions or portraits resembled the following, in which there is nothing offensive to chaste ears:

Note, that all the poems of du Loyer are very obscene. He had a sister who wrote four very sensible verses, which the prefixed to his poetical works:

Vous estes malheureux vray'ment,
Mais si elles sont pures bayes,
Que sert feindre tant de tourment ?*

During the cure of this wound, he formed the resolution of renouncing the vanities of the world, of going to Jerusalem, and afterwards leading a very particular sort of life. As soon as he was cured, he took his way towards our Lady of Montserrat (b); and being arrived there, he hung up his arms over the altar of the holy Virgin, and consecrated himself to her service, the night of the twenty-fourth of March, 1522. He imitated as much as he could the rules of ancient chivalry (c) [A]; in lifting himself under the standards of this spiritual warfare. He parted before day, dressed himself like a pilgrim, and bent his course towards Manresa, where he sojourned about a year amongst the poor of the hospital, and in the practice of all kinds of mortification. There it was that he writ his book of spiritual exercises [B]. Having embarked at Barcelona, for his voyage to Jerusalem, he arrived at Cajeta in five days, and, being unwilling to continue his enterprize, without receiving

[A] He imitated, as near as possible, the laws of ancient chivalry. One of the learnedest men of this age has jested upon this, in a manner worth the relating. The first thing to be observed in him (1), says he (2), is, that he was converted by reading the legends of the saints, as Don Quixot was to knight-errantry, by the reading of old romances. . . . His countryman was never more touched with the adventures of the first knights, than Ignatius with the histories of St Dominic and St Francis *. For these were they, which affected him most; and before he would take a fixed resolution of running through the world, as a religious knight-errant, he represented to himself the difficult adventures of these two illustrious heroes, and found he had courage enough to undergo the like. Thus in a fit of zeal †, he leaped one night out of bed, and fell on his knees before the image of the blessed Virgin, and in that posture vowed himself her knight; which is so considerable a circumstance, that I wonder Maffæus has omitted it, together with the strange noise which was heard in the house, the rocking of the chamber, and the clattering of all the glass-windows, which happened at that time; a sure sign, says Orlandinus, that the devil bad him then farewell. After this, the Virgin appeared to him, with great glory, holding her son in her bosom, which so encouraged him in his first design, that, a little after he took his journey to Montserrat, a place of great devotion to the Virgin. In his journey thither, he had like to have begun his first adventure by fighting with a Moor, who confessing, that the blessed Virgin remained a Virgin, till her child-birth, denied, that she continued so afterwards. For St Ignatius, reflecting whole knight he was, grew to be enraged, that he thought himself absolutely obliged to revenge upon the Moor, the affront he had done his mistress; but considering a little what was best to be done, and the Moor taking another road, he left the affair to the judgment of his mule; and throwing the bridle upon her neck, resolved to be the death of the offender, if at the first cross-way she took the road which he had taken. The good mule, knowing full well her master's intention, turned out of the great road, and took that of Montserrat; where, as soon as he was arrived, he performed a remarkable ceremony, which was this. Ignatius, as Orlandinus and Maffæus † expressly say, having read in books of Chivalry, that the ancient knights taking upon them that honourable employ, were wont to watch all night in their arms, thought himself obliged to begin in the same manner: he hung up his sword and bayonet before the altar of the Virgin, put on his accoutrements, and, instead of glittering armour, took a long robe, of very coarse cloth, girding it about him with a thick cord, to which he fastened a water bottle; instead of a lance, he took a plain staff, walking with an oser shoe on one foot, and the other naked, without making use of a head-piece that he might be exposed to the injuries of the weather. Before he entered the town, he fastened all his vestments, which he had procured by the way, to the pommel of his saddle, says Maffæus †, for fear the people should think him in his right senses, and did not put them on, till he came to the place, where, by the laws of Chivalry he was to watch, thus accoutred. Being come to the appointed place, he put them on, and watched, say they, sometimes standing, and sometimes on his knees, thus consecrating himself, with all his might, to the service of the blessed Virgin. This done, he departed early in the morning, which is a necessary circumstance to knight-errants, and came to Monresa, where he lodged in the hospital of the town, letting his hair and nails grow, begging from door to door, fasting always six days a week, disciplining himself thrice a day, being seven hours a day in vocal prayers and sleeping on the bare ground, the better to prepare himself for all adventures in his expedition to Jerusalem.

[B] His book of Spiritual Exercises. He composed it in Spain, in 1522, and published it at Rome in 1548, translated into Latin by Andrew Frassius, and with the approbation of Paul III. They, who wonder how he could read the lives of the saints, during the cure of his broken leg, so far as much as he had scarce learned his A. B. C. (3), may with much more reason wonder, how he could compose the book of exercises, in the time of his ignorance, did they not know, what Lewis du Ponte affirms, that God revealed these exercises, to St Ignatius, and that the holy Virgin helped him to compose them. * Rensert Ludovicus de Ponte, vir omni exceptione major, in vita P. Balthazaris Alvarez, c. 43. fida traditione inde usque à P. Jacobo Lainio, altero Societatis Jesu Præposito Generali, acceptum haberi, Deum hæc exercitia Sancto Patri Nostro revelasse: imo per Gabrielem Archangelum non nemini fuisse à Dispara Virgine significatum, se patronam eorum, fundatricem, atque adiutricem fuisse, docuisse Ignatium, ut ea sic conciperet; quo nomine se hæc operi dedisse initium (4). — Lewis de Ponte, a man of unquestionable credit, relates, in the life of Balthazar Alvarez, ib. 43, that it was banded down to us by faithful tradition by Father James Lainio, the other general of the order of Jesus, that God revealed these exercises to our holy father; and that the archangel Gabriel had signified to a certain person from the Virgin Mother of God, that he had been their patroness, founder, and helper; and that Ignatius had begun to compose them by her assistance. About an age after, an indictment of theft was publicly brought against the founder of the Jesuits on occasion of this work (5): it was maintained, that he was not the author of it. The accuser was a Benedictin. This was an affront to Paul III, and to the congregation of rites; for this Pope expressly affirms the contrary in his approbation of the book; and when the cardinal Francis Mari del Monte reported, before Gregory XV, the proceedings of this congregation, with respect to the canonization of St Ignatius, he declared, that the book of Spiritual Exercises was the work of him whom they were about to canonize. The Benedictins, of the congregation of Monte Cassino condemned, in a general assembly (6), the book, in which St Ignatius was accused of plagiarism venna in the year 1644.

(7). Innocent X, put the matter out of doubt, as Father Southwell pretends: for this Pope inserted, in the Roman breviary, a precise testimony, that Ignatius was author of the exercises. * Nunc extra om- nem Controversiam Catholicis certa esse debet (ea res) postquam in Breviarium Romanum est relata atque in lectionibus toti Ecclesie propositis auctoritate Innocentii X. Pont. Max. in festo S. Ignatii diserte tradita his verbis, quo tempore homo literarum plane rudis, admirabilem illum composuit Exercitiorum librum S. Apostolicæ sedis judicio & omnium utilitate comprobatur (8). — The Catholics caught no longer to doubt of this matter, since it has been inserted in the Roman breviary, and expressly delivered in the lessons, proposed to the whole church, by the authority of Pope Innocent X, on the festival of St Ignatius, in these words: at which time this man, the Pope's benediction, he came to Rome (d), from whence, after he had paid his respects to Hadrian VI, he took his way to Venice. Here he embarked, the fourteenth of July 1523, and arrived at Joppa the last of August, and at Jerusalem the fourth of September, the same year. Having satisfied, in this country, his devout curiosity, he returned to Venice, from whence he parted, to go on board at Genoa, in his return to Barcelona, where he fixed his abode for some time, as a most convenient place, for the design he had of studying the Latin Tongue. I say nothing of the miraculous adventures of his voyage (C); I should never have done, should I copy his historian on this head. He began the rudiments of Grammar in 1524, and finding, that the reading a book of Erasmus cooled his devotion (D), he would no longer hear that writer mentioned;

man, without any learning, composed that admirable book of exercises, approved by the judgment of the Apostolic see, and by its general usefulness. Alexander VII confirmed the same thing by a brief of the twelfth of October, 1657, wherein he grants a plenary indulgence to all who shall make use of St Ignatius's spiritual exercises (9).

(9) Concessa indulgentia peccatorum plenaria omnibus Christi fidelibus, exercitiis spiritualibus à S. Ignatio instituta peragentibus ætidiu spatio in domibus Societatis. Sæculi, ibid.

The two Bibliographers of the society have not done the Benedictin the honour to name him; but we know from other hands, that he was called Constantinus Cætanus. He pretended, that a Benedictin, called Garcias Cisneros, was the true author of the spiritual exercises, which have passed under the founder of the Jesuits name, and that three monks of Monte Cassino gave the same St Ignatius the book of constitutions of the society of Jesus, when he went to them, whilst he was meditating the design of a new order. This Benedictin, who thus brings St Ignatius into the number of Plagiaries, backs his proof with the testimony of a famous Jesuit, whose sense he has mistaken: for this Jesuit only says, that the founder of the Benedictins assisted St Ignatius with his divine illuminations, for the forming the constitutions of the society. Is this saying, that three monks of St Benedict dictated these constitutions to Ignatius, as to an amanuensis? 'Dixi Societatem Jesu videri charam S. Benedicto, in cujus sinu Lutetie primum delineata sit; & postmodum Cassini sancto fundatori illuc digresso, Sanctissimus Patriarcha illius loci præfens, multa lumina & coelestes afflatus exorasse visus est. Hoc Cætanus ad exceptas inibi per S. Ignatium à tribus Monachis Constitutiones Societatis Jesu traxit; quæ si quod dixi, S. Benedictum, (ut pium est arbitrari,) coelestem lucem, hærenti in æde sua S. Ignatio esse apprecatum, idem sonet, quod tres Monachos nigros dictasse S. Ignatio, velut amanuensis, suas Constitutiones (10). — I said, that the society of Jesus was favoured by St Benedict, in whose bosom it was first planned, at Paris; and afterwards at Monte Cassino, the most holy Patriarch of that place, prayed for much illumination and heavenly inspiration on the holy founder, who was come thither. This, Cætanus pretends, implies, that St Ignatius received there the book of constitutions of the society of Jesus from three Monks; as if my saying, that St Benedict (as we ought piously to suppose) prayed for celestial light on St Ignatius, residing in his house, was the same thing, as if I had said, that three Monks dictated to St Ignatius, as to an amanuensis, his constitutions. Note by the way (11), that the same Benedictin maintains, that the Jesuit, he cites, committed a mortal sin in putting any other name than his own in the title page of his book (12). A Jesuit, called John Rowe, has treated this accuser of Ignatius very roughly. It remains, that I say something concerning the book of exercises. They tried to get it condemned in Spain, in 1553. Melchior Canus was very active in it, and the archbishop of Toledo would not have been sorry that it had succeeded; but the doctor, he consulted, was of another opinion. This is what the Jesuits say: but who knows whether they speak truth? 'Inventi sunt qui . . . anno 1553 eum librum non allatrent modo, sed & morderent, Thomas quidam Pedrovius, alienæ ea in re voluntatis administer, & Melchior Canus, cujus fuggillationes, & obelos, cum Paschali Mantio Ord. Prædicatorum, Complutensi Theologo primario, exhibuisset Joannes Siliceus Præfati Toletanus, qui librum illum cupiebat ab eo improbari, responsum retulit, nihil esse in sic dispendio libro damnatione dignum, præter Cui dispendio, & fuggillationes, ut ad illum annum recitari Orlandinus, addito pergravi Bartholomæi Torris, poëta Canariensis Præfatus elogio eorumdem exercitiorum (13). — Some there were, who, in the year 1553, vented their spleen against that book; among these, one Thomas Pedrovius, employed in that affair by some other person, and Melchior Canus, whose evils against it, when John Siliceus, Archbishop of Toledo, who was pleased that he disapproved that book, had shown to Paschalis Mantius, of the order of preaching Friars, and a divine of the first rank at Complutum, he received for answer, that there was nothing worthy to be condemned, in this so much censured book, but the censures and evils of Canus; as Orlandinus relates under that year, adding the weighty encomium of Bartholomæus Torris, afterwards bishop of the Canaries, on those exercises.

Some other works are attributed to the same author, a letter de religiosa obedientia ad Lusitanæ socios ac filios, written from Rome the twenty sixth of March, 1553: it has been inserted in the Bibliotheca Patrum. A letter de religiosa perfectione ad Hispaniæ socios, written the fourth of March 1547, was printed in Latin, in the collection of the letters of the generals of the Jesuits. There is another Latin version of them (14) printed at Cracow, in 1607, in the collection intitled, Thesaurus spiritualium rerum ad Societatem Jesu pertinentium. A letter to Claudius king of Ethiopia, dated the twenty second of February, 1555. It is found in the History of the Jesuits, 1555. It is not known how this book came to be lost. No body doubts but he is the author of a book, called Constitutiones Societatis Jesu decem in partes distributæ. But some believe, that James Lainez is the author of the declarations that are joined to it. Father Southwell confutes this opinion (15). This book of Constitutions, &c. was printed first at Rome by the Jesuits, in 1558, in 8vo. It has since been published in the same place, in Latin, and in Spanish, in folio, 1606. The Latin version was made by John Polancus, secretary to the author (16).

(C) I say nothing of the miraculous adventures of his voyage. The bare recital of his extatic visions would make a very long remark, did I trouble myself to relate all that are found in his history. See Dr Stillingfleet (17), who draws from thence a good proof, that the Institution of the Jesuits, as well as other monks, is founded on Fanaticism. He cites Melchior Canus, who says that Loyola fled from Spain for fear the inquisition, which suspected him of the heresy of the illuminate, should imprison him (18). Melchior Canus adds, that Loyola told him a thousand revelations, and spoke of one of his comrades as a great saint. This pretended saint, being interrogated by Melchior Canus, vented several heresies through meer ignorance. Loyola, to excuse him, alleged, that he was not a Heretic, but a Lunatic, who had his lucid intervals, and who at that time, by reason of the new-moon, was not a good Catholic: 'Cum aliquando Romæ essem, Innicum istum videre mihi libuit: qui in sermone sine ulla occasione cepit suam commemorare justitiam, & perfectionem, quam passus esset in Hispania nullo suo merito. Multa etiam & magna prædicabat de revelationibus, quas divinitus habuisset, idque nulla ejus rei necessitate: quæ fuit occasio, cur eum pro homine vano haberem, nec de revelationibus suis quicquam ei crederem . . . (19). Quendam sociorum pro sancto prædicare cepit, qui cum accitus venisset, illico hominis non satis incolumi capite mihi suspicionem movit: cumque de rebus divinis eum percutatus essem, multa hæretica respondit, quippe qui idiota, planeque rudis & indoctus esset. Innicus ejus causa confusus, ille, inquit, non est hæreticus, sed fatuus, credoque eum lucida habere intervalla, jamque adeo propter conjunctionem Lunæ non esse ulqueque Catholicum (20).'

(D) He found, that the reading of a book of Erasmus cooled his devotion. This book is his Enchiridion 63.

tioned; but betook himself to Thomas à Kempis. At two years end, he was thought to have made a sufficient progress, to be admitted to lectures of Philosophy; accordingly he parted for Complutum in 1526. His mendicant life, his equipage, and that of his four companions, who had already espoused his fortune, together with the instructions he gave the people, who crowded about him, obliged the inquisition to examine what he meant. The matter went so far, that he was cast into prison [E], from whence he was not released, but upon condition, that he would forbear venting his opinions for four years (e). This injunction was no way suitable to his design; not willing therefore to submit to it, he retired to Salamanca, where he continued to discourse upon matters of devotion. He was imprisoned afresh, and set at liberty again on the same conditions, as at Complutum. Then he determined to go to Paris. He arrived there in the beginning of February 1528, with a firm resolution to study hard; but the misery, he was reduced to, having obliged him to beg his bread in the streets, and put himself into St James's hospital, extremely crossed his design. He tried several expedients to remove all these obstacles; but as fast as he got clear of one difficulty, he was involved in others; for it was observed, that the zeal, with which he exhorted young people to spirituality, made them betake themselves to a very odd way of life. He was accused before the inquisitor of the faith; and narrowly escaped being whipped in the college of St Barbara [F]. All these difficulties did not discourage him; he went through his course of Philosophy, and Divinity, and gained over a certain number of companions, who engaged themselves by vow to a new life. This they did in the church

Militis Christiani. It is universally looked upon as a piece, in which purity of life is joined with the best rules of Christian morality. However, Loyola did not relish it; it was an ice that damped his fire of divine love; he took an aversion to it, and would never read this author's writings; nor was he willing his disciples should read them. Ribadeneira tells us this particular. 'In hac studiorum palæstra versanti, pii quidam ac docti viri consilium dederunt, ut Erasmi Roterodami, qui eo tempore bonæ Latinitatis auctor habebatur, libellum de milite Christiano legeret, ut sermonis scilicet elegantiam cum pietate conjungeret. Cujus consilii Confessarius etiam ad reliquos auctor accessit. Quod cum Ignatius simpliciter fecisset, observavit illius libelli lectione refrigerare in se spiritum Dei, & devotionis sensum ardorem restingui. Qua re animadvertens, librum de manibus omnino abiecit, & ita est averfatus, ut nec ipse amplius legerit illius auctoris libros, & passim in Societate nostra legi vetuerit (21).'

[E] The matter went so far, that he was cast into prison Before it came to this, enquiry had been made about his life and doctrine, and he had only been enjoined to wear shoes and stockings, and not oblige his companions to go barefoot. But when it was observed, that a widow and her daughter had undertaken a pilgrimage on foot, and begging, Ignatius, who had been their casuist, was much exasperated against. Hereupon he was imprisoned. I do not wonder the alarm was taken, when people reflected on the great ascendancy this man had gained over the fair sex. People continued to flock about him in his prison, to hear him discourse; and there were a great many persons of quality - of both sexes (22), who offered him their good offices; but he thankfully refused them. Being asked, whether he had advised the widow's pilgrimage, he answered, that, on the contrary, he had dissuaded her from it, fearing that the young woman, who was very handsome, might be exposed, during these travels, to some accident (23). The sentence was pronounced the forty second day of his imprisonment, and he was discharged (24). He was treated more severely at Salamanca (25).

[F] He narrowly escaped being whipped in the college of St Barbara. Mind this account of Mr Jurieu (26). 'He came to Paris in 1528, and, being conscious of his ignorance, he entered himself in Montaigne college; he there began again his studies, put himself into the sixth class, to learn his Grammar a second time, and desired his master to set him a task, and whip him, as he did the other scholars, when he could not say his lesson. He was then thirty seven years old: a pretty sight, to see this venerable saint's shirt taken up amidst a company of boys, who were spectators of the comedy . . . (27). We have already seen, how, after this, at thirty seven years of age, he caused himself to be whipped in Montaigne college, before the little boys.' Here are two things affirmed; one, that Ignatius not only desired his master to whip him, but that he was actually whipped; the other, that this passed at Paris, in

Montaigne college. I think here is a mistake as to both these facts, and that it is better to keep to the following narrative. 'Being returned to Barcelona, he began his Grammar at thirty years of age (28); but, as Massæus says *, he could scarce say amo, but his mind was wandering I know not where, and was always filled with so many visions, that he could not remember one single word of what he learned. * Mass. lib. i, cap. xvi. This obliged him, with great humility, to beg his master on his knees . . . that he would please punctually to keep him to a lesson, as he did the other scholars, and whip him soundly, if he did not give a good account of it (29). You see, that all is reduced to a bare resolution of suffering the lash, in case he did not learn his lesson, and that this passed at Barcelona, when he was but thirty three years of age, and not at Paris, when he was thirty seven. I know indeed, that, at Paris also, Ignatius was willing to submit to the lash; but this was after he had understood, that the principal of the college (30) had resolved it should be given him: and he felt some struggles between the flesh and the spirit, before he could resolve to suffer that ignominy (31). Besides, it was not at Montaigne college, but at St Barbara's that they resolved to whip him, and the reason was, not for any neglect of his lesson, but because there were scholars, who renounced their exercises, to practise the counsels of Spirituality, with which he infatuated them. Now the principal of the college was so far from executing his resolution, that, on the contrary, upon his hearing Ignatius speak, he cast himself at his feet, to beg his pardon. 'Quid multa? prehensa manu Goveanus, ad cœnationem Ignatium adduxit; hic repente se, omnibus inspectantibus, illi ad pedes abiecit; lachrymis veniam petit: se nimis credulum, illum virum sanctum clamavit, qui non intentati cruciatus terrore, sed Dei tantum honore tangatur (32). — In short, Goveanus took Ignatius by the hand, and led him to supper: then in the sight of the whole company, he fell at his feet, and begged pardon with tears, calling himself over credulous, and Loyola a holy man, who was not touched with the dread of threatened punishment, but only with the honour of God.' Note, that Ignatius studied the Latin tongue in Montaigne college (33), but I have not read, that he went through all his classes, beginning at the sixth, as Mr Jurieu affirms. It is true, it would be excusable to infer this from these words of Massæus, 'Igitur ad montis acuti Collegium itare quotidie, atque inter procacium puerorum greges matura jam ætate vir Grammatica rudimenta repetere non designatus est (34). — Therefore he condescended to go daily to Montaigne college, and, tho' advanced in years, to begin again the rudiments of Grammar among a parcel of unlucky boys.' See Palquier, who pleasantly ridicules Loyola's studies and ignorance (35). Little did he then imagine, that this man would soon be invoked: he exposed himself to the fault of Non putaram (36). I will make a reflexion hereupon in the remark [G].

church of Montmartre, the fifteenth of August 1534; and they renewed their engagement twice successively in the same place, and on the same day, and with the same ceremonies. At first there were only seven, reckoning Loyola himself among them; but afterwards they became ten. It was determined among them, that Ignatius should return into Spain, to regulate some affairs there; that afterwards he should go to Venice; and that they should leave Paris the twenty fifth of January 1537, to go and meet him. He came into Spain in 1535, where he preached repentance [G], and was followed by prodigious crowds of hearers. He remembered the affairs his companions had recommended to him, and in due time passed by sea to Genoa, and from thence travelled to Venice, where they all met him on the eighth of January 1537 (f). During the time that he waited for them, he was not idle: he gained souls, and got acquainted with John Peter Caraffa [H], who was afterwards Pope. Being engaged by vow to make a voyage to Jerusalem, they prepared to go thither; but they were desirous before all things to salute the Pope, and obtain his benediction and permission. They went therefore to Rome, and obtained their desire. Being returned to Venice with a design to go on board, they found no opportunity: the war with the Porte had put an entire stop to the transportation of pilgrims. Hereupon, rather than be idle, they resolved to disperse themselves in the towns under the Venetians jurisdiction. They preached in the streets, and afterwards went into the universities, to gain the scholars; and at last returned to Rome. There it was that Ignatius formed the plan of a new society, which Pope Paul III confirmed in the year 1540, with some limitations, and in the year 1543 without limitations. He was created general of this new order in 1541, and fixed his head quarters at Rome, whilst his companions dispersed themselves throughout the earth. Here he applied himself to several things, as in converting the Jews [I], reforming the women of a bad life [K], or the care of orphans. He found himself soon exposed to the [G] Where he preached repentance.] He exclaimed, among other things, against the concubinage of the priests, which was hardly looked upon as shameful at that time; for their servant maids confidently assumed the head-dress of married women, and behaved themselves to them, as if they had been their lawful husbands. Ignatius got very severe laws made against this corruption. Quibus quidem operibus & vitæ exemplo, prudentisque tantum apud illos homines profecit, ut errores multos corrigeret; vitia, quæ in sacerdotum etiam mores irreperant, & longa jam consuetudine honestatis nomen obsederant, emendare non destitit: multaque constituit, quæ ad hominum mores conformandos, pietatemque augendam pertinerent. In his severæ leges fuerunt ejus opera latæ à magistratibus, de alea, de concubinato sacerdotum. Nam cum patrio more Virgines, quoad viro tradentur, capite aperto essent, pessimo exemplo mulierum cum apud clericos turpiter viverent, perinde caput obnubebant, ac si legitimo eis matrimonio junctæ fuissent: quibus fidem, quasi matris, præstabant. Quod nefarium institutum, ac sacrilegum, funditus tollendum curavit (37). — By which works, and the example of his life, and his prudence, he so gained upon those men, that he corrected many errors; nor did he cease to amend the vices, which had crept even into the morals of the clergy, and through long custom bad, as it were, ceased to be scandalous: he likewise made many regulations, tending to the well ordering their manners, and the increase of piety. Among these, the magistrates, at his instigation, published severe laws, concerning gaming; and the concubinage of the clergy. For it being the custom of the country for maidens, till they were married, to have their heads uncovered, many, who lived in criminal conversation with clergymen, veiled themselves, as if they were lawfully married to them, thus setting a most scandalous example. This wicked and sacrilegious practice he took care to put a stop to.

(f) They parted from Paris the fifth of November, 1536, and did not wait till the time which they had agreed upon.

[H] He got acquainted with John Peter Caraffa.] Who was Pope under the name of Paul IV, and who had then joined himself with some other votaries (38), to form the congregation called the Theatins. These, in this last age, have had a great quarrel with the Jesuits. See the use Mr Arnaud makes of it. 'One may judge, says he (39), speaking to the Jesuits, how little touchy you are, by that sharp and harsh way, wherewith your writers (40), have treated the Theatins, for having said, in the Life of the blessed Cajetan, that St Ignatius, four or five years before the establishment of your society, living with the Theatins at Venice, when he came thither from Spain, in the year 1536, was so edified, and affected with the sanctity of his hosts, that he desired to be received among them: but that the blessed Cajetan would not grant his request, because God had acquainted him, that he would found another order, more given to action. Be this true or false, could it be a just ground for flying into such a passion, and continuing so hot a war for near thirty years together; were it true, that you are so little sensible, as you say, of what only affects the reputation of your society?' Spondanus (41) observes, that John Sleidan, and some others after him, have falsely said, that the Jesuits were founded by this John Peter Caraffa. The truth, adds he, is, that as the Jesuits came into the world a little after the Theatins, and almost in the same habit, they were called Theatins, which name they still retain in Spain and Italy. If, in requital, the name of the Jesuits was given the Theatins, we might less wonder at Sleidan's assertion. The author, I have so often cited, acknowledges, that these two orders of regular clergy came so soon after one another, and were alike in so many things, that the name of Theatins was often given to the Jesuits. 'A quibus vulgi errore falsa Theatinorum in nos est appellatio, cognomenque transfusum. Nam cum ordo uterque, noster & illorum, clericorum Regularium sint, eodemque ferme tempore nati, neque habuit valde dissimiles, populus rudis externa specie deceptus, alienum nomen nostris imposuit, Romæ primum; unde in alias deinde urbes influxit, & in remotas etiam provincias penetravit (42).'

[I] He . . . employed himself . . . in converting the Jews.] He entertained in the house of the Jesuits some Jews, who had been baptized, and, by his earnest solicitations, obtained, that all Jews, who embraced the true faith, should be entertained in a certain house appointed for that purpose. At his request, Pope Paul III decreed, that they should preserve all their goods, and that, if they were children, who were converted without their fathers and mothers consent, they should have the whole patrimony (43). And as to goods acquired by usury, the true owner of which was not known, it was ordered, that they should be given to the converted Jews. Julius III, and Paul IV, added a new order, which was, that all the synagogues of Italy should be taxed every year in a certain sum, to be applied to the maintenance of these proselytes (44). The French converters have imitated part of these orders in our days.

most outrageous calumnies [L], which did not however hinder his pursuing whatever might contribute to the glory and establishment of his order. There were those of the other sex, who were willing to submit to his discipline [M]; but the trouble, which the ving by prostitution, (for, at that time, there was a greater licentiousness of manners in the city, which, through the vigilance of the holy Pontiff, was afterwards suppressed by severe laws) and the city itself was become a nest of whores. At that time their number was prodigious: they, who would quit this infamous way of life, were received into the convent of the Magdalenes, provided they obliged themselves to a perpetual cloister, and to the vows of the order. This condition, which was somewhat hard, retarded the fruits, that might be expected from the institution of this convent; it excluded all married women, and all maids and widows, who would willingly have quitted their wicked course of life, but could not submit to the laws of a long penance. There were therefore two sorts of debauched women, which were to be taken care of. They, who feared the resentment of their husbands, had need of a place of retreat, where they might be in safety, till they had made their peace with them. They, who would quit criminal, without renouncing honest pleasures, had need also of some place that was not a convent, where they might have a subsistence, when they gave over the trade of a courtesan. For which reason, Ignatius caused apartments to be built in the church of St Martha, in which a new society was founded for this kind of penitents (46).

(46) It was called the Community of the Grace of the Holy Virgin.

Permutæ ex iis nuptæ sunt, quæ hoc perfugio excluduntur: quibus tamen locus aliquis dandus est, quo se recipiant, dum maritis reconciliantur, ut à vitæ honestate, quam petunt, abist periculum. Porro aliæ emergere quidem ex sæcibus illis vellent, sed non continuo se diuturnæ penitentiae dedere: neque si à pessima fugiant paratæ sunt, sectari idcirco optima concupiscunt: quibus receptum ad tempus dari Cœnobii illius (47) leges non sinunt. Ignatius igitur, ut omnium saluti consulere: & ne qua esset, quæ victus querendi difficultatem suæ turpitudini prætexeret, locum peropportunitatem instituendum curavit, quod omnium esset commune perfugium (48). He was the first bountiful contributor to this building: his example was followed by several, and especially by Leonora Osoria, wife to John Vega, ambassador of Charles V. It was a very edifying sight, to see the general of the Jesuits, at the head of a band of whores, leading them either to St Martha's church, or to women of qualities houses, who undertook to have them instructed. In hoc autem divæ Marthæ Cœnobium, mulierculæ à turpi quæstus abductas ipsomet sœpenuero, ne perirent, vel in matronæ alicujus honestæ domum, instituendas ad virtutis studium, id ætatis vir, & Generalis Præpositus deducebat (49). When he was told, that the pains he took, to convert these prostitutes, was lost labour, since they were hardened in sin, and would quickly return to their vomit, he answered, that he should think all the labour of his life well employed, if he could cause these creatures to abstain only one night from offending God; and though he was persuaded, that the next day they would fall again into their infamous practices, yet he would not cease to labour with all his might to save that small space of time (50). Cum autem Ignatio objiceretur, in curandis hujusmodi mulierculis male operam poni, quippe quæ in vitiis jam occalluissent, facileque reverterentur ad vomitum: Minimè sanè, inquit Ignatius: sed si omnibus meæ vitæ curis, atque laboribus id possim efficere, ut vel unam noctem peccato vacuum præterire istarum aliqua velit; omnes ego quidem nervos contendam, ut vel illo tam exiguo tempore Deus ac Dominus noster non offendatur: etiam si sciam illam statim ad ingenium redituram (51). As he was careful to remedy the evil, he did not forget to prevent the evil to come. He knew, that the honour of many maids is in danger, either because they are poor, or because their mothers take not sufficient care, or even turn procuresses for them: he therefore got a convent built, whither the young women should be removed, who were in this danger. Illud etiam excogitavit, in lubrico versanti virginum pudicitia: qua ratione succurreret: ne videlicet puellaris callitas, aut matrum turpitudine incuriave desolaretur, aut paupertate. [L] He found himself exposed to the most outrageous calumnies. Ribadeneira does not enter into particulars, and I do not think there is any book extant, in which these calumnies are particularly related. I shall only say, with this Historian, that Ignatius having caused a married woman to be put into the hospital of St Martha, who had suffered herself to be carried off by her galant, exposed himself to the indignation of this ravisher, who, being a very passionate man, was not content to throw stones all night at the house, where his mistress was shut up, but moreover defamed the Jesuits all over the city, and dispersed a hundred Pasquils against them. He accused them of all sorts of disorders, and of the most impious and filthy crimes. He so prejudiced the city of Rome against them, that they durst hardly shew themselves; for they every where met with those, who insulted and cursed them. I shall set down Ribadeneira's words, that I may not be thought to amplify. Ut erat vir acer, ac ferox, & in ipsum Sanctæ Marthæ Cœnobium furere nocturnis lapidationibus cepit, & in nostros iniquis criminationibus debacchari: multaque in vulgus spargere, quæ non solum falsa essent, sed dicta etiam turpissima. Eoque processit (gratia fortasse, qua valebat plurimum, & autoritate fretus) ut Ignatii nomen publicè insectaretur, & laceraret: & ea nostris per se, & suos coram objiceret, quæ honestè audire non possent. Famosos præterea libellos confecit, & vulgo jactavit, quibus multa nefaria, & impura, multa impia, & scelerata continebantur: ut nostris vix in publicum prodire, vix cum hominibus de ipsorum salute agere liceret: ita aut conviciis ab improbitimo quoque, aut maledictis excipiebantur (53). Ignatius petitioned the Pope to name commissioners for examining these accusations. They were examined by the governor and by the vicar of Rome, who, in their sentence, given the tenth of August, 1543, declared, that they were all calumnies. There was a priest at Rome, who terribly blackened the reputation of the Jesuits. He accused them of Heresy, and of revealing the secrets of confessions, and of committing things not fit to be named, and which made Ignatius deserve to be burnt. See in the margin Ribadeneira's words (54), who observes, that this priest was suspended, and deprived of his benefices, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, for crimes which time at last revealed. As for his accusations, the Jesuits did not complain of them, but suffered them to drop unanswered.

(53) Idem, ibid. cap. xiii, pag. 223.

[M] There were some of the other sex, who were willing to submit to his discipline. You will hardly find any order of Monks, but what has convents for maids; and I question, whether you can name a founder, who in his life-time had not female votaries, who constantly attended him. Ignatius had his; but he did not consent to the forming nunneries, which should embarrass his rules. Isabella Rosella, his benefactress, was so desirous to see him again, that she came from Spain to Rome, to put herself under his discipline. She, and some others, obtained leave of the Pope to make the same vows as the Jesuits (55). Ignatius did not oppose it, till he had experienced the prodigious trouble they gave him. Perceiving then, that this would only incommode his society, he represented his reasons so urgently to the Pope, as to get a discharge from this burden. Mirum est trium muliercularum gubernatio, quantum illi molestiæ & occupationis paucis diebus attulerit. Ergo Pontificem Maximum docet, quanto ea res impedimento Societati sit futura, orat, obsecratque Pontificem, ut se præsentis molestiæ Societatem metu perpetuo liberet: neque permittat nostros homines, aliis in rebus magnis, utilibus, necessariis occupatos, hac mulierum cura minus necessariam implicari. Quod utique Pontifex, rationes Ignatii probans, Societati dedit: literaque Apostolicas scribi iussit, quibus nostri in perpetuum ab onere Mulierum eximuntur, & quarecunque mulierum cura sub obedientia nostrorum in communi, vel alias vivere volentium, anno 1547 13. direction of three women had given him, obliged him to deliver his society for ever from this incumbrance. Having gotten his order confirmed by Pope Julius III, in 1550, he had a mind to lay down his generalship; but the Jesuits would by no means consent to it. So he kept that post to his death, which happened on the last day of July 1556 (g). The author, whom I cite, having honestly owned, That his St Ignatius had not the gift of miracles, and having even prevented the objections, which were to be feared on this head, had no doubt a hint given him, that he had gone too far, and that it was not prudent to make such concessions in the face of the World. However it be, he retracted it in a new book, and mentioned I know not how many miracles wrought by the Founder of his order [N]. They are gone so far as to pretend, that

He therefore acquaints the Pope, what an incumbrance that affair was like to prove to the society: he begs and intreats the Pope to free him from the present trouble, and the society from perpetual fear; and that he would not permit our brethren, employed in other matters of great and necessary importance, to be taken up with the less necessary care of women. The Pope, approving Ignatius's reasons, granted the society this favour, and ordered apostolical letters to be written, exempting us for ever from the burden of Nuns, and the care of any women, who might be willing to submit to our discipline in common, or to live elsewhere, in the year 1547, May the 20th. But Ignatius, not satisfied with this, that he might entirely guard against this danger, obtained the same grant from the same Paul III, in the year 1549; that we might not be obliged to undertake the care of any Nuns, or religious women whatever, by apostolical letters obtained, or hereafter to be obtained; unless making express mention of that indulgence, and of our order.’

In that respect he had the gift of the Hirpæ (58). What is said of some enchanted soldiers, that they are in no danger, though exposed to a furious storm of musket-shot, is an image of Loyola's continence. The most lascivious ogling, the most tender caresses, and in general, all the artillery woman could employ against his virtue, would have found it impenetrable: always provided that we refer ourselves to Missæus's words (59): I have read a parallel of Luther and Loyola (60), in which it is observed, that Luther, without any extraordinary grace, lived in a chaste celibacy for forty two years of age, and, being afterwards married, neither blemished his modesty, nor piety; and that, after all, Loyola's chastity deserved no commendation, since there is no virtue, but what proceeds from a victory disputed with the passions (61).

[N] He retracted it . . . and mentions I know not how many miracles of the founder of his order. The thirteenth chapter of the fifth book of St Ignatius's Life, written by the Jesuit Ribadeneira is very remarkable: he begins with this objection (62). ‘If all you have been saying be true, whence comes it that Loyola's sanctity was not confirmed by miracles, like those of so many other saints? The author answers, Who hath known the mind of the Lord, or who hath been his counsellor? God alone works wonderful things, and as it is he alone performs them, he alone knows the proper time, and place, in which miracles ought to be wrought, and by whose prayers, Ut solus ille hæc potest efficere, ita ille solus novit quo loco, quo tempore miracula & quorum precibus faciendæ sunt (63).’ He adds, that all saints have not had the gift of miracles, and that those, who have been most eminent for the greatness, or number of their miracles, have not, for all that, excelled the others in holiness of life. For it is not by miraculous, but charitable actions, that we are to judge of a person's sanctity. This he proves from the authority of St Gregory, from reasons drawn from Scripture, and from example. ‘Neque omnes sancti viri miraculis excellent: neque qui illorum aut magnitudine præstiterunt, aut copia, idcirco reliquos sanctitate superant. Non enim sanctitate cuiusque signis, sed charitate æstimanda est (64).’ He makes it appear by Scripture, that the gift of miracles is granted sometimes to false teachers, and in a very few words exposes to view the strength of whatever the Protestants can urge against those, who upbraid them, because Luther and Calvin had not this gift. I say not this, adds he, to extenuate this virtue, but to let the prudent reader understand, that all this must be referred to the good providence of God, who distributes his gifts according to his own good pleasure. He afterwards assigns some reasons, for which God might think fit, and that even in favour of the Jesuits, to deny their founder this gift of miracles. We must hear himself. ‘Hæc dixerim non ut miraculorum vim elevem, sed ut prudens lector intelligat, rem totam Deo committendam: qui dona sua unicuique distribuit, prout vult. Potuit ille, pro sua occulta sapientia, nostræ hoc imbecillitati dare, ne miracula unquam jactare possemus. Potuit utilitati, ut auctore instituti nostri minus illud fieri, à Jesu potius, quam ab illo, nomen traheremus: & nostrâ nos appellatio sacra moneret, ne ab illo oculos unquam dimoveremus: quem non solum, ut communem humani generis liberatorem ac Principem, sed etiam, ut præcipuum Ducem colere, atque imitari debemus, minimam hanc Societatem sui nominis glorioso titulo decorantem. Potuit hoc etiam tribuere temporibus, quibus hæc miracula necessaria non sunt (65). — I say this, not to lessen the efficacy of miracles, but that the prudent reader may understand, that the whole matter is to be referred to God, who distributes his gifts to every one as he pleases. He might, of his unsearchable wisdom, design to put it out of the power of our weakness, to boast of miracles. He might in this consult our profit, that, the founder of our order being the less illustrious, we might take our name from Jesus, rather than from him; and that our sacred appellation might put us in mind, never to turn our eyes away from him, whom we ought to worship and imitate, not only as the common Saviour of mankind, but as the chief God, who vouchsafes to adorn our humble society with the glorious title of his name. He might likewise in this consult the times, in which these miracles are not necessary.’ Lastly, he says (66), that the manner of the institution of the society of the Jesuits, its prodigious growth, and the miracles wrought by some of its members, are a convincing proof, that it is the work of God, and is a sufficient ground for ascribing the glory of miracles to the life of its founder. Thus the ancient fathers have observed, that the speedy propagation of the Gospel throughout the world, though the instruments God made use of had nothing considerable in them, according to the world, and though it met with the most violent opposition, is so bright a miracle, as would alone be sufficient to prove the divine original of Christianity. The Protestants acknowledge the same thing, when they are asked, what miracles Luther and Calvin wrought to support their mission. Let us once more cite Ribadeneira. 'Quid admirabilis, says he (67), quam militarem hominem, ferro & castris affectum, à spiritu Dei alienum, ita immutatum, ut non solum ipse Christo militaret, sed sacrae militiae antesignanus esset, & princeps? Quid inusitatum, quam tot homines ingenio, studio, aetate florentes, ab Ignatio egeno ac despiciendo, nulla magna vel literarum scientia, vel sermonis elegantia & copia, huc adduci potuisse, illustrium ut vitæ cursum abrumperent, spes suas prodigerent, paupertatis, decoris, atque ignominiae sese telis objicerent, & tot laborum periculisque offerent incurisibus? —'

What can be more wonderful, than that a military man, accustomed to arms and camps, and a stranger to the Spirit of God, should be so changed, as not only to fight under Christ's banner, but himself to become the leader and head of the sacred warfare? what more uncommon, than that so many men, famous for wit and learning, and in the flower of their youth, could be prevailed upon by Ignatius, a poor, despised wretch, with no great learning, and as little eloquence, to break off their course of life, give up all their hopes, expose themselves to the darts of poverty, disgrace, and ignominy, and voluntarily submit to so many labours and dangers? He has forgot one circumstance, which in some respects, does exceedingly heighten the wonder, to wit, that there appeared in Loyola's life, from his travels to Monserrat, till the time of his fixing at Rome, so many marks of extravagance, and so many symptoms of a mind disordered, stupified, overwhelmed by fanaticism, that it is strange, men of solid sense, such as Lainez and Salmeron, should have adhered to him, and that his order should so soon have over-topped all the rest. But if we turn the perspective, we perceive, that this very thing lessens the wonder; for nothing is so likely to deceive, as that which appears supernatural in madness, extravagancy, and foolery. However it be, we have here a famous Jesuit, his cotemporary (68), who plainly confesses, that his founder wrought no miracles, but he did not maintain this opinion till his death: for he changed his note in another book (69). It is true, most of the miracles he relates were wrought by Ignatius after his death: thus he speaks (70).

Quia vero postremo quinti libri capite de miraculis breviter egimus quasi nulla fecisset, aut ad demonstrandum ejus sanctitatem necessaria non essent, statui nunc ea paulo fusius exponere, non omnia quidem (res enim nimis in longum excurreret) sed partem duntaxat eorum quæ Deus efficere per servum suum dignatus est. Quamvis enim, cum anno 1572. primum vitam ejus latine scriberem, alia nonnulla miracula ab eo facta novissem, tamen adeo mihi certa & explorata non erant, ut in vulgus edenda mihi persuaderem; postea vero, questionibus de ejus in divos relatione publice habitis, gravibus & idoneis testibus fuerunt comprobata. Enimvero Deus ut servum suum extollat in terris tam frequentibus eum in dies miraculis dignatur, ut mearum partium esse ducam litteris hic mandare nonnulla è publicis actionibus sumta. — Because, in the last chapter of the fifth book, I have briefly treated of miracles, supposing that he did none, or that they were not necessary to demonstrate his sanctity, I have determined, in this place, to treat more at large of them, not of all (for it would be too tedious) but part only of those, which God vouchsafed to perform by his servant. For though, in the year 1572, when I first wrote his Life in Latin, I knew that he had performed some other miracles, yet I was not so fully informed concerning them, that I could persuade myself to publish them: but afterwards, when his canonization was publicly talked of, they were confirmed by sufficient witnesses. And indeed God granted his servant to perform so many miracles, to exalt him in the earth, that they think it incumbent on me to commit to writing some few of his public actions.' Note, that he speaks only of the first edition, which was of the year 1572, and says nothing of the second, which was of the year 1587, and which was much enlarged by him. He added several particulars, which he had learned afterwards, either from the testimony of some persons of great authority, intimate friends of Ignatius, or the certainty whereof he had discovered by a severe examination, though he had looked upon them as doubtful before. 'Multa mihi necessario addenda judicavi. Primum nova quædam, quæ post libellum excusum, gravissimi viri, & Ignatio valde familiares, & ante Societatem conditam intimi necessarii, quasi testes oculati de ipso Ignatio nobis retulerunt. Tum alia, quæ dubia antea mihi erant, & diligenti postea inquisitione investigata, certa esse comperi (71).' Hence we conclude, that St Ignatius's miracles were things, of which his friends had not informed Ribadeneira, during the fifteen years, which passed between the two editions, nor what the author could clear from uncertainty in that interval of time. Nevertheless he assures us, that, in the year 1572, he was informed of some miracles wrought by this founder, but not with all the certainty necessary to publish them. Amongst the things, of which he was not at that time perfectly assured, there were undoubtedly none, the certainty whereof he sought after more diligently, than that of the miracles of his apostle: since therefore he continued to say, in the edition of 1587, that the blessed Ignatius had wrought no miracles, it necessarily follows, that his strictest search had afforded him nothing certain upon that head; for if it had afforded him any certainty, he would, in the second edition, have added this grand article with more concern, than those other things, which he did add, only because, of uncertainty, as they had been before, they were now become certain, by the exact care he took to be informed about them. Farther, would a Jesuit, who had known, in the year 1572, that his founder had wrought miracles, and who only forbore inserting them in a public work, because his intelligence in that point was not so sure as it ought to be; would he have plainly owned, I say, that his founder wrought no miracles? would he have argued with so much concern upon it? would he have answered objections against it so elaborately? his duty doubtless had been to be silent, till he was fully informed, and there is great probability, that Ribadeneira would have taken that method, and that all he has said, by an after-game, is insincere and full of shifts; nor should it be omitted, that nothing was so capable of being set in a full light during the interval of time between those two editions, as Loyola's miracles, surprising facts, which make a deeper impression than any others, and spread from place to place with greater noise. Would the intimate friends, the inseparable companions of Ignatius, have said nothing of them to Ribadeneira, they, who told him so many other things, of which he was not informed in the year 1572; and which he added to his book in 1587? This, to say no worse of it, makes all the miracles suspected, which have been published, and pretended to have been wrought by Ignatius, before the second edition of Ribadeneira. The other miracles of the same saint are very numerous, if we take the word of his good friends. See the two following remarks.

[O] It is pretended, that the words of Virgil, in his mouth, had the power of dismaying devils, and forcing them to cry out for quarter. The story goes, that Ignatius Loyola had no sooner repeated the place in Virgil, where it is said, that Æneas and Dido entered into a cave, but the possessed woman, who prayed him to succour her, was thrown upon the ground, the devil leaving her, and begging the favour not to be shut up in the eternal cave. He obtained leave to ramble where he pleased, provided he would never possess any man or woman more. 'Hafenmüllerus enim in Histor. Jesuit. cap. 8. pag. 296. ex Turriano refert, quod aliquando Romæ scemina quædam à Diabolo obfessa Ignatium Lojolam secuta sit, & clamavit: Tu solus me liberare & juvare potes. Tunc Lojolam recitasse versum Virgilii: Speluncam Dido, Dux & Trojanus eandem. Qua voce audita Dæmonem mulierem prostravisse ac egredientem clamasse: O fili Lojola, tu ceu Leo me ad speluncam inferni abire cogis, sed rogo te, ne me æternæ speluncæ injicias. Postea Ignatium illi dixisse: Vade quocunque volueris, modo nullum amplius hominem obsequeris; ac statim Dæmonium magno cum strepitu egres-catalogue of the Saints in the year 1622. Innocent X, and Clement IX, increased the honours of this new saint [P]. But let them do what they will for him, nothing will be so wonderful in his history as the prodigious growth of his order in so few years, both in the old world and in the new, in spite of the strongest opposition of its adversaries. I believe never any society had so many enemies, within and without, as the Jesuits have had, and still have; and yet their authority, which is so suddenly grown to a very high pitch, seems rather to increase daily, than decline. The books, that have been published against them, would make a large library of themselves. They may well say, that a great many condemn them out of meer prejudice [Q]; nor do they fail to make the [P] Innocent X, and Clement IX, increased the honours of this new saint. I shall make use of the words of Father Nathaniel Southwell. — Pope Innocent X ordered, that Ignatius should be honoured with ecclesiastical service, all over the world, under the semi-double rite, on the twenty ninth of October, 1644. Pope Clement IX increased the worship paid to him, and raised it to the double rite, the eleventh of October, 1667. This author adds, that Ignatius had already more than fifty churches consecrated to him in several parts of the world (74); that the miracles, performed by this saint, during his life, and after his death, are so numerous and so eminent, that they might fill a volume; for besides those mentioned in his Life, and in the bull of canonization; Father Bartoli relates a hundred, that are well attested. Alphonsus de Andra mentions several others, which were wrought at Munebrega, in Arragon, where they worship a miraculous image of St Ignatius (75). A paper image of the same saint has bled very lately at one of the fingers, in a town of Sicily. We have a book upon it, printed at Palermo, in 1668. 'His confamilia narratur contigisse in Sicilia Regalbuti Diocesi. Catanensis, ubi Imago papyracea S. Ignatii anno Dom. 1666. à digito fudit prodigiose sanguinem, & hæc omnia examinata accurate, atque ab Episcopo loci illustrissimo D. Fr. Michaeli Angelo Bonadies, olim Generali Seraph. Ordinis S. Francisci de observantia approbata, & mandata typis Panormi 1668 (76). — Something like this is said to have happened in Sicily at Regalbuti, in the diocese of Catania, where a paper image of St Ignatius, in the year 1666, bled prodigiously at the finger; and that the affair was carefully enquired into, and approved by the most illustrious Michael Angelo Bonadies, bishop of the place, and formerly general of the Franciscans, & published at Panormo.' See the remark, where I shall speak of three Sermons.

[Q] They may well say, that a great many condemn them out of meer prejudice. It is certain, that whatsoever is published against them, is almost equally believed by their enemies, both Catholics and Protestants. It is also true, that the accusations are renewed against them, as often as occasion offers in any new book. In the mean time, they, who examine with any sort of equity, the innumerable apologies, published by the Jesuits, find, as to some facts, sufficient justifications, to make a reasonable enemy drop the charge. I will give an instance of this.

In 1610, there came out a very severe book against the Jesuits (77), in which it was affirmed (78), that the abbot du Bois had maintained, and would prove it to Father Coton's face, that sentence had been given against him at Avignon, for getting a nun with child. Father Coton, answering this libel, produced (79) the following letter. I, whose name is underwritten, do certify, that I was in Avignon all the time the R. Father

Coton, of the society of Jesus, lived there, and that I never heard any one say, that he had committed any thing contrary to the dignity and quality of his profession; and in particular as to what the Anti-Coton charges upon him. In which Anti-Coton, since I am made the author of a manifest calumny, to wit, that the R. Father Coton is charged: I frankly aver, that I know nothing of it, and that I have always looked upon the said R. Father Coton as a venerable and worthy man. In testimony whereof, I have written and signed this present deposition. From Paris, in my study, the eve of St Denis the martyr, 1610. OLIVIER ABBOT DU BOIS. And I have sealed it with my seal. Besides this he produced four certificates (80), seen and acknowledged for authentic, true, and legal, l'Anticot, pag. 200. The first was signed Lewis Beau, protonotary of the holy apostolic see, and sealed with his seal, and with those of two subsequent archbishops in the metropolitan city of Avignon, whose vicar general he had been all the time of Father Coton's sojourning in Avignon. The second was signed by fifteen persons, who composed and represented all the clergy of Avignon. The third was signed by the two consuls of Avignon, and their acefflor, and sealed with the seal of the consular house. The fourth was given by the bishop of Orange. These four attestations concur, not only in contradicting the author of the Anti-Coton, as an infamous calumniator; but also in extolling Father Coton's good and pious conduct. Besides these certificates, the magistrates of Avignon writ to this Jesuit in these terms (81). 'If these testimonies of prelates and consuls are not sufficient, we can produce the certificates of the greatest part of the gentlemen, doctors, citizens, merchants, and others of the town.' I know not what could be produced of greater force, to justify the accused. And yet there are a great many, who still believed, the nun was got with child, and that sentence had been passed upon Father Coton. They gave more credit to the Anti-Coton, who brought no proof, nor any authentic evidence, than to Father Coton, who produced all that the most exact judicial proceedings could require. This could be nothing but the effect of an extravagant prejudice.

(80) Réponse à l'Anticot, pag. 200.

(81) lb pag. 206.

The fate of the Jesuits, and that of Catiline, is much the same. Several accusations were given in against Catiline, without any proof; but they met with credit upon this general argument: since he has done such a thing, he is very capable of having done this, or that, and it is very probable he has done the rest. The historian Sallust has judiciously observed this illusion, which is not a sophism of the schools, but of the town. 'Scio fuisse nonnullos qui ita exultarent, juventutem quæ domum Catilinæ frequentabat parum honeste pudicitiam habuisse: sed ex aliis rebus magis quam quod cuiquam id compertum foret, hæc fama valebat (82). I know there were some, who looked upon the young persons, who frequented Catiline's house, as men of ill fame; but it was not a knowledge of them, but some thing else, that gave rise to this opinion.' There was published at the Hague, about eleven years ago, a book intitled, the Religion of the Jesuits. The author confesses, that the prejudice against these gentlemen is so general, that whatever attestations of innocence they fortify themselves with, it is impossible to undeceive the world. 'We must know, says he (83), that nothing so horrible can be said against the Jesuits, though ever so doubtful, but what becomes probable from their character, and the consideration of what they are capable of.' He gives two examples of this: One is, the report spread, not only at Heidelberg, but through all Europe, that they had suborned a false spirit from the other world, who cried every night in the ears of the old duke

(82) Sallust in Bello Catilin. pag. m. 33.

the most of this plea, that without being at the pains of answering particularly to all the charges of their enemies, they may be furnished with one general common-place, to invalidate the accusations [R]. But it is certain, there are those, who, without appearing prejudiced, maintain, that several things have justly rendered this society odious. They have not acquired so great a power, say they, nor preserved it so long, without the duke, that there was no salvation for him, unless he would exterminate Heresy and Heretics out of his new dominions, according to the counsel of the Fathers Jesuits: the duke, tired with these visions, resolved to enquire into the matter. He declared himself to one of his officers, who engaged to conjure the spirit most effectually, without either prayers or holy water. The officer hid himself under the prince's bed, and when the spirit came, he so hacked and hewed him with his hanger, that it is said he died of his wounds. The officer who had done the exploit, had the indiscretion to tell his wife of it, against the duke's express commands. The wife was no more retentive than the husband. And thus the thing was divulged. The Jesuits have tried all manner of ways to clear themselves. The duke has issued rigorous injunctions in his estates, against speaking of it. The Jesuits have procured certificates under the hands of the Protestants themselves, concerning the falsity of the story. But all to no purpose. They will never destroy the suspicions, which these stories, whether true or false, have imprinted in the people's minds, because they are known to be capable of this juggle, by others of the same stamp. He mentions some of them in general, I mean without circumstances of time, and place, and persons: and after having advised us to reject their certificates from the Palatinate, he concludes thus (84): 'However, be this little story true, or be it false, we know what they can do, and that is enough to make the thing probable.' The other example is, that the Jesuits had 'plotted to poison the emperor in the sacrament (85).' This prince was cautioned of it, and would not communicate the next day, but forced the Jesuit to take the poisoned Host, of which he died. The emperor and court of Vienna, according to its devotion, ordered, under terrible penalties, the few persons, that were privy to it, to keep the thing a secret. It was not however well kept; or at least it spread a little, and a gentleman of honour (86) swore, that the thing happened for certain in Vienna . . . (87), 'We do not give this for a truth, parjure l'auteur, and, indeed to say all, we are not much inclined to believe it: but be it ever so false, the Jesuits will never be able to destroy the suspicion of it, because of the character of the society, which is known all the world over.' He adds several reflexions tending to persuade his readers, that this story of Vienna is certain; and then proceeds (88): 'The thing, after all may be false; but it will ever be thought probable, considering the ordinary conduct of these good fathers . . . (89). They, who believe the story of Vienna false, will however believe it probable. If it be false, it will at least serve to justify what I have just now said, that the hatred against the society is extreme even in the church of Rome.' See the margin (90).

Without so many repetitions, we might easily have taken his thought. He means, that a man need only confidently publish whatever he pleases against the Jesuits, to be assured, that abundance of people will believe it. I believe him in the right; at least, that in this he will prove a good prophet. It was doubtless on this presumption, that he published the story of Vienna, though he believed it false. But if other authors have taken the same method, what will become of all the facts, which the enemies of the Jesuits have published? Should we not have reason to believe, that they have divulged several, which they knew to be false, or doubtful, and which nevertheless would in their reckoning appear as certain, and be received by the public as undoubted truths? I cannot think the rules of morality will allow the making so ill a use of public prejudice: They command us to be equitable towards all, and never to represent people worse than they are. I own to this author, that the readiness, wherewith the public swallows all that is said against the Jesuits, is a sign of an excessive aversion to the society (91), and I deny not but this aversion affords most reasonable consequences, which blast their reputation (92). He has reason to add (93), that the good fathers would not do amiss to explain to us this riddle; how it comes to pass, that, being so good, so officious, and so amiable, they are notwithstanding so terribly hated, whilst the Jansenists and Jacobins are not so cried down in the world, as the Jesuits are (94). But he might perhaps be embarrassed, should we require of him the explication of another riddle: how it comes to pass, that there are ministers, accomplished in all kinds of virtues, as they pretend, who are hated as a pest in all the communities different from their own, and who have innumerable enemies in their own, and of whom nothing could be published, but what would appear probable, whilst Mr Daillé, and Mr Claude, are every where in good reputation? Be it how it will, I question whether this writer had all the prudence of a nice disputant, when he insisted so much upon this great disposition of the public to believe whatever is printed against the Jesuits. This is more proper, than he imagines, to keep their own friends fast to them, who will easily believe, that this prejudice has been made too much use of, in publishing the most ill grounded stories. And as, at the bottom, it is a great fault, to be ready to believe whatever is said to the disadvantage of our enemies, true or false, doubtful or certain, so there is more indiscretion, than sincerity, in revealing this prepossession. Would a cunning enemy discover this weak place? But, in point of indiscretion, this author has not his fellow. Does not he say in the same book (95), that the Esprit de Mr Arnaud was suppressed in Holland, only because of the FEAR, 'the country was in at that time, of quarrelling with the English?' Does he not tell the public (96), 'that this prohibition hindered not the book's being sold quietly, and without any other precaution, than that of not exposing it in a bookeller's shop? The fine, adds he (97), imposed on the Printer was neither demanded, nor paid; it was only a formality to stop the mouth of the court of England; and they themselves, who had forbidden it, would have been very sorry, if it had not been sold. Nor did this prohibition hinder it's being re-printed in this country. He, who was reckoned the author of the book, was not a jot the worse received for it at court, and every where else.' Is it not to speak with the utmost contempt of his sovereign, to represent Holland so very much afraid of England. Tho' this pretended fear were true, would not a good subject have concealed it? Would he have revealed it to the public? Would he confess, that the edicts of the State, against a book, were only a vain formality, which the Bookellers laughed at? I omit what may be said more: it is an abyss, which prudence advises to stop at the brink of; my indiscretion would be a hundred times more blameable, than that of this author, if I did not draw a veil over what he has had the rashness to boast of, and if I did not cry out, Procul hinc, procul esse profani. He has sacrificed to a paternal affection, the things he ought to have had the most respect for; for no body doubts that the author of the Esprit de Mr Arnaud, and the author of the Religion de Jesuits, is one and the same person. Nothing is more easily discovered; for the eulogies, he bestows on the first of these books, in the latter, can proceed only from the affection of a father, who idolizes his own offspring, and is struck with a singular fondness for the Esprit de Mr Arnaud, the child of his own brain, on a double account, first, as it is made according to his own image and similitude; next, as it contains his own true character (98).

Here- tofore they used to answer all the books that were written against them; at last they are weary of it. The reason they alledge for their silence is, that they are no more obliged to confute the satires of their enemies, than the king of France is to answer the Gazettees of Amsterdam. 'Why sho ld not he allow, it

(98) In the preface to the second page of the Religion de Jesuits, you will find the words: To judge equitably, say they, of the spirit of this author, let us see the spirit of Mr Arnaud, such as discovered; for the eulogies, he bestows on the first of these books, in the latter, can proceed only from the affection of a father, who idolizes his own offspring, and is struck with a singular fondness for the Esprit de Mr Arnaud, the child of his own brain, on a double account, first, as it is made according to his own image and similitude; next, as it contains his own true character (98).

the assistance of the most refined human policy. Now does not this take in the whole compass of ill morals, as to spiritual sins? Besides, the Jesuits are the men, who have carried farthest, and with the greatest eagerness, the consequences of several doctrines, which were hatched before their time, and which expose kings to continual revolutions [S], Protestants to butchery, and Christian morality to the most deplorable relaxation it is Father Tellier who speaks (99), the Jesuits to neglect answering libels, which in their opinion are no less fabulous and contemptible, than the Gazette of Amsterdam, and the historical or prophetic Systems of Mr Jurieu? Ought they to be more tender in point of reputation, that the powers whom God has placed over us? Ought they not, or, at least may they not, be permitted, after these great examples, to despise what only touches their particular honour? Here are more reasons of theirs, taken from the insignificance of their answers, and the disposition of one part of the public to take for truth, whatever is said against them (100). We no sooner answer one of their satires, but they have half a dozen more ready to be published. They keep magazines full of them, they have them reprinted from all parts of the world. Those that were refuted a hundred years ago, or which the world laughed at, though they were not refuted, they revive again at present, with the same confidence, as if they were new pieces, or had remained unanswered. And the generation, that shall come after them forty or fifty years hence, will do the same with those satires invented in our days, as despicable, and as despised as they are. What use will it be, for instance, to the Jesuits of China, to have been the first, and almost the only men, who submitted, without the least resistance, to the apostolical vicars, in 1684, when this has not hindered their enemies from publishing, the last summer, by the pen of their secretary, the Holland Gazetteer, that the holy father was extremely provoked against the Jesuits, because they would not acknowledge the bishops he had sent to China. Can it be doubted, that, some years hence, this lye will come again upon the stage? In like manner, what advantage will it be to the Jesuits of Germany, to have had an attestation, signed by four of the principal counsellors of the Elector Palatine, all Protestants, in which they declare, that the story of a Jesuit, counterfeiting a voice from heaven to deceive this prince, and to excite him to the destruction of heresy, is a pure fable? Will this act hereafter hinder any good Protestant, who shall continue the History of the Jesuits, from making a chapter of this chimerical adventure, upon the credit of the Holland Gazetteer? Why should we not expect this, when we see the gravest authors of the party seriously tell us the story of the packers of Amiens, with all the circumstances that are capable of making a story ridiculous. . . . After this, let not the Holland Gazetteer repent his publishing, for example, that it was the Jesuits, who by their avarice and wicked councils, engaged the emperor in the last Hungarian war; that the people of Vienna, enraged against them on this account, massacred several of them, when they would have escaped upon the approach of the Ottoman army: that it was they, who burnt Stockholm the last year, (a little before, it was four disguised Turks that did it) &c. Let him not repent his publishing these follies, and an hundred more of the same nature, nor let him change his stile for the future. If they are at present despised, at least he may assure himself, that the time will come, when they shall be very good memoirs for him who shall write the twentieth, or the thirtieth Tome of the Practical Morality (101). You see with how much artifice they take advantage of the prejudice of their enemies; and how they verify the maxim, misfortune is good for something. They turn the hatred of the world against them to their advantage, Frauentur Diis iratis. It is certain, their enemies would hurt them more, if they observed some measure in the blows they give them; for whilst they promiscuously heap on well-grounded accusations with those that are otherwise, they favour the accused; they give him a handle for rendering those suspected, which are really true. A man must be very blind, not to foresee, that several libels, which daily appear against the society (102), will put weapons into their hands. Did they pay the authors for publishing such stories, they might be said to employ their money well. See the remark I have made upon the art of slandering (103). Note, that the Janfenists (104) politically boast, they are not so credulous, with regard to the Jesuits, as the Protestants are.

[S] The Jesuits . . . have carried far . . . the consequences of several doctrines, which were hatched before their time, and which expose kings to continual revolutions. The opinion, that the authority of kings is inferior to that of the people, and that they may be punished by the people, in certain cases, has been taught and practised in all countries, in all ages, and in all Christian communions, that have made any figure in the world. History affords us instances every where of kings deposed at the instigation, or with the approbation of the clergy. The opinion, that sovereigns have received the sword from God, to punish Heretics, is yet more universal, than the former, and has been reduced to practice among Christians, from the days of Constantine to ours, in all the Christian communions, that have had the power in their hands; and a man dares scarce write in Holland against such an opinion. These two doctrines therefore were not invented by the Jesuits; but they have drawn the most odious consequences from them, and such as are most prejudicial to public peace: for, from the conjunction of these two principles, they have concluded, and that, as they think, by consequential reasoning, that an heretical prince ought to be deposed, and Heresy extirpated by fire and sword, if it cannot be done any other way. If sovereigns have received the sword to punish Heretics, it is evident, that the people, the true sovereign of their monarchs, according to the first principle, ought to punish them, when they persist in Heresy. But the gentlest punishment, that can be inflicted on a Heretic, is, doubtless imprisonment, banishment, confiscation of goods; and consequently an heretical king ought at least to be dethroned by the people, his sovereign, and superiour; since, according to the first principle, monarchs are only delegates to whom the people, not being able to exercise its sovereignty in person, recommend the functions and exercise of it, with restrictions, and an inalienable right of resuming them, when they acquit themselves ill. Now there is no case, in which they ought more reasonably to be divested of them, than when they deserve the punishment, which the sovereign, according to the second principle, is ordered by God to inflict on Heretics. But as it is not ordinarily possible by judicial processes to take from them the goods, which they have fairly forfeited by virtue of the laws, which God will have established against Heresy: as, I say, they have most commonly power enough in their hands to maintain themselves in the exercise of royalty; an exercise, which is nothing but usurpation, as long as they are Heretics; it follows, that recourse must be had to artifice, in order to bring them to the punishments, which they have rightfully incurred; that is to say, conspiracies may be formed against their persons; since, otherwise, God would have given the sword to the people, as a true sovereign, for the punishment of Heretics, in vain. On the other hand, if sovereigns have received the sword, to punish the breakers of the two tables of the Decalogue, it follows, that they ought to proceed with greater severity against Heretics, who violate the first table, than against murderers and thieves, who only violate the second; for the infractions of the first are immediate treason against the divine majesty, and affront God directly: whereas the infractions of the second offend him only in an indirect manner. It is therefore the duty of ecclesiastics to excite sovereigns to the punishment of Heretics, violators of the first table of the commandments; and if princes are negligent in this part, that negligence deserves more to be exclaimed against, than a neglect in punishing murderers and robbers. It ought also to be represented, that if the inevitable danger of ruining the state, obliges them to grant Heretics a toleration, they are bound to keep their word no longer than the danger lasts; and this danger ceasing, they ought to resume the sword for the extirpation of Heresy, just as they would resume it against robbers and murderers, when the danger which forced them to make a truce with these, is once over. In a word, if God has given the sword into the sovereign's hand for the punishment of Heresy, the granting it impunity will render them as criminal before God, as the granting impunity to theft, adultery, and murder; and the only thing that can excuse them, would be, that for the avoiding a greater evil, the infallible ruin of the state and church, they were forced to promise the suspension of the penal laws; whence it follows, that they are obliged to their first engagement as soon as that danger is passed; for every oath that engages to the disobedience of the laws of God, is essentially null. Thus you see upon what foundations the Jesuits have built a system, which hath rendered them so odious, and which has given so just a horror for the maxims that several among them have vented. They have built upon a foundation, which they found ready to their hands; they have raised consequence upon consequence, quite out of sight, without being astonished at the hideousness of the objects; they have believed on one hand, that this would turn to the advantage of the church; and on the other, that they did nothing against the art of right reasoning. I shall not examine, whether Logic in effect did not lead them through all these consequences; the matter would be too odious. I content myself with saying, that France, having seen two of her kings successively murdered, under the pernicious pretence, that they were favourers of Heretics, thought she could no better ruin this wretched gradation of consequences, than by overturning the first principle it depends upon. For this reason the third estate of the kingdom (105) resolved to condemn as pernicious all doctrines, which make the authority of monarchs depend on any thing besides God. I add to this an observation of Mr Jurieu: he cannot be suspected of partiality to the Jesuits, and yet it is certain, he praised this reasoning, viz. princes may put Heretics to death, therefore they ought to put them to death; and laughed at a man, who neither blamed those, who do put them to death, nor those, who do not put them to death. Let us see Mr Jurieu's words (106).

(107) The words of this passage, printed in Italy, are taken out of a book of Mr Ferrand, intitled, Reponse à l'Apologie pour la Reformation.

(108) In the eighth letter of the Tableau du Sacerdantisme.

I explain myself (107), and say, that I am for those, who do not put Heretics to death; and it is my opinion, that their example ought to be followed. But as I believe on the other hand, that it is lawful to punish Heretics capitally, I condemn not those, who do it: both do well in my judgment. Mr Ferrand adds this last period to explain his thought, as he says. 'It had not been amiss, if he had added two, or three, or more, to explain it farther. For they, who have any penetration, will be hard put to it, to unfold this author's notion. They will think, he has hit on a very odd medium. He is of opinion, that it is lawful, and consequently very just, to burn the Calvinists; but yet the best way is not to do it: some troublesome disputant will urge thus: It is never permitted to put any to death, but those who deserve it. If it be permitted to put the Calvinists to death, they certainly deserve it. Now how can reason, justice, and equity permit us to suffer those to live in public society who deserve death? I know very well, that a sovereign may, without any crime, give a murderer his life, or a robber, or a rebel, who deserved death: but it is supposed, that they repent; and that, having once fallen into a crime, they now forsake it, and resolve never to return to it more; there is mercy for every sin. But there is nothing like this, in the case of letting Heretics live, who deserve death on account of their Heresy, and who persevere however, and declare their resolution to persevere in it. I should chuse in the same manner to say, that it is just to put robbers, murderers, and sorcerers to death, who profess they will rob, kill, and poison all they can, as long as they are suffered to live.'

Mr Jurieu reasons as well in this passage, as he reasons ill in another book (108), where he maintains, that magistrates are obliged to punish Idolaters, but yet does not blame the impunity, which the States of Holland suffer them to enjoy, for whole ages together. Note, that, in saying he reasons well, I have supplied, by my imagination, a clause that is most essential to his discourse, and which he has omitted. The last period is absurd, unless this be added to it, or something equivalent; and nevertheless, I am for those, who do not put them to death, and it is my opinion their example ought to be followed.

[T] . . . and Christian morality to the most deplorable relaxation.] It was not the Jesuits, who invented the mental reservations, nor the other opinions, that Mr Pascal has charged upon them (109), nor even the philosophical sin (110). They found all this in other authors, either expressly, or in such a manner, as a doctrine is in the principle, that produces it by consequences. But as we have seen in their society a greater number of patrons of these opinions, than in other communities, and that in their hands, the loose maxims grew daily more fruitful, by the earnestness with which they disputed on these points, they have been formally and expressly impleaded. Wretched fruits of disputation! their method of studying has had at least as great a share in it, as the corruption of the heart. Before they come to read moral Divinity, they have dictated one or more courses of Philosophy; they have accustomed themselves to cavil upon every thing; they have wrangled a thousand times upon the ens rationis; they have heard as often the questions maintained pro and con about universals, and many other things of the same nature; their heads are so turned to objection and distinction, that, when they come to handle matters of morality, they find themselves wholly disposed to perplex them. Distinctions offer to them in shoals; arguments ad hominem, oblige you to fortify your self on every hand, and to abate one thing to day, another thing to morrow. All this is very dangerous. Dispute as long as you please upon logical questions; but in morality be content with good sense, and with that light, which the reading of the Gospel sheds on your mind. If you go about to dispute after a scholastic manner, you will not readily find a clew to the labyrinth. It was a very good saying of a certain person, that the books of the Casuists are nothing but the art of cavilling with God (111). These advocates in the court of conscience find out more distinctions and subtilties, than the Lawyers in the civil courts. They make the tribunal of conscience a sort of moral laboratory, in which the most solid truths evaporate into smoke, volatile salts, and vapour. What Cicero said of the subtilties of Logic, admirably agrees with those of the Casuists. 'Dilectici ad extremum ipsi se compungunt suis acuminibus, & multa querendo reperiunt non modo ea quæ jam non possint ipsi dissolvere, sed etiam quibus ante exorta & potius detexta prope retentantur' (112). — The Logicians at last wound themselves with their own edge, and, by enquiring after many things, find not only what they cannot themselves give a solution of, but what overthrows all they have before been raising. A man is caught in webs of his own spinning; he is lost, and knows not how to turn himself; nor has he any way to disengage, but by relaxing in almost every article. They, who have read Father Pirot's book (113) will own, that it is easier to censure it, and perceive, that it contains dangerous doctrines, than answer his objections.

On the whole, tho' the Jesuits are not the authors of the relaxed opinions, and tho' they are daily maintained by others, yet they ought not to think it hard, that they are charged with them; whilst we go upon a principle, which they themselves approve, with regard to the version of Mons (114).

[U] The queen . . . of Spain has made a grant to the Jesuits of the house, in which Ignatius was born.] The particulars of this affair are to be found in a book, printed at Salamanca in 1689. It is intitled Averiguaciones de las Antiquidades de Cantabria (115). The author calls himself Gabriel de Henao, a name that has appeared in the title page of several books in folio, and among others of a book which might be called a Curious Account of Paradise. Gabriel de Henao, is a Jesuit, professor of Divinity in the royal college of the society at Salamanca. He has endeavoured to bring to light the antiquities of Cantabria, only because it was the country, in which Ignatius was born. He says, that, at present, this province takes in Guipulcoa, Biscay, and the country of Alava. These two last countries produced Ignatius's ancestors. The first gave him birth in the territory of Azpeytia; for the castle of Loyola is situated in this territory. The fons of the church of St Sebastian d'Azpeytia, in which Ignatius was baptized, are a continual object of devotion. Women with child flock thither, and passionately desire their children may be christened at them, and take the name of Ignatius, or Ignatia as an omen of good fortune. The castle of Loyola, where this saint was born, is standing to this day, and is called la Santa Casa. Lewis Henry de Cabrera, and Teresa Henrietta Velasco de Loyola, marquis and marchioness of Alcanizans and Oropeza, last proprietors of this castle, made a solemn grant of it, in the year 1681, to Marianna of Austria, mother to the present king of Spain (116). This princess gave it the year following to the Jesuits, for the founding a college for their society, and only reserved the right of patronage to herself, during her life, and, after her death, to her son the king, and the succeeding kings of Spain. But she imposed upon the donataries the same condition, that was annexed to the cession made to herself of it; which was that they should not be permitted to demolish any part of the castle wall, but content themselves with building by it (117).

(110) This doctrine is almost an unavoidable consequence of the definition of liberty, by which it is asserted, that, to the end any action be free, the agent must have a power of determining himself to the right or left, without being necessitated by any foreign cause. Now this definition is that, which is most commonly received in the church of Rome.

Should I only mention a curious book of Gabriel Henao, without giving any account of it, I might be complained of for having impertinently provoked the reader's curiosity. I shall say then, that this Jesuit published a volume in folio, in the year 1652, intitled, Emphyreologia, seu Philosophia Christiana de Emphyreo celo, in which he so particularly describes the blessedness of Paradise, as to say (118) there will be music in heaven, with material instruments, as on earth. But his account, if I mistake not, is not comparable to that of Lewis Henricus, his brother Jesuit, who affirms (119): that there will be a sovereign pleasure in kissing and embracing the bodies of the blessed; that they shall bathe in the sight of one another, for which there shall be most delicious baths; that they shall swim in them like fishes, and sing as harmonious as larks and nightingales. That the angels shall be dressed like women, and shall appear to the saints in the habits of ladies, their hair curled, their petty-coats fardingaled, and in the richest linnen. That men and women shall divert themselves with majestades, feasts, and balls. That the women shall sing more agreeably than the men, to make the pleasure greater; that they shall rise again with longer hair, and shall be decked with ribands and head-dresses, as they are in this world. That married people shall kiss one other, as in this life, and their pretty sweet children, which will be no small pleasure.

[X] Three sermons, preached upon his beatification, were censured by the Sorbonne. Paul V having beatified Ignatius in the year 1609, the Jesuits kept a solemn festival in all their houses, colleges, and noviciates, where they made choice of, and desired some of the greatest divines who were not of their order, to make his panegyric (120). Valderama, prior of the Augustines of Seville, preached the sermon, the thirty first of July 1610. Peter Deza, dominican of Valencia, preached another, the twenty sixth of January 1610. James Rebulloja, dominican of Barcelona, preached a third the fourth Sunday of Advent 1609. A Jesuit of Limosin, called Francis Solier, translated these three sermons out of Spanish into French, and published them at Poitiers in 1611. In these sermons were found four articles, which the Faculty of Divinity at Paris, assembled in the Sorbonne, the first of October 1611, thundered against in a terrible manner.

The first is in the first sermon of brother P. de Valderama, pag. 54. and 55. We know indeed, that Moses, carrying his rod in his hand, did very great miracles in the air, in the earth, in the water, in the stones, and in every thing he pleased, so far as to drown Pharaoh and his army in the Red-Sea; but it was the ineffable name of God, which, as the learned Tostat, bishop of Avilla, says, was engraven on this wand or rod, which worked these wonders. It was not so great a matter, that the creatures, seeing the commands of God, their sovereign king and lord, subscribed with his own name, should pay him their homage and obedience. Nor was it any great wonder, that the apostles should work miracles, since it was in the name of God, by the virtue and power which he had given them; signing it with his signet, In nomine meo demonia ejicient, linguis loquentur novis, &c. — In my name they shall cast out devils, they shall speak with new tongues. But that Ignatius, with his own name written in paper, should work more miracles than Moses, and as many as the apostles; that his signet should have so much authority over the creatures, as that they should immediately obey him; this is what renders him exceedingly admirable. The second is in page 91. of the same sermon. As long as Ignatius lived, his life and morals were so grave, so holy, and so exalted, even in the opinion of heaven, that there were only some Popes, as St Peter; some emperresses as the mother of God; some sovereign monarch, as God the Father and his holy Son, who had the happiness to see it (121). The third is in brother Peter Deza's sermon, pag. 111, 112. Doubtless the other founders of religious orders were sent in favour of the church, &c. Novissime autem diebus istis loquutus est nobis in filio suo Ignatio, quem constituit heredem universorum. — But in these last days he hath spoken unto us, by his son Ignatius, whom he hath appointed heir of all things: to which there is no other article of praise wanting than per quem fecit secula. — By whom he made the world. The fourth is in brother James Rebulloja's sermon, pag. 207. The martyr Ignatius bore a most particular affection to the holy father and Pope of Rome, as to the lawful successor of Jesus Christ, and his vicar on earth (122).

The Faculty voted and resolved on the first article, that that form of speech, by which the name of the creature is equalled with the name of Almighty God; the miracles done in the name of God are depreciated; and finally, the miracles, which were not as yet certain, are preferred before those, which we are obliged to believe with a Catholic, indubitable faith, is scandalous, erroneous, blasphemous, and impious. As to the second, that assertion, which pretends, that God received any good from the vision of the creature is of itself detestable, false, and a notorious Heresy. As to the third, which appropriates the text of St Paul, Novissime autem, &c. to any other than Jesus Christ, it is execrable, and blasphemous, and impious. As to the last article, it has two contrary parts, one of which destroys the other: the last indeed is Catholic, and approved; namely, that the Pope is the vicar of Jesus Christ on earth; but the first, viz. that the Pope is the lawful successor of Jesus Christ, is a proposition manifestly false, and altogether heretical. Signed C. Petit Jan curate of St Peter (123).

Father Solier published a very bold and threatening apology for them (124), in which he says, amongst other things, that it ought to be remembered, that one speaks after a popular manner in sermons and declamations, and chiefly in that style, which they call demonstrative and encomiastic, which more easily admits amplifications than the deliberative and judicial kind (125), and that it is easy to discover when the preacher advances a conception rather to delight the ear, than seriously to instruct the auditors (126). He shewed that Lewis de Grenade, St Antoninus, and St Bernard, have made as bold applications of scripture, and even bolder than those complained of. He cites many scripture passages (127), to justify this thought of Valderama: as long as Ignatius lived, his life and his manners were not universally known: none but God the Father, and his Son, having the happiness to see it; but as soon as he was dead, all the courtiers of the king eternal ran to see him (128). He asks (129), if, when the Holy Ghost says, in the canticles, to a chosen soul, ostende mihi faciem tuam, sonet vox tua in auribus meis, vox enim tua dulcis & facies tua decora; it would be ill translating, or blaspheming, or paraphrasing, this passage, to say, my dove, let me see thy face, and hear thy voice; forasmuch as thy voice is sweet, and thy countenance beautiful. He answers nothing concerning the fourth proposition, which was censured, and seems to be ignorant that it was condemned.

condemned. Not but he undertook to justify the four articles; but he supposes, that the fourth was this: that only the order of St Francis, works miracles in matter of voluntary poverty (130). 'For a lay-brother of his order, says he, with the cord, which serves him for a girdle, in his hand, works more miracles, than ever the rod of Moses did; because the latter only drew water from a rock; but this extracts bread, wine, flesh, and whatever he has need off, from hearts harder than flint.' He excuses this two ways; first, by saying it is one of those notions a preacher advances, not as a serious doctrine, but to tickle the ears of his auditors: Secondly, by maintaining that, even literally, the proposition is true. But, says he, though we should take it in strict speaking, and with all the rigours of the school, it is not true, that it is a greater work to mollify an heart steeld by sinful habits, and hardened in iniquity, than to make living water spring out of a rock? Has not St Bernard said in this sense, that Jesus Christ worked a greater miracle in the conversion of Mary Magdalen, than in raising her brother Lazarus from the dead? He had better have confined himself to the first reason, which was only to represent, that there is an indulgence due to the fallies of an orator, and the eloquence of the pulpit, especially amongst Monks; and that the day of the panegyric is in possession of almost an unlimited licence. But this hinders not, that sometimes the enthusiasms of this licence ought to be censured; as the archbishop of Rheims has lately done (131). I forget not, that Scoppius (132) has been very merry upon a place of this Peter Deza's sermon. It is that, where the preacher exhibits, as a great miracle, the happiness the Jesuits have had in obtaining whatever they desired in an age so covetous, so hard-hearted, and void of charity.

Hospinian, speaking of this matter, has said a thing which, no doubt, he has persuaded a great many of, and which notwithstanding seems to be very false. He says, that the Jesuits themselves composed these three sermons; but that, for the greater honour of their St Ignatius, they gave out that the Spanish dominicans had preached them. He adds, that this fraud was discovered (133). Common sense revolts against this accusation; for suppose the Jesuits as wicked as you please, it will not do; you must farther suppose them stupid, and as foolish as children; since none but blockheads could possibly imagine, but that, in two months at farthest, they should be exposed in the face of the world, if they ventured to print, that such and such Monks, distinguished by their place of residence, their dignities and names, had preached such and such things, such a day, in such a town. Such falsehoods cannot fail of being presently confuted by a public and judicial contradiction, which renders the liar the eternal subject of his enemies derision. If none but fools could foresee this imminent mortification, nothing but a brutal stupidity would, upon such a foresight, have exposed itself to the hazard; so that there is all kind of probability to make us believe, that the Jesuits, who are very jealous of the honour of their order, and very tender of their interests, and narrowly observed by vigilant enemies, have not falsely fathered the three sermons, which Francis Solier printed at Poitiers; and since the Janfenists (134) attribute only the French translation to the Jesuits, it is an evident proof, that Hospinian is mistaken. This brings to my mind a charge of forgery, which proved unfortunate to the Capuchins of Paris. They pretended, that the approbation of one of their fathers, prefixed to a book of Amadeus Guimenius, was fictitious. We declare, said they, that not any one of us approved that book, and farther, that there neither has been, nor is in our congregation any provincial monk, who is called Luifius of Valencia, who has been twice provincial minister of the Frier minors of St Francis, Capuchins of the province of the Blood of Jesus Christ, in the kingdoms of Valencia and Murcia, Master of Arts, first professor, and Jubilate reader of sacred Divinity, and counsellor qualificador of the Inquisition of both kingdoms; and that we have not in Spain any province so called. We protest also that these pompous titles, wherewith the author of this forged approbation is adorned, are very remote from the simplicity we profess. We declare these things, upon the testimony of our most reverend father general, who having understood, that this book was published with this approbation, has testified what we have said. This declaration of forgery was confuted in all its parts by authentic acts, attended with all the formalities, that the most judicial procedure could require (135). What did the good Capuchins of Paris think of? Could they imagine, that practised forgers would specify so many characters, proper names, titles of dignity, places of residence, if they had a false approbation to produce? Would not this be pointing out the track to their enemies, to take the hare in its form? Would not this be leading by the hand to the discovery of the imposture? The Janfenists have publicly acknowledged, that the certificate of the Capuchins of Paris contains a false allegation (136).

Note, by the way, that the proper names are wretchedly disguised in this relation of Hospinian; probably by the negligence of the correctors. You find Valderanna, and Vualderanna, instead of Valderama; Doza instead of Deza; Testatus instead of Tostatus; Tilefac instead of Filefac (137); Ducal instead of Du Val (138).

[2] . . . which doubtless were a fresh accession to Stephen Pasquier's discontent. The news of Ignatius's beatification could not but be disagreeable to this writer, a great enemy to the Jesuits, and who had but lately ridiculed their founder in a public work (139) so as to preface, in some measure, that the artifices made use of at Rome, to get him canonized, would come to nothing (140). We may therefore believe, that his displeasure increased in proportion to the noise the pomp of this beatification made all over Europe: I cannot conceive a severer mortification, than his seeing a person beatified, of whom he had spoken very ill. If he had been a Protestant, he would have laughed at the judgment of the court of Rome; but he professed himself a Roman Catholic: he could not therefore deny but that his slanders had been confuted in the most authentic manner possible, and himself condemned by the whole church of Rome, which acquiesced in the Pope's decree. It was a wretched come-off, to say, as his children did in their answer to Garasse, that he did not believe the founder of the Jesuits would one day be beatified. It is an unlucky inconvenience in the Roman communion, that a man runs the risk of seeing himself forced to keep the seals of those persons devoutly, and to invoke them, whom he formerly satirized. This should make critical authors more circumspect. I attack a man, they ought to say to themselves, who perhaps may get into the litanies before I die: let us be cautious of every thing, and consider what may come to pass. It is true, Lewis XII did not think a king of France obliged to revenge the injuries offered to a duke of Orleans; but how do we know whether the beatified are of this humour? Do not the country curates say, a thousand and a thousand times over, that the saints send plagues and famines, &c. to punish the neglect of their chapels and images? If the fault of these indelovout people is chastised by a public disaster, which falls even on the innocent, has not this particular censor, author of the Jesuits Catechism, reason to fear St Ignatius's repentment.

arose in France about the day of his festival [Z], after Pope Urban VIII had published the bull of his canonization.

His Life has been written by near twenty authors: one of them calls himself John Eusebius of Nieremberg: his work was severely censured, if we believe Father Baron [AA]. I need not add, that the Jesuit Bouhours is one of his patriarch's Historians; it being a thing notorious enough. What Grotius has said of Loyola, and the Jesuits, is not the least beautiful part of his history (i). His expressions are well chosen, grave and noble. There is nothing in it that favours of invective; but all bespeaks a soul sedately possessing it self, and able to hold the ballance in equilibrio. But the more he shews himself exempt from passion and partiality, the more capable he is of persuading a thing, which, to say no worse of it, has no certainty. He maintains, that the profession of a Jesuit does not exclude marriage [BB]; that a man, when he is of the society, may has secured him from the danger of inconstancy. Have you praised a man, who dextrously hid his faults? He loses his art, is universally cried down, and you are censured for your incense. Perhaps too he becomes your enemy, and your furious persecutor; this has opened your eyes; you have seen him to the bottom, and have turned your encomiums into satire; for which you are exposed, as at variance with your self. These inconveniencies would not have happened, if you had not been overhasty in dealing out your praises. Besides, men of merit have not always the gift of perseverance; they lose themselves in prosperity, or in other conjunctures, which the general course of affairs produces. You are ashamed to have been the herald of their praises; your ears being stung with ungrateful reproaches on that account. We might avoid all this, would we wait as long, before we pronounced a man praise-worthy, as Solon did to pronounce him happy.

nerable to all France, had it not been restored by a decree of the parliament of Paris, passed upon an excellent discourse of the advocate-general. Mr Heidegger might have cited John Lætus (148), or rather James Rævus (149), cited by John Lætus, but what good would this have done?

[AA] The Life of St Ignatius by John Eusebius of Nieremberg was severely censured, if we believe Father Baron. This dominican assures us, that the censor, who was commissioned to examine this Life, reported to the judges that he found it so full of faults that it deserved to be expunged from beginning to end. Adeo mendosum librum ut esset inmendabilis, & à capite ad calcem spongia delendus; nonnulla etiam notavit quæ stomachum & indignationem audientibus moverant (150). Father Papebroch, (151) answering a Carmelite, who alledged this passage, has observed, that Vincent Baron is not to be credited upon this subject, and that the condemnation of the book of Nieremberg concerns only the second edition (152), and is moderated by a donec corrigatur. He adds, that the third edition, enlarged with the Life of Francis Xavier, went off without any opposition.

But as to censure, and criticism, you are not secure, though you wait till the person is dead: there shall arise, it may be, a Pope, who will enroll among the saints the man whom you have treated ill, and bid you, adora quod incendisti, recommend yourself to the intercession of him, whom you have offended. I do not know but the French, who have abused Innocent XI, both in his life-time, and since his death (144), may experience this unlucky fate. It resembles those decrees of parliament, which force a man to marry the woman he has dishonoured.

[Z] Some differences arose in France about the day of his festival. Mr Heidegger relates, that the Pope, having assigned for St Ignatius's festival the same day which by ancient prescription had belonged to St Germain (145), the Jesuits raised the name of St Germain out of the Calendar, to put their Founder's name in it's place (146). The French took offence at this by reason of their great veneration for St Germain. The prince of Condé, a patron of the Jesuits, affirmed that St Ignatius appeared to him, the day they were celebrating his feast at Rome. The cause being brought to Rome was determined in the following manner. The Pope decreed, that the feast of St Germain, and St Ignatius should be kept the same day; but if they could not agree together, Ignatius as being the junior, should be obliged to stay till leap-year, when he should have the intercalated day wholly to himself. 'Lis ad Pontificem delata ridicula ita decisa est, ut eodem die simul Germanus & Ignatius celebraretur: quod si simul stare nolle viderentur, expectaret Ignatius, seu recentior, annum bissextilem, & diem, qui tum intercalatur, sibi eximium haberet (147).' I wish Mr Heidegger had cited some good author; for I do not find all this in the letter to a counsellor of parliament on a writing of Father Annat. We find this letter in the first Tome of the collection of pieces concerning the New Testament of Mons, and this is what we read at the 503d page: 'Who knows not, that, as soon St Ignatius was canonized, the Jesuits substituted him in the place of St Germain bishop of Auxerre, whom they insolently razed out of the Calendar; where we should have no more seen this great name so ve-

[BB] Grotius maintains, that a Jesuit's vow does not exclude marriage. His words are these: 'Transgressi in morem non una habitant omnes. Angustum videbatur Societatis incrementa parietibus includere: DANT NOMINA ET CONJUGES (153). They do not all dwell together. It seemed narrow, to confine the increase of the society within walls: THEY GIVE NAMES AND WIVES.' Pasquier, pleading against the Jesuits in the year 1564, affirmed (154), that their society was composed of two sorts of men, the first whereof, say they are of the great observance, and the others of the less. Those of the great observance are obliged to four vows; for, besides the three ordinary ones of obedience, poverty, and chastity, they make one particularly in favour of the Pope. Those, who are of the lesser observance, are obliged to no more than two vows, one respecting the fidelity they promise to the Pope, and the other obedience towards their superiors and ministers. These latter do not vow poverty; but it is lawful for them to hold benefices without dispensation, to succeed their fathers and mothers, to acquire lands and possessions, as if they were not obliged to any religious vow. (155) This same ordinance makes it possible for all people to be of this order. For as, in this lesser observance, there are no vows made, either of virginity, or poverty, so it indifferently takes in priests and laymen, married or unmarried, since they are not obliged to reside, with the great observancers. But they may inhabit with the rest of the people, provided that, on certain and prefixed days, they appear at the house common to them all, to participate in their grimaces.' But let us see what was answered him by the Jesuit Richome (156). The fifth lie is in the same pleading, where, having discoursed like a dotard upon the rule of the Jesuits, and told a great many pitiful and silly lies, at last he adds one of a larger size, big with many others, saying, this same ordinance makes it possible for all people, &c. And after having fooled sufficiently, he fastens the tail to his chimera, and concludes. So that following this law and rule, it is no absurdity to see a whole town of Jesuits. This lie ought not to be reckoned a single one; for it contains as many as there are words. I have been a member of this society above twenty years, and have carefully read it's constitutions, may live where he pleases, and cohabit with his wife. Pasquier had said the same thing, and was publicly charged with a falsehood. I have not found, that he answered the adversary, who treated him as a downright slanderer. Grotius was to be pitied, if he had no other warrant, than Pasquier.

tions, but never heard of the lesser or greater obsequy among the Jesuits; nor have I ever read one word of it, either in their books, or in their bulls expedited by the Popes for their establishment. And to one and all, the vows of chastity, poverty, and obedience, are so exprets, that no body can doubt of them; besides, who ever saw a married Jesuit among them? or rather, who ever heard any one speak of it, besides Pasquier?

Perhaps Grotius might find himself upon the bare testimony of Pasquier, looking on it as incontestable, since it was not probable, that a man would venture to utter a falsity of this nature, in full parliament, and in so solemn a cause; but the surest way is to mistrust appearances, and never to judge upon the report of one of the parties. Audi & alteram partem; keep one ear for the accused; inform yourself of the answer of each party; is a rule that ought never to be forgotten. The lie, that was given to this advocate, is found in a work printed in 1599. Pasquier, two or three years after, published his Catechism of the Jesuits, in which he repeated many of the things he had advanced before, and maintained them against the apologists for the society. He insists (157) chiefly on an examination of the simple vows, which the Jesuits are obliged to make: but does not reply one word about the two kinds of Jesuits, which he had informed the world of, one married, the other unmarried. This makes me believe, that he discovered his error. The Janseist, who, in 1688, published an apology for the censures of Louvain and Douay, supposes (158), that there are concealed Jesuits, who without wearing the habit, are yet of the society, and are left in the world for its interests; but he does not say, that they are permitted to marry. In vain shall we endeavour to excuse Grotius by the testimony of an anonymous writer, who printed a little book in 1682, intitled, The Emperor and Empire betrayed, how, and by whom. This author advances the same thing as Pasquier, and suspects even the emperor to be a Jesuit of the second class. 'My jealousy, says he (159), of his Imperial majesty, encreases the more, because it is notorious, that there are several sorts of religious among the Jesuits; some who are dispensed with, not only as to the habit, but who are even allowed to marry, and to be invested with all sorts of offices and dignities; that if his Imperial majesty, through too great a zeal for his religion, was, in his younger years, unfortunately engaged in this order, under the aforesaid dispensations, we need no longer wonder at any part of his behaviour to the Protestants; for though he were only of the lesser order, in which it is permitted to marry, and to possess all sorts of offices and dignities, it is however true, that in every thing else, and particularly in matters of religion, he would be under the obedience of the general of the Jesuits, and consequently obliged to make peace and war, just as the general of the society should think fit for the interests of the Papal court, and the society. The war he perpetually makes against the Protestants of the Upper Hungary, his immense presents to the society with the scandalous and disgraceful signing of the last peace (160) All this smells strong of an obedience, which knows no other duty, nor rule of justice and piety, than the absolute command of his superior: and I see nothing in the conduct of this prince, whether in his way of living, and his perpetual applications to Jesuitical comedies, music, or pilgrimages, sometimes to one relic, sometimes to another, together with whatever may discover his natural or habitual inclinations, that contradicts this opinion. Yet once more, it would be impertinent, in favour of Grotius, to alledge such a libeller, who dares so insolently and disrespectfully speak of his Imperial majesty. These writers would be too obligingly treated, should we lay to them; I expected proof, and you bring me vulgar stories (161). For they most commonly vent, not only what they have heard themselves, but what they have forged in the mint of their own brain. He, whom I have cited, and Mr Jerieu, would afford matter of laughter to all the world; the one maintains, that the Jesuits betrayed the house of Austria in favour of France, and the other, that they would be always disposed to betray France, in favour of the house of Austria (162). That which is certain is, that the Imperial court has observed such a conduct for above these twelve years past (163), as is an invincible proof, either that the Jesuits have no credit there; or that their councils are adopted to the temporal interests of the emperor, preferable to the advantages of the Catholic religion in general; and if the author of the libel had understood politics, he might easily have seen, that the signing of the peace of Nimwegen was the best and noblest resolution the house of Austria could take, considering the posture of affairs, after the particular peace of France with the United-Provinces. But this author did not consider it so closely; and, if he had been alive in 1697, I doubt not but he had been the promoter of news, not unlike what we have seen above (164). The Historical Letters of October, that year, have this in them. 'It has been for some time reported, that the Jesuits had formed a conspiracy, against the emperor and the king of the Romans, and that one of them had already been executed. They write from Vienna, that this is a meer calumny; so that the emperor, to deceive the public, has ordered his council of regency to publish an act in High-Dutch upon this subject (165). The author of the Historical Letters gives a French translation of this Imperial act.

(a) He was then explaining Apollonius Rhodius.

LUBBERT, (SIBRAND) professor of Divinity at Franeker, was born at Longoworde in Friseland, about the year 1556. He went through his classical learning in the college of Bremen, and studied afterwards in the university of Wittemberg, where he learned Hebrew to a great perfection, under the professor Valentine Scindlerus, after which he went to Geneva, and diligently attended the lectures of Beza, Casaubon, and Francis Portus (a). He went afterwards to Neustadt, whither prince Casimir had removed the Calvinistical professors. He chiefly frequented the lecture of Zachary Ursinus, and insinuated himself into his intimacy and favour. He was one day praised by him, in such a manner as was at the same time a good proof of this professor's modesty [A]. Our Lubbert had an offer of being substitute to Ursinus in the Logic professorship,

[A] He was one day praised by him in such a manner, as was a good proof of this professor's modesty. He had misquoted David Kimchi in a public lecture, and being told of it by our Sibbrand, he acknowledged his fault in the next lecture, and pointed out the person who had set him right. You will find a larger account of this in the following Latin: 'Accidit aliquando, ut D. Ursinus in lectione publica Kimchium citaret, quem noster quoque antea ad eundem locum confu- luerat. Deprehendebat adolescens, D. Ursinum, Kimchii autoritatem, five errore μνημονεύω, five quod locum obiter insepisset, male allegasse. Mox ait: haec de re præceptorem modelle & verecunde. Is miratus juvenis in Ebraismo peritiam, introduxit eum in Musæum, inspeculoque Kimchii Commentario, rem sese ad eum modum habere deprehendit. Tantum abest ut offenderit clarissimum Theologorum hæc discipuli libertas, ut postmodum in lectione publica errorem illum suum retractaverit, monstrato D. Sibbrand, quem sibi ejus indicium secisse profitebatur.

fellowship, with the promise of a better employment, in due time; but he modestly answered, that he did not think himself qualified to fill a place, in which this illustrious professor had acquired so much glory. Nevertheless, Urfinus had found none amongst his disciples besides him, fit to be recommended to this place. It was given to Fortunatus Crellius. As soon as Lubbert found himself qualified to be promoted to the ministry; he had a call from the Reformed church of Brussels, and from that of Embden; he preferred the latter, by the advice of Zachary Urfinus. He was called into Friesland in 1584 to be preacher to the governor and deputies of the States of the province, and to read Divinity lectures in the university of Franeker, the foundation whereof was resolved on at that time. He had for his colleagues in the Divinity professorship, Martin Lydius, and Henry Antonides Nerdens; and though they were older than he, he far excelled them. He took his doctor of Divinity's degree at Heidelberg, when he saw himself honoured with a professorship in that faculty at Franeker. He exercised this employment about forty years, and in this long interval, was several times employed in important affairs [B]. He was one of the deputies at the synod of Dort; and one of the best heads in the assembly. His great industry and strong constitution, gave him opportunities of composing several books [C], which were much esteemed. He preached with great zeal, and was very fervent in censuring vice [D], and

tur. Eâ etiam occasione D. Urfinus juventuti facra Ebraïsmi studia, paremque diligentiam commendabat.

Pulcrum est digito monstrari & dicier, hic est (1).

It was more glorious to Urfinus thus to acknowledge his fault, than to Lubbert to be praised for discovering it.

[B] He was several times employed in important affairs. Count William of Nassau, governor of Friesland, and the deputies of the States of the Province frequently admitted him into their council; and when in the year 1594, the town of Groningen and the Ommelanden were added to the body of the United Provinces, he was one of the three ministers (2) who founded a church at Groningen, and drew up the statutes of it. Some time after, a quarrel arose between the ministers of Leuwarden, which was carried on with so much passion and obstinacy, that the only means of restoring peace, was to dismiss them all; whereupon Sibrand Lubbert, Lydius, Nerdens, and John Arceus, were sent to serve that church, and continued in it till these dissensions were ended. He was deputed to the Hague, in the year 1606, to assist in a preliminary assembly, ad conventum præparatorium; and in the year 1618, the States of Friesland deputed him to the synod of Dort (3). One of the English divines, who assisted at that synod observes, that this Friesland deputy grew hot, and flew into a passion, and contributed much more to perplex things, and to foment divisions, than to compose them (4). I have spoken elsewhere (5) of his quarrel with Maccovius; and I add here, that he had some differences with his colleague, the learned Drusus (6).

[C] His great industry and strong constitution, gave him opportunities of composing many books. He generally rose a three at clock in the morning or sooner, neither winter nor old age interrupted this custom; and nothing afflicted him more in his maladies, than to be deprived of the satisfaction of studying. He was scarce ever sick till the last years of his life, his good constitution having all along held out against the ill effects of violent study. Robusta & qualis paucis obtingit, valetudine semper usus fuerat, magno Dei beneficio, in tantis adeoque assiduis laboribus. Postremis annis dolores nephritici ex assiduis studiis contracti & catarbi frequentiores per intervalla eum exercuerunt (7). He published books against Bellarmine, upon the controverties concerning the scripture, the Pope, the church, and councils, and replied to Grotius, who had answered for Bellarmine. He had the last in this dispute, for Grotius did not reply. These works of Lubbert, procured him several letters filled with praises; and he was forced to publish them, as a buckler to the blows of one of his adversaries. Quanti autem hoc præclaris & honorificis Elogiis Præstantissimorum ejus luminum, quorum aliquot evulgationem effraenis adversarii maledicta modestissima animæ expressit (8). Having observed, that the Socinian heresy began to appear in the Low-Countries, he published a book against Socinus de Christo Salvatore (9). He wrote also against Arminius's letter ad H. a Collibus, and against Peter Bertius, who had engaged in the defence of this letter. Afterwards he wrote against Vorstius, and against a book which Grotius intitled Pietas Ordinum Hollandiæ. Having thus declared himself an ardent champion of the Contra-Remonstrants cause, he was often obliged to take pen in hand; but the author of his funeral oration, did not think it proper to insist on this. He declared on the contrary, that he wished all these things might be buried for ever, in the grave of oblivion. De iis quæ postea subsequuta sunt, malo tacere, quam rē δακρυον ἐκδιδόν ἐγχείρειν. Optem enim ex animo, quod ipsa quoque Synodus evocet, infausta illa factionum nomina, quæ mihi hic cum cordolio & horrore usurpanda essent, æternâ oblivioni seipulta esset. Si volumus coire Ecclesiæ vulnera & cicatricem ducere, cavendum sedulo est, ne investigatorum anguibus imprudenti zelo resudantur (10). The last book that Lubbert published, is his commentary upon the Catechism of the Palatinate. He left an Anti-Bellarminian compleat, which had cost him infinite labour, and it was thought he had some reasons to desire, that this important composition should not be printed in his life-time (11).

[D] He preached with great zeal, and was very fervent in censuring vice. He had the courage to despise the unjust resentment of those, who were sensible that he aimed at them in his censures, and he always went on his own way. The word of God was so powerful in his mouth, that when he pleased, he drew tears from those, who were most hardened in their crimes. He did not stand in his sermons so much to confute Popery, as to reform the depravation of manners, drunkenness, luxury, &c. Let us hear the author of his funeral oration. Nec enim id solum agebat, ut Pontificias superstitiones in animis hominum veritatis flammâ exureret, sed illud vel maxime, ut qui se Evangelicos profitebantur, ab ebrietate, luxu, aliisque flagitiis avulsi, discerent p̄d, sobriè & jussè vivere. Explevit autem omnes sanctissimi muneris partes in utraque Frisia, ea libertate, ut multorum malorum odia hoc solum nomine sibi conciliaverit. Quæ tamen animosus ille Christi pugil, sanctissimi propositi mutatione nequaquam placanda censuit. Quin contra audientior ibat, publicè peccantes, Tros Rutulove esset, nullo discrimine publicitus arguens. Adfuit huic libertati (Deo laboribus ejus insigniter benedcente) admirabilis efficacia. Qui eum concionantem audire, supersunt autem adhuc plurimi, ajunt eum vel pertinacissimis & deploratissimis hominibus lacrimas, quoties volebat, expressisse. Devotæ autem & contritæ animæ vix unquam sicca oculis eum audire (12). — Nor was it his only care to purge out of the minds of men Popish superstitions by the force of truth, but he was also particularly studious in endeavouring to make those, who professed themselves of the evangeilic faith, to abstain from drunkenness, luxury, and other vices, that they might learn to live, piously, soberly, and justly. He exercised the duties of the ministry in both the Frieslands with such boldness, that he drew upon himself the ill will of many evil doers; yet such was the heroic constancy of this champion of Christ, that nothing could affright or move him from his holy resolution. On the contrary, he behaved with greater severity, reproving publicly notorious and a severe observer of the statutes; he sometimes refused the dignity of rector, because he feared he could not effectually reform the debauched scholars [E]. He refused a chair of Divinity, which was offered him in the Palatinate, and was become vacant by the death of Kimedontius professor at Heidelberg (b). The governors of the university of Franeker opposed that invitation; and his wife being unwilling to leave her own country, he thanked his electoral highness Frederic IV. He died at Franeker the twenty first of January 1625 (c). Scaliger himself owned him to be a learned man. A letter has been lately published, which informs us, that he was much in king James's esteem [F].

notorious offenders let their rank be what it would. From this liberty of speech (God in a singular manner blessing his labours) there followed wonderful effects. Those who heard him preach, and there are many such alive at this day, affirm, that when he pleased he could draw tears from men who were the most hardened and profligate. As for the pious and the devout they seldom or never heard him with dry eyes.

[E] He sometimes refused the dignity of rector, because he feared he could not effectually reform the debauched scholars. He even desired to be excused assisting at the university assemblies, and upon that condition obliged himself to lectures extraordinary (13), his reason was, because he could not connive at the relaxation of discipline (14). He was grave, and used no complaisance to get the love of the scholars. He severely reprimanded those who took wrong courses. They were angry with him; but the time came, when several of them acknowledged, that they were infinitely obliged to him. In omnibus actionibus erat ferus & gravis. Gratiam favoremque juventutis non alia ratione, quam privata publicaque industria, nec non salutaribus ad pietatem & diligentiam adhortationibus, captare dicerat. Qua ratione etiam subinde petulantiores adolescentes, ut ea ætas solet monitoribus esse aspera, offenderit, eorum tamen plerique, jam viros, eo nomine sibi arctius habuit obligatos (15). Could he have hoped that the ancient discipline would have been re-established, he would not have forsaken the university assemblies, he would have taken his share of the government; but he chose rather wholly to absent himself, whilst he despaired of a reformation. Malebat a publico abstinere, quam illud committere, palam aut fieret, quibus flagitiis coercendis impar esset.

set. Ajebat se boni publici causâ nullas offensas unquam subterfugisse, sed inanes irritaque quæ nec sibi nec collegio usui futuræ essent, constanter deprecabatur (16). A year before his death he was prevailed upon by powerful solicitations, to accept of the dignity of rector; and there was then a probability, that the authority of the sovereign would intervene, to introduce good discipline amongst the young students at Franeker. He began the exercise of his office, with the invocation of the name of God, and with an excellent oration, in which he declaimed against the drunkards and dissolute scholars, and against the debaucheries of the universities, the source of the ill state of the churches; and he menaced those with the severest treatment, who should deserve it: 'In Ebrietatem, juvenutis irreverentiam, & qui dissolutis Academia rum moribus natales suos debet, miserum Ecclesiarum statum graviter dicebat. Discipline necessitatem nervos ostendebat, illudque tandem profitebatur sine ambagibus; se bonis fore Rectorem humanissimum, at malos severiorem præ se non desideraturos.' Here is an example fit to be recommended to all who have offices in universities.

[F] Scaliger himself owned he was a learned man; a letter has been lately published, which informs us, that he was much in king James's esteem. Sibyrus Lubbertus, who is learned, and a good writer, is very ugly and rustic in his person. He is covetous but rich (17); he sells his apples himself, and walks without a cloak, as Felix of Nîmes told me. I want his book de Conciliis (18). The letter I speak of, is Calaubon's; you will find it at the beginning of a book published in 1699, by a famous professor of Franeker (19).

LUBIENIETZKI (STANISLAUS) in Latin Lubieniecus, a Polish gentleman, was one of the most famous ministers the Socinians had in the XVIIth century. He was born at Racow the twenty third of August 1623. He was educated with a particular care by his father, who was minister of Racow, and who not only sent him to the schools, but also took care that he should see the diets of Poland, in order to introduce him to the grandees, and instruct him in all things agreeable to his birth [A]. He afterwards sent him to Thorn, where the young man settled for two years, and joined himself to two Socinian deputies (a) during the conference that was held in this city in the year 1644, for the re-union of religions. He drew up an account of this conference. Being made governor to the young count of Niemirycz, he travelled with him into Holland, and afterwards into France, where he acquired the esteem of several learned men, with whom he conferred upon points of religion, without ever dissembling his own, or neglecting any opportunities of maintaining it. He lost his father in the year 1648, and returned into Poland. He married in 1652, the daughter of a zealous Socinian, and was made coadjutor to John Ciachovius, minister of Siedliski; and as he quickly gave great proofs of his prudence and learning, the synod of Czarcow received him minister, and made him pastor of a church of this name. The irruption of the Swedes made him quit it in 1655, and obliged him to retire to Cracow with his family, the 6th of April 1656. He there

[A] Agreeable to his birth. The family of Lubienietzki is very noble. The person we speak of, was related in the fourth degree to the house of Sobieski, which at present reigns gloriously in Poland (1). Secum solebat ad Comitibus aliosque conventus Regni Nobilium ducere, vel mittere; notitiæque virorum in patria insignium tradere, omnibus illis imbuere quæ & Christianum & Poloniam Regni indigenam decebant. Nobilem, quippe qui ad Serenissimi Regis Poloniæ, qui hodie tanta cum gloria regnat, familiam quarto consanguinitatis gradu remotus, pertinuerit (2). He was wont either to carry him, or to send him to the diets and other meetings of the nobility, that he might gain the acquaintance of persons of the first rank, and receive an early tincture of every kind of knowledge, becoming a Christian and a nobleman of Poland. His family was so illustrious as to stand related in the fourth degree to the king, who at this day sways the Polish sceptre with so much glory. Andrew Lubienietzki appeared much at court, when having imbibed the doctrine of the Unitarians, he resolved to sacrifice his fortune to the profession of this sect. He engaged in it in such a manner, that having exercised the office of deacon, he took upon him that of minister, which he exercised in several places at his own expense. He died in 1625, about seventy two years of age (3). He had two brothers who followed his example; they renounced the favour of their prince to be Socinian ministers. One was called Stanislaus, and the other Christopher. The former died there employed his time in fasting, and prayer, and preaching (b). The town falling again into the hands of the Poles in the year 1657, he followed the Swedish garrison, together with two other Socinians, to supplicate the king of Sweden that the Unitarians, who had put themselves under his protection, might be comprehended in the amnesty, by the peace that should be concluded with Poland. He arrived at Volgaft the seventh of October, 1657, and was very well received by the king of Sweden. He sat at his majesty's table; an honour this prince had done him before at Cracow. He obtained the acquaintance of some Swedish lords, notwithstanding the opposition of the Divines [B], and explained his religion on several occasions. It is even said, that he was favoured with a signal revelation, during the siege of Stetin [C]. He happened to be at Oliva while the treaty of peace was carrying on there, and had the mortification to see the Unitarians excluded out of the amnesty granted to others who were not Catholics. Seeing himself thus deprived of the hopes of returning into Poland, he bent his course towards Copenhagen; he arrived there the twenty eighth of November, 1660, and endeavoured to obtain of the king a place of retreat for his brethren, who had been banished out of Poland. This prince expressed a great respect for him [D], but as this could not produce an establishment for that sect, he returned into Pomerania (c), and there used all the endeavours he could in favour of his party. His adversaries continually disturbing in 1633, having lived about seventy five years (4); the other died at Racow, in 1624, and left a son called Christopher, who was a Socinian minister at Racow and at Lublin (5), and died in the year 1648 (6). He was the father of him who is the subject of this article.

[B] He obtained the acquaintance of some Swedish lords, notwithstanding the opposition of the Divines. It is no wonder that the Swedish lords had more complaisance for our Socinian minister, than the ministers of the Confession of Augsburg; for it is their business, and not that of courtiers, to take care that Heresy does not spread its poison, ne quid Religio detrimenti capiat. It was therefore a natural consequence that Lubienietzki should be opposed by the ministers of the Confession of Augsburg, whilst persons of quality paid him civilities. Cum in Pomeraniâ commoraretur Tractatus pacis expectans, in Magnatum Sueciæ familiaritatem facile venit, aliorum antea contractam amicitiam renovavit, confirmavit, commercium cum iis literarum habuit, ubique testimonium veritatis, Rege Principibusque ultro lacerantibus, perhibuit. Non desuerunt præsertim Stetini Lubieniecio adversarii, quorum odia Theologica expertus est, illaque Concionatores, etiam ad rudem plebeculam, propagare conabantur, inter quos primarius fuit Johannes Micrælius Vir Stetini celebris. Similia quoque Stralsundi expertus est noster, similia tamen ubique veritati dare testimonium non neglexit (7). — While he waited in Pomerania for the treaty of peace, he easily contracted a friendship with the Swedish nobility, his former acquaintance with some of them being renewed, and confirmed by corresponding with them by letters, every where giving his testimony to the truth, being encouraged so to do, by the king and the chiefs of the nobility. At Stetin Lubienietzki met with new enemies, whose theological malice he experienced, most of these were preachers who endeavoured to irritate the people against him, among these was John Micrælius, a man at that time in high reputation in Stetin. At Stralsund this good man met with the like usage, yet he never omitted giving his testimony to the truth wherever he came.

(7) Vita Lubieniecii, fol. 3, verso.

[C] It is said . . . he was favoured with a signal revelation during the siege of Stetin. There is no sect but, in some measure, ascribes to itself extraordinary and miraculous graces. Here is an example of it: our Lubienietzki was at Elbing, while the troops of the emperor and Brandenburg besieged Stetin. Two weighty reasons induced him to pray earnestly to God, that the siege might be raised; for his wife and children were in Stetin; and a Swedish count had promised to turn Socinian, if Lubienietzki could by his prayers obtain, that this town should not be taken. This minister, moved by the interest of his family, and by the hopes of gaining an illustrious proselyte, spent three weeks in fasting and prayer, after which he went to wait upon the count, and assured him, that the town should not be taken. The count, and they who were with him, looked on it as the effects of a delirium, since Lubienietzki had no sooner left them, but he fell sick; but when at six days end it was known that the siege was really raised, the count was much surprized; for no body could tell Lubienietzki the good news he had foretold. The count was challenged upon his promise, but he answered

ed, that having enquired of God, whether he should do well to embrace this minister's religion: God had confirmed him in the Confession of Augsburg. That the reader may see whether I have been a faithful translator, or have heightened the story, I will set down the words of the original: 'Accidit . . . ut Comes Slippenbachius polliceretur Stanislai nostri Religionem amplecti, modò id à Deo precibus obtineret, ut Stetinum urbs non satis munita nec rebus ad obsidionem tolerandam necessariis instructa, de cuius liberatione propterea desperabant, liberaretur ab hostibus. Lubieniecicus imprimis suorum miseriam motus, tribus hebdomadibus & precibus ad Deum ardentibus & jejuniis frequenti consumptis, veniens ad Comitem, urbem extra periculum esse affirmavit, bonoque eos esse animo jussit. Comes adstanteque insinire eum putabant, præsertim quod ab iis reversus, in morbum inciderit. Ejus vero assertio post sex dies litteris Stetino liberato datis confirmata, graviter perterrefecit Comitem. Id enim temporis Lubieniecicus à nemine certus hac de re fieri potuit. Promissum cum Lubieniecicus, pro sua cum Comite familiaritate, aliquando reposceret, dixit ille, sese in genua procubuisse, Deumque orasse patefaceret sibi num Religio Lubieniecii suscipienda esset, nec ne, sed à Deo in confessione Angustanâ confirmatum esse (8).'

[D] The king of Denmark expressed a great respect for him. Lubienietzki kept a great correspondence by letters, which was a singular advantage to him, to introduce him into the favour of great men, who were glad to know by his means private news relating to other countries. The king of Denmark, to whom some of his accounts had been read, was so pleased with them, that he bestowed a place upon Lubienietzki (9), which was to copy for his majesty the letters he received, for which he was to have an annual pension (10). This prince declared to him in private, that he could do no less than grant the Unitarians a settlement at Altena by connivance. He never saw him at court, but he called to him, to hear him discourse of matters of religion; which exposed the Polish minister to envy, it being feared that the king of Denmark would embrace Arianism. Solebat Rex, quotiescunque Lubieniecium in Aula conspexit, reliquis cæteris, cum propius ut accederet compellere, & de religionis capitibus imprimis colloqui. Quæ res invidiam etiam creavit Lubieniecio, timentibus Theologis, ne Rex fieret Arianus (11). This prince ordered his confessor and our Lubienietzki to dispute, and was present. Cum M. Eryco Gravio Aulico concionatore & confessorario suo Rex eum commisit, ipseque disputationi adfuit (12). He endeavoured to prevail with the magistrates of Hamburg, to let him be quiet; but his intercession was not potent enough. Cum iterum iterumque instaret, ut antea fecerat, Magistratus, urbeque per nuntios Lubieniecio interdicere, frustra Secretariatum Regis Poloniæ obtendenti, nihilque proficientibus ejusdem Regis intercessoribus, in lethalem incidit morbum (13). His friends had obtained for him the title of secretary to the king of Poland, because they hoped that that would oblige the magistrates of Hamburg, not to disturb him; but their hopes were frustrated.

disturbing him, he was obliged to quit Stetin, and betake himself to Hamburg, whither he ordered his family the year following (d). He there frequently discoursed with queen Christina, on matters of religion, in the presence of some princes. The second voyage he made to the court of Denmark was favourable enough to him: the magistrates of Fridericksburg consented that the Unitarians should reside in their town, and have the domestic exercise of their religion. But by the endeavours of a Lutheran superintendent, the duke of Holstein gave them orders, some time after, to depart. Lubienietzki struggled a long time with the Hamburg ministers [E]: at last the magistrates gave him punctual orders to depart. He was then sick, and promised to obey them; but he died some days after

[E] He struggled a long time with the Hamburg ministers. They so frequently and instantly solicited the magistrates to make Lubienietzki depart, that he received frequent orders to retire; and it was in vain to say, that his Danish majesty honoured him with his protection, or that he was innocent; for he was forced to yield to the storm (14). However some years after, he returned to Hamburg, thinking they would no more take notice of him; but he was mistaken: a licentiate in Divinity was so vigilant and vehement, as to cause new instances to be made to the magistrates against Lubienietzki; and the clergy had so exasperated the people, by representing Lubienietzki as a public pest, that he durst hardly stir out of his lodgings. Post annos aliquot consilio amicorum, credentium jam de furore remississe adversarios, ob commoditatem dirigendam litterarum Hamburgum se contulit cum familia, sed nimis vigilantem expertus est Dominum Edvardii Licentiatum Theologum, qui indefesso studio id egit, ut cum collegis suis magistratum incitaret ut Lubieniecium urbe ejiceretur. Dignus qui hic nominetur, gloriatur enim, se auctorem Lubieniecium cum familia urbe exactum. Imo propter Ministrorum zelum, qui etiam ex cathedra in templo cum absente Lubieniecio disputabant, eumque hæreticum, teterimamque civitatis pestem proclamabant; ut ex Lubieniecii manuscripto colligi potest, quod jam fecerant cum primâ vice per Hamburgum Hafniam transiret anno 1667. Lubieniecio ante migrationem, domo exire non semper tutum fuit (15). — Some years after, by the advice of his friends, who imagined that the rage of his enemies was by this time somewhat abated, he removed with his family to Hamburg, for the convenience of his epistolary correspondence; but Mr Edvard, a licentiate in Theology, was so vigilant, that by his own interest, and that of his colleagues, he wearied the magistrates till they banished Lubienietzki the city. It is fit this man's name should here be recorded, because he made it his boast, that it was by his means, that Lubienietzki, with his family, were expelled the city. Tea such was the zeal of the clergy, that they disputed in the church against the absent Lubienietzki, declaring him a Heretic, and a very plague to the city; as may be collected from a manuscript of Lubienietzki's, and they did this even the first time that he passed thro' that city in his way to Copenhagen in 1667. Before he left the place, it was not safe for him to stir out of doors. What the Sieur Edvardus did in this town, was practised at Fridericksburg by John Reinboht, who excited the duke of Holstein to banish the Socinian refugees. His pacis discessit Hafniâ, venitque Fridericopolim, ibique à Magistratu urbis obtinuit ut exules in communionem & sacram & civilem reciperentur, privationemque in ædibus more Polono exercitium Religionis perageretur; quod etiam per literas Fratribus significavit. Lubieniecus in id laboravit, nec sumptibus pepercit & damnum rei familiaris subiit, quo posset eo frates deducere, deductis succurrere, donec ex urbe fecedere jussi sunt à Principe Holstiae, quod debent partim Domino Superintendenti Lutheranæ Joanni Rembotto (16). — These things being settled, he quitted Copenhagen, and went to Fridericksburg, where he obtained the consent of the magistrates, that the exiles should be received into all the rights of the city, sacred and civil, and that they should be permitted to celebrate divine service in private houses after the Polish manner; which by letters he signified to the brethren. Lubienietzki laboured in this matter without sparing cost, and even to the detriment of his own affairs, that he might draw the brethren together, and relieve them when they came to him, till they were obliged to leave the city by the command of the duke of Holstein, in some measure partly procured by the Lubie-ran superintendent John Reinboht. Mr Mollerus affirms the same thing. Socinianis, says he (17), ab oppidi Friderichstadiensis Magistratu, & incolendi istud potestatem, & sacrorum exercitii libertatem, a. 1662. obtinuit Stanisl. Lubienitzius, promachus scetæ istius non incelebris, sed incassum. Sereniss. enim Dux Holstæ-Gottorpensis, quo ignaro hæc erant gesta, edicto publico, suâ Johan. Reinbohtii, Theologi aulici, promulgato, & civitate illa, & ditionibus suis unitis, non multo post iisdem interdixit. Lubienitzius ipse, quem singulari Rex Daniæ, Frid. III. favore dignabatur, urbe, quam per aliquot lustra, connivente Magistratu, incolerat, Hamburgensi a. 1675. Edvardi & Pastorum ordinariorum instinctu, jussus excedere, antequam obsequi Senatui posset, veneno, cibis ipsius immixto, cum biga filiarum d. 18. Maji periiit. — Stanislaus Lubienietzki, the famous champion of that sect, procured from the magistrates of Fridericksstadt, in the year 1662, that the Socinians should not only be allowed to inhabit this place, but also to have divine service, after their manner, celebrated therein, but in vain. For his most serene highness, the duke of Holstein-Gottorp, without whose knowledge this had been transacted, did, by the persuasion of John Reinboht, a Divine of his court, publish an edict, whereby he commanded him to quit that city, and every other part of his dominions. As for Lubienietzki being favoured in a particular manner by Frederick III. king of Denmark, after living some time, by connivance of the magistrates, at Hamburg in 1675, through the interposition of Edvard, and other ministers, he was ordered to withdraw; but before he could obey the injunction of the senate, he, with two of his daughters, were destroyed with poison given them in their food on the eighth of May. There is hardly any person among the Catholics, or Protestants, but will praise this conduct of the Lutheran ministers. If you alledge to them, that it is expressing too much diffidence of their cause, they have good answers ready. They will tell you, that diffidence is the mother of security, and when Jesus Christ promised his church, that the gates of hell should not prevail against it, he meant not to exclude humane means, which are most proper to preserve orthodoxy: I mean the edicts of princes, which stop the mouth of the heterodox, and stifle the knowledge of objections, which might be made against the sound doctrine: if you reply, that, after all, they behave themselves as if they had not read the book of Eldras (18), in which the force of truth is represented superior to all others, whether that of wine, or a king, or of women; and that, on the contrary, they believe it unable to subsist in the places where it sways, if it be left exposed to the attacks of three or four fugitives (19); they will answer you, that the heart of man is more inclined to evil than good, and that therefore error is more capable of seducing him, than truth of undeceiving him; so that Christian prudence does not suffer us to allow Heretics the proposing their arguments. I question whether there ever was any subject more fruitful in answers and replies; it may be turned several ways in every sense; and hence an author will maintain to you to day, that truth need only shew itself to confound hereby; and to-morrow, that if hereby be suffered to expose it's subtilties, it will quickly corrupt all the inhabitants. One day you shall have truth represented as an immoveable rock, another you shall be told, that it ought not to be put to the hazard of a dispute, as being a rencounter in which it would dash itself in pieces with respect to the hearers. What are we to do in this volubility of reasonings (20)? There are some who preserve truth as they do a piece of China-ware, and seem to be convinced, that as it has the transparency, so it has the brittleness of crystal (21).

at Frankfurt 1605, 8vo. His Latin verses are in the third tome of the Delitiae Poëtarum Germanorum. We shall find in the following remark the title of some other of his works.

[B] and one among the rest, in which he pretended to explain the origin of sin by a new hypothesis. He established two co-eternal principles, not body and vacuum, as Epicurus, but God and nothing; God as a good principle, and nothing as an evil principle. He added, that sin was only a tendency towards this nothing, and that sin had been necessary, that the nature of good might be known. He applied to this nothing, all that Aristotle had said of the first matter (3). One may easily see that all this is chimerical, and wholly unable to lessen the difficulties about the origin of evil; for who is so stupid as not to see, that nothing is not capable of producing any thing, either as an efficient cause or as a passive subject, and it is as impossible for sin to proceed from nothing, as it is for the finner: consequently it is as necessary to assign a positive cause to sin as the finner. It is no wonder then, that this hypothesis of Lubin should not pass. The professor Grawerus, who confuted it, had no hard task of it. He had the suffrages of Mylius, Huttenus, Piscator (4), Schluffelburgius, Major, and Petrus, and many others (5).

[C] He was attacked upon it by some Divines. I will give Mr Baillet's account of it (6). 'Eilhard Lubin had composed a book, more than metaphysical, upon the origin and nature of sin, in which he sufficiently discovered himself to be of the number of the Lutherans of the old stamp, concerning election, reprobation, justification, human liberty &c. His book was printed at Rostock, in the duchy of Mecklenburg, in 1596, and re-printed in the same town four years after, in 8vo and in 12mo, with the title of Phosphorus, de prima causa, & natura mali Tractatus Hypermetaphysicus, in quo multorum gravissimæ dubitationes tolluntur & errores deteguntur. Grawerus . . . exclaimed at Lubin's Phosphorus, as if it had been a comet. He accused him of running into the most exorbitant paradoxes, and wrote against him a little after. Lubin answered him, to let him see that his accusations were pure calumnies, and printed a new book at Rostock, in the year 1600, with the title of Apologeticus quo Alb. Graw. Calumniis respond. &c. which was re-printed in 1605, in 4to, in the same town. Grawerus hereupon was obliged to defend himself in his turn, which he did in the Anti-Lubin, printed at Magdeburg in 1606, in 4to, with the title of Anti-Lubini, five Elenchus Paradoxorum Lubini, & Emblematum Calvinisticorum, &c. De prima causa, & natura mali. This was only an answer to Lubin's Phosphorus, but Grawerus made another to it for his Apologeticus, which was printed by way of appendix, with the Anti-Lubin, under the title of Responsio ad elumem Lubini Apologeticum. I do not know whether Lubin appealed to the Divines of the confession of Augsburg, against Grawerus's ill usage, and whether with that intention he wrote the book intitled Tractatus Theologicus de causa peccati, ad Theologos Augustanae Confessionis in Germania, which he published the year following at Rostock, in 4to; but I can affirm that all these works have not hindered posterity from believing him a better Humanist than Divine.

[D] He married twice. His first wife, widow to James Backmeißer, professor of the Hebrew tongue at Rostock, lived seven years with him, and bore him no children. The second bore him nine. She was daughter to William Lauremberg, a famous Physician (7).

LUCIDUS (JOHN) surnamed Samothæus, or Samofatheus, lived in the XVIth century. A book of Chronology, which he published at Venice in 1537 in 4to, gave him reputation [A]. It is said that the name which he took was not his true name [B]. David Blondel did not know the time in which this author flourished, for he places him in the year 1510, among such as have spoken of Pope Joan (a).

[A] A book of Chronology gave him reputation. Vossius witnesses this in the following words: 'Anno cijo xxxviii facile locum suum tuebat Joannes Lucidus Samofatheus: qui anno eo Venetiis labores suos Chronologicos, non sine eruditæ cavæ applausu, diffundebat. In iis sunt ista: Emendationes temporum ab orbe condito; canones in perpetuam temporum tabulam; de vero die Passionis Christi; Epitome emendationis Calendarii Romani (1). — In the year 1537, John Lucidus Samofatheus easily held his place, who this year published at Venice, not without great applause, his Chronological labours. In these are contained the emendation of times from the beginning of the world; Chronological Canons; of the true day of Christ's suffering; Epitome of the emendation of the Roman Calendar. The account here given us of the pieces contained in the work of Lucidus, is taken, word for word, from the Bibliothèque de Gesner. Vossius might have said, that Lucidus published a new edition of this book, in the year 1546, wherein he gives us to understand, that he was writing in the year 1545, and that he looked upon that year as extremely proper for the reformation of the Calendar. 'Hoc igitur anno Domini 1545, says he (2), maxime convenit, ut emendetur Calendarium Romanum in hoc generali Concilio, postquam reformata fuerit Ecclesia, in eis quæ pertinent ad fidem, atque ad bonos mores, quæ magis necessaria sunt. Hæc enim oportet facere, & illa non omittre, sicut Dominus nos in Evangelio admonet. — In this year 1545, it would be very proper to amend the Roman Calendar, by the authority of the present general council, after the church had been reformed in things relating to faith and good manners, which are more necessary. These ought to be done, and those ought not to be omitted, as our Lord admonishes us in the Gospel.' He had given the reason why the year 1545 ought to have been chosen. It was 1590 years after the reformation made in the Calendar by Julius Cæsar, and consequently the equinoxes were advanced fifteen days precisely; for he supposed, with Albategni, that every 106 years occasions the difference of a day, between the solar and the Julian year.

Lucidus's performance was continued to the year 1575, by Jerom Bardi, a Monk of the order of Camaldoli.

[B] The name which he took was not his true name. This particular is to be found in Florimond de Remond. He had been reproached that he had objected nothing to John Lucidus, who had maintained the truth of this fact (3), but that he was too late a writer to prove any thing; to this he answers; 'This Protestant is to be pardoned for what he says, for he has thought that this Lucidus was some honest man of the old times, but he is mistaken, for he wrote in the year 1537, neither did he write in defence of the truth of the story, but only used these words: Joan, an English woman, two years one month. During these two years we may say the see of Rome was vacant, because a woman is not qualified for the pontificate. This is all that he says. John Lucidus is an assumed name, as I was informed by a very learned person, who assured me that he heard Poffet say, that he was acquainted with that author, who concealed his true name under that of Lucidus, thereby to intimate, that he had brought new light to Chronology (4). The first part of this passage does not appear to be necessary, but yet it is not altogether useless, in as much as we learn therefrom, what Lucidus said concerning Pope Joan.

LUCILIUS

LUCILIUS (Caius) a Roman knight, and Latin poet, was born at Sueffa in the country of the Arunci in Italy, towards the beginning of the VIIth century of Rome [A]. He bore arms under Scipio Africanus in the Numantine war [B], and had a great share in the friendship of this famous general, and in that of Lælius [C]. He composed thirty books of Satires, in which he severely censured, even by name, several persons of quality [D]. Some learned men say that he was the first author of this sort of Poetry [E]; but others are of a different opinion. He used to say, that he wished to meet with readers who were neither ignorant, nor very learned [F]. It is not probable

[A] He was born at Sueffa, in the country of the Arunci, towards the beginning of the VIIth century of Rome. Eusebius's Chronicle places the birth of Lucilius in the first year of the CLVIIIth Olympiad, which is the DCVth of Rome (1). Ausonius points out this poet, when he says,

(1) Consult the remark [B].

(2) Auson. Epist. xv, ver. ix, pag. m. 626.

Rudes Camœnas qui Sueffæ prævenis (2).

For thou com'st up to the rude Sueffian verse.

Juvenal also hints at him in this verse:

(3) Juvenal. Sat. I, ver. 20.

Per quem magnus equos Auruncæ flexit alumnus (3).

The road in which the great Aruntian drove.

And therefore that is Lucilius's country which I give him, and not Sueffa Pomertia, as Father Briet will have it. C. Lucilius, says he, Romanus Eques ex Sueffa Pomertia urbe Aruncorum non procul à Pomptina palude ortus fuit (4). — Caius Lucilius, a Roman knight, was of Sueffa Pomertia, a city of the Arunci, situated not far from the Pomptin lake. If he had consulted Cluverius, he would have found Sueffa Pomertia was in the country of the Volsci, and not in the country of the Arunci. Cluverius distinguishes two towns called Sueffa; one, with the epithet Pomertia, was in the country of the Volsci, the other, with the epithet Aurunca, was in Campania, beyond the Liris (5). Some commentators on Juvenal (6), by a notable blunder, say, that Lucilius was born at Aurunca, or Aurunca, a town of the Rutuli. The time has been worse mistaken than the place of his birth, by Father Briet. Natus, says he, Olymp. CXXXVIII. obiit Olymp. CXLIX. ætatis 46 Neapoli publico elatus funere, ut scribit Hieronymus. — He was born in the CXXXVIIIth, and died in the CXLIX Olympiad, being forty six years old. He was honoured at Naples with a public funeral, as Jerome writes. St Jerome does not say this; and if he had, this Jesuit should either have confuted, or rejected him, since, according to him, the Poet Lucilius bore arms in the Numantine war (7), fifty years later than the CXLIXth Olympiad.

[B] He bore arms . . . in the Numantine war. Valerius Paterculus tells us this. Celebre, says he (8), & Lucili nomen fuit, qui sub P. Africano Numantino bello eques militaverat. Quo quidem tempore juvenis adhuc Jugurtha ac Marius sub eodem Africano militantes in iisdem castris didicere quæ postea in contrariis facerent. — The name of Lucilius was famous, who served under Publius Africanus in the Numantine war, at which time Jugurtha and Marius, both young men, served likewise under Africanus, and learned in the same camp, those arts which they afterwards practised against each other. It must be confessed, that this does not well agree with Eusebius's Chronicle; for when Scipio made war with the Numantines. Lucilius, by this Chronicle, was but fifteen years old. Did any one lift in the cavalry before he took on the Toga Virilis? Scalliger observes (9), that the fathers sometimes brought their sons to the army, before the taking this garment; but this was not what they called militare equitem. Yet this is what Paterculus affirms of our Lucilius.

[C] He had a great share in the friendship of Scipio and Lælius. They honoured him with such a familiarity, as to droll and toy with him. See Horace's scholiast upon these words of the first satire of the second book.

Quin, ubi se à vulgo, & scena, in secreta remorant Virtus Scipiadae, & mitis sapientia Læli: Nugari cum illo, & discincti ludere, donec Decoqueretur olus, soliti . . . (10).

V O L. III.

Did Lælius, or did Scipio hate his muse?
Or storm when he Metellus did abuse?
The great ones and the crowd did discommend,
And valu'd virtue only and her friend?
No, no, they treated him, and thought him good,
And when remov'd from bus'ness and the crowd,
Would keep him company, would laugh and jest,
And sport until their little meat was dress'd.

[D] He composed thirty books of satires, in which he censured by name . . . several persons of quality. Let us hear what Horace had just said of him.

Quid cum est Lucilius ausus

Primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem, Detrahere & pellem, nitidus qua quisque per ora Cederet, introrsum turpis? num Lælius, aut, qui Duxit ab oppressa meritum Carthagine nomen, Ingenio offensus? aut læso dolere Metello?
Famosisque Lupo cooperto veribus? atqui
Primores populi arripuit, populumque tributum, Scilicet uni æquus virtuti, atque ejus amicis (11).

(11) Horat. Sat. I, lib. ii, ver. 62.

How, Sir, Lucilius that did first engage
In writing satires, and that lash'd the age,
And stripp'd our foppings of their lion's skin,
In which they look'd so gay, all soul within. &c.

CREECH.

Perfius says the same thing in fewer words (12). See Juvenal, who relates how Lucilius made the guilty tremble with his pen, as much as if he had pursued them with sword in hand.

(12) Scult. Lucilius urhem Te Lupo, te Muti, & genulum fregit in illis. Perf. Sat. I, ver. 115.

Criminibus, tacita sudant præcordia culpa (13).

(13) Juven. Sat. I, ver. 165.

Sharp as a sword, Lucilius drew his pen,
And struck, with panic terror, guilty men;
At his just strokes, the hard'ned wretch would start,
Feel the cold sweat, and tremble at the heart.

[E] Some learned men say that he was the first author of satire; others are of a different opinion. They who make him the inventor of it, ground themselves on these words of Horace:

Quid cum est Lucilius ausus

PRIMUS in hunc operis, componere carmina morem (14)?

(14) Horat. ubi supra, ver. 48.

Was it not Lucilius who first attempted to write in this way.

They alledge also a passage of Quintilian, and these words of Pliny: 'Si hoc Lucilius qui PRIMUS condidit styli nasum, dicendum sibi putavit (15). — If Lucilius, who first introduced the Satiric stile, thought proper to say this.' Quintilian's testimony is this: 'Satira quidem tota nostra est, in qua PRIMUS insignem laudem adeptus est Lucilius (16). — Satire is indeed entirely our own, and Lucilius is the first that gained praise therein.' But Infit. Orat. lib. notwithstanding these authorities, Mr Dacier has maintained, with greater probability, that Lucilius had only given this kind of poetry a juster turn, and seasoned it with more wit and delicacy than his predecessors Ennius and Pacuvius (17).

[F] He wished neither ignorant nor very learned readers. There is something in this wish, that discovers a deal probable he died at forty six years of age [G], as some affirm. Of all his works we have only some fragments of his Satires remaining [H]. It is a misfortune; for if we had all his works, we should learn a great many things by them. Cicero has contradicted himself a deal of good sense. These two kind of readers, are sometimes equally formidable; the former see not enough, and the latter see too much; the one have not sense enough to understand what is good, there is no justice to be expected from them; and there is no concealing from the others what is imperfect. One of Cicero's interlocutors, in the second book of the Orator, mentions this thought of Lucilius, and approves it, and applies it to himself; I mean, he wishes the same thing. Here is what he says. 'Quod addidisti tertium vos eos esse qui vitam insuavem sine his studiis putaretis; id me non modo non hortatur ad disputandum, sed etiam deterret. Nam ut Cajus Lucilius homo doctus, & perurbanus dicere solebat, ea quæ scriberet, neque ab indoctissimis, neque ab doctissimis legi velle, quod alteri nihil intelligerent, alteri plus fortasse quam ipse de se, quo etiam scripsit: Persium non curo legere. Hic enim fuit, ut noramus, omnium fere nostrorum hominum doctissimus. Lælius Decimus volo, quem cognovimus virum bonum & non illiterarum, sed nihil ad Persium. Sic ego, si jam mihi disputandum sit de his nostris studiis, nolim equidem apud rusticos, sed multo minus apud vos. Malo enim non intelligi orationem meam, quam reprehendi di (18). — What you add in the third place, that you are of the number of those, who, without these studies, think life unpleasant, not only binds me from disputing at present, but also utterly deters me from it; for as Caius Lucilius, a learned and very polite man, used to say, that he did not desire that his writings should be read by the most ignorant, nor by the most learned, because the former knew nothing of the matter, and the latter perhaps more than he who wrote it; so I do not care to read Persius. For he was, as we all know, one of the most learned of our writers. I like Lælius Decimus very well, whom we knew to be a good man, and not illiterate, but nothing when compared to Persius. So were I to dispute on the subject of our studies, I should not care to do it among clowns, but much less among you. For I had rather my discourse should not be understood, than be censured.' Cicero, in another book, where he speaks in his own name, declares himself to be far from this wish of Lucilius; he requires the most penetrating readers, and fears no colours. 'Nec enim, says he (19), ut noster Lucilius, recusabo quo minus omnes meæ legant. Utinam esset ille Persius. Scipio vero, & Rutilius multo etiam magis, quorum ille iudicium reformidans, Tarentivis ait se, & Conventinis, & Siculis scribere: facere is quidem sicut alias, sed neque tam docti tunc erant ad quorum iudicium elaboraret, & sunt illius scripta leviora, ut urbanitas summa apparet, doctrina mediocris. Ego autem quem timeam lectorem, quum ad te (20) ne Græcis quidem cententem, in philologia audeam scribere?' He had in another book mentioned this thought of Lucilius, and approved and adopted it, as appears from Pliny's preface, who, after to great an example, doth himself an honour to espouse it. 'Præterea est quedam publica etiam eruditorum rejectio. Utitur illa & M. Tullius, extra omnem ingenii aleam positus, & (quod miremur) per advocatum defenditur. Nec doctissimis: Manium Persium hæc legere nolo, Junium Congum volo. Quod si hoc Lucilius, qui primus condidit styli nasum, dicendum sibi putavit: si Cicero mutandum, præsertim cum de Republica scriberet; quanto nos cautius ab aliquo iudice defendimus?' Father Hardouin has expunged Lælius Decimus out of this passage of Pliny, to insert Junium Congum, agreeably to the manuscripts. He observes, that Lucilius more than once made use of this thought, and named one while some persons, and another while others; and therefore it is a mistake to pretend, that it was Lælius Decimus in Pliny, because this name is found in Cicero's second book, de Oratore. Pliny had not this passage of Cicero in view, but another in his book de Republica. See the margin (21).

[G] It is not probable that he died at forty six years of age. Eusebius's Chronicle does not make him older; it places his birth in the first year of the CLVIIIth Olympiad, and his death in the second year of the CLXIXth Olympiad (22), which is the DCLIIIth of Rome. Glandorpius ought not to be accused of making him sixty four years old; it is an error of the press, which transposing the figures, gives 64 for 46. Such errors are common. To prove that Eusebius is mistaken, we need only consider, that Lucilius has mentioned the Licinian law, made against the expences of feasts in the 656th year of Rome, or thereabouts. Lex deinde Licinia rogata est Huius legis Lælius Poëta meminit. Lucilius quoque legis istius meminit in his verbis, Legem citemus Licini (23). (23) A. Gellius, He therefore lived five or six years after the year it is lib. II, cap. xxi, pretended he died at Naples; and if, on the other hand, we consider that he must be born before the 605th year of Rome, since he bore arms before Numantia, in the year 620, we shall find, that Horace might well call him an old man, literally, and without a figure. It is in the place where he says Lucilius committed all his secrets to his books, so that we find in them his life, as in a votive table.

me pedibus delectat claudere verba
Lucili ritu, nostrum melioris utroque.
Ille velut fidis arcana fodalibus, olim
Credebat libris: neque, si male gesserat usquam
Decurres aliò, neque si bene, quo fit, ut omnis
Votiva pateat veluti descripta tabella
Vita SENIS.

I love to rhyme, and have a railing wit,
And chuse the way that wise Lucilius writ:
He did to's books, as to a trusty friend,
His secret virtues, and his faults commend.
And when a good or faulty deed was done,
He trusted them with that, and them alone,
And hence his books do all his life explain,
As if we saw him live it o'er again.

CREECH.

These words of Horace are in the first satire, verse 28, of the second book.

[H] Of all his works we have only some fragments of his satires remaining. For five or six words, which remain of his other pieces (24), deserve not our notice, besides, it is not agreed these pieces were his. See Douza the son's notes upon Lucilius's fragments, at the 99th page. Some say, that he wrote the Life of the same Scipio Africanus, whose victories were celebrated by Ennius. Douza denies it, for a reason which I think very weak; he takes it from Scipio and Lucilius's living at different times, a very bad proof; for may not a Poet, who shall live an hundred years hence, write the private Life of the prince of Condé, or the marshal de Turenne. However, I believe, with Douza, that Lucilius wrote the Life of that Scipio Africanus, with whom he intimately conversed. 'Ejusdem Scipionis (it is Douza the son who speaks in his notes upon the fragments of our Poet, at the 98th page) vitam privatam postea descripsit, in quo Pseudoporphyrionem manifesti erroris convinct Parens meus, qui Lucilius vitam privatam Scipionis, Ennium vero bella descripsisse annotat: ubi male nomina Scipionum inter se confusa. Ennium enim Scipionis majoris res gestas cecinisse constat. Lucilius autem ut ejusdem vitam privatam descripsit, ratio temporum plane vetat. — Of the same Scipio, he wrote the private Life; in respect of which my father convicted the false Porphyry of a manifest error, who observed, that Lucilius wrote the private Life of Scipio, as Ennius recorded his wars; wherein he confounds the Scipios one with another, for it is agreed, that Ennius sung the exploits of the elder Scipio, but that Lucilius wrote his private Life, is a thing inconsistent with Chronology.' Mr Dacier must have believed this argument to be good, since he speaks thus: 'Lucilius, besides his satires, wrote a particular book, concerning the life of the young Scipio Africanus, son to Paulus Æmilius, in which he spoke of his justice and valour: Such as have thought, that Lucilius wrote the history of himself concerning Lucilius's learning [I]. I do not think Horace was reasonably blamed for the judgment he made of this Satirist [K]. Pompey, by the mother's side, was grandson, of the great Scipio, and that it is he whom Horace mentions here, confound Chronology. The great Scipio was dead above thirty five years before Lucilius was born (25). If Lucilius had died before Scipio was born, this had been an invincible confutation of those who attributed to him the history of this Roman general: but to go and confuse them by this reason, that he was born thirty five years after the death of this hero, must proceed from want of attention. It is not only possible, that this Poet might write the history of Scipio Africanus the elder, but very probable that he has done it; and that at the request of Scipio Africanus, the younger, his good friend, who might furnish him with many good materials. I do not, however, retract what I have advanced; how many things are not true, which are yet most probable (26) for the rest, Lucilius's fragments were collected with great care by Francis Douza, and published (27) at Leyden with notes, in the year 1597. They stand greatly in need of being better illustrated by some learned critic.

[I] Cicero has contradicted himself concerning Lucilius's learning. In his first book De Oratore, he acknowledges that Lucilius was a learned man; his words are worth reciting. Sed ut solebat C. Lucilius sæpe dicere homo tibi subitatus (28), mihi propter eam ipsam causam minus quam volebat familiaris, sed tam men & doctus & perurbanus, sic sentio neminem esse in oratorum numero habendam, qui non sit omnibus iis artibus quæ sunt libero homine dignæ perpolitus (29). — But as Caius Lucilius, a man who did not like you, and who therefore was less intimate with me than otherwise he would have been, but yet a very learned and polite man, was wont to say, so think I, that no one ought to be taken into the list of orators, who is deficient in any thing it becomes a free man to know. He gives him the same praise of a learned man, in the second book of the same work (30), but takes that praise from him in the first book De Finibus (31). Quintilian gives it him, without ever retracting. I will cite him in the following remark.

[K] I do not think Horace could reasonably be blamed for the judgment he gave of Lucilius. The critics murmured, and he justified himself. Let us see his words: we will begin with the criticism, and end with the apology.

Mutatis tantum pedibus, numerisque facetus:
Emunctæ naris, durus componere versus.
Nam fuit hoc vitiosus: in hora sæpe ducentos,
Ut magnum, versus disclabat stans pede in uno:
Cum fueret lulentus, erat quod tollere velles:
Garrulus, atque piger scribendi ferre laborem:
Scribendi recte: nam ut multum, nil moror (32).

Cratin, and Eupolis, that last'd the age,
Those old comedian furies of the stage:
If they were to describe a vile, unjust,
And cheating knave, or scourge a lawless lust;
Or other crimes: regardless of his fame
They show'd the man, and boldly told his name.
This is Lucilius's way, he follows those:
His wit the same, but other numbers chose;
I grant he was a sharp and ready wit,
But rude and uncorrect in all he writ:
This was his fault, he hastily wou'd rhyme,
(As if 'twere said a wondrous thing in him)
Two hundred tedious lines in one hour's time:
Yet when with force his muddy fancy flow'd,
Some few pure streams appear'd amongst the mud:
In writing much 'tis true his parts excel,
Too lazy for the task of writing well.

CREECH.

Now we shall see how Horace justifies himself.

Nempe incompolito dixi pede currere versus Lucili: quis tam Lucili fautor ineptæ est,
Ut non hoc fateatur? at idem, quod fale multo
Urbem defricuit, charta laudatur eadem.
Nec tamen hoc tribuens, dederim quoque cætera, nam sic

Et Laberi mimos, ut pulchra poemata, mirer (33).

Well Sir, I grant, I said, Lucilius' muse
Is uncorrect, his way of writing loose,
And who admires him so, what friend of his
So blindly dotes as to deny me this?
And yet in the same page I freely own
His wit as sharp as ever last'd the town;
But this one sort of excellence allow'd,
Doth not infer that all the rest is good:
For on the same account I might admit Laberius farce, for poems and for wit.

CREECH.

He afterwards answers Lucilius's admirers concerning the mixing Greek with Latin words, and professes he does not design to rob him of the crown so justly due to him.

Hoc erat, experto frustra Varrone Atacino,
Atque quibusdam aliis, melius quod scribere possem,
Inventore minor: neque ego illi detrachere ausim
Hærentem capiti multa cum laude coronam (34).
In satires I, with Varro try'd in vain,
And others too may have a happy strain.
Yet thou, Lucilius, lest, I freely own,
I would not strive to blast his just renown,
He wears, and best deserves to wear, the crown.

CREECH.

He demands the same liberty with respect to Lucilius, which every one takes with respect to the greatest Poets, and which Lucilius himself took with respect to Ennius; and maintains, that if the author he censured were alive, he would correct his own works, and write with greater exactness.

At dixi fluere hunc lutulentum, sæpe ferentem
Plura quidem tollenda relinquendis, æge, quæso,
Tu nihil in magno doctus reprehendis Homero?
Nil comis Tragicæ mutat Lucilius Atti?
Non ridet versus Enni gravitate minores,
Cum de se loquitur, non ut majore reprensus?
Quid vetat, & nosmet Lucili scripta legenteis
Quærere, num illius, num rerum dura negarit
Vericulos natura magis factos, & cuncteis Mollius (35)?

(35) lb. ver. 30.

— fuerit Lucilius, inquam,
Comis & urbanus: fuerit limatior idem,
Quam rudis, & Græci intacti carminis auctor,
Quamque Poëtarum seniorum turba: sed ille,
Si foret hoc nostrum fato dilatus in ævum:
Detereret sibi multa: recideret omne, quod ultra Perfectum traheretur & in versu faciendo
Sæpe caput scaberet: vivos & roderet ungues (36).

(36) lb. ver. 64.

Ay, but I said his fancy muddy flow'd,
And faulty lines did oft exceed the good.
Well Sir, and is e'en Homer all correct?
Is he, Sir Critic, free from all defect?
Doth not Lucilius Accius rhymes accuse?
And blame our Ennius's correcter muse?
For too much lightness oft his rhymes deride,
And when he talks of his own verse, for pride?

*Then what's the reason that his friend repines,
That when I read Lucilius' looser lines,
I try if 'tis his subject won't permit,
More even verse, or if 'tis want of wit?*

*Well then suppose Lucilius was a wit,
His virtue's more than faults in what he writ.
Correster than the older writers own,
And that we satire owe to him alone,
Satire a poem to the Greeks unknown.
Yet did he now again new life commence,
He would correct, he would retrench his sense,
And pare off all that was not excellence;
Take pains, and often when he verses made,

CREECH.

I thought my self obliged to set down all these long passages, because they acquaint my reader with Lucilius's character, and it is disagreeable to be diverted by references, in reading the life of a famous man. Mr Dacier never gave a better proof of his judgment, than when he declared himself (37) for Horace against Quintilian; it is strange, that learned Rhetorician should not applaud this Poet's judgment. His words will let us see the prodigious prejudice of many in Lucilius's favour. 'Satira quidem tota nostra est, in qua primus insignem laudem adeptus est Lucilius, qui quosdam ita deditos sibi adhuc habet amatores, ut eum non ejusdem modò operis autoribus, sed omnibus poetis præferre non dubitent. Ego quantum ab illis, tantum ab Horatio dissentio, qui Lucilium fluere solutentum, & esse aliquid quod tollere possis, putat. Nam & eruditio in eo mira, & libertas, atque inde acerbitas, & abunde satis (38). — Satire indeed is wholly ours; and Lucilius was the first who acquired any reputation therein, to whose work some are so bigotted, that they stick not to prefer him not only to all Satirists, but to all Poets. For my part, I differ as much from them as from Horace, who thought Lucilius raked too much in mud, and said many things which might have been as well let alone. For his learning is certainly wonderful. He writes with a great freedom, smartness, and sparkling strokes of wit.'

[L] Pompey . . . was grandson, or rather great nephew, to Lucilius.] Porphyryon, upon these words of Horace, observes, that Lucilius was brother to Pompey's grandmother, and consequently his great uncle by the mother's side. Acron (40), another old interpreter of Horace in Religio race, says that Lucilius was Pompey's grandfather. This opinion is less probable than the former, for if Lucilia, Pompey's mother, had been Lucilius's daughter (41), I do not think that Velleius Paterculus would have forgotten to mention it. We must therefore believe she was daughter to a brother of Lucilius, and consequently, that Porphyryon mistakes the true ground of the relation. Thus the learned Antonius Augustinus (42), and Francis Douza reason and conjecture.

[M] I shall observe the faults of Mr Moreri.] I. Lucilius was not a native of Suevia Pometia. II. His town was not in the country of the Aurunci. III. It is not certain, that he was the first who wrote satires in Latin verse. Mr Dacier shews the contrary: see, above, the remark [E]. IV. However it be, he should not have pretended, that besides this, he was the author of a kind of verse unknown to the Greeks; from Græcis intacti carminis auctor; for if these words of Horace (43) did concern Lucilius, they would only ascribe to him the invention of satire. V. But the best critics (44) have long since observed, that these words relate to Ennius, and not to Lucilius. VI. It is not true, that the CLXIXth Olympiad falls in the 651st year of Rome: an Olympiad includes four years.

[N] . . . and the faults of some other authors.] See above (45) those of Father Briet. Gesner's abridger is grossly mistaken about the age of Lucilius, or Lucilius, as he calls him; Floruit, says he (46), secundi belli Punici temporibus. Glandorp (47) was of opinion, that he whom Cicero speaks of, as an author, who defied neither ignorant nor very learned readers, is not the same Lucilius, who composed the satires. It is an error. Charles Stephens has committed the same fault: Lloyd and Hofman have adopted it, and moreover pretended, that our Lucilius was born in the LIIIrd Olympiad, and that he died in the LXIXth, being forty six years of age: an absurdity which is manifest. They cite Quintilian 17. 21. which is a chimerical citation.

[O] . . . and an anachronism of Stephen Pasquier.] His words are these. 'With this it was (48) that the advocates of Rome sported most, when they had a mind to awake their judges. See this piece of Cicero in his oration for Milo: Est enim hæc, Judices, non scripta, sed nata lex, &c. You will find it equals the finest verses of all antiquity: which afterwards grew into such an affectation and abuse, that Lucilius, a satirical Poet ridiculed it very handsomely in one of his satires whose verses Aulus Gellius relates in the thirteenth book of his Noctes Atticæ (49). Garasse has not pardoned him this mistake; let us hear him. 'Wherein, I say, Mr Pasquier has very handsomely exposed himself to the laughter of all men, moderately versed in Chronology; for how could Lucilius, who lived about an hundred years before Cicero, ridicule what was done an hundred years after his death? It is just as if I should say, speaking of that nice, polished, and accurate poetry, which was introduced by Berthaud and Malherbe, that Marot and St Gelais were disgusted so much with it, as to ridicule and satirize it in their writings. Such was the sufficiency of that old dotard mentioned by Servinus Boëtius in his book de Disciplina Scholæ, who asked whether Æneas was not Julius Cæsar's wife. Such was the impertinence of that minister noted by Horace Dolabella, in the sixth chapter of his Apology, who being asked, Uter fuerit prior secundum Annales Ecclesiæ Constantinus an Nero? — Who, according to the annals of the church, lived first, Constantine or Nero? came off very ingeniously by these words of our Saviour, Non est vestrum nosse tempora vel momenta. — It is not for you to know the times or the seasons. Acts i. 7. And yet I believe these men, tho' very ignorant, if they had seen the difference of stile, between Lucilius and Cicero, would never have called in question, whether Lucilius had been before Cicero; as a man need not be very much versed in Chronology, to be able to say a hundred years hence whether Alain Charretier, Froissard, and Montrelet, were before Monsieur du Vair; and it would be a horrid ignorance to say, that Alain Charretier, or Montrelet, improved the stile, the diction, and figures of Amiot, or du Vair (50). It was difficult to make a good answer to this censure; and therefore we find, that the learned Pasquier's sons defended him but ill upon this point: here is what they answer, Garasse says that Lucilius was an hundred years before Cicero, which is false, for Cicero and Pompey lived at the same time; but Lucilius was Pompey's uncle: so that it is easy to judge, that our calumniator is much mistaken in his computation. In the second place he says, this might be known by the difference of stile. This ignorance is more insupportable than the former; for Pliny expressly observes, that primus fuit Lucilius qui stylen acuisse dicitur. Horace calls him emundæ naris, and says he made two hundred verses in an hour, and Quintilian calls him principem Satyricorum, inasmuch, that Adrian the emperor preferred him before Virgil. Observe, I pray, into how many absurdities a man sometimes runs by the itch of criticizing (51). There is nothing good in this reply, but the remark on the hundred years Garasse puts betwixt Cicero and Lucilius. This Jesuit pretending to criticize one fault in Chronology, falls into another; for it is not true, that Lucilius was an hundred years before Cicero, he died some years after Cicero.

great danger, who ventured to speak ill of Lucilius's poems [P].

Cicero was born. It was easy for Pasquier's apologists to justify this; but instead of good proofs, they only alleged, that Lucilius was Pompey's uncle, Cicero's cotemporary. They were mistaken; Lucilius is accounted the grandfather, or great uncle, to Pompey (52). They are very much in the wrong, to pretend that there is no distinction to be observed betwixt Lucilius and Cicero's stile; there is a greater difference between the stile of Cicero and that of Lucilius, than between the stile of Mr Flechier, and that of Clement Marot. To be soon convinced of it, we need only cast an eye with some judgment on the fragments of the Latin satirist, and on the works of Cicero at the bare opening his book. To oppose to Father Garasse the words of Pliny ill cited (53), and those of Quintilian ill cited (54), is to pretend that because Regnier is the first who writ good French satires, his stile differs not from that of Mr Patru, or Mr Boileau. The emundæ naris of Horace proves nothing; this might be said of Clement Marot, and Regnier, with a great deal of justice, and yet what difference is there between their stile, and that of Patru and Boileau? Consider Horace's whole verse, Emundæ naris DURUS componere Versus.

Have they not been forced miserably to mutilate his testimony, that they might be able to make use of it? If they had given it intire, would they not have furnished arms to their adversary? But that proof from Horace is much less ridiculous than that which follows, and is taken from the same author, Lucilius, as Horace says, made two hundred verses in an hour, therefore he writ as well as Cicero. What a monstrous consequence is here, and more amazing still, when we consider that Horace mentions this as a fault of Lucilius, and immediately compares this author's poems to muddy streams:

*Nam fuit hoc vitiosus in hora sæpe ducentos,
Ut magnum versus distabat, stans pede in uno.
Quum fluere LUTULENTUS . . . (55).*

The last proof which Stephen Pasquier's apologists bring, is no better than the others. It is founded on a false fact, the consequence whereof would make against them, if it were true. It is not to Lucilius, but to Ennius, that Adrian gave the preference before Virgil; and all that this proves, is, that Ennius's stile was more ruly and mouldy; for this was Hadrian's taste, as his Historian observes. 'Amavit Prætera genus dicendi vetustum . . . Ciceroni Catonem, Virgilio Ennium, Sallustio Cælium prætulit (56). — Besides he loved the old manner of speaking . . . He preferred Cato to Cicero, Ennius to Virgil, Cælius to Sallust.'

LUCRETIA, a Roman lady, famous for her beauty and noble extraction [A], but much more for her virtue, was married to Collatinus, a relation to Tarquin king of Rome. Every one knows the reason that induced her to kill herself. I shall however relate the circumstances of that tragical history. Tarquin not being able to make himself master of the town of Ardea, as soon as he expected, resolved on a formal siege. The siege continued a long time, and did not hinder the young princes from entertaining one another pretty often. Sextus having invited to supper his two brothers and Collatinus, the discourse turned upon the fair sex; and a dispute arose, not about the beauty of their mistresses, as it would in our age, but upon the beauty of their wives. Each maintained

[A] For her . . . noble extraction.] Lucretia's family was doubtless Patrician, since we find consuls in it, at a time when the Plebeians were not admitted unto the consulship. It made a noble figure in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus; for this prince gave the government of Rome to SPURIUS LUCRETIUS TRICIPITINUS, father to our Lucretia, married to a prince of the blood (1). Some authors say (2), that Numa Pompilius, being chosen king of Rome, married a lady called Lucretia. If she was of the family I here speak of, as it is probable she was, what proofs should we desire greater of the famous antiquity of this house? Spurius Lucretius, after his daughter's death, was created Interrex, and he named Brutus, and his son-in-law Collatinus, to the consulship (3).

VOL. III.

[P] They exposed themselves to a great danger, who ventured to speak ill of Lucilius's poems.] It is a long time ago since I read what I am going to transcribe. 'Our little doctor does much the same (57). That is to say, Girac, the Disgenet, acts in every thing contrary to the people. And indeed a man of that humour, is in a fair way of being beaten (I mean with the tongue and pen) for we do not live in an age so licentious, as was that of these young Romans of quality, who walked the streets all day, concealing long whips under their gowns, to chastise the insolence of those who did not approve the Poet Lucilius, if they had the misfortune to be in their way (58). I believed when I read this, that since Coftar cited no body, he did not know who first said it, and I put myself upon the enquiry. I found it in some verses which have passed for Horace's, and have been prefixed to one of his satires (59) in some editions. Mr Dacier has inserted them in his notes upon this Poet; I will transcribe all he has said upon it; by which we shall see, that Coftar magnifies objects, and that his embroidery is too high.

'We may say of Lucilius, that he had the good fortune of some women, who with very little beauty have created violent passions. Among his partisans, there were some so extravagant as to run along the streets, with whips under their gowns, to lash such as durst speak ill of Lucilius's verses.

'I will shew you, Lucilius, how full of faults you are, even by the testimony of Cato, your great patron. He has a design to polish your ill turned verses. As he is a better man than most others, he has taken the gentlest and safest method. But he is not so subtil as that learned knight, who armed himself with good strops and moistened cords, to revenge our dislikes of the ancient Poets.

'These verses had been prefixed to this satire, as if they were written by Horace, and were the beginning of it. Canterus and Lilius Gyradius, have been deceived by it. Though they are not Horace's, yet they are not bad, and they serve to shew, that Lucilius's verses were not always universally esteemed (60).'

The later was soon after forced to resign his office, and retire to Lanuvium (4), where he spent the rest of his life, which was very long. Valerius being chosen in his room, took Spurius Lucretius for his colleague (5), after Brutus had been killed; but this colleague died in a few days (6). I find a TITUS LUCRETIUS, who was consul the following year, and a few years after (7); and a PUBLIUS LUCRETIUS, colleague to Valerius, when he was consul the third time (8). This Titus Lucretius is thought to be the father of LUCIUS LUCRETIUS TRICIPITINUS, consul in the year of Rome 291 (9). I pass over several Lucretii, who enjoyed afterwards the principal posts in the government, before it was determined, that the Plebeians should be admitted to maintained that his was handsomest; the controversy growing hot, Collatinus proposed a means of deciding it. Why so many words, said he, we may in a little time have visible proofs of my Lucretia's pre-eminence; let us take horse, and go and surprize our wives; the determination of the question will by this means be easier, than if they were prepared to receive us. Wine having heated them, they readily embraced the proposition, and rode to Rome full speed. They found Tarquin's daughters-in-law at table, regaling themselves with some persons of their own age. They afterwards went to Collatia; and, though it was very late, they found Lucretia, in the midst of her maids, working with her hands upon wool (a). They agreed, that she excelled all the others and returned to the camp. Sextus, transported with a violent passion for her, returned a few days after to Collatia, without saying a word to any person. He was received with all the civility, that was due to a near relation, who was the king's eldest son, and who was not suspected of the least dishonest thought. After he had supped, he was conducted to the chamber designed for him. He did not sleep, but when he thought the family were quiet, he stole, with his sword in his hand, into Lucretia's chamber, and threatening to kill her if she made the least noise, he declared his passion to her; he used all the tenderest entreaties, and the most terrible threats, and all imaginable artifices that can touch a woman's heart. It was all to no purpose, Lucretia continued firm; the fear of death did not shake her, but she could not resist the menace that Sextus made of exposing her to the last degree of infamy. He declared, that after having killed her, he would kill one of her slaves, and lay him in her bed, and make it be believed, that both the murders were the punishment of the adultery, in which he had surprized her. Having thus accomplished his infamous design, he retired as content and proud of his conquest, as if it had been fairly obtained, and according to the nicest laws of gallantry. The lady, seized with the deepest melancholy, sent to entreat her father, who was at Rome, and her husband, who was at the siege of Ardea, to come immediately to her. They did so: she acquainted them with her misfortune, and conjured them to revenge her. They promised they would, and said all they could think of to comfort her; she would by no means be comforted, but drawing out a dagger, she had hid in her cloaths, struck it into her heart. Brutus, who was present at this spectacle, found the occasion he had long fought for of delivering Rome from Tarquin's tyranny, and so far improved this occasion, that the kingly power was abolished (b): thus Lucretia's death was the cause of the liberty of the Roman people, which has given a great lustre to the immortal memory of this lady. Historians relate her adventure differently [B]. The

them. But there is no need of all these particulars to prove, that the Lucretii Tricipitini were of a Patrician family. What I have said is sufficient. It is not certain that this can be said of the Lucretii surnamed Vespillo, or Ofella, or of those of any other surname: There are even some Lucretii, whose surname we are ignorant of, who were of a Plebeian family; for we see a MARCUS LUCRETIUS, tribune of the people in the second Punic war (10). Note, that QUINTUS LUCRETIUS, the first who was surnamed Vespillo, had this surname for calling Tiberius Gracchus's body into the Tiber: Chius Corpus Lucretii Aditis manu in Tiberim missum; unde ille Vespillo dictus (11). Cicero (12) speaks honourably of one QUINTUS LUCRETIUS Vespillo, a good Lawyer and good Advocate. There was one QUINTUS LUCRETIUS Vespillo, a senator, who followed Pompey's party (13), and whom the fidelity of his wife preserved from the fury of the Triumviri, who had proscribed him (14). This is probably the same who obtained the consulship in the 734th year of Rome (15). Cicero speaks of LUCRETIUS Ofella, as an orator, who was better at making harangues to the people, than at pleading causes: Apertior concionibus quam judiciis (16). Moreri has wretchedly translated this. He was fitter, says he, to make speeches than pronounce judgments. Another (17) affirms, that Cicero represents him fitter to be a judge than a great orator. It is believed (18), that this Lucretius Ofella, is the same who quitted Marius's party, and joined Sylla, and retook Praeneste, where he forced Marius the younger to kill himself. This piece of service hindered not Sylla's putting him to death in the midst of the Forum, because he had demanded the consulship against Sylla's intention (19).

[B] Historians relate Lucretia's adventure differently. Dionysius Halicarnassensis, and Livy, have given the largest descriptions of it. They lived at the same time, and exactly consulted the preceding authors. Nevertheless, they agree but in three or four general facts: I. That Sextus entered by night into Lucretia's chamber. II. That this lady, after having resisted the menaces of death, intreaties, and promises, yielded at last, when she was threatened with infamy. III. That she killed herself the next day. IV. That Brutus laid hold of this occasion to change the government. The first of these two Historians gives a more particular and large account than the other: as for instance, he particularizes that Sextus promised Lucretia to marry her; by which means she would immediately be queen of the Gabii, and afterwards of Rome, upon Tarquin's death, whose successor he would infallibly be, as being his eldest son (20). Livy contents himself with these general expressions. Stricto gladio ad dormientem Lucretiam venit, sinistraque manu mulieris pectore oppresso, Tace Lucretia, inquit, Sex. Tarquinius sum, ferrum in manu est: moriêre, si emisseris vocem. Cum pavida è somno mulier nullam opem, propè mortem imminentem videret; Tum Tarquinius fateri amorem, orare: miscere precibus minas: versare in omnes partes muliebrem animum (21). With his drawn sword in his hand, he approached the sleeping Lucretia, he put his left hand upon her breast, he silent, said he, Lucretia, I am Sextus Tarquinius, my sword is in my hand, and if you speak a word you die. The woman, awaking in a fright, perceived no help nigh, and that she was in danger of immediate death: then Tarquin declared his passion, besought her, mingled threatenings with prayers, and used all the arts capable of prevailing on a woman. But to know the difference between these two Historians, we need only remember, that Livy relates the story, as we find it in the text of this article; and at the same time take notice of the following particulars: I take them from Dionysius Halicarnassensis. Sextus being sent to Collatia by king Tarquin, upon affairs relating to the siege of Ardea, lodged at the house of Collatinus, his relation, who was then at the camp, and found a proper opportunity to satisfy the passion he had conceived for Lucretia in a former visit. The Historian does not speak of the dispute of the young princes, concerning the beauty of their wives, which obliged them to go to Rome and to Collatia, to end the difference. This circumstance, however, was singular enough to deserve a place in Dionysius Halicarnassensis's account; and was an incident very capable of embellishing the narration. Lucretia, over-whelmed with melancholy, took coach at break of day, as soon as Sextus was withdrawn: she epitaph which is seen in Italy, and is pretended to have been composed by Collatinus her husband [C], is doubtless, a supposititious piece. Her ravisher was not long exposed to the remories of his conscience, or the severe reproaches of his family, whose total ruin he had occasioned. He retired to a town of the Gabii, where he had formerly commanded, and there perished a little after (c). The reflexions which have been made by some writers, are not only false wit, but vain cavelling sophistry [D]. It has been said in another took a mourning habit, and a dagger under her robe, and went to Rome with a dejected countenance, and all in tears, without saying any thing to those who asked her the cause of her affliction. When she came to her father's house, she threw herself upon her knees; she cried without saying a word, and at last desired him to send for her relations and friends: as soon as they were come together, she told them her adventure; prayed the gods to take her quickly out of this world (22), and stabbed herself. Valerius was immediately dispatched to the camp, to carry this news to Collatinus, and to join with him in raising an insurrection among the soldiers. He met Collatinus and Brutus not far from Rome, who had heard nothing of what had happened. Thus you see variations somewhat surprising; and which prove, that the first Historians, the sources of Livy and Dionysius Halicarnassensis, did not take the necessary care to have an exact information.

Here are more variations. Servius calls him Aruns who violated Lucretia; other Historians call him Sextus, and give the name of Aruns to another son of Tarquin (23). The same Servius supposes, that, in order to determine the dispute, they went first to Lucretia at Collatia, and then to Rome, and says, that the slave he took with him into Lucretia's chamber, was an Ethiopian (24). I say nothing of Ovid, who has related (25) Lucretia's misfortune with several circumstances of which no Historian makes mention. He used a Poetical licence, and has invented what he thought most proper to adorn his story. Nay, he has inserted what the Greeks said of Polyxena (26), that she took care to settle her cloaths, that, as she fell, nothing might be seen that modesty would have concealed.

Nec mora, celato figit sua pectora ferro:

Et cadit in Patrios sanguinolenta pedes.

Tunc quoque, jam moriens, ne non procumbat honeste, Respicit: hæc etiam cura cadentis erat (27).

This said, her fatal dagger pierc'd her side,
And at her father's feet she fell and dy'd.
Yet as she fell, her dying thoughts contriv'd,
To fall as modestly as she had liv'd.

But as it would be no embellishment to his account, to say that the ravisher of this lady was Tarquin's youngest son, we must believe that in this he followed some tradition; and consequently that the Historians were divided on this particular point: most said that the ravisher was eldest son to that prince, and some took him for the youngest.

[C] The epitaph that is . . . pretended to have been composed by Collatinus her husband.] These are the words of it: 'Collatinus Tarquinus dulcissimæ conjugis & incomparabili, pudiciæ decori, mulierum gloriæ, vixit annis xxxii. mens. iii. d. vi. pro dolor, quæ fuit carissima (28). — Collatinus Tarquinus to his most dear and incomparable wife, honour of chastity, glory of women. She lived twenty two years, three months, six days, who was most dear to me!' It is said, that this inscription is seen at Rome, and in the diocese of Viterbo (29).

[D] The reflexions . . . of some writers are not only false wit, but vain cavelling sophistry.] A modern author, fancied himself, no doubt, very witty in observing that Lucretia killed herself too late; and that, if she resolved upon parting with her life, it was not till she had tasted the forbidden fruit (30). This is the falsest railery in the world; and there is no reasonable man, but will agree, that, on such a subject as this, to quit gravity, and in any wise to aim at jesting, is not only a rash audaciousness, but also stupidity and brutishness. Lucretia's action should only excite the sense of compassion and admiration. Her conduct was exempt from any mixture of impurity; she was a bright sacrifice to the love of virtue and glory; and it would be as ridiculous to say, that he is guilty of prodigality, who throws away his cloaths to save his life by swimming, as to say there was any thing of lewdness in Lucretia's patience; for this illustrious lady was patient only to save her reputation. But if you would see the efforts of cavilling, read this long passage of Henry Stephens (31). 'And yet the poor Lucretia did not pass a right judgment on herself, when, being thus violated, she said she had lost her chastity; since it is certain, virtue cannot be ravished by any human force: and therefore what she adds, that her body was violated, but that her thought (or her mind) was not culpable, contradicts what she had been saying, namely, that she had lost her chastity, it being certain, that the seat of it is the mind, and not the body; which yet the Heathens seem not well to have considered, who have not only excused this woman's act, in being her own murderer, but have taken occasion from it to extol her to the skies, as being a woman of courage, and of a great soul, in that she revenged, by her death, the outrage done to her chastity. However, before I answer them, as to the outrage they pretend was done, her chastity, I would desire them to tell me, what they mean by the word revenge; because to me it seems a thing against all reason, that the injury should be revenged, by the death of the person who received it, and not by the death of him that gave it. Whereupon I should alledge to them, that she herself did not say, Mors ultrix erit, or vindex, my death shall revenge it; but Mors testis erit, that is, my death shall witness it: as if she had said, my death shall witness to the eyes of the world, what I cannot discover, it being a secret in my own conscience; to wit, that pleasure was so far from making me consent to such an act, that my life is hateful to me for having committed it. But, to come to the answer of the other point, I say, that supposing this death to import revenge, it must be the revenge of an outrage done to the body, and not to the mind, the seat of chastity. Which a certain author (whose name St Augustin has thought fit to conceal) considering in a declamation, has this fine sentence, concerning Lucretia's misfortune: a wonderful thing! here are two persons, and only one commits adultery. But St Augustin afterwards argues thus; if it is not impudicity to have to do with a man against her will, she is unjustly punished, since she is chaste. For it is certain, that the more the adultery is excused, the more the murder is heightened; and the more the adultery is censured, the more the murder is excused: (It being once supposed lawful for a person to kill himself.) And the same St Augustin, who praises this Rhetorician's saying, seems also to have succeeded well in that other argument (if it be his) Si adultera, cur laudata? Si pudica, cur occisa? That is, if she be an adulteress, why is she praised? if chaste, why was she killed? Upon which words, a friend of mine (32), a learned man, whom God has blessed with many graces, the fruits whereof are scattered in many parts of Christendom, has lately made an epigram, with which I am willing to gratify the reader. It is this:

Si tibi fortè fuit Lucretia gratus adulter,
Immerito ex merita præmia cæde petis:
Sin potius casto vis est allata pudori,
Quis furor est hostis crimine velle mori?
Frustra igitur laudem captas Lucretia: namque
Vel furiosa ruis, vel scelerata cadis.

If thou wert pleas'd with the adulterous deed,
With justice then did thy soul bosom bleed.
If guiltless you did with the monster lye,
Why for an enemy would you thus die?
In vain, Lucretia, thus you seek a name,
Rage or Remorse can never lead to fame.

Lewis Guyon (33) stole all these things from Henry Stephens, without the least alteration; and without citing him; which plagiarism is customary with him (34). A Spanish Jesuit has amused himself with the same cavilling: but, as we shall see in the following remark, he has mixed some good things with it. He approves the Latin verses we have seen above; and maintains, that Lucretia shewed neither chastity nor courage, and, from a cowardly spirit, feared her husband's knife more than her own. 'Ni def- cubrio lo uno ni lo otro: no lo primero, pues confinitio: y como dize Sant Ambrosio a otra de su manera †: Facilius oportuit sanguinem cum spiritu fundere, quam perdere castitatem. Ni tampoco mo- stro lo segundo, pues por flaqueza de animo temio mas el cuchillo de Colatino, que el suyo propio: y por esto se mato con desesperacion, la qual ‡ pone Santo Thomas por hija dela luxuria (35).— She shewed neither the one nor the other: not the first, since she consented, when as St Ambrose says, she ought rather to have lost her life than her cha- stity. Nor the second, since, thro' a cowardly spirit, she was more afraid of Collatinus's knife, than of her own: and for that reason she killed herself out of despair, which according to St Thomas, is the daughter of Luxury.' All this is false and unjust: she manifested both a great love for chastity, and a great courage. When a man has the courage to take away his own life, to secure his reputation, does not he chuse to die, rather than lose his good name? And is there in this the least sign of cowardice? If this is acting against the rules of true religion, it is at least conforming to the ideas of Heathen heroism. But let us consider a little Henry Stephens's words. He accuses Lucretia of contradiction and ignorance: She did not know the true name of things, since she believed she had lost her chastity, notwithstanding the resistance of her will. She contradicted herself, because she immediately added, that her body only had been violated. 'Quid salvi est mulieri amissa pudicitia? These are her words; Vestigia viri alieni Collatine in lecto sunt tuo. Cæterum corpus est tantum violatum, animus insons: mors tellis erit: sed date dexteras fidemque, haud impune adul- tero fore (36). — What is left to a woman who has lost her honour? The print of another man, O! Collatine, is visible in thy bed. But it was my body only was violated, my soul is pure, death shall witness this, but give me your right hand, and pledge me your faith, that the adulterer shall not escape unpunished.' I am surprized, that Henry Stephens, who was so good a Grammarian, had so little considered, that, in the usage of all languages, the same words, without any impropriety, are taken in different senses, more or less comprehensive. Did he think he could instruct Livy on the signification of the word pudicitia? I say Livy: for it is he to whom our Lucretia's expressions belong. The Latin that was spoke at Rome, when this lady was alive was not like the Latin of this eloquent historian: and there is no probability, that he any where had found the very words which Lucretia used; each historian turned them to his own way of speaking; the most exact were content to retain the sense and force of them. It is probable she complained, she had lost her honour; that she had been dishonoured, or that Sextus had violated her honour, &c. There is no impropriety in those expressions. Thus an English woman would express herself in the same case, though she perfectly understood the language; and though, notwithstanding her affliction, she took care not to break thro' through the rules of grammar. They who steal away a maid, and enjoy her by force, are reckoned ravishers of her honour: and if the parents confined their prosecutions to the forcing him to marry her, the process is most properly called a process in reparation of honour. The same phrases would be used, though the violence had not been so extreme; I mean, in case the ravisher had obtained some sort of consent (37); because having proposed to her choice, either the yielding to his passion, or death, or the rack, or famine, or some other pain, able to intimidate the most resolute, she had chosen the first part of the alternative, without any kind of inward approbation. Now, if Lucretia could properly say, her honour was lost, she might very well use words equivalent to pudicitia amissa. Note, That Ovid uses the words pudor raptus to signify the forced enjoyment of a maid (38), and Plau- tus expresses despoiling, by the words pudicitia pul- sa (39). Thus the pretended contradiction, imputed to Lucretia, falls to the ground; for those maids or wives, who should at this day complain of having been violated, dishonoured, or robbed of their honour, in the sacking of a town, or otherwise, might add, without contradicting themselves, that their soul had no share in that stain.

Henry Stephens understands not what he says, when he affirms, that the Heathens praised Lucretia, for having revenged, by her death, the outrage done to her chastity. It is false, that they gave this turn to their praises: all therefore that he advances to con- fute them is a deception, a fallacy, which is called ignoratio elenchi. The Heathens, who praise Lucre- tia, grounded their panegyrics upon her extreme sense of glory, and the reputation of a chaste wife, and her great delicacy as to this point of honour; which was so very great, as not to permit her to survive the affront that had been offered her. What our critic borrows from St Augustin, whose meaning he has not rightly taken, is subject to the same censure: it is still the false supposition, that Lucretia killed herself to punish herself for the crime. It is an ignorance of the state of the question. This lady knew herself innocent, and yet would die, that no leud woman should have the face to live, under pretence, that Lucretia had the cowardice to survive her rape (40).

One of the most reasonable objections of St Augu- stin, is, that self-murder is a crime; and he streng- thens his argument by the encomiums that are given to Lucretia. He reasons ad hominem, against the Heathens, and alleges to them the laws of their own tribunals. These laws would have obliged them to punish a man, who had killed Lucretia. You would therefore be obliged, continues he, to punish her, if she was accused before you, of having killed herself. But if ye answer, that it is impossible to punish her, since she is not in being, why do you accumulate so many praises upon the murderer of a virtuous per- son? 'Sed quid est hoc, quod in eam gravius vin- dicatur, quæ adulterium non admittit? Nam ille pa- tria cum patre pulsus est: hæc summo est mactata supplicio. Si non est illa impudicitia, qua invita opprimitur; non est hæc iustitia, qua casta punitur. Vos appello, Leges judicesque Romani. Nempe post perpetrata facinora, nec quemquam scelestum indem- natum imponere voluistis occidi. Si ergo ad vestrum iudicium quisquam deferret hoc crimen, vobisque probaretur, non solum indemnata, verum etiam castam & innocentem interfectam esse mulierem; nonne eum qui id fecisset, severitate congrua pleste- retis? Hoc fecit illa Lucretia, illa, illa sic prædica- ta Lucretia innocentem, castam, vim perperam Lu- cretiam insuper interemit. Proferte sententiam. Quid si propterea non potestis, quia non adlat quam pu- nire possitis, cur interfectricem innocentis & castæ tanta prædicatione laudatis (41)? I do not pretend to justify those who would say, in favour of this lady, that St Augustin has condemned her by principles she did not know; for she was ignorant of the axioms of the Christian religion, which forbid the attempt- ing upon our own lives: She might therefore have complained of being brought before such a tribunal: she might have declined the jurisdiction, and appeal- ed to her natural judges, to those ideas of grandeur and heroic glory, which have persuaded so many people, that it is better to die, than to live in dis- grace. But, as I have already said, this is an answer which I shall not concern myself with; I chuse rather this other reflexion. The Roman magistrates, whom St Augustin speaks to, and demands for judges of the question, might have quickly undeceived him, by shewing that, the laws, which gave no authority to private persons over one another's lives, debar not any one the privilege of disposing of his own. Do not you know, they might have said, in what admi- ration the Cato's, the Brutus's, the Cassius's, and so many other illustrious Romans, have ever been, who preferred death to a life, that would have made them witnesses of the oppression of liberty, or exposed them

In a word, are you ignorant how the resolution of private persons has been admired, or even of whole towns, of perishing by precipice or fire, rather than to fall into their enemies' hands? the nation, whom you look upon as the favourite people of the true God, blamed not Saul, it's first king, and one of the valiantest princes of his age, for having prevented, by killing himself, the disgrace of falling into the hands of the conqueror (45). His successor, one of your greatest prophets, did nevertheless give him the greatest praises (46). Do not the books of the same nation give the same praises to a hero, who imitated the action of king Saul (47)? And after this, will you tell us, whoever should have killed Lucretia, would have been punishable; and therefore she is punishable for having killed herself? Learn to reason better, and remember, that the maxims of the noblest and most august sect that ever was among the Greeks (48), favour this lady's proceeding.

(48) Treat of the Stoics.

It is certain St Augustin took a wrong method in recurring to the maxims of the Heathens, as a rule for the condemnation of Lucretia. I know well enough, that they were not all of the opinion of the Stoics, and there were some great Philosophers, who condemned self murder. I know also, that it has been said, that it was rather cowardice, than a proof of courage, to forego life, to be rid of trouble and pain; and that a man, who resolves to struggle long with his ill fortune, discovers as much firmness as he who kills himself, shews weakness. I know, I say, there have been many among the Heathens, who have been of this opinion; but they wanted on their side glory and lustre: they were only considered as the populace: the other faction was the nobility, the distinguished party, the school of heroism; and it might be represented to them, that, like counterfeited braves, they assumed honourable names, and gave the names of constancy and intrepidity to an excessive love of life, and an excessive fear of death. They were so fond of life, that nothing was able to give them a disgust of it: dishonour, poverty, the most stinking dungeons, the most inveterate diseases, did not disfigure it in their eyes (49); It appeared to them amiable even in this equipage. Death was not able to put on any disguise that could in Seneca, Epist. ci, pag. m. 414. conceal the least feature of it's ugly face. This, might they say, was the principle of that great courage of which they gloried, and which made them consider the action of Lucretia, as the effect of cowardice: Flaqueza de animo, said the Jesuit, John de Torres in the passage above cited.

Let us now examine St Augustin's dilemma. 'Ita A CONFUTATION of St Augustin's dilemma.

'hæc causa ex utroque latere coarctatur, ut si ex-tenuatur homicidium, adulterium confirmetur; si gus-tin's dilemma.

'tenuatur homicidium, adulterium confirmetur: nec purgatur adulterium, homicidium cumuletur: nec omnino invenitur exitus, ubi dicitur, Si adulterata,

'cur laudata? si pudica, cur occisa (50)? — This case has it's difficulties on each side, so that if the murder be extenuated the adultery is confirmed; if we acquit her of adultery, she must be charged with murder: nor can we any way answer this charge, viz.

'If she was an adulteress, why is she praised? if chaste, why did she kill herself.' He pretends, that this lady's murder cannot be extenuated, without aggravating the adultery, nor her adultery extenuated, without aggravating her murder. But to shew that he had not diligently examined this matter, it suffices to say, that his argument proves too much; for by a like reasoning, we ought to blame a person, who deserves great praises. It sometimes happened, that in the first ages, very pious young women, who were consecrated to celibacy, for the service of God, were violated. This is but too common a case at present; and we daily hear the story of an abbess, who, with her Nuns, had passed thro' the hands of an Irish company in Piedmont, and who made her complaints to Monsieur de Catinat. Let us suppose, that a Nun should, in this case, contract such a melancholy, as might bring upon her a mortal disemper. Let us suppose that the testimony of her conscience, fortified with the strongest consolations that a Divine could give, were unable to relieve her. Let us suppose she had conceived such a value for the purity of body and mind, that the bare idea of the most involuntary defilement, should cast her into an insupportable affliction of which she should die: would not this be a convincing proof of an exquisite chastity? Would not her innocence and virtue stand in a clear light? Whereas, if we follow St Augustin's dilemma, as much as you give to her affliction, you take from her chastity, si pudica, cur mortua? You see then, that there is more subtilty, than solidity, in this Father's argument: and thus you see Lucretia perfectly screened from St Augustin's attacks, except in respect of the murder; for if she had died of grief only, both he, and the other fathers of the church, had, by this kind of death, confirmed the praises of her incomparable chastity.

(50) August. de Civit. Dei, lib. i, cap. xix, pag. 69.

One of the odd conceits, which Balzac attributes to his Barbon, is this. 'Another word, misunderstanding in the history of Dion, made him calumniate Lucretia's chastity, that is, throw dirt on the finest flower of antiquity, and sully the chief ornament of rising Rome. And although the reputation of so honest a lady had come down pure to our times, this accuser of virtue had the impudence to oppose his single judgment to the testimony of all ages: and to dispute that heroin the possession of her glory, by an impertinent accusation. He pretends, that Tarquin began indeed by force, but ended by persuasion; that Lucretia would not give her consent to the crime, but shewed some respect to his quality; and that, after she was vanquished she was won, and the remorse of conscience, for the sin she had committed, as much as a repentment of the affront, made her resolve not to survive her dishonour (51).

The pretence, which the historian Dion might furnish these ill-natured people with, consists in his saying Lucretia, was worked upon to suffer voluntarily Tarquin's enjoying her. Ἡρώκασεν αὐτὴν ἐκὼσαν ὑπεραβήνας: Cogit eam NON INVITAM stuprum pati . . . (52). Διὰ μὲν ἐν ταύτῃ ἐκ ἀνύστα δὴ ἐμοι: εὐθὺν. Eam igitur ob causam NON INVITA adultero cessit (53). The learned critic, who has published several fine fragments of Dion, blames him for offering so cruel an injury to Lucretia, as saying, that she was not dishonoured against her will (54); he pretends that this is ruining all that was serious and grave in the narration of this adventure: and that such a fact, having brought on a famous revolution volution in Rome; and being, as it were, the hinge on which the history of the Roman people turns, it ought to have been treated in a very serious way, that it might appear, that the Romans, who had lived under a kingly government ever since the foundation of their city, did not abolish that form of government without a very just provocation. So that he should not have said, that Lucretia voluntarily suffered Sextus to satisfy himself, for this was next door to the crime (55); but that she was forced, by a dagger at her breast. This critic advises us to compare the narrative of Dion with that of Dionysius Halicarnassus, which he thinks much inferior to that of Diodorus Siculus (56); but, he adds, the best of all is that of Livy.

(55) Hoc enim proximum culpe est. Id. ibid.

(56) Diodorus Siculus, in iisdem excerptis, pag. 253.

Whatever admiration I may have for the profound learning and judgment that appears in the writings of Henry Valesius, I cannot here be of his opinion. It seems to me that nothing is wanting in Dion's relation, as to the point of gravity; and I think Lucretia's chastity is as well set forth there as in any other historian, and in all the circumstances that can raise our idea of it. The words, ἐκείνη, ἡ ἀνδραγαθή, signify nothing but what Livy and Dionysius Halicarnassus and others give us clearly to understand. They only serve to show a circumstance which no historian has omitted, viz. that Sextus did not make use of direct force, as when a woman defends herself as much as she can with her hands, and feet, and teeth, &c. But Dion gives us nevertheless to understand, that there was something voluntary in Lucretia's patience, just as the most covetous man throws his merchandizes into the sea voluntarily, when there is no other way of saving his life, which is still more precious to him than his riches. All the world judges, that he who enjoys a woman after he has threatened to kill her, or to put her to the rack, or to some other terrible punishment, has effectually forced her; and that he ought to be punished as a ravisher; and no body can say, that this woman suffered this willingly: Her consent is like that of a man who walks, but only does it, because they hold a sword to his breast, and are ready to kill him, or to drag him along with a rope about his neck, if he does not walk. I am persuaded that Dion would have used the same words ἐκείνη, ἡ ἀνδραγαθή, non invita. If he had designed to express what difference there is between a woman who chuses to walk rather than to suffer herself to be dragged along, and a woman who rather chuses to be dragged along than to walk. Let them no more therefore say this Historian has injured Lucretia.

[E] It has been said that religion had no share in this action of Lucretia. A learned man has opposed this opinion by some remarks, which deserve to be discussed.] Three observations have been made in the Miscellaneous Thoughts upon Comets. I. That for the three first ages of antient Rome, the modesty, frugality, and chastity of women were very remarkable; and there were some who manifested a very lively sense of honour (57). II. That this sense of honour could not be inspired into the Roman women by the religion they professed; since it was necessary, to that end, that their religion should teach them, that immorality was displeasing to the gods: but far from that it taught them the contrary, that the gods themselves were excessively leud (58). III. That, if Lucretia had loved chastity from a principle of religion; or, which is the same thing, if she had loved it in obedience to God, she would never have consented to Sextus's desires; but have rather chosen to abandon her reputation to calumny, than her body to adultery. However this she did not do. She courageously resisted this prince's pursuit, though he threatened to kill her. But when he threatened to expose her reputation to eternal infamy, she granted his desires, and afterwards killed herself. This is an evident proof, that she loved nothing in virtue, but the glory that attended it; and that she had not in view the pleasing of her gods; for they who would please God, would chuse rather to be reckoned infamous by men, than commit a crime. It must therefore necessarily be confessed, that Lucretia's religion contributed nothing to her chastity; and that, in that respect, she had been the very same as she was, tho' she had never heard there

Mr du Rondel published in 1685, some reflexions upon a chapter of Theophrastus (60), which I have read over and over again with great pleasure. The place, where he makes the elogy and apology for Lucretia, chiefly charmed me, as having always been an admirer of this illustrious lady; and if the subject could have suffered it, I would have pleaded her cause no less in the Miscellaneous Thoughts on Comets, than in the preceding remark. I therefore heartily applaud all that Mr du Rondel alledges in her justification, except what relates to the motives of religion. He makes two learned reflexions upon this point; one (61), 'that the 'leud gods were not those who were worshipped (62) 'in antient Rome'; the other, that 'if Lucretia (63) 'was willing for some moments, to survive her honour, it was, because she was forced to it by her religion, and was accountable for her reputation, before the Eumenides (64). She could not discharge her duty without calling her husband, her father, and the rest of her relations, and exposing her misfortune to them to the least circumstances; and then killing herself before them, in confirmation of the truth of what she had said. A Poet, whose name is not known, has hit upon this thought:

Quum foderet ferro caſtum Lucretia peſtus,
Sanguinis & torrens egrederetur, ait:
Accedant teſtes, me non ſaviſſe tyranno
Ante virum ſanguis, ſpiritus ante Deos.
Quam bene, producti pro me poſti ſunt, loquentur;
Alter apud Manes, alter apud Superos.

When chaſt Lucretia pierc'd her tender ſide,
Thus ſhe exclaim'd, while flow'd the purple tide:
That no ſeſent my ſpotleſs mind did know,
To men, my blood, to heaven, my ſoul ſhall ſhow;
Thus my ſad fate my innocence ſhall prove,
To late poſterity and powers above.

But I muſt here illuſtrate what I ſay, concerning the tribunal of the Eumenides. This is the account of it. According to the antient Theologiſts, man was compoſed of a ſoul, a body, and a ſhade. At death the ſoul was reſtored to heaven, where the thoughts were examined before the Diræ; the body was reſtored to the earth, where the actions were examined before the Furæ; and the ſhade was reſtored to hell, where the reports that had been ſpread of us were to be accounted for, and that before the Eumenides. Ne Lucretia, ſays an antient author (65), Caſtitaſ famam deperderet, quippe quam ſine Purgatione futuram eſſe cernebat, invita turpibus imperiis paruit. Lucretia, fearing ſhe ſhould loſe the reputation of her chaſtity, which ſhe ſaw would happen unleſs ſhe juſtified herſelf, ſubmitted therefore, tho' againſt her will, to his baſe deſires. It was neceſſary there ſhould be witneſſes, and blood, to be cleared from calumny, and to appear with impunity before the Eumenides; or reſolve to be damned to all the ſerpents of infamy, which was one of theſe goddeſſes, tertia Pœnarum Infamia. Thus, Sir, Lucretia has ſatisfied her religion, and is more commendable than has hitherto been imagined; ſince, with the ſtab of the dagger, ſhe made an expiatory ſacrifice, which ſtopped the mouth of ſlander, and cleared her a glorious way to the Elyſian fields.

Nothing can be more properly alledged, to confirm the firſt of theſe obſervations, than what is found in Dionyſius Halicarnaeſus, concerning the laws of Romulus. He expressly observes, that the Romans did not teach, that Cælus was castrated by his children, or that Saturn devoured his; or that Jupiter, having dethroned Saturn, threw him into Tartarus, or that the gods had been at wars, or had been wounded in them, or that they had been slaves among men. This whole passage of the Historian is very remarkable: we see in it, that Romulus established a religion, not as a man educated among shepherds, but as an excellent Philosopher, and a thousand times a better Theologian, than the magistrates of Greece. Nevertheless, the other Historians, even they, who, like Livy, were more interested than Dionysius, in Romulus's glory, have been silent upon this article: which silence is surprising and unaccountable. But let us observe, that this author, who particularizes so many things, rejected by the first king of the Romans, does not take notice that he had banished what concerned the adulteries of the gods. Let us also say, that he falsely advances, that they did not speak of the castration of Cælus, or the dethroning of Saturn, &c. How durst he affirm things so false? Did he not know, that the Romans had adopted all the chimeras of the Greek Mythology (67)? Why did he not content himself with saying, that, during the first ages of Rome, they gave no credit to them? Be it how it will, though we grant what he says of Romulus, we cannot thence infer, that our Lucretia was persuaded, that the gods were very chaste.

(67) See Cicero, de Natura Deorum.

The tradition, that Romulus was the son of Mars, and of the vestal Sylvia, was, doubtless, very ancient in Tarquin's time; for this vestal had declared, when she was with child, that a god was the father of it (68). It was Romulus's interest that this fable should be believed, in order to screen the honour of his mother, and give himself a celestial origin. This was moreover well suited to the temporal interests of the city he had built; which is probably the reason why he, rejecting the other fables of the Greeks, did not intimate, that the amours of the gods were to be excluded.

(68) Dionys. Halicarn. lib. i, cap. lxxviii, pag. m. 61.

Let us then be persuaded, that, in Lucretia's time, one of the articles of the faith of the Roman people, was, that Mars got Sylvia with child, when he went to fetch water, for the divine service, to the wood consecrated to this god (69). So that Lucretia far from fearing to offend the gods, supposing she should commit adultery, ought to fear the being alone in some consecrated wood, and imagine that her honour would run a great risk there, the god of the place being very likely to fall in love with her, and to force her, with so much the less scruple, as she had never been a vestal (70), as the mother of Romulus had. Note, that during the wars that Tarquin made with the Romans they built a temple to Castor and Pollux (71); that is, to two bastards of the same Jupiter, whom they worshipped in the Capitol; which is a justification, even in respect of ancient Rome, of what is said in the Miscellaneous Thoughts on Comets, that religion did not teach, that lewdness was displeasing to the gods. Note also, that the first king of Rome, by forbidding to ascribe to the gods what Greece imputed to them, intimated, that there were evil reports concerning their conduct. This, doubtless, would occasion at least the curiosity of informing themselves what these slanders were: and we know, that in Tarquin's time, the oracle of Delphi was very well known at Rome (72). They had therefore an account of the religion of the Greeks; they knew the stories concerning the love-intrigues of the gods; and, as people easily believe what gratifies their passions, they easily gave credit to these discourses, authorized by a learned and ingenious nation; and which furnished dissolute men with so many apologies. We only imitate the gods, said they privately, in the beginning; they were bolder afterwards, as the law of Romulus grew obsolete. We know, from the experience of the later ages, that the forbidding a book, wherein the amours and corruptions of a court are exposed, prevents indeed the inhabitants of the country from dispersing these scandalous stories, but not from thinking of them and believing them any more than before. Apply this to the subjects of Romulus, with respect to the proscribing the Grecian fables: add too, that the building of the temple of Castor and Pollux, was, as it were, an authentic declaration of Jupiter's adulteries, and derogatory to Romulus's law (73). The husband to the mother (74) of these two deities, was, by this edifice, as solemnly declared a cuckold, as by a decree of the Amphictyones, or of the senate. Whence we must conclude, that the virtue and good morals, so conspicuous among the Romans for the three or four first centuries, did not depend on the religion of the Heathens, but only on natural religion, &c.

(73) I speak thus to accommodate myself to those, who might pretend that that law comprehended the article which Dionysius Halicarnassensis has not mentioned.

But here is a dilemma. The religion, established by Romulus, and which represented God as a most perfect being, either subsisted intire in Lucretia's time, or was already corrupted by the fables of Greece. In the first case, Lucretia did not govern herself by the principles of her religion, since she stood more in fear of what the world would say (75), than of God himself. In the second case, she governed herself by the ideas of virtue, and the love of chastity, which the notion of her gods did not give her. Let us now see what relates to the second observation of our learned friend.

(75) Succubuit famæ victa puella metu. Ovid, Fagor. lib. ii, ver. 810.

He must give me leave to say, that the learning he has shewn upon the distinction of the Diræ, the Furæ, and the Eumenides, and so on, was above the comprehension of Lucretia, and all the other women of Rome or Athens. It was a piece of the most mystical Theology then in being: the women had nothing to do with it; the Initiates did not come near it: only the old Adepti were to be instructed in this article. I question whether Varro, the most learned of the Romans, and the Pontifex Caius Cotta (76), penetrated so far. But most certainly Lucretia did not know, that her acquitting herself in heaven and earth, before the Diræ and the Furæ, was to no purpose, unless she was furnished with the certificates, which the Eumenides demanded in hell. She did not therefore die, to provide herself with an answer to an examination, which she had no idea of. The bare interest of her reputation, without the least regard to religion, induced her to kill herself, as has been said in the Thoughts upon Comets.

St Augustin understood very well this truth, and hath justly concluded, that Lucretia's conduct does not equal that of Christian women, who, having submitted to a like violence, comfort themselves in God, the witness of their inward purity; and are far from refusing the suspicions of men, by transgressing the laws of God. 'Quod seipsam, quoniam adulterum pertulit, etiam non adulterata occidit, non est pudicitie caritas, sed pudoris infirmitas. Pudit enim eam turpitudinis alienæ in se commissæ, etiam si non secum: & Romana mulier laudis avida nimium verita est, ne putaretur, quod violenter est passa cum viveret, libenter passa si viveret. Unde ad oculos hominum mentis suæ testem illam penam adhibendam putavit, quibus conscientiam demonstrare non potuit. Sociam quippe facti se credi erubuit, si quod alius in ea fecerat turpiter, ferret ipsa patienter. Non hoc fecerunt Fœminæ Christianæ, quæ passæ similia vivunt. Tamen nec in se ultæ sunt crimen alienum, ne aliorum sceleribus adderent suæ; si, quoniam hostes in eis concupiscendo stupra commiserant, illæ in se ipsis homicidia erubescendo committerent. Habent quippe intus gloriam castitatis, testimonium conscientie: habent autem coram oculis Dei sui; nec requirunt amplius, ubi quid rectè faciant, non amplius habent, ne deviant ab auctoritate legis divinæ, cum male deviant offensionem suspitionis humanæ (77). — That tho' she submitted to the adulterer, yet without being an adulteress, afterwards slew herself, was not the effect of her regard to chastity, but through a fear of shame. She could not endure the thoughts of a man's baseness towards her, tho' she was not base with him, and this Roman lady, too covetous of praise, was afraid, lest that violence which she had suffered when alive, would be thought to be voluntary if she still lived; therefore she resolved to render that evident to the eyes of men by her death, which otherwise she could never have made manifest to their minds, dreading to be thought an accomplice in the fact, if having been basely used she had patiently for this lady, and he says, she surpassed her own deities [F]. Let us not forget to observe, that as soon as Sextus was sensible of his passion for Lucretia, he resolved to make use of force (d). This shews, either that, in those times, married women were not used to be cajoled, or that the virtue of Lucretia shone so in her face and conduct that no body durst hope for any favour (e). This shews also how the times change: for at present, princes, great lords, and all galants in general, think first of declaring their passion, and begin by cajoling. They think on nothing less than offering violence, as imagining they shall have no need of it. And if the worst come to the worst, this is their

* patiently sustained it. But Christian women have not acted like her, for having suffered what she did they are yet alive, desiring not to revenge on their own bodies the crimes of others, nor to add new crimes to theirs, which they must have done, if, because the enemies in the heat of their lust had abused them, they had for shame murdered themselves. For they enjoy within the glory of chastity from the testimony of their consciences. They have this also in the sight of God; neither do they require any more; but choose to all so as not to offend against the divine law, rather than to do evil to avoid the suspicions of men. If instead of following the Roman genius, which thirsted after the praise of men (78), she had conformed to the precepts of sound religion, she had chosen to die by the hand of Sextus, rather than suffered him to do what he did. She cannot therefore be justified at the bar of religion? but if she is judged at the tribunal of human glory, there she will come off with flying colours. For if, on one hand, life was less dear to her than chastity; she sacrificed, on the other, to a fair reputation, what she preferred before life itself. All this centered in self-love; but had she been a Christian, I say, a thorough Christian, she would have acted otherwise, and from a principle of divine love. The Spanish Jesuit, above-cited, states her duty aright, and opposes to her the answer of Lucia, a Christian woman. 'Mal se eganno Lucretia, y si tuviera tanto valor de animo como hermofura, con el primero reparara el danno que la hizo la segunda. No son violadas, dize Sant Basilio', hablando de las virgines: Quæ vim passæ sunt non consentiente ad voluptatem animæ, imo integram aique incorruptam sponso suo & fide & virginitate inclytam, majori cum gloria & laude obtulerunt. Esto no fabia Lucretia, y si lo entendia, cegose con el puntillo de la honra, y todo lo perdio. De manera, que por medio de la muerte, quedo muerta: y por temor de la honra quedo deshonrada. Quanto mas, que respondio muy bien otra no Lucretia Romana, sino Lucia Christiana, al Presidente Paschasio, que sobre el mismo punto dixo, la pondria en el lugar de las mugeres ramera, para que qualquiera la infamasse, y el Espiritu divino de que se preciava la desamparasse: Si invitam jufferis violari, castitas mihi duplicabitur ad coronam (79). — Lucretia was much mistaken, and if she valued herself as much for her courage as for her beauty, with the first she repaired the mischief which was caused by the second. They are not defiled (says St Basil, speaking of the virgins) who have suffered violence when their soul did not consent to the lust; on the contrary, they have offered themselves with greater glory and praise, like pure and faithful virgins to their spouse. Lucretia was ignorant of this, and if she knew it, she was blinded by the point of honour, and lost both her life and honour. How much more to the purpose was the answer not of the Roman Lucretia, but of the Christian Lucia to the president Paschasius, who, in the same case, said, he would send her among the most abandoned women that any one might defile her, and the holy spirit on which she valued herself should forsake her: If you order violence to be offered me against my own consent, my chastity will merit a double crown. There is one thing more, in which the Christian women St Augustin speaks of, excelled her. She had her choice of death or consenting: they were not allowed this option (80). Tyrants, persecutors, and soldiers, made use of violence, without proposing the alternative. Being reduced to this condition, all the defence they had was a denial of consent, and repugnance of will; for what would the resistance of arms and hands have signified? As for the rest, we must presume as much in favour of Lucretia, as in favour of that is, reject the surmises St Augustin has suggested concerning this Heathen lady. Who knows, say he, but she was conscious of some kind of consent, which might be the reason of her killing herself? Quid si enim, (quod ipsa tantummodo nosse poterat), quævis juveni violenter irruenti, etiam sua libidine illecta consensit, idque in se puniens ita doluit, ut morte putaret expiandum? Quamquam nec sic quidem occidere se debuit, si fructuosam posset apud deos falsos agere penitentiam. Verumtamen si forte ita est, salumque est illud, quod duo fuerunt, & adulterium unus admisit, sed potius ambo adulterium commiserunt, unus manifesta invasione, altera latente consensione, non se occidit infontem (81). — But supposing (which she herself only could know) that she the youth committed violence on her, yet through her own lust she consented, for which afterwards grieving she thought it could be expiated only by death? Yet in this case she ought not to have put herself to death, if by any penitence her false gods might in her opinion have been appeased. But if this be true, then the other notion is false, that though two were concerned in the crime, one only committed adultery, rather both committed adultery, one by open force, the other by secret consent, in this case she did not kill herself without guilt. These are unreasonable suspicions. We ought to believe, that her soul lost nothing of its purity; and that she was violently robbed of an immaculate chastity (82), according to the literal meaning of Brutus's words in Dionysius Halicarnassensis. Note, that we may reasonably suppose, no body had ever known young Tarquin's exploit, if Lucretia had not revealed it.

(81) Ib. pag. 68.

(F) Father le Moine . . . has made an apology for this lady, in which he says she surpassed her own deities.

I have seen, says he (83), the action brought against her memory, and the sentence which is annexed to it in St Augustin's books de Civitate Dei. I have sometimes heard, in declamations, that one of the most heroic and strict ladies of her sex (84) had pleaded against her; and I confess, that if she were to be judged by the Christian law, and the rules of the gospel, she would find it very difficult to justify her innocence. But if she be removed from this severe tribunal, where Pagan virtue finds no footing, she is out of danger of being condemned: if she is judged by the laws of her own country, and the religion of her time she will be found to be the chastest of those who then lived, and the most resolute of all the Heathens. The noble and virtuous Philosopher, who accuses her so often, would pardon her misfortune, and reconcile himself to her, and every body must confess, that her crime was less her fault, than the imperfection of the Roman law, which had not regulated it rightly, and the scandals of her religion, which had only given her ill examples: and truly the law of that country, in those times, was only superficial and out-side . . . As for the Roman religion which exalted ladies of pleasure to the rank of goddesses, and offered sacrifices to adulterers, it could not be expected that it should keep women virtuous or chaste. In this, Lucretia, nay, the ravished Lucretia, was better than the gods of Rome. It was not the love of pleasure, or the fear of death, that made her transgress: It was the love of honour, and her extreme apprehension, that she should lose it. And if she had not the resolution of Sufannah, who neither yielded under the fear of death, or infamy; it is sufficient to say in her excuse, that she did not believe in Sufannah's God: and the miracle had been too great, if a Pagan had equalled one of the sublimest virtues of the faithful. Were it not for the law and grace, what could the faithful do? We need not therefore scruple to praise Lucretia. . . . Not being able with her hands to resist an armed force, she resorted to it in thought, and her soul raised itself as much as possible to avoid the stain of impurity, which which her body was defiled (85).

their last shift; whereas it was the only one of the eldest son of Tarquin, a potent king at that time. He made his first declaration of love, with a sword in his hand, and with the threats of death in his mouth.

LUCRETIIUS, commonly called, Titus Lucretius Carus [A], was one of the best poets of his age. He was born, according to Eusebius's Chronicle, in the second year of the CLXXIst olympiad [B], and killed himself in the forty fourth year of his age; that is, he killed himself in the 702d year of Rome. He had a philtre given him, which threw him into a phrenzy. During this madness he had some lucid intervals, in which

[A] Titus Lucretius Carus. Lambinus conjectures, that our Poet was either of the family of the Lucretii firmamed Vespillo, or of the family of the Lucretii firmamed Ofella; and that the firmame Carus was a fourth title, denoting either his admirable genius, or the sweetness of his temper, or something of this kind (1). He produces some instances of other persons, who had two firmames. The baron des Coutures goes farther (2), and affirms, as an undoubted fact, that Lucretius was firmamed Vespillo, or Ofella; because, in all appearance, he derived his pedigree from one of these two families. The same Lambinus conjectures, that Lucretius was either brother, or cousin german, to the two orators, Cicero speaks of, one firmamed Vespillo, and the other Ofella; or else to Lucretius Vespillo, mentioned by Julius Cæsar. This last Lucretius was a senator, but that hinders not but he might be a near relation to our Poet; for there were families, in which some raised themselves to the senatorial dignity, whilst others remained in the rank of knights. To prove this, Lambinus makes use of a false supposition: he says, that if Cicero's brother had not aspired to great employments, there would have been an instance of two brothers, one of which was a senator, the other only a knight; but he owns, that this was not the case of Cicero's brother. * Finge ex his duobus fratribus alterum se ad honores petendos, & Remp. gerendam contulisse: alterum luce populari carere, suum negotium agere, intra pelliculam se continere voluisse (quod tamen fecus factum est) sed finge ita evenisse, procul dubio is qui ædilitatem majorem, præturam, consulatum adeptus esset, ut Marcus, Senatorii ordinis factus esset: ille alter qui nullum Magistratum gessisset, in equestri ordine mansisset (3). The baron des Coutures goes still further, and affirms, that our Lucretius always continued in the equestrian order; and that Cicero, who enjoyed the most considerable dignities of the republic, had a brother, Quintus Tullius, who never rose higher than the degree of a knight.

[B] He was born in the second year of the CLXXIst olympiad. It is a pretty current opinion (4), that Lucretius was born twelve years after Cicero, in the consulship of Lucius Licinius Crassus, and Quintus Mutius Scævola, in the 658th year of Rome. The baron des Coutures (5) is the first I know of, who places the birth of Cicero twelve years later than that of Lucretius; and yet he places the birth of each under the consulships fixed upon by other writers. Here Lambinus falls into three errors. He says that Eusebius has placed Lucretius's birth in the CLXXIst olympiad; that is, in the consulship of Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, and Caius Cassius Longinus, in the 657th year of Rome; and that others place it in the CLXXIId olympiad; that is, in the consulship of L. Licinius Crassus, and Q. Mutius Scævola, in the year 658: from whence it follows, says he, that this Poet was twelve or eleven years younger than Cicero, who was born in the consulship of Q. Servilius Cæpio, and C. Attilius Seranus. I. Eusebius places Lucretius's birth in the second year of the CLXXIst olympiad. Now Domitius Ænobarbus, and Cassius Longinus, were consuls the year before. II. Their consulship, and that of Licinius Crassus, and Mutius Scævola, do not belong to the CLXXIId, but to the CLXXIst olympiad. It is somewhat strange, that Lambinus should so carelessly determine the olympiads CLXXI and CLXXII, by the years 657 and 658 of Rome. III. Since the consulship, in which Cicero was born, falls in with the 647th year of Rome, he ought to have said, that Lucretius was ten or twelve years younger than Cicero, and not twelve or eleven. Gifanius, and his copyer, Daniel Pareus (6), placing Lucretius's birth in the 658th year, are in the wrong to make him precede Cicero by twelve years.

VOL. III.

I have reckoned up eight faults in eight lines of Father Briet (7). He will have Lucretius born in the second year of the CLXXVth olympiad, and that year to be the 543d of Rome. He will have Lucretius die in the 584th year of Rome, at thirty six years of age, or rather forty, in the consulship of Pompey and Crassus; and that this was the year, in which Virgil assumed the Toga Virilis: lastly, he pretends that St Jerome says, that Lucretius killed himself at forty years of age. Let us sum up his faults. I. He should have placed the birth of Lucretius in the CLXXIst olympiad, and not in the CLXXVth. II. The olympic year he mentions, answers to the 674th year of Rome, and not to the 543d. III. It is absurd to say, that a man who was born in the year 543, and died in 584, died at thirty six years of age; this, I say, is absurd, though he corrects it by these words, or rather at the age of forty; for besides that, he should have said forty one, and not forty, such a disjunctive ought never to be used, as at thirty six or forty, when it is certain that the first part of the proposition is false. This is Father Briet's case. He positively fixes Lucretius's birth to the 543d year of Rome, and his death to the 584th: he ought not therefore to have advanced two different opinions concerning his term of life. IV. As Crassus and Pompey were twice consuls together, it is a fault, simply, to observe, that such a thing happened in the consulship of these two men: he should have specified under which consulship. V. Crassus and Pompey were consuls the first time in the 683d year of Rome, and not in 584. VI. He should either not have mentioned Virgil at all, or have said, as Donatus does, that this Poet took the Toga Virilis the same day that Lucretius died. The point of singularity consists in the sameness of the day: and this Father Briet enervates, by barely observing, that Virgil took the Toga Virilis the same year Lucretius died. VII. It was in the second consulship of Crassus and Pompey, that Virgil took this robe, and in the 698th year of Rome (8); he ought not therefore to have placed Lucretius's death in the 584th year. VIII. St Jerome has plainly said, that Lucretius killed himself in the forty fourth year of his age. Propria se manu interfecit anno ætatis quadagesimo quarto (9). Add to these eight faults, that which Father Briet has committed a little after, in saying, that Ovid gave Lucretius the epithet divine.

Carmina divini tunc sunt peritura Lucreti, Exitio terras cum dabit una dies.

Sublime Lucretius wrote with so much fire,
That his bright work shall with the world expire.

It is sublimis, and not divini, in Ovid (10). Gassendus was strangely mistaken about the passage of St Jerome: he thought the year of the death of Lucretius had been specified in it, and not that, of his birth; which made him conclude, that Lucretius was older than Zeno the Epicurean, whose auditors Cicero and Atticus had been (11). Mr Creech has placed Lucretius's birth in the 659th year, and his death in the 702d; and pretends, that Virgil was born the same day Lucretius died; which would make a Pythagorean believe, that Lucretius's soul transmigrated into Virgil's body. Vix absolute opere moritur, eo ipso die quo natus est Virgilius; & aliquis Pythagoreus credat Lucretii animam in Maronis corpus transisse, ibique longo usu & multo studio exercitatum Poëtam evasisse (12). This is a considerable fault; for we must hence conclude, that Virgil wrote his Eclogues at eight or nine years of age. Thus you see how the most learned men confound their ideas. They change the day that Virgil took his Toga Virilis,

The same Chronicle informs us, that this work was corrected by Cicero after the death of the author [D]. And Virilis, into that of his birth. Lambinus made the same blunder (13).

(13) See the end of this remark.

If we judged by the style, we might easily conclude, that Lucretius was older than Cicero; but that rule would be fallacious. How many authors have we younger than Balzac, who wrote in old French, whilst Balzac wrote eloquently and politely? however, I have read in some Moderns, that Lucretius preceded Cicero. 'Paulo antiquior fuit, Terentio Varrone, & M. Tullio, ut quidam scripserunt. — He lived some time before Terentius Varro, and Cicero, as some have wrote.' These are the words of Crinitus (14). Charles Stephens, Lloyd, and Hofman, have exactly copied him; but Decimotor, copying him without well-placing the commas, has uttered a gross falsehood.

'Lucretius, says he (15), Poëta latinus paulo antiquior Terentio, Varrone & M. Tullio. — Lucretius, the Latin Poet, was a little older than Terence, Varro, and Cicero.' In another book (16) he had barely said, that Lucretius was more ancient than Terence and Cicero. A famous Englishman (17), whom I frequently cite, will have Lucretius to be cotemporary with Cicero and Varro, but somewhat older. He puts in the margin, that Lucretius flourished 105 years before Jesus Christ. Now, according to him, the birth of Jesus Christ falls in the 751st year of Rome (18), he believes therefore, that our Lucretius flourished in the 646th year of Rome. He must therefore fix his birth about the year 620. In which he deviates far from the common opinion, and from that of St. Jerome. Lambinus's Life of Lucretius, in the edition I make use of (19), imports, that he died in the forty third year of his age, in the third consulship of Pompey, in the 751st year of Rome, the day that Virgil was born. Of the two faults, which are notorious in this account, one is, doubtless, a fault of the press (20), and the other of the author. Lambinus, instead of the day that Virgil took the Toga Virilis, has put his birth-day; and, though we should rectify him thus far, yet we could not clear him of an error, for it was in Pompey's second consulship that Virgil took the Toga Virilis, in the year 698 (21).

[C] During this madness, he had some lucid intervals, in which he composed his six books de Rerum Natura. They who shall read in Thuanus (22), that Tasso was subject to great fits of madness, which hindered not his writing excellent verses, will not think incredible what we here say of Lucretius. 'Amatorio poculo in furorem versus, quum aliquot libros per intervalla insanie conscripisset (23). — Falling mad by taking a love potion, he composed some books in his lucid intervals.' Some believe, that Statius alluded to this madness, when he said et docti furor ardens Lucreti (24); but others think, that he only meant his Poetic Enthusiasm, and that he alluded to these words of Lucretius's first book: sed acri Percussit thyrsi laudis spes magna meum cor. See Barthius upon these words of Statius.

[D] Eusebius informs us, that this work was corrected by Cicero, after the death of the author. Father Briet seems to believe it, since he uses these words: 'In suis versibus, duris quidem, sed valde Latinis, & Tullii lima dignissimis. — His verses are difficult indeed, but his Latin is pure, and worthy the revision of Cicero.' Some think (25), he only meant, that Lucretius's poems had need of Cicero's file; but others believe his meaning is, that they do honour to Cicero, by whom they were corrected; or that it plainly appears, they received the finishing stroke from this great man.

[E] Never any man denied the divine providence with more boldness. He sets out with this impious exordium.

Omnis enim per se Divum natura necesse est Immortali ævo summa cum pace fruatur, Semota à nostris rebus, sejunctaque longè. Nam privata dolore omni, privata periculis,

He goes on, with giving infinite praises to Epicurus, who courageously attacked religion, and triumphed over it.

Humana ante oculos scedd cum vita jaceret
In terris oppressa gravi sub religione:
Quæ caput à cœli regionibus ostendebat,
Horribili super adpectu mortalibus instans:

Long time men lay oppress'd with slavish fear,
Religious tyranny did domineer,
Which, bring plac'd in heav'n, look'd proudly down,
And frighted abject spirits with her frown.
At last a mighty one of Greece began
To assert the nat'ral liberty of man,
By senseless terrors, and vain fancies, led
To slavery; strait the conquer'd phantom fled.
Not the sam'd stories of the Deity,
Nor all the thunder of the threat'ning sky,
Could stop his rising soul, thro' all he pass'd,
The strongest bounds that pow'rful nature cast:
His vigorous and active mind was hurl'd
Beyond the flaming limits of this world,
Into the mighty space, and there did see How things begin, what can, what cannot be:
Thus by his conquest we our right regain;
Religion he subdu'd, and we now reign.

He says, in the same book, that one of the things that most encouraged him, was the praise he hoped to deserve, in treating of a subject quite new, and in breaking the fetters of religion.

He has acknowledged some, I do not know what cause, which delights in the overthrow of human greatness. Having described the fear which seizes admirals at the approach of a tempest, he adds, that their vows are all in vain. So true it is, that a hidden force seems to sport with the dignities of the earth.

(30) You muſt underſtand here by Fortune, a deity which acts with knowledge, but is whimsical, malicious, unjuſt, imprudent, &c.

See here a Philoſopher, who, though he obſtinately denies a providence, and the power of fortune (30), and attributes all things to the neceſſary motions of atoms; a cauſe which knows not whither it tends, nor what it does: yet is forced, by experience, to acknowledge, in the courſe of events, a particular affection of over-turning thoſe exalted dignities which appear among men. It is hardly poſſible not to diſcover this affection, when we attentively ſtudy Hiſtory, or only the tranſactions of the countries within our own knowledge. A life, of any moderate length, ſuffices to ſhew us, how perſons, raiſed to the higheſt ſtations, by a ſwift courſe of good ſucceſſes, fell back again into their primitive nothing, by a like courſe of un-proſperous events. All proſpered with them formerly, but nothing at preſent: they are daſhed by a thouſand ſtorms, which ſpare moderate conditions, though ſtanding, as we may ſay, in the ſame road with them. It is againſt them that fortune ſeems exaſperated: it is their ruin ſhe ſeems to have conſpired, whiſt ſhe ſuffers others to eſcape. I do not wonder then, that Lucretius perceived ſuch an affection as this, inexplicable by his principles, and very hard to be explained by any other ſyſtem. For it muſt be confeſſed, that the phenomena, in the hiſtory of man, caſt the Philoſophers into no leſs perplexity, than thoſe in the hiſtory of nature. That which is moſt conspicuous in the hiſtory of man, is that viciffitude of exaltation and abaſement (31). I elſewhere ſpoke of (32), and which, as Æſop ſays, is the ordinary exerciſe of providence. How ſhall we reconcile this with the ideas of a God, infinitely good, infinitely wiſe, and director of all things? can the infinitely perfect being delight in raiſing a creature to the higheſt pitch of glory, on purpoſe to hurl it, ſome time after, to the loweſt degree of infamy? would not this conduct reſemble that of children, who no ſooner have built a caſtle of cards, but they undo and over-throw it again? this, you will ſay, is neceſſary, becauſe men abuſing their proſperity, grow ſo insolent, that their fall muſt be a puniſhment for the ill uſe they have made of the favours of Heaven, a conſolation to the miſerable, and a leſſon to thoſe whom God ſhall favour hereafter. But were not it better, will another ſay, to mix with ſo many favours, the grace of not abuſing them? inſtead of ſix great ſucceſſes, only give four; and add, as a compenſation for the two others, the ability to uſe them well. It will no longer be neceſſary either to puniſh the insolent, or comfort the miſerable, or inſtruct the man deſigned for exaltation. The firſt thing a father would do, if it were in his power, would be to ſupply his children with the gift of rightly uſing all the goods he thought beſtow on them; for without this, the other gifts are rather a ſnare than a favour, when it is conſidered, that they ſhall produce a conduct, the puniſhment whereof muſt be exemplary to others: beſides that, the uſefulneſs of theſe examples is not ſeen: all generations hitherto have had need of this leſſon: and there is no probability that future ages ſhould be more exempt from this viciffitude, which Æſop ſpoke of, than the preceding ones. Thus this viciffitude of good and evil, bears not the character of a being, infinitely good, wiſe, and immutable. I know a thouſand reaſons may be thought on to ſolve theſe difficulties, but as many replies may be invented: the mind of man is more fruitful in objections, than answers: ſo that it muſt be acknowledged, that, without the lights of revelation, Philoſophy cannot unravel the doubts that are drawn from the hiſtory of man. It is the province of Divines, and not of Philoſophers, to explain this. The Heathen Poets had recourſe to an hypotheſis, which paſſed very well with the people: They pretended, that among that multitude of deities who had a ſhare in the government of the world, there were ſome envied the happineſs of men; and who, to aſſuage the gnawing of this envy, left no ſtone unturned to ruin thoſe men. Hence Paganism was particularly careful to appeaſe theſe envious gods; and the goddeſs Nemefis, who was repreſented at the head of them, had as great a ſhare as any other deity, in the worſhip and honours of religion: and even when a man was thought to be humbled, as much as theſe envious powers could wiſh, he ſtill moſt humbly beſought them to ceaſe their perfection.

Vos quoque Pergamæ jam ſas eſt parcere genti,

TRAPP.

If this hypotheſis were once admitted, it might eaſily be explained, how human grandeur is more expoſed to the insults of fortune, than moderate conditions; and every one might underſtand the cauſe of that affection, which Lucretius himſelf could not deny. Now, of all the ſyſtems of Philoſophy, there is none ſo irrecoverably over-whelmed with the difficulties I ſpeak of, as that of Epicurus. Lucretius did not know what to fix upon; he could neither employ the hypotheſis of the Poets, nor any kind of morality; for he allowed not the gods any ſhare in the government of the univerſe, nor acknowledged in our world any inviſible being, which knew or willed any thing; conſequently his vis abdita quædam is a convincing argument againſt himſelf. By it he over-throw his own principles.

I ſhall obſerve, by the way, that it had been very eaſy for him to reconcile the exiſtence of what people called, Fortune, Nemefis, good and evil genii with his own ſyſtem. He might have left the gods in the ſtate, in which he conceived them, content with their own condition, and enjoying a ſupreme felicity, without concerning themſelves with our affairs, without puniſhing evil, or rewarding good, &c. but he might ſuppoſe, that certain collections of atoms, to which he had given what names he pleaſed, were capable of jealousy, with reſpect to man; as alſo of labouring inviſibly in ruining exalted fortunes. I have often wondered, that neither Epicurus, nor any of his followers, ſhould conſider, that the atoms which form a noſe, two eyes, ſeveral nerves, a brain, have nothing more excellent in them, than thoſe which go to the making a ſtone (34): and therefore it is very abſurd to ſuppoſe, that every collection of atoms, which makes not a man or a beaſt, ſhould be diſtinct of knowledge. He who denies the ſoul of man to be a ſubſtance diſtinct from matter, reaſons childiſhly, unleſs he ſuppoſes, that all the univerſe is animated; and that there are every where ſome particular thinking beings; and that, as there are ſome, which do not equal men, ſo there are others which exceed them. On this ſuppoſition, plants and ſtones, would be thinking ſubſtances. It is not neceſſary, they ſhould have a ſenſation of colours, ſounds, ſmells, &c. but it is neceſſary, they ſhould have another ſort of knowledge: and, as theſe would be ridiculous to deny there were any ſuch beings as men, who do them a deal of miſchief, who pluck them up by the roots, who cut and break them in pieces; as, I ſay, they would be ridiculous to deny this, under pretence that they do not ſee the arm or ax which ſmote them; ſo the Epicureans are moſt ridiculous, in denying, that there are beings in the air, or elſewhere, who know us, who do morals [G]. Had he as attentively considered the accidents which befall private persons, as he did those which happen to the great, he might perhaps have discovered some I do not know us sometimes evil, sometimes good; or who are inclined, some to destroy, others to protect us: I say, the Epicureans would be very ridiculous to deny this, under pretence, that we see no such beings. They have no good reason to deny Witchcraft, Magic, the Larvæ, the Spectres, the Lemures, Hobgoblins, familiars, and other things of this nature. It is more allowable in those who believe the soul to be distinct from matter, to deny them; and yet I know not by what preposterous turn of mind, they who believe the soul of man to be corporeal, are the readiest to deny the existence of demons.

[G] His work is intermixed with several fine maxims against ill morals. A learned critic, who has laboured to explain this poem, as much as any man whatever, gives it this testimony: 'Ambitionem etiam suæ ætatis gravissimis versibus libro tertio & quinto reprehendit (Lucretius). Quam sanctis denique fuerit moribus Poeta testis est locupletissimum opus gravissimum, multique præclaris ad bonos mores conformandos adhortationibus illuminatum (35). — The pride and ambition reigning in his age, he (Lucretius) reproves in the most severe verses in his third and fifth books. In fine, to what a sanctity of manners our Poet attained, his excellent work is a sufficient testimony, every where abounding with the most elegant exhortations to a moral life.' So that we know not what to think of that Jesuit, who durst affirm, that all the world is agreed, concerning Lucretius's ill morals, which, adds he, are but too manifestly exposed in his book (36).

Upon the testimony of this Jesuit, Mr Baillet had reason to say (37), 'that some have found fault with Lucretius for not dissembling, more than he did, his own corrupt morals, and so much the more, as he had less need to expose them.' But it is certain this Jesuit is in an error; and that there is nothing in the poem of Rerum Natura, whence it may be reasonably inferred, that the author was a man of a dissolute life; so far is he from glorying in the corruption of his own morals. I confess, he explains some things, concerning generation, in very obscene terms: but do not our most esteemed and most virtuous Physicians do the same, in the books where they treat of these matters, and several others? Read Mr Menjot's dissertations, who was a Protestant, and a perfectly honest man: read, I say, his dissertation de Sterilitate, where you will find Lucretius's verses, preceded by an explanation, which, to say no worse, comes not behind the verses themselves. 'Causis etiam sterilitatis annumeratur incompotitus inter coeundum motus, dum scilicet clunibus & coxendicibus sublevatis lumborum crispitudine fluctuat, sive, ut dixit Martialis †, vibrat sine fine priuriens lascivos docili tremore lumbos fœmina oisphalis (Latinus crissare, Græci στερυγίζων appellat) unde belluæ naturæ edocæ in congressu citrà στέναι quietæ perstant. Lucretius †, quem nescias utrumne inter Poetas an inter Philosophos numeres, hanc rationem reddit,

Nec molles opus sunt motus uxoribus hilum,
Nam mulier prohibet se concipere atque repugnat,
Clunibus ipsa viri Venerem si lata retrahet
Atque exoscat ciet omni pectore fluctus.
Ejicit enim fulci rectâ regione viâque
Vomerem, atque locis avertit feminis ictum.
Idque suâ causâ confuerunt scorta moveri
Nè complerentur crebrò, gravidæque jacerent (38).

There is a great difference betwixt the Poets, who publish obscenities in the way of Catullus and Ovid, and those who are forced to use obscene words, in explaining the effects of nature. Lucretius must be reckoned in this last class; and consequently his expressions cannot be brought as a proof against his morals. The case is quite different as to Catullus, and such as he, who publish obscenities only to give the history of their amours, or excite people to the most filthy debaucheries. In a word, Lucretius is a Poet who was a Natural Philosopher, and the others are the authors of verses on galantry: it is lawful for him to make use of the Physicians' stile. But obscenity is intolerable in love-verses. I mention not the poem, in which the abbot

Quillet gives rules for getting handsome children (39). I am not ignorant how Mr Baillet blames him (40); therefore I forbear saying, that, if a Christian Poet, a Poet who is an ecclesiastic (41), is not excluded from the number of men of probity, on account of the descriptions he has given upon the subject of generation (42), Lucretius ought not to be excluded.

I will not take advantage of Dionysius Lambinus's (40) libel, & pag. testimony. He is an author, who, desirous to prove by examples, the modesty wherewith the ancient Poets described what concerns the venereal exercise (43), alleges, amongst other passages, that of Lucretius above-cited (44). 'Ad genera verecundiora redeo. Pindarus Apollinis cum Cyrena concubitus narans, ita testis verbis utitur, ut ne virginales quidem aures eis offendi posse videantur hoc modo, νεγ καὶ ἐν ἀρχαῖον καίτερον μὴ λινδὴν ποίαν, &c. id est, licet ne ex ejus cubili suavem herbam tondere? & ibid. de Antei filia, quam pater optimè currenti præmium proposuerat. Χρυσόσπαρξ δὲ οἱ ἥσας καὶ πὺν ἀνδάναν ἀποσπείλας ἡδονῶν; id est, curiores autem florentem ei pubertatis aureæ fructum decerpere volebant. Lucret. lib. 4. in extr. de muliere motum adhibente in concubitu, Ejicit enim sulci rectâ regione, viâque Vomerem, atque locis avertit feminis ictum (45). — I return to the chaster Poets. Pindar, describing the commerce between Apollo and Cyrena, uses such words as might inoffensively touch even a virgin's ear, thus: Is it not lawful to gather a fragrant herb out of it's bed. The same Poet, telling us, that Anteus, offering his daughter as a prize to the man who overcame in the race, speaks thus of the desires of those who contended on this occasion, the young men who ran desired to pluck the fruit of her golden youth: Lucretius, in his fourth book, describing the motion of a woman in the act of love, says, that by diverting the plow she sometimes causes the grain to fall in an improper place. The reason which hinders me from taking advantage of this testimony, is, that Lambinus had no very nice taste upon this subject: for at present we should think such expressions, as he cites to be very gross. One of Pindar's examples; contained in the words I have copied, answers to this English expression: they would rob her of the flower of her virginity. The instances he cites from Homer (46) are for the most part as strong as the expressions of carnal copulation, and cohabitation; which the country notaries do now make a scruple of inserting, in the contracts for marriage, as was done heretofore. He moreover alleges these words of Horace, Inachiam ter nocte potes; where, says he, verbum, in quo turpitude & obscenitas inest, tacetur. — (The verb in which the obscenity lies is suppressed. But tho' two Poets, natives of Vire in Normandy (47), have used the like suppression, as Horace, in translating these words, yet is the translation obscene. I omit to say, that the ode, whence Lambinus has taken this example of a modest conduct, furnishes us with a quite contrary instance presently after.

We shall not therefore trust to Lambinus, as not being a competent judge. What he calls chaste and modest expressions, are intolerable, at present, in love-verses, in a book of wit, in a sermon, or a speech. None but Physicians, or Advocates, or Historians, or Dictionary writers, &c. can justifiably employ them.

Let us conclude with a fine encomium, which an excellent commentator on Lucretius has lately given him. Nothing can better prove what I have affirmed in the text of this remark. 'Huic calumnias ita profligatæ succedit alia elatior aspectu, & voce truculentior; clamitans vesanum esse, immodestum, impium, voluptatis magistrum, omni denique spurcitie, quæ decet porcum ex Epicuri grege, inquinatum: Ego verò nunquam animum meum inducere potui ut credam credam, Pomponii Attici, castissimi viri familiarem, utriusque Ciceronis delicias, & eximium suae ætatis ornamentum tot vitiis (de impietate aptior erit dicendi locus) sedatum: Testes igitur quæro, sed nullibi inveniam; scripta evolvo, at in illis omnia longe dissimilia: multa adversus metum fortiter, intemperantiam severè, libidinem castè disputantur, quæ hortari ad virtutes, ab avaritia, ambitione, luxuria possint deterrere plurima: & qui ad illius præcepta vitam morisque componit, illum privati habebunt integerrimum amicum, civem Respublica (49). — To this profligate calumny, succeeds another higher in its nature, and couched in severer terms, he is clamorously said to have been mad, immodest, impious, immersed in pleasure: in fine, to have been polluted with all the filth which might be expelled on a swine out of Epiræus's herd: for my part, I could never bring myself to believe, that the intimate friend of so chaste a man as Pomponius Atticus, one who was the delight of both the Cicero's, and the ornament of the age in which he lived, could be covered with such a multitude of vices, for as to his impiety, we shall find a proper place to speak of it. I therefore enquired for witnesses, but I could find none: I turned over his writings, in which every thing is of a contrary cast; many fine things are said to remove fear, many severe things against intemperance, he chafely disputes against lust, and as to what may exhort men to virtues, and deter them from avarice, ambition, and luxury, with such passages his book abounds; and if any person conform himself to the precepts he gives for the regulation of life, private persons will find in such a one a valuable friend, and the public a good citizen.

The Jesuit Possevin, full, as he is, of scruples, and as earnest as he has been, in advising not to suffer students to read some places of Lucretius (50), is yet of opinion, that they ought to be shewn the fine precepts of morality, which are in this Poet, upon the contempt of death: the avoiding of love, and upon the means of bridling the passions, and of procuring the tranquillity of the soul. Non negaverim perlegi posse in Lucretio quæ de morte contemnenda, de amore fugiendo, de coercendis cupiditatibus, de sedandis animorum motibus, de mentis tranquillitate comparanda . . . disputat (51).

[H] He might perhaps have discovered some, I do not know what, which took a pleasure in molesting meaner conditions; but perhaps he would also have rejected this hypothesis. There are very few who have not taken notice that the world generally complains, that infirmity and death, seize the persons that are dearest to them, more commonly than indifferent or hated people. See such a one, say they, he loved his wife and had good reason for it: he lost her the second year of their marriage, and is not to be comforted: and, while he laments this dismal separation, many husbands have panted after a state of widowhood for twenty years together, and are still threatened with the long life of their wives. Observe this widow, how she mourns night and day her good husband, which was carried off by death in the flower of his age: a hundred other husbands enjoy a perfect health for a great many years together, and shall live on several years longer, and persist in abusing their wives without cause. Should they happen to die, patience would be no longer necessary in their houses: comfort, repose, and good housewifery would there agreeably reign together; and therefore we ought to believe they will live long. A child is lately buried, an only son, the delight of his father and mother's heart: he was a youth of promising hopes, and worthy to succeed to the great estate he was born to: death has singled him out, amidst a hundred others, whom she has spared, and who are a burden to their families. That worthy man, who made so good use of his parts, and riches, is lately dead. His life was very short; he never enjoyed a day of health; and, if his constitution had been stronger, he would have done more service to the world than he has done. He is dead, and twenty others in the neighbourhood are perfectly well, and never knew what sickness is, who seek only to disturb all the world besides, and who abuse their health, their wit, and their riches, to the oppressing of innocence, and scandalizing the public by a wicked life. Observe yon rogue, a vagabond, and profligate; he fell from the third story, and never hurt himself. A gentleman's son, an only son, an honest man, would have broken his bones with a much less fall. My readers will all own, that such complaints are daily heard: and it is even a common saying, that the wishes of the public, for a wicked man's death, have a particular virtue to prolong his life. It would be easy to explain this, by the hypothesis of these jealous, envious, and malignant deities, which the Heathens admitted. Sound Divinity may reason solidly hereupon; but what could Lucretius have said.

If there were really deities, who repined at the profligacies of men, and delighted to mortify them, they would doubtless affect to destroy an only son in the flower of his age, a husband tenderly beloved, a wife, who was the happiness of her husband; and, preserve the life of a villain, who was a heart-breaking to his father and mother, and preserve a husband and wife, who were plagues to one another. Were they to put a family in mourning, they would chuse out a child of the greatest hopes, and most beloved; and were they to persecute a parish, they would afflict such as were the support of it, by their charity and prudence; they would consign them to the bed of sickness, and afterwards to the grave; and protect the life of the wicked from all harm and danger. They would delight in mortifying the public, by preserving the objects of their curses, and speedily destroying the objects of their hopes, the delights of mankind, the Marcellus's and Germanicus's. Consider what Tacitus says, in describing Germanicus's triumph, and the disturbance that glorious day bred in the minds of those, who remembered, that the favour of the Roman people brought ill luck. 'Augebat intuentium visus eximia ipsius (Germanici) species, currusque quinque liberis ornatus: sed suberat occulta formido reputantibus, haud prosperum in Druso patre ejus favorem vulgi, avunculum ejusdem Marcellum flagrantibus plebis studiis intra juventam ereptum, breves & insanos populi Romani amores (52). — The fight was enabled by (52) Tacitus, the beauty of his (Germanicus's) person, and the appearance of his chariot with five children; but they were struck with a secret fear, remembering that the favour of the people had been fatal to his father Drusus, that his uncle Marcellus was cut off immaturally on the same account, whence they inferred, that the love of the Romans was short and ominous.' Every one knows Virgil's reflexion, that Marcellus died young, that fate did but just shew him to the world, because the gods thought, that Rome would be too potent, if it enjoyed him a long time.

Offendent teris hunc tantum fata; neque ultra

Esse sinent: nimium vobis Romana propago

Vifa potens Superi, propria hæc si dona fuissent (53) (53) Virgil. Æn. lib. vi, ver. 870.

This wonder to the world must be but shewn,
The Roman race had too much greatness known;
Had not the powers divine resum'd their own.

It is very probable, that Virgil had in view the jealousy attributed to the gods; but our divines reason in a manner infinitely more solid. They do not deny in general the distinctions, which a prophane and impious Heathen would have called an affection to vex men, a respect of persons, or even pure malice, and envy of fate: they find in these distinctions, a providence full of goodness, wisdom, and justice. God separates us from those whom we love most tenderly: he does it with a design to dis-unite us from the earth, and to teach us, that the true happiness ought to be sought in heaven. He suffers us to be long exposed to domestic miseries, in order to prove our patience, and to purify us in this crucible. He lengthens out the days of the wicked, in order to punish the sins of men. They are the scourges of his justice; and no body suffers more than he has deserved. Thus sound Divinity finds nothing difficult in all this; but neither Lucretius nor Epicurus could have easily solved the difficulty. They might perhaps have denied the fact, and maintained, that the authors of the murmurs, complaints, and observations, we have seen above, compute wrong. It is customary for men not to reckon enough on one hand, and to reckon too much on

(a) See the remark [G].

They who have written his life affirm, that he was a very honest man (a). Some pretend that the invocation at the beginning of his poem [I] may afford us a proof of his contradicting on the other. Let a wicked man, or a wicked husband die soon; this is presently observed, but a man quickly forgets his reflexion upon it. But if an honest man, or a good husband, be nipped in the bud; this is attentively considered, and never forgotten, the memory being then a faithful register. Perhaps as many children die, according to the wishes of their parents, as only idolized sons. The death of the former makes no noise, it is but lightly reflected on; but the death of the other raises a thousand out-cries and reflexions. Besides this, we must know, that men are naturally more inclined to complain of their destiny, than commend it; and fallily imagine, on a thousand occasions, that their neighbours prosperity exceeds their own (54). There are some so ungrateful, and impertinent, as to say, My son is dead of his wound; if he had been another man's son, he would have recovered. Add, that Lucretius would have recourse to his Natural Philosophy. Wonder not, he would have said, that a son, tenderly beloved, should die sooner than another, who had lived unregarded; the later grows robust, he hardens himself in all weathers; the other is softened by his effeminate education, and the least indisposition carries him off. A young man of extraordinary parts is sickly, and dies before he is thirty years old: a fool, a booby is never sick, or at least recovers from the violentest distemper, and lives to be very old. Have you kept a register, would Lucretius answer, of all the learned of the first rank, who have lived to eighty; and of all the blockheads who have not attained to the age of man? resume your counters, and calculate better, you will find your accounts are wrong. But after all, what wonder is it, that a great wit should not be of a strong constitution. His texture is of a finer web of atoms, and therefore his resistance to extraneous bodies must be very feeble. A clumsy peasant is compounded of more massy and strong wrought parts; and therefore must last the longer. If the atoms of the imagination are in a very rapid motion, they disorder and shake the parts of the brain, opening breaches, by which there evaporates abundance of atoms, which are necessary to the maintaining of the organs. The machine must therefore necessarily wear itself out, and the principles of life quickly corrupt. Here is the explication of the axiom,

These answers, which I suppose Lucretius would have given, are far from accounting for all that is contained in the beginning of this remark.

[I] The invocation at the beginning of his poem.]

The baron des Coutures observes (57), that 'this invocation has surprized a great many of the learned, as being contrary to Epicurus's doctrine. Lambinus, adds he, cites a Florentine, who pretends to have found the reason of it, because this Philosopher, having maintained, that our crimes provoked not the anger of the gods, nor our good actions procured to us their favours, admitted however of prayers, and owned, that they heard those of men.' I do not examine, whether, from Epicurus's professing to honour the gods, we may be allowed to conclude, that he professed also to invoke them, and to expect they would hear his prayers. There is no consequence between these two things. We may esteem, respect, and venerate a being on the account of the perfection of its nature, without addressing our prayers to it; for we might be persuaded, that it concerned itself with nothing, and dispensed neither good nor evil. Nor yet do I trouble myself to enquire, whether Epicurus might not pretend to honour the Deity, only to secure himself from the punishments established against Atheism. I refer my reader to a treatise of the learned Mr du Rondel (58). But I venture to affirm, that Lucretius did not invoke the goddess Venus, to conform himself to the principles this Florentine ascribes to Epicurus, that the gods are worthy of our prayers, though they do not govern the world. 'I am not of Lambinus's opinion, (it is the baron des Coutures that speaks) (59) who applauds this Florentine; nor does he himself explain the thing better, by adding, that Lucretius, perhaps only addressed himself to Venus, according to the custom of the Poets: and that it was not as a Philosopher that he pretended her charms could obtain of Mars the peace which the Romans desired; or perhaps that Epicurus, placing the supreme good in the absence of pain, addressed himself to the mistress of pleasures; or, lastly, because she was the mother of Æneas, from whom descended the founder of Rome: for my part, I maintain, that Lucretius did not depart from the notion of Epicurus, in the invocation of Venus, it being neither a Poetical flight, nor a Roman gratitude, but a Philosophical reflexion. He did not look upon the mistress of Mars to be a goddess, since he himself in the second book says, that Bacchus and wine, Ceres and corn, are the same thing: nor did he any more imagine, that Mars was a god; but, as he had written a poem concerning the nature of things, could he better address himself, than to generation, which he means by the mother of love; and whom all the Naturalists have acknowledged for that secret appetite, which is given to every species for its propagation.' This removes not the difficulty; for it is certain Lucretius considered Venus according to the ideas of those, who took her for a goddess. He does not consider her as the natural passion, which induces sexes to unite: for in that notion, Venus is no more the mother of Æneas, than of Epicurus, and yet he first characterizes her by the epithet of Æneadum genitrix. That which, in my opinion, is most reasonable to believe, is, that all this is only a piece of wit. Lucretius seeing all the Poets invoke the Muses at the beginning of any great work, was not willing his Poem should be destitute of an ornament of this kind: he therefore sets out with an invocation of Venus, as the properest Deity for a Naturalist. But he no ways pretended, that this was an act of religion; or that Venus, whom he celebrates with so many praises, was an intelligent being: thus he has in another place invoked the Muse Calliope (60), (60) Tu mihi without pretending that he addressed himself to an intelligent being: he has not therefore acted against his own principles. I should sooner accuse Lippius, of committing an act of Heathen idolatry in the verses he addresses to the planet Venus, in behalf of his garden (61), than ascribe to our Lucretius an act of religion, from the prayer he addresses to the mother of Æneas. Note, that abundance of Christian Poets, infinitely greater enemies to the Heathen gods, than Lucretius was, solemnly invoke the Muses, or Bacchus, in their poems. This is imitating the Antients, and not performing an act of religion; for they have not a thought of invoking the deity. Note also, that this (61) Tu will invocation of Lippius ad Stellam Venerem, and Lucr. find them at the invocation have been compared, with a design to convict Lippius of an impiety (62); but this it cannot, the first Miscellanea, unless we suppose his prayer was not a piece of new Century.

For the rest, the Florentine, mentioned by the baron des Coutures, is the learned Peter Victorius. Mr Minutoli acquainted me with it in 1693. Here are his words somewhat more at large than I gave them in the article EPICURUS (64). 'There is in the (61) Aut ergo tu same collection (65) at the 19th page, a letter of Iudis in precibus, Petrus Victorius, to John della Casa, archbishop of Benevento, which turns upon the question, whether the Poet Lucretius, who, in the beginning of his De rer. lib. i. poem, invokes Venus, does not in that contradict the doctrine of his patron Epicurus; and whether this is consistent with the inactivity ascribed to the gods, by this Philosopher. Doth Mr du Rondel, whose work I have not read, and who endeavours to make an apology for Epicurus in this respect, mention this difficulty, or cite that letter?' Tycho Brahe was consulted upon this question by Isaac Pontanus, (64) Citation (117).

contradicting himself, and forsaking his system in the very first line of his book. They would be in the right, if this invocation were any thing more than a poetical flight [K], by which he was willing to accommodate himself, in some sort, to custom. It may easily be showed that he has, on several occasions, adapted his style to the common way of in the year 1596, and gave this judicious answer. 'Ad questionem illam joculam, says he (66), & nonnihil Criticam antiqui Lucretii, cum is sectam Philosophorum Deos eorumque providentiam inficiantium profiteretur, Venerem nihilominus, Aeneadum genitricem, primordio sui operis, ejusque opem imploret, non habeo serio dicere, quomodo hæc resolvenda sit, si quidem non ad Veneris fidus cœlestis, quod nos una cum ceteris subinde scrutamur, sed ad terrestrem illam Venerem, Aeneadum, uti fingebant Poëtæ, matrem, & aliorum quoque hominum genitricem pertineat (67) Si quid tamen in his nostris valent lusus, crediderim Lucretium ad imitationem aliorum Poëtarum sic exorsum esse, non quod revera aliquam Deam, quæ Venus appellaretur, aut ulla alia numina statueret. Ideoque sub hoc nomine voluptatem corpoream, quam etiam Deum subinde nuncupare non veretur, intellexisse arbitror. ——— As to that jocosé, and in some measure critical, question, concerning Lucretius, why he, who followed that sect of Philosophers, that deny the providence of the gods, invoked, notwithstanding, the aid of Venus, the mother of Aeneas in the beginning of his work. I know not what to say, seriously, in as much as it cannot be applied to the celestial planet Venus, which we, as well as others, observe, but to that earthly Venus, who, as the Poets feign, was the mother of Aeneas, and of other men. However, if one may be allowed to offer somewhat in a ludicrous way, I should think that Lucretius did this rather to imitate other Poets in his exordium, than that he believed Venus in reality to be a goddess, or that he allowed any other deities, I am therefore of opinion, that hereby he intended sensual pleasure, which elsewhere he does not hesitate to style a God.'

[K] They would be in the right, if this invocation were any thing more than a poetical flight.] Before we quit this subject, we must say, that had Lucretius invoked either Venus or Calliope, being persuaded, that his prayer would procure him any assistance, he would have contradicted himself in a manner not only unworthy of a Philosopher, but even of a man any way capable of reasoning. For he scarce has finished this pretended invocation to Mars's mistress,

Nam tu sola potes tranquilla pace juvare
Mortaleis: quoniam belli fera mœnena Favores Armipotens regit: in gremium qui sæpe tuum se Reficit, æterno devinctus vulnere amoris (68).

(68) Lucret. lib. 2, ver. 32.

CREECH.

When he lays down as a principle, that the gods concern not themselves, nor intermeddle with any kind of affair (69); and throughout his whole book, he makes it his chief business to explain the phenomena of nature, by the motion of atoms, and to confute those who ascribe them to the operation of the gods. It cannot be hence inferred, either that he did not believe their existence, or had no respect and veneration for them: for, according to his principles, it is not absurd, that beings should have been formed much more perfect than man, content with their own conditions, and no way curious either of knowing or reforming the actions and affairs of others: and as it is most certain, that we admire, with great veneration, the merit of some great men, though we never received any benefit from them, nor expect any favour, nor fear any evil office, nothing hinders, but that Epicurus's followers might have had an actual veneration for the gods. But it may very well be inferred from Lucretius's system, that he could not invoke them; and that he must have looked upon all the religious worship,

(69) See the remark [E], citat. (26).

WHETHER Epicurus could possibly have reconciled his system to the public worship, and received the Athenians.

practised at Rome, the vows, sacrifices, feasts, &c. as wholly insignificant. A reflexion offers here upon the conduct of the Athenian priests, with respect to Epicurus. They had several times brought to punishment the Philosophers, whom they accused of Atheism, and they vigorously prosecuted Anaxagoras for one simple act of profanation. 'Miror cur Anaxagoras reus factus sit quia solem esse dixit lapidem ardentem, negans utique Deum, cum in eadem civitate gloria floruerit Epicurus, vixeritque securus, non solum solem vel ullum siderum Deum esse non credens, sed nec Jovem nec ullum deorum omnino in mundo habitare contendens, ad quem preces hominum supplicationesque perveniant (70). ——— I wonder that Anaxagoras should be declared guilty of a capital offence, for asserting the sun to be only a burning stone, and so denying it to be a god, when Epicurus flourished in the same city with glory, and lived in quiet, who not only denied the sun, or any other star to be a divinity, but also asserted, that neither Jupiter, nor any other of the gods, dwelt within the sphere of this world, or were capable of bearing the prayers and petitions of men.' How comes it then that they did not seize Epicurus? was it because he had no quarrel with them, either on account of some personal interest or personal offence, as perhaps those they prosecuted had, and whom perhaps they would not have accused of irreligion, if it had not been to gratify their private passions, under the cloak of piety? or was it because Epicurus politically conformed to the public worship, and openly approved it? I believe indeed they were capable of being satisfied with the exterior, as they do at present, without searching into the thoughts: but was it not necessary, as at present, that this exterior should be observed, even in books and lectures? would they suffer a man to dogmatize in this school, contrary to what he professed in the streets and temples? it is hard to imagine this. And yet Epicurus's system was contrary to the worship of the gods, as practised by the Athenians: it could only allow the esteem, and respect, the praises of the gods; but not the prayers, sacrifices, and acts of repentance. Thus all the inconveniencies, that were to be feared from Atheism, the destruction of our confidence in the protection of heaven, the ruin of our hopes of happiness by living well, and of our fears of misery by living ill: all these inconveniencies, I say, without one exception, flowed as naturally, and as necessarily from Epicurus's doctrine, as from that of the Atheists. The least discerning may very easily comprehend, that all the practices of religion are founded not upon the doctrine of the existence of God, but upon that of his providence: since therefore Epicurus was tolerated in a city, which punished Atheists, it follows, that there was with them, respect of persons, and that they had double weights and double measures: or else, that the Athenians, so subtle and ingenious in other respects, were very stupid in point of religion. They suffered themselves to be plaid upon like children; not perceiving, that in dogmatizing, like Epicurus, a man mocked them, if he protested, that he approved the use of sacrifices, and prayers, and all the other parts of public worship. This reason would appear to me very strong to prove, that this Philosopher taught the providence of God, as Mr. du Rondel pretends; it would appear to me, I say, very strong, did I not see Lucretius manifestly combating providence, without any subterfuge or equivocation, or leaving any room for such apologies, as are made for Epicurus, and yet living in an entire tranquillity at Rome, a city no less jealous of religion, nor less severe against impious men, than the people of Athens. Note, by the way, that the good morals of a man, who owns, with Lucretius, the existence, holiness, goodness, immortality, of God, without acknowledging his providence, are as good proof of this position, Atheism is not necessarily joined with bad morals, as the proof drawn from the good life of those, who should deny the providence of God, and his existence all at once: for it is plain, that the belief of the existence, without the belief of a providence, can be no motive to virtue, nor restraint to vice.

CREECH.

It is plain, that the vow or wiſh, or prayer, he puts up here, proceeded only from a habit he had got of ſpeaking like other men. He daily converſed with people, whoſe language was filled with parentheſes, which might have been called religious, if they had not been an effect of cuſtom rather than an act of reflection. His wife, his maid, his friends, and all the Romans in general, were accuſtomed to bring in a ſolemn wiſh or prayer, in the mentioning an ill preſage, or ſad accident. Deus avertat, God forbid, ſaid they; if any miſfortune ſhould happen, quod abominor, which God avert. Authors likewiſe made uſe of theſe ways of ſpeech,

Di, prohibete minas, Di, talem avertite caſum (73).

May heaven prohibit, gods avert ſuch ill.

I make no doubt, that Lucretius, being uſed from his childhood to theſe forms of diſcourſe, uſed them in familiar converſation, either without any ſalvo, or only ſubſtituting the term natura, or fortuna, in the room of Deus. Thus the Proteſtants have ſubſtituted the parentheſis, God receive his ſoul, inſtead of that, God aſſolve him. The Roman Catholics uſe the later, when they mention their deceaſed relations; but as this could not agree with thoſe who denied a purgatory, the Proteſtants have not admitted it; but however have accommodated themſelves to cuſtom by a phraſe placed like the other, and turned according to the maxims of their own religion. Lucretius being accuſtomed by his reading and converſation to this kind of parentheſis, inſerted the prayer or wiſh we have ſeen above. Nothing was more vain than this in the hypotheſis he maintained; and it cannot be pretended, that he was ignorant of the inconſiſtency of ſuch a wiſh, with the doctrine of atoms: he very well knew, that that nature, or fortune, which ſhoved them on, was unable to change or ſuſpend their courſe, or even to hear the deſires of men. If the train of their motion were ſuch as muſt ſpeedily bring on the diſſolution of the world; this diſſolution was inevitable: the devouteſt prayers of mankind, their ſacrifices and proceſſions, could not give it the leaſt delay. How then comes Lucretius in ſome ſort, to invoke nature or fortune, to put off to another time the diſtruction of the earth? it was becauſe he ſometimes ſpoke according to the language of the vulgar. Note, that the doctrine of fatality did not exclude all wiſhes; for, without departing from his principles, Epicurus might very well wiſh, that the diſpoſition of atoms might be favourable to his health. He could not have deſired that it ſhould alter, but only have wiſhed, that their nature might incline them to ſuch or ſuch purpoſes. Lucretius goes farther, as appears by his expreſſions. This is the firſt inſtance that I will give.

The ſecond is not very far different from it, ſince immediately after the ſix verſes, I have recited, we find theſe:

Qua priùs aggrediar quàm de re fundere fata
Sanctiùs, & multo certa ratione magis, quàm
Pythia, quæ tripode è Phœbi lauroque profatur;
Multa tibi expediàm doctis ſolatia dictis (74).

*But now before I teach theſe truths, more pure
And certain oracles, and far more ſure
Than what from trembling Pythia reach'd our ears,
I'll firſt propoſe ſome cure againſt thy fears.*

CREECH.

Here he promiſes oracles, much more certain than thoſe of Delphi, and he made uſe of the ſame comparison in another place, to heighten the importance of the doctrine of the antient Grecian Philoſophers.

Quamquam multa bene ac divinitus invenientes
Ex adyto tamquam cordis reſponſa dedere
Sanctiùs, & multo certa ratione magis, quàm
Pythia, quæ tripode ex Phœbi, lauroque profatur (75).

*Which they have left as oracles, more ſure
Than from the Tripod ſpoke, and leſs obſcure Than thoſe the Antients from the Pythia heard. . .*

CREECH.

Who ſees not that, in both theſe paſſages, he expreſſes himſelf, according to the ideas of the people, and not according to the principles of his ſect? for, according to him, the anſwers of Apollo's prieſteſs could only be the dreams of a diſtemper'd brain; or of an ignorant impoſtor. He acknowledged no Divinity in the oracles: It was not therefore giving the higheſt idea of a philoſophical Doctrine, to affirm it excelled the Delphic oracles. It is as much as if we ſhould now ſay, that Des Cartes's notions deſerve more attention, than the prophecies of your ſtrolling gypsies, and fortune-tellers. It is plain then, that Lucretius adapted his language to popular opinions: and it would be ridiculous cavilling to maintain, that the force of truth ſometimes drew expreſſions from him, which overturned his ſyſtem, and convicted him of groſs contradiction: for example, where he owns in two places of his Poems, that there was ſomething divine, inſpired, ſupernatural, and prophetic, in the oracles of Apollo.

[M] It is pretended he was a diſciple of Zeno. They who have criticized this, have not ſucceeded very well. If we once admit their opinion, who ſay, that Lucretius was ſent to Athens to ſtudy, it can hardly be queſtioned, but he was one of Zeno's diſciples, the chief of Epicurus's ſchool at that time. Accordingly we ſee, that Lambinus and Giſenius joined theſe two opinions together. 'Credibile eſt Lucretium . . . ſeſe Athenas contuliſſe ibique Zenonem illum Epicuræorum Coryphæum audiviſſe (76). It is probable that Lucretius . . . went to Athens, and there heard Zeno, the great leader of the Epicureans. This is what Lambinus ſays: the following words are Giſenius's (77). 'Præerat hortis eo tempore Zeno acriculus ille ſenex, & Phædrus, Epicuri homo, ut Cicero ait, humaniſſimus, itaque hi videtur uſus præceptoribus Titus, quos etiam Atticus paulo licet hoc poeta grandior audivit. The gardens were at that time under the direction of Zeno, a ſhrewd old man; and Phædrus, whom Cicero mentions as a perſon of the greateſt humanity, theſe therefore were, in all probability, the maſters of Titus, ai, a little before, they had been to Atticus, who was ſomething older than that Poet.' The Baron des Coutures has trod in the ſame ſteps. It is probable, ſays he (78) that Lucretius went to Athens, where Zeno, who was the honour of the Epicurean ſect, had acquired a general eſteem. A letter has been inſerted in the Bibliothèque Univerſelle (79), containing ſome critical obſervations on the baron's opinion. writers [O], we shall say several things concerning Lucretius. They who desire to know the eulogies that have been given him, need only consult the authors, whom Barthius points out to us (b). Mr Creech who, in 1695, put out an edition of this poet (c), with an excellent paraphrase, and fine notes, had before published an English translation of it. It is pity so good an author had not a longer life (d), and that his end was, in some measure, like that of the Roman author, whom he had translated and paraphrased. I am certain, that the abbot de Marolles's French translation would not have met with the fate it did [P], had it been as good as this English version.

last is this: lastly, the fifth blunder is, that Zeno is said to have been the honour of the Epicurean sect, whereas he is acknowledged to be the head of the Stoics. The critic did not observe, that there were more Zeno's than one: He thought the founder of the Stoics was meant, and upon this foot he should have found in the words he censured a notable fault in chronology, which he does not mention. Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, died the first year of the CXXXIXth Olympiad: so that his death must have preceded the birth of Lucretius above 160 years. He ought therefore to have suspected, that the author he censured, had a Zeno in view, different from the founder of the Stoics: and if this suspicion had put him upon making some inquiries he would probably have found, that there was a famous Epicurean, named Zeno (80), who taught at Athens in Lucretius's time.

[N] We consult Mr Moreri.] I. He ought not to have said, that our Poet was called T. Carus Lucretius. Carus was not his name, but his sur-name, Cognomen. II. By these words, Roman by nation, Moreri doubtless meant, that Lucretius was born at Rome. This is expressing his thought ill; for where is the author so exact as to scruple to say, that Cicero and Livy were Romans by nation, as Demosthenes and Thucydides were Greeks by nation? III. We have no proof that Lucretius was born at Rome: Mr Moreri therefore ought not peremptorily to have given him this birth-place. IV. Much less ought he to have said that Lucretius himself declares, he was a native of Rome: I have found in Lucretius but one passage, which may give ground to say, that he makes it his native city; but that passage is of no force. It is this,

Funde, petens placidam Romanis incluta pacem,
Nam neque nos agere hoc patriâ tempore iniquo
Possimus æquo animo (81).

Carest with all the subtil arts, become
A flatterer, and beg a peace for Rome.
For midst rough wars, how can verse smoothly flow:
Or midst such storms, the learned laurel grow?

CREECH.

Cicero, Livy, Florus, Seneca, who were all born out of Rome, would not have spoken otherwise. All the inhabitants of a country might say, in the time of a Civil-war, that their country is afflicted, though the particular place of their birth were exempt from that public calamity. Learned men, more learned than Moreri (82) have affirmed what he affirms. Mr Morhof, somewhat wiser, you will say, than the rest, has used the particle, perhaps: but it is certain, that his forte relates to another doubt: therefore we may reckon him among those who positively say, Lucretius was born in Rome (83). V. He should not have affirmed, that Lucretius's relations sent him to study at Athens. This is, I confess, very probable, but yet, since there is no proof of it, he should have mentioned this by way of conjecture; or at most only say, as Gifanius has done, that no one doubted it. 'Adolescentulus autem, says he, quin à parentibus, seu propinquis, considerata ejus ad bonas artes nata pende divina indole, Athenas more patrio sit missus, Athenas non ita pridem à P. Sulla crudeliter vastatas, non dubito, postular hoc Romanorum consuetudo, ad doctrinæ ratio (84). — That a lad, either by his parents or by his relations, led by the consideration of his pregnant, and almost Divine, parts, was sent according to the custom of those times to Athens, a little before cruelly treated by Publius Sulla, I make no question, the custom of the Romans, and the mode of education in those days, obliged me to own it.' VI. It is not true, that Velleius Paterculus and Cicero have said, that Lucretius's eloquence rendered him the sublimest of all the Poets of his time. Cicero speaks of him but once; nor is it certainly known whether he praises he gives him, are great or moderate: for the learned are divided about the reading of his passage (85): some (86) understand it, that there was not much wit in Lucretius's poem, though there was a great deal of art: others (87) understand it, that this work sparkled with a great many bright thoughts, and that, nevertheless, a great deal of art appeared in it. Take the most favourable reading you please, Cicero will not be found to say, what Moreri ascribes to him. As for Velleius Paterculus, he is content to place Lucretius in the list of great wits; eminentium ingeniorum notare tempora (88). He has said nothing particular of him. VII. It is no small fault to say, that a woman, named Lucilia, gave Lucretius a love-philtre, which threw him into a strange phrenzy. This is omitting one capital circumstance, to wit, that Lucilia is said to be Lucretius's wife (89). VIII. It is not true that Cicero says, that Lucretius Offella was fitter to make orations than to pronounce judgments (90). IX. Cicero, Velleius Paterculus, and Cæsar, do not speak of another, who was probably brother or uncle to the poet. It is very true, that he whom Cicero and Cæsar speaks of, the former in his letter to Atticus (91), the latter in the civil-war, is the same man; but he whom Velleius Paterculus speaks of, is another, and probably the same who harangued better than he pleaded.

[O] . . . and some other writers.] See above, the remark [B]. The baron des Coutures makes Lambinus say, that Lucretius's elocution is preferable to that of Cæsar or Cicero. He must have used a different edition from that I have consulted, where I have found these words. 'Hoc non dubitanter affirmabo nullum in tota lingua latina scriptorem Lucretio latine melius esse locutum: non M. Tullii, non C. Cæsar's ascribes them to orationem esse puriorem (92). — I will not be so fitate to affirm, that none of the Roman writers, deserve to take place of Lucretius in point of Latinity; the style of Cicero, or of Cæsar, is not more pure.' Something like this might be imputed to Peter Victorius; for he boldly preferred Lucretius before Virgil (93). It is surprising, after the foregoing passage, to find Lambinus accused of saying that Lucretius's Latin was bad. 'Quo respexit forte Dionysius Lambinus cum Lucretium malum latinittatis autorem vocat, qua tamen cum sententia ille minime audiendus est (94). — To this perhaps Dionysius Lambinus had regard, when he said that Lucretius wrote bad Latin, in which however he deserves no credit.' Borrichius supposes, that Cicero, Aulus Gellius, and Scaliger, have praised Lucretius for writing the purest Latin. 'Certe purissimæ latinittatis esse omnia in confesso est . . . laudaturque hoc nomine Ciceroni, Gellio, Scaligero, aliis (95). — Certainly in purity of Latin style his merit is generally confessed . . . having on this account, been praised by Cicero, Gellius, Scaliger, and others.' We have seen above that Cicero's eulogy, had no relation to the purity of style. Glandorpius is mistaken (96) in supposing, that Lucretius followed Empedocles's opinions: if he had considered the first book of de rerum Natura, where Empedocles is confuted he would not have said this.

[P] The abbot de Marolles's translation would not have met with the fate it did.] Queen Christina would have thanked him for the dedication of so fine a book. Her silence, doubtless, mortified the abbot, who nevertheless continued well satisfied with his performance. Let us hear what he himself says (97): 'When my version of Lucretius was printed, the worthy Mr du Morhier, for whom I have always had a great esteem, advised me to make a present of it to Christina queen of Sweden (98): But this produced nothing; nor do I so much as know

It will not be improper to examine a false reasoning and a contradiction, that Lucretius is reproached with. The false reasoning relates to one of the arguments he has used to shew, that death was to be despised. Epicurus had employed it before, but in such a manner that Plutarch severely censured him for it [2]. The contradiction relates to Lucretius's

'whether ever she received the book, which Mr Herault, who managed her affairs here with so much care and fidelity, assured me he had sent her. At least I received no answer, contrary to the custom of this prince, who was then liberal of her compliments to men of letters. However it be, the book has not failed of a good reception from the public: and some learned men, the count de Pagan, the late Mr le Pailleur, the learned Mr d'Avignon, Mr de la Courvée, Physician to the queen of Poland, and some others, have given me thanks, in the name of the public, for having, in some measure, solved the difficulties that might be raised from the doctrine of this Poet, in his third volume, where he treats of the nature of the soul. I have since very much corrected it, and put it in a better state for a second edition.' The abbot de Marolles did not understand the Latin tongue, or Epicurus's physics enough to succeed in such a version. Yet it has bore two editions, the first in the year 1650, dedicated to the queen of Sweden; the second in the year 1663, to which was added the translation of the tenth book of Diogenes Laërtius, and dedicated to the first president.

[2] Plutarch severely censured Epicurus. To comment these words regularly, we must first set forth the design of Epicurus and Lucretius. They proposed to prove, that death is not to be feared, that death is nothing, that we are not interested nor concerned in it.

[103] See, in Gassendi's notes on the tenth book of Diogenes Laërtius, Oper. Tom. V. pag. 131, what turn might be given to this argument of Epicurus?

Their proof was taken from hence, that things dissolved, or separated, have no sense; and that things which have no sense are nothing with regard to us. Epicurus's words are these. 'Ο θάνατος ἐστὲν πρὸς ἡμᾶς, τὸ γὰρ διαλυθὲν ἀναισθητὶ, τὸ δὲ ἀναισθητὴν ἐστὲν πρὸς ἡμᾶς (100). Plutarch (101) pretended, that this Philosopher argued wrong here, and that there was a necessary proposition wanting in his syllogism; namely this, death is the separation of the body and soul: 'Ο θάνατος ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος διάλυσις. Aulus Gellius, taking Epicurus's part, agrees, that the syllogism, to be in form, ought to contain this proposition: but he maintains, that Epicurus, having not undertaken to reduce his reasoning to syllogistical rules, suppressed it on purpose, as being sufficiently self-evident. And it should not be thought strange, that the conclusion was placed not at the end, but at the beginning of the argument; the Philosopher Plato, frequently arguing after the same manner; that is, inverting the order of the propositions of a syllogism. This is what Aulus Gellius answers to Plutarch's censure: he mistook the point, and has been severely criticized in the XVIth century. He has been accused of having betrayed his own folly by endeavouring to cover that of another, and even of not understanding the state of the question. 'Naclus autem est patronum (Epicurus) tali prorsus cliente dignum Gellium: qui dum alienam stultitiam tege-re vult, prodit, suam. Tantum enim abest ab eo defendendo, ut ne intellexisse quidem videatur, quid in eo reprehenderetur (102). It might have been added, that he did not know in general, what a syllogism was; for he supposes, that of Epicurus is really conformable to the rules, and that to be in form there is nothing wanting, but the proposition sub-understood by the author. Now let us see what this syllogism would be, by adding what Epicurus has sub-understood.

*Death is the dissolution of body and soul,
That which is dissolved is insensible, and what is insensible does not affect us:
Therefore death does not affect us.*

This syllogism is fallacious, as manifestly consisting of four terms (103). We must therefore believe, that Plutarch's objection was not founded on the suppression of the major, as Aulus Gellius pretends, but upon this that the major, which was sub-understood, was not a principle from whence the conclusion could be deduced. This is assuredly the case of this principle; and you clearly see, that after having granted the major and the minor of the syllogism, just now produced, the consequence may still be denied. Moretus is very angry with Epicurus hereupon, and treats him as an impertinent Logician. 'Ilius artis (Dialecticæ) ignorantia ruebat in dicendo: sæpeque aliquid probare aggressus, ea fumebat, quibus datis ac concessis, id tamen quod probare instituerat, non concluderetur. Quale est, quod cum docere vellet, mortem nihil ad nos pertinere, ita ratiocinabatur: 'Ο θάνατος ἐστὲν πρὸς ἡμᾶς. τὸ γὰρ διαλυθὲν ἀναισθητὶ. τὸ δὲ ἀναισθητὴν ἐστὲν πρὸς ἡμᾶς. Neque enim sequitur, si id quod dissolutum est sensu vacat; idcirco ipsam quoque dissolutionem non sentiri. Neque mors est τὸ διαλυθὲν, ἀλλὰ αὐτὴ ἡ διάλυσις. Meritoque Plutarchus secundo librorum, quos de Homero composuit, imperfecte, atque præpostere, atque inscite syllogismo usum esse cum dixerat: non quod prætermisisset illud ἄληθμα, ὁ θάνατος. 'Ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος διάλυσις: quo addito, nihilo magis efficitur, quod ipse voluit: sed quod, stupiditate quadam, & crassitudine ingenii, non pervidisset, quantum inter id, quod dissolutum est, & ipsam dissolutionem interesset (104). — Being ignorant of the Art of Logic, he made frequent mistakes: for when he undertook to prove something, he laid down such propositions, which tho' they were granted, would nevertheless have concluded nothing, in favour of what he intended to prove. For example, when he endeavoured to prove that death no way concerns us, he reasoned thus: Death is nothing to us, for what is dissolved, becomes insensible, and what is insensible is nothing to us. For it does not follow, that if what is dissolved, be insensible, therefore dissolution itself, cannot be felt: nor is death the thing dissolved, but the dissolution itself. And Plutarch says very rightly, in his second book upon Homer, that he used this syllogism in a manner imperfect, preposterous, and which showed that he had no skill in arguing. Not merely for leaving out this lemma, Death is the dissolution of soul and body: Which being added makes nothing in favour of what he intended to prove, but that thro' a certain stupidity and grossness of understanding he could not see the difference between the thing dissolved, and the dissolution itself. And to convince us that the fault Plutarch has taxed Epicurus with, consists not in barely suppressing the major; he produces a passage of Alexander Aphrodisæus (105): in which Epicurus's argument is censured just as he supposes Plutarch had criticised it. I cannot think Plutarch would have troubled himself to censure that which the best Logicians might have done. Nothing hinders their employing an enthymema, which is a syllogism wanting either the major or minor. It is still used in the schools, while the greatest slaves to the formalities of disputation have nothing to say against it, provided the proposition understood be right: but what hissing would they make, if it was found to be as defective as this before us? Let us discover the fallacy. Epicurus and Lucretius suppose, that death is a thing that does not concern us, and in which we are not at all interested. They conclude this from the supposition that the soul is mortal, and consequently that the man is insensible, after the separation of the soul and body.

*Nil igitur Mors est, ad nos neque pertinet hilum, Quandoquidem natura Animi mortalis habetur:
Et velut anteacto nil tempore sensimus ægri,
Ad consigendum venientibus undique Pœnis;
Omnia cum belli trepido concussa tumultu
Horrida contemnuere sub altis ætheris auris:
In dubioque fuit sub utrorum regna cadendum
Omnibus humanis esset, terraque marique:
Sic ubi non erimus, cum Corporis, atque Animæ
Discidium fuerit, quibus è sumus uniter apti*
Scilicet

Lucretius's doctrine concerning the nature of the soul of man. He maintains, that this soul dies with the body; and yet he observes, that it returns to heaven when the man dies.

Scilicet haud Nobis quidquam, qui non erimus tum, Accidere omnino poterit, sensumque movere:
Non si terra mari miscbitur, & mare caelo (106).

(105) Lucret.
lib. iii, ver. 842,
pag. 172.

*Well then, what's death to us, since souls can dye?
For as we neither knew, nor felt those harms,
When dreadful Carthage frighted Rome with arms,
And all the world was shook with fierce alarms;
Which undecided yet, which part should fall,
Which nation rise the glorious lord of all:
So after death, when we shall be no more,
What tho' the seas forsake their usual shore,
And rise to heav'n? What tho' the stars drop from thence?
Yet how can this disturb our perish'd sense?*

CREECH.

They are in the right to say, that nothing concerns a man, which happens to him in a state of insensibility: for it is the same thing to the statue of Socrates, whether it be broken to pieces, or the statue of Caesar. Since therefore the breaking of Caesar's statue, does in no wise concern the statue of Socrates, the latter is no way interested in its own destruction: it neither sees it nor feels any thing of it any more than it would the burning of a tree under the south pole. But still they fall into a fallacy two ways: they cannot deny, but that death happens, whilst a man is yet endued with sense; it is therefore a thing which concerns a man. And from the insensibility of the separate parts, they are in the wrong to infer, that the accident, which separates them, is imperceptible. 'Epicurus . . . negavit mortem ad nos pertinere, quod enim dissolvitur, inquit, sensu caret, & quod sensu caret nihil ad nos. Dissolvitur autem & caret sensu non ipsa mors, sed homo qui eam patitur. At ille ei dedit passionem ejus est actio. Quod si hominis est pati mortem, dissolutionem corporis & peremptionem sensus, quam ineptum, ut tanta vis ad hominem non pertinere dicatur? (107) — Epicurus . . . denied, that death any way concerns us, for, said he, that which is dissolved, wants sense, and that which wants sense, can be nothing to us. But that which is dissolved, and wants sense is not death itself, but the man who suffers it. So that be attributed passion to that which is the action. But if it be the part of man to suffer death, the dissolution of the body, and the loss of sense, how ridiculous is it to say, that this great change concerns him not.' Thus their first inconsequence consists in their concluding from the parts separated to the separation itself; as the latter, may be painful, and attended with a thousand sorts of troublesome sensations, it is an evil which properly and really belongs to man, and that even in virtue of their own principle, that if the dead are not at all interested in their condition, it is because they feel nothing. The second defect of these Philosophers reasoning, is their supposing, that man only fears death, because he imagines it attended with a great positive misery. They are mistaken, and afford no remedy to such as look on the bare loss of life, as a great evil. The love of life is deeply rooted in the heart of man; and this is a sign that it is considered as a very great good: from whence it follows, that death is feared as a very great evil, merely for robbing us of this good. What signifies it, against this fear, to say, You will feel nothing after you are dead? Will you not quickly be answered, It is enough to be deprived of a life I love so well; and if the union of my body and soul is a state which belongs to me, and which I passionately desire to preserve, it cannot be pretended, that death, which breaks this union, is a thing which does not concern me. Let us conclude, that Epicurus and Lucretius's argument was not just, and could only be conclusive against the fear of pain in another world. There was another sort of fear, which they ought to have removed; to wit, the fear of the deprivation of the pleasures of this life. They might say, that, taking all together, the insensibility of the dead is a gain rather than a loss, as being a deliverance from the evils of this life. Now whether these evils surpass the goods, as many have believed, or whether they only equal them, it is an advantage to be insensible; for there is no man who rightly understands his own interest, but would prefer four hours of good sleep, before two hours of pleasure, and two hours of pain, supposing them equal in degree (108).

Let us see another paralogism of Lucretius. He pretends, that death would not concern us, even tho' sensation should remain in the separate parts, or tho' chance should again in time produce a re-union of soul and body. His reason is, that we are compounded of a soul and body; and therefore nothing concerns us, but what belongs to us, as we are this compound. As us of. He also therefore the soul, separate from the body, is not the man, it's sensations in that state would not be those of the man; and it would not be true to say, that Scipio would be unhappy, under pretence that Scipio's soul was unhappy after Scipio's death. I make use of this example, though it is not contained in these words of Lucretius.

A frame compos'd of body join'd with soul?*

CREECH.

He thinks it possible, that the same atoms a man is composed of, and which are dispersed by death, may take, in time, the same situation, and produce a man again: but he will not allow, that the events which happen to this new man, should any way concern the former. The interruption of life, adds he, hinders our having any interest in what shall happen hereafter, in case the ages to come should restore to us the human nature we had before. The state we were formerly in, is at present a thing entirely indifferent to us; and we may say the same of the states we may arrive to, in the time to come.

Nec, si materiam nostram conlegerit ætas
Post obitum, rursumque redegerit, ut sita nunc est;
Atque iterum Nobis fuerint data lumina vitæ,
Pertineat quidquam tamen ad Nos id quoque fastum,
Interrupta semel cum sit repetentia nostra
Et nunc nil ad Nos de Nobis attinet, antè
Quæ fuimus, nec jam de illis Nos afficit angor, Quos de materia nostra nova proferet ætas:
Nam cum respicias immensū temporis omne
Præteritum spatium, tum motus Materiæ
Multimodi quàm sint; facili hoc adcredere possis,
Semina sæpe in eodem, ut nunc sunt, ordine postâ:
Nec memori tamen id quimus deprendere mente.
Inter enim jectâ est vitæ pausa, vagæque Deerrant passim motus ab Sensibus omnes (110).

ver. 859.

*Now, grant the scatter'd ashes of our urn
Be join'd again, and life and sense return;
Yet how can that concern us when 'tis done?
Since all the mem'ry of pass'd life is gone?
Now we ne'er joy, nor grieve, to think that we Were heretofore, nor what those things will be,
Which fram'd from us the following age shall see.
When we revolve, how num'rous years have run,
How oft the east bebel'd the rising sun,
E'er we began, and how the atoms move,
How the unthinking seeds for ever strove;
'Tis probable, and reason's laws allow,
Those seeds of ours were once combin'd as now:
Yet now who minds, who knows his former state?
The interim of death, the band of fate,*

Such motions, as destroy'd the former sense.*

A COMPUTATION of Lucretius, as to what he says of the sense which might remain after death.

If Lucretius expected to convince of these two points of Physics, such as know how to go the bottom of a question, he made little use of his reason. Here is an instance that will set this matter in a clear light, tho' I suppose it at pleasure. Let us fancy to ourselves a watch, and let us suppose it to be animated, to be sensible, and capable of understanding what the maker says to it. Let us after this suppose, that he tells it, he is going to take it to pieces; that he will not leave two wheels of it together; that all the pieces shall be separated, and laid each a-part in a box; that the sense shall remain, notwithstanding this dissolution; and that the soul or principle of life shall retain it's faculties, as to grief and joy, &c. Is it not certain, on this supposition, that the watch will interest itself in these sensations, which it is told the dispersion of it's parts will not put an end to? It will be no longer affected as a watch: but it is sufficient, for it's misery, that, as a sensitive substance, it shall still feel heat, cold, pain, trouble, &c. It will certainly be the same substance, which had been exposed to these evils in the watch; and the evil it shall suffer after the destruction of the compound will only be a continuation of the evil it had suffered, whilst the compound subsisted. Apply this to our soul, and you shall see, that, if it remain sensible after our death, it would be most true to say, that the same nature which had suffered hunger, and cold, the fever, and stone, &c. in a human body, suffers other things out of the human body: and that Lucretius's consolation is chimerical and ridiculous. What signifies it, says he, if your soul be miserable after your death, you are a man; the soul will not be a man in a separate state; and consequently the miseries of the soul will not belong to you. A silly consequence! It is as if Pythagoras had said to a man, at the point of death, your soul shall go into the body of an ox; which shall be almost all it's life yoked to the plough, and suffered to die of hunger when it is old; but that suffering will not concern you, since an ox is not a man. Would not this be a wonderful comfort? People do not sufficiently attend to this position, that the subject of the accidents remains always numerically the same, in all the transformations of bodies. The same atoms that compose water, are in the ice, in the vapours, in the clouds, in the hail, and in the snow: those which compose the wheat pass into the meal, the paste, the bread, the blood, the flesh, the bones, &c. If they were miserable under the form of water, and under that of ice, it is the same numerical substance, that is to be pitied in both these estates; consequently all the disasters that are to be feared, under the form of meal, concern the atoms which compose the wheat: and nothing ought so much to interest itself about the lot and condition of the meal as the atoms of wheat, though they are not to suffer in the state and composition of wheat.

A COMPUTATION of Lucretius, as to what he says concerning the production of the same man

Let us now confute another fallacy of Lucretius, and resume the example of a watch. If the watch-maker should say to it, I will keep your parts dispersed for three or four years, but at that period of time I will re-join them, and make you up again. During the separation, no part shall feel any pain; they shall all be in a perfect sleep, but as soon as they are restored to their former situation, their labour, their constraint, and state of suffering, shall return. Would not a watch, that should give credit to these words, be fully persuaded, that itself and no other should be the watch, that he would put in order again at three or four years end? It would have the greatest reason in the world to believe it, and to interest itself in this new watch's fate and destiny, as it's own. And yet it's first life would have been interrupted. Let us say then, that Lucretius too lightly examined this matter, when he affirmed, that death putting a long interval between the first and second life of the same atoms of a human body, would cause this first and second life to belong to different men. I know indeed, that, though we suppose this kind of resurrection, yet we might say, that the miseries we had suffered at Rome in Marius and Sylla's time, do not at all contribute to our present fortune. A total oblivion separates us from those times; nevertheless we should have been those miserable persons: and we should be the same men, who had formerly undergone so many misfortunes: from whence it results, that if we should return again into the world a thousand years hence, all the miseries we were to suffer in that new life would properly belong to us; and the certain knowledge of such a futurity must necessarily give us a disturbance. Lucretius therefore has not reasoned justly. There are but two ways a man can take to calm, in a reasonable manner, the fears of another life. One is to promise the happiness of heaven; the other is to promise a privation of all kind of sense. Note, that the Spinozists had no pretence to either of these two consolations. All their refuge consists in preparing themselves for a perpetual and infinite circulation of forms, ever accompanied with thought, but without knowing whether they shall be more happy or more miserable than under the human form.

[R] They who pretended that he could not say this without contradicting himself, have . . . not well considered his opinion.] Lactantius charges this contradiction upon him, and imagines, that the force of truth overpowered him, and insinuated itself into his soul without being perceived. 'Denique idem Lucretius oblitus quid assereret, & quod dogma defenderet, hos versus posuit;

*Cedit item retro de terra quod fuit ante
In terram, sed quod missum est ex ætheris oris
Id rursus Cæli fulgentia templa receptant.*

Quod ejus non erat dicere, qui perire animas cum corporibus differebat; sed victus est veritate, & imprudenti ratio vera surrepsit (111). — In fine, Lucretius forgetting what he had asserted, and what doctrines he hath defended, hath left us these verses;

*Whatever is from the earth's entrails born,
Dost soon, or late, unto that earth return,
But what descends from the æthereal skies,
From earth releas'd, to heav'n again will rise.*

Which surely was not fit for him to say, who had maintained that the souls perished with the bodies; but he was overcome by truth, and these words escaped him unawares. A Dominican, who has lately written concerning the Chinese idolatry, perfectly approves this observation of Lactantius, and makes use of it to corroborate his proofs against the Jesuits (112). 'It would be no wonder that the Chinese should contradict themselves, since Lucretius, one of the learnedest Philosophers of the Epicurean sect, who durst openly attack the doctrine of the soul's immortality, confessed, notwithstanding, that if it dispersed itself after death, it was because the grosser parts were lost in the earth, and the more subtil and celestial parts re-ascended into the third region of the air, or into heaven. Thus, says Lactantius, he fell into a manifest contradiction upon the subject of the soul' (113). The notion of the learned of China, upon this point, perfectly resembles that of Lucretius, and they explain themselves much as he did. This Philosopher maintains, that the soul perishes with the body: nevertheless he confesses, that it's citest & subtilest parts ascend and re-unite in heaven, from whence they came. He contradicts himself, though he was a very ingenious man: and you object to us, as a great absurdity, that the Chinese who are a people of a very mean understanding, without subtilty, penetration, and almost without principles, as you declare in your Memoirs, should contradict themselves, if they believed, that the pictures of the dead were the seats of their souls? If the contradiction of the Chinese be no grosser than that which Lucretius is accused of, the adversaries of the Jesuits will get little by it; for it is certain Lactantius had no reason to believe, that Lucretius contradicted himself. objection would have given him no trouble: he would have been infinitely harder put to it, to maintain the attributes of his gods [S]. For he himself furnishes arms to those who

the earth, impregnated with atoms which fall from heaven along with the rain, produces plants, and beasts, and men. Lucretius would prove in this place, that two kinds of insensible matter may compose one entire sensible being. The earth is insensible, the seeds it receives into its bosom, and which drop from heaven, are insensible; and yet the earth, impregnated by those seeds, produces and nourishes bodies that have life and sense. Death disunites the parts of these bodies, but destroys nothing of their substance. Those that the earth supplied are restored to the earth; and those which descended from the region of the æther ascend thither again. This manifestly means, that the subtil parts which compose the soul, according to Epicurus's system, evaporate, and exhale, when the man dies, and disperse themselves in the air; just as we see bodies do in the chymical analysis of compounds, when the spirituous parts gain the top, and the earthy remain at the bottom of the vessel. Lucretius does not pretend, as the Dominicans suppose that the parts of the soul, go, and reunite in heaven from whence they came; so as to persevere in a state of a soul, and a thinking substance. He supposes them dissipated, and insensible, as they were before the life of the animal (115); and therefore does not believe, that the soul, as a soul, survives the man: there is therefore no contradiction in his doctrine, and he cannot be alledged for an example of the contradictions which the Chinese would fall into, if they affirmed, on one hand, that the soul is nothing but the subtilest parts of this-kie or matter; and pretended on the other, that it descends into the pictures of the dead from the uppermost region of the air, where it had resided (116).

[S] He would have been infinitely harder put to it, to maintain the attributes of his gods. A perfect tranquillity, and compleat happiness, were the principal qualities which he attributed to the gods (117). He maintained, on the other hand, that the nature of things contained nothing but vacuum and body;

Omnis, ut est, igitur, per se, Natura, duabus Constituit rebus; nam corpora sunt, & inane (118).

*This All consists of body and of space,
That moves, and this affords the motion place.*

He assigns his reasons and then concludes,

Ergo præter Inane, & Corpora, tertia per se
Nulla potest rerum in numero natura relinqui;
Nec, quæ sub sensus cadat ullo tempore nostros,
Nec, ratione animi quam quisquam possit aspicere.
Nam, quæcunque cluent, aut his conjuncta duabus
Rebus ea invenies: aut horum eventa videbis (119).

*Well then a different third in vain is sought,
And not to be discover'd by sense, or thought,
For whatso'er may seem of more degree,
Are the events, or properties of these.
While to explain we call those properties,
Which never part except the subject dies
Body and space make up this mighty frame,
And all we see is but made up of them.*

CREECH.

Without an extraordinary penetration one may easily perceive, that these two doctrines of Lucretius are inconsistent. I might therefore have discovered the difficulty, which we shall see by and by; but I had not the leisure to consider it; I have found it, ready to my hand, in a book of the Sieur Cotin, before I had considered this subject. And, as it is but just to give every one his due, I shall make use of the words of this writer. The gods 'have bodies, or something like bodies, since besides vacuum and body, and what results from their union, we cannot so much as conceive any other nature. This Epicurus positively teaches;

This All consists of body and of space.

VOL. III. N°. LXXXVII.

says the interpreter of this Philosopher, who also believes, that, if the soul were incorporeal, it could neither do nor suffer any thing. What felicity then would the gods have, if they were incorporeal (120)? Their bodies are composed of atoms and there is a vacuum betwixt the parts which compose these divine bodies since vacuum and atoms are the principles of all things. Every body may be resolved into the parts which compose it; and the heap of atoms . . . cannot eternally subsist in the same manner; they are too volatile, and moveable to remain always at rest (121). Cotin infers from all this, 'that Epicurus's gods, though discharged from human affairs, are not so happy and quiet as he imagines: they are not without apprehension and fear of the last separation of atoms, which being once dispersed thro' the vacuum, will never unite again. Thus, says this Philosopher, the particles which compose the soul being once dispersed, can never reunite throughout all ages: otherwise we might be, after we had ceased to be; that is to say, the resurrection would be naturally possible. An hypothesis, however, which may be inferred from Epicurism (122): for why may not the same chance, which had once united the little bodies, that composed Pythocles and Metrodorus, be able to reunite them once again? Besides . . . the Epicurean gods having settled their mansions amidst those innumerable worlds, which overthrow one another, and make a dreadful crash, how can they bear, without extreme disturbance, so many ponderous masses falling round about them, and perhaps upon their heads? For chance knows them not, and consequently can pay them no respect (123). Note, that this writer observes (124), that most of the Epicureans have said, that the gods . . . are not composed of atoms. What I offer hereupon may be seen in the remark [F] of the article EPICURUS (125). They perceived, that eternal felicity, which they attributed to the gods, was not consistent with the contexture of atoms. It was necessary therefore to give them another nature; but hereby they ruined the fundamental article of their system, that capital principle which is the basis of their Physics, viz. that atoms and vacuum are the principles of all things. I do not think Lucretius could ever get clear of this difficulty. He must either have given up the blessed eternity of his deities, or his two principles, for it is not possible to retain both these doctrines at the same time. Hence we may judge, that the hypothesis of the existence of the gods; which is the richest jewel in the system of Anaxagoras, and some other Philosophers, and the noblest and most excellent piece of the whole machine, is the weakest part of the Epicurean system. Their founder, having delivered himself from all fear, with respect to the divine justice, found himself, in other respects, more embarrassed with his gods, than if he had ascribed to them a providence. He durst not deny their existence, and yet he knew not what to do with them, or where to place them. Whatever he could say of them, made a breach in his system, and exposed him to invincible objections. See how Cicero has turned him into ridicule, as well upon the subtilty of the bodies of the gods (126), as their human shape (127), &c.

The Sieur Cotin taxes him with a palpable contradiction, with respect to divine providence. 'What will you say, if I shew you, by a precise and formal passage of Epicurus, that he not only believed a Deity, but also owned his providence? This passage is in his epistle to Meneceus *; it is certain there are gods: but we must have a care of attributing to God, mark this, who is an immortal and most happy being, any quality repugnant to his immutable felicity. No, he is not impious, who does not believe that croud of gods, which the greatest part of men imagine and never saw, but he who believes things too mean and unworthy of them. The gods send to these prophane wretches, who dishonour them by their false opinions, innumerable calamities; and, on the contrary, heap their benefits upon the wise and good. The reason whereof is, because they love their like, and think that what is not agreeable to virtue, is not agreeable to their nature. Seneca, Epictetus, and Plato, could not who would attack them; and in this, his system does not appear to be the production of a man who can reason consistently.

* speak more divinely. Epicurus, thou, at the bottom of thy soul, art religious, because nature cannot wholly deny itself: the misfortune is, that thou canst not say what thou sayest, without contradicting thyself (128). Here you see a slight and a moral reflexion, which the author would have placed better, if he had brought them into one of his sermons. But wherever he had placed them, they would have been ill grounded; for it is not true that Epicurus ever wrote to Menecæus, what Cotin attributes to him. Let us see the Greek words, with the learned Gassendus's Latin translation, which will clearly shew, that Epicurus's notion is as remote from Cotin's sense, as heaven from earth. Ἀσεβὲς δὲ οὐχ' ὁ τὰς τῶν πολλῶν θεῶν ἀναίρων, ἀλλ' ὁ τὰς τῶν πολλῶν δόξας θεοῖς περσάπων. Οὐ γὰρ περσάψεις εἰσὶν, ἀλλ' ὑπολήψεις ψευδεῖς αἱ τῶν πολλῶν ὑπὲρ θεῶν ἀποφάσεις. Ἐνθεν καὶ μεγίστας βλάβας δύναιται τοῖς κακοῖς ἐκ θεῶν ἐπάγασθαι, καὶ ἀφελείας τοῖς ἀγαθοῖς. Ταῖς γὰρ ἰδίαις οἰκεῖται διὰ παντὸς τὰς ὁμοίας ἀποδέχονταί, πᾶν τὸ μὴ τοιούτου, ὡς ἀλλόττερον νομίζοντες. non is, qui vulgareis multitudinis Deos tollit; sed is, qui multitudinis opiniones Diis adhibet. Non enim germanæ prænotiones sunt, sed suspiciones falsæ, eæ, quæ de Diis ab hominibus à vulgo traduntur. Arbitrantur quippe & malis detrimenta maxima; & bonis præsidia à Diis advenire: siquidem propriis virtutibus, seu affectibus innutriti, simileis sui Deos admittunt, & quicquid affectuum suorum non est, id exilimant ab ipsis alienum (129). — He therefore is not impious who denies the gods of the vulgar, but he who attributes the notions of the vulgar to the gods. For the sentiments of the vulgar concerning the gods, are not true and certain, but false and supposititious only; for they imagine, that great misfortunes befall the wicked, and blessings are bestowed upon good men, by the direction of the gods, ascribing to them their own passions and inclinations, and excluding from them, whatever they feel not in themselves.

However, this contradiction does not concern Lucretius; and, if I have mentioned it, it is only to shew the best and the worst side of his censure.

LUGO (FRANCIS DE) elder brother to the cardinal of that name, of whom I speak below, was born at Madrid in 1580, and became a Jesuit at Salamanca in 1600. He took so much pleasure in humbling himself, that, after having taught Philosophy, he begged of his superiors the employ of explaining the rudiments of Grammar, and obtained it. Having afterwards taught Divinity, he desired he might be sent to the Indies, to teach the Infidels their Catechism and Grammar. But they employed him to to higher purposes: they gave him a professorship of Divinity in the cities of Mexico and Santa Fe. Finding that the employment given him in this country did not agree with that humility in which he designed to live, he desired to be re-called to Spain. In his return he lost the greatest part of his commentaries upon Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologica [A]. He was deputed to Rome by the province of Castile, to assist at the eighth general assembly of the Jesuits, and stayed there after the breaking up of this assembly to exercise two offices, viz. that of censor to the books published by the Jesuits, and that of Theologist to the general: but finding his reputation encrease daily, after his brother was made a cardinal, he returned into Spain, where he was chosen rector of two colleges. He died the seventeenth of December 1652 (a). He is the author of several books [B]. If any one refuses to believe what I have been saying of this Jesuit's humility, I shall not charge him with incredulity.

LUGO (JOHN D'E) a Spanish Jesuit and cardinal, was born at Madrid the twenty fifth of November 1583; but he always wrote himself of Seville, because his father kept his ordinary residence there [A]. He discovered his parts when he was but three years old, for he could read printed books and manuscripts. He maintained some theses at fourteen, and was sent soon after to Salamanca to study the Civil-law, in imitation of his elder brother, and notwithstanding the oppositions of his father, he became a Jesuit the sixth of July 1603. He finished his course of Philosophy with the Jesuits at Pampelona, and studied Divinity at Salamanca. After the death of his father, he

The States of the kingdom being called to Madrid, he assisted there as deputy of his country (3): he married in the same city Teresa de Quiroga, and had the son by her, who is the subject of this article (4). This son might have been more rightly surnamed Hispanensis, than Madritensis; for when a woman lies-in, in a journey, it is not usual to make that the child's birth-place where he is born, but where his parents live. This is the case of children of ambassadors, born in the places of their embassy. They are reckoned natives of the places where their father would reside, were they not ambassadors: and because they are absent upon public affairs, Republicæ Causa, their children have the same privileges as those who are born at home. Thus it was with cardinal de Lugo's father; he only resided at Madrid, as deputy of Seville to the assembly of the States of the kingdom.

[B] He

he was sent by his superiors to Seville, to take possession of his patrimony which was very considerable. He divided it with his brother's consent betwixt the Jesuits of Seville and those of Salamanca. He taught Philosophy for five years (a), and afterwards was made professor of Divinity at Valladolid. The success with which he discharged this employment, made him esteemed worthy of a more eminent chair: accordingly in the fifth year of his professorship he received orders to go to Rome, to teach Divinity there. He set out in March 1621; and, having escaped several dangers in crossing the provinces of France, he arrived at Rome in the beginning of June the same year. He professed Divinity there twenty years, with a great reputation; for he thoroughly understood school Divinity: He made a good choice (b) of the opinions he defended, and was admirable for joining brevity with perspicuity. He minded only his own business, without losing time in making his court to the cardinals, or frequenting ambassadors' houses. He never affected to be an author, but having received a command to publish some of his works, his vow of obedience did not permit him to dispense with it. He printed seven large volumes in folio [B]; the fourth of which he dedicated to Urban VIII. This Pope made him a cardinal the fourteenth of December 1643. Some very singular things are related, which show how free from ambition this Jesuit was [C]. While he was cardinal, he shewed himself very charitable to the poor: he liberally distributed the bark to such as were afflicted with agues [D]. He died the twentieth of August 1660, leaving all his estate to the Jesuits of the professed college at Rome, and would be buried at the feet of Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the order (c). He invented the hypothesis of turbid points [E], to solve the unfurmountable objections, both against the divisibility of parts ad infinitum, and against Mathematical points. A fragment of

The fourth, and fifth, de Justitia & Jure, at Lyons, 1642, and 1652. The sixth, de Virtute Divina fidei, at Lyons, 1646, and 1656. The seventh is a collection Responsorum Moralium, at Lyons, 1651, and 1660. Besides this, he wrote notes, in privilegia vocis oraculo concessa societati, printed at Rome, in 1645, in 12mo; and he translated the Life of the blessed Lewis de Gonzaga out of Italian into Spanish (5). The fourth of these volumes was dedicated to Pope Urban VIII. The author hereupon was obliged to go and pay his respects to this Pope, to whom he had never spoke (6). He was favourably received by him; and from that time Urban employed him on several occasions, and expressed a particular affection for him. De Lugo seeing himself obliged to be an author, employed no amanuensis, or any other person, to fit his manuscripts for the press. He himself underwent all this great labour (7). Father Maimbourg has made use of a thought of this cardinal; which the reader will perhaps be glad to find here, and may give him some notion of the principles of this Spanish doctor. 'The church, says Father Maimbourg (8), has not yet thought it necessary to determine any thing concerning the immaculate conception of the Holy Virgin. It has not used this method concerning her exemption from venial sin, having decided that point as being an appurtenance of faith. . . . She has searched the scriptures and apostolical tradition, and the sense of the holy fathers, upon the quality of the mother of God, to discover the whole extent of it. And † as afterwards she found the exemption from venial sin to be comprized in this supreme dignity, as a necessary consequence in it's principle, she has defined it as a point of faith †, revealed in the word of God, which contains it. This is the remark of the learned and subtle cardinal de Lugo †, in his excellent treatise concerning faith, which I had the honour to receive from him at Rome, when I was his disciple.'

[C] Some very singular things are related, which show how free from ambition this Jesuit was. He was created a cardinal without his knowledge, or the least thought that the Pope had any such design. Hearing the news of his creation, he was almost confounded; and did not give the messenger, who brought the news, the present due to him on such occasions: the reason he gave for it was, that this news was disagreeable to him; and he would not suffer the college of Jesuits to give any testimony of joy, or play-days to the scholars. He looked on the coach, that cardinal Francis Barberini sent him, as if it had been his coffin; and, when he was in the Pope's palace, he declared to the officers, who were preparing to put on his cardinal's robes, that he first desired to represent to his Holiness, that the vows he made, as a Jesuit, forbade him to accept the cardinal's cap. He was answered, that the Pope dispensed with those vows: Dispensationes, replied he, leave a man to his natural liberty, which if I am permitted to enjoy, I shall always refuse the cardinalship. They were therefore obliged to introduce him to the Pope: to whom he told his reasons, and asked him, whether his Holiness commanded him, in virtue of holy obedience, to accept this dignity: the Pope answered he did; whereupon de Lugo humbly acquiesced, and stooped to receive the hat. The purple did not hinder his retaining a Jesuit constantly near him, as a perpetual witness of his actions: he continued to dress and undress himself, without the assistance of any of his domestics. He would have no tapestries in his palace; and he settled such regular orders in it, that it was a kind of seminary. This is a good part of Father Southwell's account (9): every one may believe of it what he pleases.

[D] He liberally distributed the bark to such as were afflicted with agues. This febrifuge came from Peru. It was brought to Rome in 1650, by the Jesuits; from whence it is called in some places Jesuits Powder. There was an attempt to discredit it, which made Father Fabri publish a book at Rome, in the year 1655, intitled, Pulvis Peruvianus Febrifugus vindicatus (10). This powder was then very dear, as Southwell affirms. By this he heightens the cardinal's charity. Quibusque (pauperibus) corticem Peruanum non levis pretii contra febres benigne & liberaliter distribuebat (11). It is observed, in Furetiere's Dictionary, at the word Quinquina, that this febrifuge was called at first, cardinal de Lugo's powder.

[E] He invented the hypothesis of turbid points. To speak more exactly, I think it ought to be said, that finding this hypothesis almost dropped, he adopted it, and brought it into credit. It does not remedy the difficulties that are proposed against Mathematical points: and besides it manifestly includes an incomprehensible absurdity; which is, that a corpusele, which in itself has neither parts nor extension, should swell at such a rate, as to fill several parts of space. The ordinary doctrine of the school-men, concerning rarefaction, gave occasion to John de Lugo to evade the great inconveniencies of this strange absurdity. The school-men teach, that a rarefied body takes up more space than it did before, without acquiring any new parts of matter; the same body, say they, sometimes fills a greater space, and sometimes a lesser: but as this doctrine is absolutely incomprehensible, and contradictory, it could be but of very small advantage to this Jesuit. See how Arriaga confutes him without naming him (12).

(9) Southwell, ubi supra, Nicolas Antonio, ubi supra, says, in general, the same things.

[F] A fragment of one of his letters has discovered a pretty curious mystery. The Jesuits teach the immaculate conception not out of piety, but out of hatred to the Dominicans, and to render them odious to the people. The cardinal du Lugo, a Jesuit, wrote this letter to one of their fathers at Madrid. 'I desire your reverence may be pleased to take care, that your society diligently apply themselves in your quarters, to enforce the devotion of the conception, for which the people of Spain, have a great affection, to see if, by that means, we can give a diversion to the Dominicans, who press us hard here in defending St Augustin: and, I believe, if we cannot oblige them to employ themselves upon some other subject, they will overcome us in the principal points de auxiliis (13).

[G] He is said to be the first author of the discovery of the philosophical sin. See the book intitled, The Philosophism of the Jesuits of Marseilles, there you will find the following words (14). That which embarrasses de Lugo, in admitting actual sins purely philosophical in a savage, at least during the short time in which he supposes and maintains, that he may be inculpably ignorant of God, is, that this savage may possibly die, within this small time, in his philosophical sins; and that he does not know what God may think fit to do with, nor what judgment he may pass upon such a sinner, nor in what rank he may place him for eternity. Some other Jesuits send him to the limbo of still-born infants after a temporal punishment, proportioned to the philosophical sin, of what nature soever it be, whether parricide, incest, &c. But de Lugo chuses rather to establish a new order of providence. . . . In this new order, God, rather than banish out of this world the philosophical sin, which is so necessary in it, and not to be embarrassed what to do in the next, with this sort of sinners, will work a miracle rather than let them die in this state. He will give them, before they leave this world, as much knowledge of the true God, as shall be necessary to qualify them for sinning theologically, or at least as much light as may be necessary to create a doubt in their minds that there may be a God, and wait and prolong their life till they have committed, with this knowledge or under this doubt, some sin which he may proceed against as a mortal sin, and punish it eternally, in hell; for that doubt alone which he would neglect to remove would render his sin eternally punishable, because, that, by sinning in this state, he would expose himself to the danger of offending him, who is the author of his being. The thought is wholly new, and worthy of him, who appears to be the first Jesuit, who made the discovery of the philosophical sin. We may, easily perceive, that the author, who thus sets forth the doctrine of this Jesuit, mixes some touches of raillery in what he says: but after all, it is not strange, that a doctor should be embarrassed, when he endeavours to reconcile the eternal damnation of man with the natural ideas, which clearly discover to us, that, in order to an action's having a character of morality, it is indispensably necessary, that a person, committing this action, know whether it be good or bad, or be ignorant of it through his own fault. It is an easy matter to stumble in such way, since we can hardly avoid making some false steps, even when we propose to acquit the judgments of God, of whatever seeming makes them appear less equitable. The supposition of our de Lugo does not tend to diminish the number of the damned, but to render them more notoriously to deserve damnation.

LUPERCALIA, a feast celebrated by the Romans, on the fifteenth of February.

Romulus was not the inventor of it (a), but Evander, who introduced it into Italy (b), whither he retired sixty years before the Trojan war. As Pan was the great Divinity of Arcadia, Evander, a native of that country appointed the feast of the Lupercalia in honour of this god (c), to be celebrated in the place where he built houses for the colony he brought with him; that is, upon the Palatin Mount. He there built a temple (d) to the god Pan; and ordained a solemn feast, which was celebrated by sacrifices offered to that god; and by the races of naked people, with whips in their hands, wherewith they lashed all they met in their way. Dionysius Halicarnassensis cites Ælius Tubero, whose exactness he commends. He cites him I say, to shew, that this feast was celebrated, according to Evander's institution, before Romulus and Remus thought of building Rome. But, as it was pretended, that they were nursed by a wolf, in the very place which Evander had consecrated to the god Pan, no doubt this determined Romulus to continue the feast of the Lupercalia, and to render it more famous. The LUPERCÆ (which was the name of the priests, who officiated in this particular worship of Pan) were divided into two societies; one of which bore the name of Quintilii, the other that of Fabii (e), to perpetuate, as is said, the memory of one Quintilius and of one Fabius, who had been the heads, the one of the party of Romulus, and the other of the party of Remus. A long time after was added to them the college or society of Julii, in honour of Julius Cæsar (f). Marc Antony entered himself into this society [A]. Though the celebration of the Lupercalia served only to disgrace religion, yet Augustus perceiving, that it had been discontinued for some years, gave orders for the re-establishing

[A] Marc Antony entered himself to this society. Cicero, in the second Philippic, tells him, 'Ita eras Lupercus, ut te consulere esse meminisse deberes. Though you were one of the Luperci, you ought at least to remember you was a consul.' Whence we may reasonably conclude, that he was one of the Julii Luperci; for so great a flatterer of Julius Cæsar, as he, would have been far from entering into either of the two ancient societies, whilst there was a new one established in honour of Julius Cæsar. But, without drawing inferences, we find the fact clearly in Cicero's oration against Marc Antony, as Dion Cassius relates it (1). Τὸ γὰρ λυκαῖα ἦν καὶ ἐπὶ τῷ ἑταίρῳ τῷ Ἰουλίῳ ἑταίρατος; that is, according to Xilander's translation, Nimirum agenda ei erant Lupercalia uni ex Collegio Julio. Father Abram (2) has translated this Greek more exactly, thus, Lupercalia

enim erant, & ipse in sodalitate Julia erat constitutus. — It was in the time of the Lupercalia, and he was one of the society of the Julii. After Julius Cæsar's death, the revenues were taken away from the Luperci, which he had bestowed upon them. Marc Anthony complains of it, in his letter to Hirtius and Octavius, which is so exactly confuted by Cicero in the thirteenth Philippic. Manutius reading thus the passage, Vetustigia Julia Lupercis ademisti, is in pain (3) to know whether Cæsar's liberality extended to all the colleges of the Luperci, or only to that XIII. which was consecrated to himself; but Father Abram (4) is in no doubt, since he follows this reading, Vetustigia Juliani Lupercis ademisti. — You have deprived the Julii Luperci of their income. ing it (g) [B]. This is infinitely less strange, than to see it continued under Christian emperors, and to find, that when, at last, Pope Gelafus, in the year 496, would tolerate it no longer (b), there were Christians found amongst the senators themselves, who endeavoured to maintain it, as appears by the apology which the Pope writ against them (i). Not only the Luperci ran like mad men along the streets, during the Lupercalia, having only a little girdle to cover their pudenda; but several young people of quality, and even some of the principal magistrates [C], ran along with them in the same posture (k), anointed with oil of olives [D], and like them lashed the people who came in their way. In Augustus's time, no beardless youth was permitted to run with the Luperci (l). The women were so far from fearing these stripes, that, on the contrary, they voluntarily exposed themselves to them, in hopes of becoming fruitful, if barren, or being more easily delivered, if with child (m): but I much doubt the truth of what Pope Gelafus says, viz. that the Roman ladies were glad to be publicly whipped stark naked on these occasions (n); I believe they only stretched out their hands [E], as a boy

[B] Augustus . . . gave orders for the re-establishing it. Moreri makes Suetonius say, that Augustus restored the three societies of the Luperci. This supposes they had been all suppressed, but Suetonius has no such thing: He only says, that Augustus re-established the Lupercalian ceremonies, sacrum Lupercale, which had been by degrees abolished. How many ecclesiastical or civil customs are there, which fall insensibly into disuse, though the bodies or societies, which ought to practise them, subsist with all their incomes? does not Cicero say somewhere (6), that the ancient custom of the auspices was hardly any longer observed? And yet the colleges of the augurs, pontiffs, &c. subsisted as before.

[C] And even some of the principal magistrates. This we learn from Plutarch: Διαθέσει δὲ, says he (7), τῶν εὐγενῶν νέοι πολλοὶ καὶ τῶν ἀρχόντων. Discurrunt autem & ex nobilibus juvenes multi & ex Magistratibus. — Some noble young men, ran as well as some magistrates. He says the same in another place (8), and uses the word, ἀρχόντων, they who translate it, those who are the chief magistrates for that year, or who are then in the magistracy, are, in my opinion, not amiss: for a parenthesis, which Plutarch uses in another place (9), clearly shews, that he believed the consuls were obliged to run naked with the Luperci. Ἀντώνιος δὲ τῶν θεόντων τὸν ἱερὸν δρόμον εἰς ἣν (καὶ γὰρ ὑπάτευεν). Antonius autem unus eorum erat qui sacrum cursum peragebant (gerebant enim Consulatum). — Antony was one that ran the sacred race, for he was then consul. But it is very probable, that Plutarch imposes upon his readers; for if 'the custom was such (I will set down * his own words (10) as they are in our English translation) that on this day, there were many young noblemen, and even those who were the principal magistrates that year, who ran stark naked through the city, anointed with oil of olives, &c. If (11) Antony was one of those that ran this sacred race * (of the Lupercalia) as being then consul, how is it that Cicero ventured to say, in a full senate (12), that, from the foundation of Rome, not only no consul, but no prætor, no tribune of the people, no ædile, ever did what Mark Antony ventured to do? Now what was that action of his? It was this, that, being consul, he went naked, and anointed, to the public place, under pretence of the Lupercalia, got into the pulpit, and harangued the people. Marc Antony endeavoured to justify this conduct by his being Lupercus: but he was answered, that the quality of consul, which he then bore, ought to take place of that of Lupercus; and that every body knew, that the consulship was a dignity of the whole people, whose majesty ought ever to be preserved, and not exposed or rendered contemptible in any respect whatsoever. Let no body tell me, that Cicero does not blame this consul, for his haranguing the people naked; for besides, that the contrary appears from the citations before-mentioned, we must know that Cicero made use of a figure, which manifestly contains this maxim, The Lupercalia might be celebrated according to all the ceremonies belonging to them, without the consul's disbonouring the whole city, by his nakedness, and by his postures. It is certain therefore, that Plutarch is mistaken. For Cicero, more worthy of credit than he, in what concerns the dignity of the consulship, takes it for granted, that the Lupercalian races were inconsistent with this dignity; and that never any consul, or any of the principal magistrates of Rome, were concerned in them before Marc Antony; but Plutarch pretends, that the consul, and the other magistrates, were always concerned in them.

Who would not be surprized to find Father Abram (13) draw this consequence from the principles and reasoning of Cicero, that one and the same person at the same time was to be consul and Lupercus: unum & eundem & consulem & Lupercum fieri debuisse. It was easy for him to confute this consequence by the words in which Plutarch affirms, as we have already seen, that the young Roman nobility and magistrates ran the races in the Lupercalia. He adds, in confirmation, the passage of the same historian, in which it is said, that because Marc Anthony was consul, he was one of these runners; and thence concludes that Plutarch would insinuate, that they who were not magistrates were excluded from these races. A man would almost advise the renouncing study when he sees learned men entangle themselves in such absurdities, upon things as clear as the sun. Abram ought at least to have refuted Plutarch, by the long passage of Dion, which he has partly cited, and partly referred to.

Britannicus (14) affirms, that it was lawful for all, whether men or women, to celebrate this feast: whence Plutarch writes, that Marc Antony, in celebrating it, was carried along the streets stark naked in a coach, by women and maids stark naked (15). This commentator has but ill expressed his own meaning; for how could a man, that was carried by women, ride in a coach through the city? But this is not the worst of it; it is hardly to be doubted, but he has erroneously fathered this upon Plutarch; and that at bottom, it is false. Were it true, Cicero's Philippics, which do not mention it, would, doubtless, have thundered against Antony.

[D] Anointed with oil of olives. I have followed the translation of Xylander. Others translate Plutarch's Greek, ἀλειψόμενοι λίπα, by unguento delibuti, — besmeared with ointment. The difference is small; Cicero (16) speaking of the Lupercalia of Marc Antony, makes use of the words unguentis oblitus. Dion mentioning the oration of Cicero against Marc Antony, uses twice on the same subject of the Lupercalia the word μυμυρισμένος, unguentis delibutus. Lloyd finds he says a thing but little known, when he tells us, that he had learnt from a passage of Appian, that the Luperci anointed their bodies. Nudum etiam corpus tunc illis unctum nescio an vulgo notum sit sed erus ex Appian. lib. 2. Bell. Civil. He neither cites Plutarch, nor Dion, nor Cicero; but Appian, who has only copied Plutarch, except the parenthesis which may be seen in the margin, where it is expressly observed, that this unction was a customary thing (17).

[E] I believe they only stretched out their hands. I do not pretend to deny, what Charles Stephens, and several of his transcribers or his originals say, viz. that the Luperci, running naked through the city, lashed the women on their hands and bellies: Nadi per urbem curstabant mulierum palmas utroque caprina pelle ferientes. But I say, that this does not justify Pope Gelafus; for it must be, undoubtedly, supposed, that the blows upon the belly were given upon the cloaths. As for the story which Ovid tells, and which seems to make against me, I answer, I. that it only relates to the particular time, in which the oracle was given; and

As to the ceremonies the Luperci were to observe in sacrificing (which were, doubtless, very singular, since, amongst other things, there were to be two boys present who laughed aloud) see Plutarch in the life of Romulus. And as for the reasons why these priests were naked, during the divine service, and when they ran along the streets, see Ovid, who gives a great many of them, in his second book of Fasti. One is taken from the ill success of Pan's amours, which is pleasant enough; and which hath been very ill related by Du Boulay [F].

and that it must not be believed, that any women, but those who were then married, and at the age of Child-bearing, submitted to the sentence of the oracle. I say, II. that Ovid does not tell us how or by whom they were lashed; whether naked, or in their cloaths; whether by their husbands, or the Luperci. What way however it was done we do not find in it the proof of Pope Gelafus's assertion; for their husbands were far from whipping them publicly, since the oracle did not command it; or from suffering the Luperci to whip them, otherwise than in private, and as the high-priest whipped the vestals, who had suffered the sacred fire to go out (18). This manner of execution fulfilled the sense of the oracle; and it is to be believed, that the husbands went no farther, and, perhaps too, stood ready at hand to prevent the Luperci's using one sort of instrument for another.

Ovid's story is this. He says (19), that in Romulus's time, women became so barren, that this prince said, it had been much better they had never stole them (20). They had recourse to prayers; husbands and wives prostrated themselves in a wood consecrated to Juno. The goddesses answer threw them into a violent anxiety; for these words were distinctly heard: That an ugly old goat should leap the Roman wives. Italidas matres, inquit, caper birtus inito. By good luck an augur that was present, put them out of pain: he sacrificed a goat, and ordered, that the skin should be employed to whip the women (21); which they consenting to, failed not to lie-in in ten months time. Thomas Bartholin (22), who has adapted to his subject the general custom of their submitting to be whipped by the Luperci, which Meibomius had forgotten (23), would have found his account better in the particular adventure I have related.

[F] Ovid . . . gives . . . a reason pleasant enough, which has been very ill told by Du Boulay.] As Du Boulay (24) has told it with several interpolations, I think myself obliged to give a faithful account of it here, in order to inspire my readers with a just mistrust of writers, who transcribe one another, without recurring to the original (25): the story is thus. Hercules travelling with Omphale, was seen by Faunus (26), who immediately fell in love with the fair one, and sought an opportunity to enjoy her. Hercules and Omphale lodged that night in a cave, where, whilst supper was getting ready, Omphale amused herself with changing cloaths with Hercules, dressing him in her petticoats, and trinkets, and putting on herself, instead of them, the lion's skin, the club, and the quiver. They supped in this equipage, and went to sleep in it. They were to lie a-part that night, because in the morning they were to sacrifice to Bacchus, an act of religion which required continence the preceding night. Faunus, who had pursued his beloved object, stole into the cave, in the dark, whilst the domestics were in a deep sleep; not without hopes that Hercules and his mistresses were as fast asleep as they; and that, by this means he might perform his exploit. He groped about sometimes on one side, and sometimes on the other, till at last he found Omphale's bed: but he no sooner touched the lion's skin, but he started back in a great fright. A little after, feeling about, he found Hercules's bed, and judging, by the fineness and softness of the cloaths, that it was Omphale, he laid himself along, and with great eagerness began to take up her coats; and without being discouraged by the bristly legs (27), thought to accomplish his design. Hereupon the hero, giving him a thrust with his elbow, threw him out of the bed (28). This awakened Omphale; she calls up the people, a candle is brought, Faunus is found sprawling on the ground, hardly able to rise, and is made the laughing-stock to the company. Ovid pretends, that this is one of the reasons of the nakedness of the Luperci: Faunus, taking an aversion for the habits which had thus deceived him, would not suffer his priests to wear any at all, during the ceremonies of his worship.

Let us now reckon up the faults, which Mr du Boulay has committed in the space of twenty one lines. I. He says, that Hercules was passing through mount Palatin, when Faunus was smitten with his wife: but if he had read Ovid (29), he would have found that Hercules was then in Lydia. II. He does not know whether the wife that attended Hercules, was Iole or Omphale. Ovid's text, without leaving room for a doubt, fixes us to Omphale. III. He says, that Hercules retired into a forest, to avoid the scorching heat of the sun. Ovid makes him retire into a cave, and only when it was late. IV. He says, that Omphale going to bed, as being the more chilly and timorous, took the lion's skin, which her husband wore, to cover her, and the club to defend her from the wild beasts. There is not one word in Ovid concerning any of these motives: and besides, what incoherence! that, on one hand, the season, should be so vehemently hot, as to oblige them to retire into a forest; and, on the other, the nights should be so cold, that a young woman must cover herself with a lion's skin to keep herself from being starved? V. He says, that Faunus observed every thing, except the change of the cloaths: Ovid makes him take notice of nothing, nor does he send him into the cave till mid-night, when all the servants, and Hercules, were asleep. VI. He says, that Hercules awakened his wife, and ordered a fire to be lighted, whilst he held this impudent fellow. In Ovid it is Omphale who cries out, and commands not that a fire should be lighted, (this not being what is said on such occasions) but that a light should be brought (30). Besides, Hercules only pushed this impudent fellow out of bed; he did not hold him. VII. He says, that Faunus was soundly thrashed: of which Ovid says not one word. VIII. He says, that this adventure was the reason of Hercules's rising quite naked: but, on the contrary, as Ovid tells the story, he had lain all night in Omphale's cloaths. What likelihood is there that he should be undressed to rise upon such an occasion as this? IX. He says, that Hercules guarded his wife from violence. This is false; for the spark, taking the husband for the wife, made no attempt at all upon her. X. He says, that because Hercules rose quite naked, and had secured his wife from violence, he added the ceremony of nakedness to the others, which were practised at the feast of this god, to appease him for the treatment he had given him. All this is false and absurd: the two causes of adding ceremonies are chimerical, as we have seen; and it was not Hercules, but Faunus, or Pan, that established the ceremony of nakedness.

(a) It is an easy matter for every body to separate the wheat from the chaff in it: therefore I do not examine the faults which this author may have committed in the article LUTHER.

LUTHER (MARTIN) a reformer of the church in the XVIth century. His History is so well known, and is found in so many books, and particularly in Moreri (a), that I shall not trouble my self to repeat it. I shall principally insist on the falsehoods which have been published concerning him. No regard has been had in this either to probability, or to the rules of the art of flandering: and the authors of them have assumed all the confidence of those who fully believe, that the public will blindly adopt all their stories, be they ever so absurd. They have dared to publish, that an Incubus

Incubus begat him [A]; and have even falsified the day of his birth, in order to frame a scheme of his nativity to his disadvantage [B]. They accuse him of having confessed, that after struggling for ten years together with his conscience, he at last became perfectly master of it, and fell into Atheism [C]. They add, that he frequently said, he would renounce his portion in Heaven, provided God would allow him a pleasant life for a hundred years

[A] They have dared to publish that an Incubus begat him. Father Maimbourg has been so equitable as to reject this ridiculous story. 'He was born, says he (1), at Illeben in the county of Mansfeld, in the year 1483, not of an Incubus, as some, to render him more odious, have written, without any appearance of truth, but as other men are born, a thing never called in question till he became an Heresiarch, which he might easily be, without any need of substituting a devil in the place of his father, John Luder, or disgracing his mother, Margaret Linderman (2), by so infamous a birth.' Such fables are hardly to be pardoned in those who mention them only as witty conceits. This is what an Italian Theatin (3) has done in a poem, in which he supposes, that Luther, born of Megera, one of the furies, was sent from hell into Germany. This is more monkish than poetical.

[B] They have falsified the day of his birth, in order to frame a scheme of his nativity to his disadvantage. Martin Luther was born the tenth of November, betwixt eleven and twelve of the clock at night, at Illeben, whither his mother was come on account of the fair, not thinking he was so near her time: for we must know, that her husband, a man of mean condition, and who worked in the mines, did not then live at Illeben, but in the village of Meza (4). The good woman, being examined by Melancthon, concerning the year she was brought to bed of Martin Luther, answered, that she did not very well remember it; she only knew the day and the hour (5). It is therefore out of pure malice, that Florimond de Remond places his birth on the twenty second of October. He thought thereby to confirm the astrological predictions of Junctinus, who, by the horoscope of this day, has defamed Martin Luther, as much as he could. This Astrologer was strongly confuted by a professor of Strasbourg, who shewed, that, by the rules of Astrology, Luther was to be a great man. 'Nihilominus Ræmundus diem 22. Octobris præfert, ut malitiosæ Astrologi cujusdam Junctini calumniæ fidem conciliaret, qui ex horoscopo illius diel ingenium Lutheri miris modis infamare voluit. Hunc Isaacus Malleolus Professor Mathem. Argentoratensis anno 1617, edita dissertatione de genitura Lutheri refutavit (6). — However, Florimond de Remond has fixed upon the twenty second of October, that he might give credit to the malicious insinuations of one Junctinus, an Astrologer, who, from the horoscope of that day, endeavoured to throw the most scandalous reflections on the abilities of Luther. Isaac Malleolus, professor of the Mathematics at Strasbourg in the year 1617, refuted all that this man advanced in a dissertation on the birth of Luther.'

To illustrate these words of Mr Seckendorf, I ought to say, that Florimond de Remond followed Cardan's hypothesis more than Junctinus's. He mentions both the dates, that of the twenty second of October, and that of the tenth of November. He prefers the first, which is that of Cardan, and insinuates, that Junctinus followed the latter. 'Luther, says he (7), was born at Illeben . . . in the year 1483, the twenty second of October, in the afternoon at eleven of the clock, thirty six minutes . . . Several authors say he was born the tenth of November, on St Martin's eve, which made his parents name him Martin: this, perhaps, has occasioned that variation; for it is not probable, that Cardan and Junctinus, who with so much curiosity have calculated his nativity, should be both misinformed. But Cardan says, he was born the twenty second of October; this is Luther's true birth day: the same says Junctinus. And, though there be some variation between these two Astrologers, about Luther's horoscope, yet it is so small that it deserves not to be considered. For in both, the planets are situate in the same houses; the moon, in both, is in the twelfth; Jupiter, Venus, and Mars, in the third; the Sun, Saturn, and Mercury, in the fourth.' The variation of these two famous Astrologers, was not so great as that of some others, who differ a whole year with respect to the birth-day of Martin Luther.

I shall cite my author (8). 'There will be as many themes or figures (9) as there are spectators at different hours; and each Astrologer, by that means, will make his own different from the rest . . . They will however agree, notwithstanding all this; as heretofore two of these gentlemen did in Germany, who, in making Luther's horoscope, who was born the tenth of November 1483, agreed as to all the events of his life, and his personal qualities, though they differed as to the day of his birth a whole year: so true it is, that this noble science never fails to discover all events.' The difference between Gauricus and Cardan, is a complete year, bating some few hours. Gauricus places Luther's birth the twenty second of October 1484, one of the clock, ten minutes in the afternoon, and he finds by this horoscope the same abominations as Cardan. 'Hæc mira fatique horrenda. 5. Planetarum coitio sub Scorpii asterismo in nona celi statione quam Arabes religioni deputabant, efficit ipsum sacrilegum hereticum, Christianæ religionis hostem acerrimum, atque prophenum. Ex horoscopi directione ad Martis coitum religiosissimus obiit. Ejus Anima celestissima ad Inferos navigavit, ab Allecto, Tiphphone, & Megera flagellis igneis cruciata perenniter (10). — This is strange, indeed terrible, five planets being in conjunction in Scorpio, in the ninth house which the Arabians allotted to religion, made him a sacrilegious Heretic, a most bitter and most prophane enemy to the Christian faith. It appears from the horoscope directed to the conjunction of Mars, that he died without any sense of religion, his soul steeped in guilt sailed to hell, there to be tormented with the fiery whips of Allecto, Tiphphone, and Megera thro' endless ages.' Can any body now say, that the Astrologers have not a great zeal for the religion they profess. But note, that this last was a prelate.

[C] They accuse him of having confessed, that having struggled for ten years together with his conscience, he was . . . fallen into Atheism. Martin Luther, who had made such progress, as to arrive at the perfection of Atheism, confessed, nevertheless, that he had struggled for ten years together with himself, to stifle or blunt that piercing sting of conscience, which his Atheism fixed in the inmost recesses of his miserable soul (11). Such an accusation required a citation of Martin Luther's own words; and yet Garasse has given none, he does not so much as cite this author's works in an indefinite manner: but in the 968th page of his book, he has not so far forgot his duty; he has cited something: this is what he says, 'Luther, who was a perfect Atheist, says, in his Table-Talk, related by Rebenstok, that he had lain ten years before his conscience, as the Greeks lay before the city of Troy; for that was his comparison: But that by his diligence, he had mastered it, and reduced his mind to such a state, as to entertain no farther scruples. He might, in my opinion, apply the whole story, and the taking of Troy, to the taking of his conscience: for, as Troy was taken by means of a wooden horse, so it was by a wooden horse that Luther took his own conscience, and stifled all that vermin of scruples: for from that time he became a horse, if there ever was an horse in the world: and his disciple, Aurifaber, deposes, as an ear-witness, that he had learned it from Luther's mouth from the pulpit, that, thanks be to God, he felt no longer any disturbance of his conscience; and that he began to see the fruits of his gospel amongst his disciples; Nam post revelatum Evangelium meum, said he, Virtus est occisa, justitia oppressa, temperantia ligata, veritas lacerata, fides clauda, nequitia quotidiana, devotio pulsa, hæresis relicta. I have fought with such success that I have stifled the seeds of virtue, oppressed justice, extinguished sobriety, rent truth to pieces, broken the pillars of faith, made villany familiar, banished devotion, and introduced Heresy.' There is no need to observe here, that all this is perverted; the thing speaks itself: and I am certain, there is no honest man, whatever religion he is of, but will detest or pity the extravagance of such a slanderer.

[D] They add, that he frequently said he would renounce his portion in heaven, provided God would allow him a pleasant life for a hundred years in this world.] This accusation comes from the same hand as the former (12). Quirinus Cnogerus has observed, in his 'Lutheran Creed, that he had seen a little German book written in praise of SAINT MARTIN LUTHER, which contained at large the legend of this new saint, canonized by the ministers of Germany, in which he had particularly read the following passage. Compositi sunt duo verus in honorem carissimi nostri preceptoris SANCTI LUTHERI, debentque omnes Papistæ ferre, velint, nolint, ut veri verus, & pia carmina sint & maneat: sunt autem hujusmodi:

IN VITA ÆTERNA.

Christus habet primas, habes tibi Paule secundas,
At loca post illos tertia, LUTHER habet.

'Two verses have been made in honour of our dear master SAINT LUTHER, which, whether the Papist will allow it or no, shall always be acknowledged to contain true and pious praises: they are these:

IN LIFE ETERNAL.

Christ's place is first, Paul to the next preferred,
Who will deny, that LUTHER claims the third.

You will find in the margin the sequel of this passage (13).

[E] They impudently maintain, that he denied the immortality of the soul.] Martin Luther, who was a man wholly carnal, and composed of fat and grease, teaches, in several places, that the immortality of the soul is a meer chimera: for behold his own words in the second tome of his works of the Wittenberg edition, in the year MDLI, in the twenty seventh article of his assertions. Quos Leo Pontifex definitivi articuli fidei, de immortalitate animæ, portenta sunt. — That is a monstrous doctrine which Pope Leo asserted, concerning the immortality of the soul. And in the same tome of the edition of the year MDLII, in the articles XXXI and XLI, he plainly says; Nihil est quod dicitur, Anima rationalis creando infunditur, & infundendo creatur: melius hac in re ratio decernit & Poeta dicens, Patrem sequitur sua proles. — It is idle talk to say, that the rational soul is infused in it's creation, or created in it's infusion: reason determining this much better, as also the Poet who says, the offspring from it's fire derives itself. It is better to believe, says this grofs blockhead, what the Poet says, than what the church teaches: thus you see from what fountain this reformer drew his articles of faith; from the leud Poets, who have acknowledged no other deity than Venus, nor any other pleasure than sensuality.

(14) Garasse, ubi
supra, pag. 877, 878.

'(14.) The first of these two passages is so mutilated, that no judgment can be passed upon it. It is no strange thing for a most orthodox man to call those thoughts chimeras, which another entertains concerning the immortality of the soul. He would not call the doctrine of the immortality itself thus, but the absurd reasons they would build it upon, and the extravagant consequences they would deduce from it. As to the second passage, what can be more absurd than to pretend, that a man teaches the mortality of the soul, upon pretence, that he supposes it produced by another soul? may he not be persuaded, with some fathers of the church, that the soul is immortal, and produced by way of propagation, ex traduce? but, what do I stand on? a man would be as ridiculous to take pains to prove, that Luther believed the immortality of the soul, as he who accuses him of believing it mortal.

But, to shew what stress is to be laid upon Garasse's citations from Martin Luther's Table-Talk, let me here observe how he cites Prateolus. Calvin's doctrine, says he (15), bolds, and must bold, the mortality of the soul, if it will be at all consistent, and Prateolus very well perceived this in his book of Heresies.

verbo Athei; for he there observes, that a general assembly being held at Geneva, of all the States, to deliberate concerning Purgatory, one of the most ingenious, and most considerable, said expressly, when it came to his turn to give his vote, Purgatorium cum Missa & Romano Pontifice melius abolere non possumus, quam si dicamus, simul animam cum corpore extingui; — We can never find out a better way to abolish Purgatory, the Mass, and the Roman Pontiff, than by saying, that soul and body died together. Such was the opinion of this gentleman. And then afterwards, to confirm this doctrine, came out public theses, printed and disputed in Geneva, in the year MDLXVIII, wherein were these words: Quicquid de animarum habetur immortalitate, ab Antichristo ad statuentem suam culinam excogitatum est. All that is said concerning the immortality of the soul, said this proponent, is nothing else, but an invention of Antichrist, to make his pot boil. Prateolus (16) has only cited Lindanus, who said, that the Italian Protestants, who fled to Geneva, deliberating one day concerning the means of abolishing Purgatory, the Papacy, and other doctrines of the Catholic church; one of them gave his opinion, that the best way was to say, that the soul died with the body. By this means, said he, we shall destroy Purgatory, the Mass, and the Pope, all at once. Lindanus (17) cites the acts of Valentine Gentilius's trial. It is a book wherein the Calvinists complain of some members of the Italian church of Geneva, who were infected with Arianism, and were expelled for their errors. Judge if this be proper to stain the Calvinists, or fix any blot upon the orthodoxy of the Genevese.

But especially admire Father Garasse's rashness, who has converted a meeting of ten or twelve Italians, into a general assembly of all the States; and an opinion advanced by some inconsiderable persons in a chamber, into theses publicly defended (18). If this Jesuit makes such ill use of Prateolus's authority, what credit can we give him, when he cites Martin Luther's Table-talk? I shall only confute him in this general way; for having not the book itself, I cannot confront the words with Garasse's citations. I add, that he has related a thing quite otherwise than one of his fraternity has done. Articulus ille, says an Irish Jesuit (19), quo creditur animam esse immortalem, Luthero judice est portentum in Romano Hieronymo Decretorum quod Papa condidit sibi & suis fidelibus. — This article, by which the immortality of the soul is settled, ought, in the opinion of Luther, to be thrown on the dunghill of the Pope's decrees, whereby he established his own faith, and that of his followers.

To have just suspicions that this is ill cited, we need only cast an eye upon the rest of this Jesuit's discourse. Si dubites, continues be, an forte contagio hujus portentosi Paradoxi alios Reformatione afflavit, Respondet Joannes Brentius: Ego inter nos nulla sit publica professio quod anima simul cum corpore intereat, & quod non sit mortuorum resurrectio: tamen impurissima & profanissima illa vita quam maxima pars hominum sectatur, perspicue indicat quod non sentiant esse vitam post hanc. Nonnulli etiam tales voces tam ebriis inter pocula excurrent, quam sobriis in familiaribus colloquiis. Quibus declaratur, licet non publica, saltem privata persuasione, & licentia vitæ, hanc invaluisse sententiam, eamque vel ipsos sobrios profiteri. Can any thing be more astonishing? a pastor deplores the corruption of his flock. Though there be not among us, says he, any formula of public faith, by which we declare that the soul dies with the body, and that the dead rise not again; yet the impure and profane life that most people lead, is a manifest sign, that they believe not the immortality of the soul. Some even drop such discourses not only when they are drunk, but when they are sober, in common conversation with their friends. Hereupon they accuse a whole church of disbelieving the immortality of the soul, and represent them as only forbearing to make it an express article of their confession of faith. Who can bear consequences, in which the blindness of passion, is so scandalous? See the margin (20).

[F] They charge him with having grofs and carnal ideas of heaven.] Let us still cite Father Garasse.

Luther, says he (21), being arrived to perfect Atheism, was still more ridiculous, for having devised intolerable fooleries, according to the confession of his disciple Rebenstock: for he one day preached publicly, that God, to pleasure his elect, was resolved to create, after the last judgment, little cats, and lap-dogs, Quorum cutis erit aurea, & pili de lapidibus pretiosis, i. e. Whose skin should be of gold, and their hair of precious stones, and bestow them on the blessed to use them for play-things, as the ladies do who put them in their muffs. He adds, that there will be serpents, toads, and caterpillars, in heaven, but that they shall be of the finest ducat gold; and which is more, there shall be, says he, pismires, lice, fleas, and bugs, in heaven, but they shall be all of precious stones, and shall all smell much better than civet (22); for these are his very words: Ibi formicæ, cynipides & omnia fœtida, & male olentia animalia, meræ delitiæ erunt, & optimum odorem spirabunt. All the excuse I can make to cover the impiety of this gross man, is, that when he said and wrote these things, he was drunk, for it was, In Sermonibus CONVIVIALIBUS titulo de vitâ æterna, pag. 454.

[G] . . . and with composing hymns in honour of drunkenness, a vice to which they make him much addicted. Martin Luther, in the first Tome of his works, in the chapter of Drunkenness, after having authorized this vice, and shewn, as well as he could, that it was incident to all the great persons that ever were, at last remembering the ecclesiastical hymns, he was wont to chant in the cloysters, made one in honour of drunkenness, which consists of two stanza's; the first whereof is this:

Si vino te impleveris

. . . we see in a book called Concordia Protestantium, that Luther is honoured with those eulogies, • Divus Lutherus zelo plenus: and, as the Painters represent our saints with their personal signs, St Jerome with a lion, (though this be a fault of the Painters, authorized by ancient custom, for it is not St Jerome, but St Gerasimus, that ought to be represented with a Lion) St Ambrose with a bee-hive, St Augustine with a young child, St Gregory with a white pigeon; so it is a custom, throughout all Germany, to paint this new saint of the pretended Reformed religion, with his specific mark; namely, a great glass full of wine; which, as I have shewn before, and related from Rebenstock, he called Poculum Catechisticum: such are Luther's arms; and John Mathesius adds, that he boasted no body could drink off his glass in a breath but himself; as no body could manage Hercules's club (24) but himself (25). The passage Garasse refers to, concerning the catechistical goblet, is in the 59th page of his book: thus: 'The most frolicksome of all was Martin Luther, as Rebenstock, and Mathesius relate in his life; for this gross blockhead being at table, used to have his great goblet brought him, which he called Poculum Catechisticum, which held about two pints, and which he swallowed at a draught, boasting that no body could do it but himself: as Ulysses, said he, had a bow, which no body could bend and draw up to the arrows point but himself. Now when he was heated with wine, having three or four times consulted his catechistical goblet, he told the pleasantest stories in the world; for, falling upon the ancient doctors, he used to draw them in very fine colours. Let us also recite what we find in Fitz Simon's book. I insert his authorities in the margin: 'Ait de se Lutherus, nihil singulare in vita mea eminet. Possum jocari, potare, frontem exporrigere, ridere, sumque commodus & facetus convivator, cumque unum biræ, sive cerviciæ cantharum teneo (verbi gratia vitrum illud monstrum, horrendum, informe, ingens, ex Apostolorum symbolo, Dominica oratione, & decem præceptis constans, quod uno haultu Lutherus exhaurire consuevit). Statim dolium ipsum totum concupisco, sæpiusque bene bonum haustum facio in Dei gloriam. Pro ea itaque quod prius macerabam corpus meum, mox cum mortuus & in capulo repositus fuero, vermibus ventricosum beneque crassum Doctorem escam dabo'.

Ventricosum itaque & bene crassum Doctorem Discipuli Reformati, Evangelistamque joculosum, bibacem, commodum & facetum convivatorem, proprii oris confessione Evangelici nostri Reformatores nacti sunt (26). — Thus speaks Luther of himself: there is nothing singular in my life; I can joke, drink, be merry, laugh, and be a facetious companion at a feast, when I take my tankard of beer or ale (he means his monstrous goblet of such an enormous bigness, that it held the Apostle's Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments: and yet the whole contents of it Luther could drink off at a draught.) I then wish for the whole hoghead, and drink many a good draught to the glory of God. And whereas I formerly used to macerate my body, now as soon as I am dead I shall afford the worms a good feast out of a jolly tumbellied doctor. Therefore the reformed disciples have a jolly tumbellied doctor, and our evangelical reformed an evangelist, merry, smiling, complaisant, and a facetious feaster, as appears from his own words. In another place of his book (27) we find these words: 'Quasi vero Lutherus in immani suo vitro catechistico, quod solus ille exhaurire potuit, unam aquæ guttulam insillari tulerit? — As if Luther would ever have suffered a drop of water to be put into that monstrous catechistical glass, on which he valued himself for being the only one capable of drinking it up at a draught.' Mr Juncker, at page 193, and 220 of his Vita D. Martini Lutheri Nummis atque Iconibus illustrata, maintains, that all that is said of this pretended catechistical rummer, is an imposture and gross fiction; and he cites two or three books, which prove, that we ought not to take any notice of what is found concerning it in the Colloquia Mensalia. This book of Mr Juncker is very curious, and shews, that the author applied himself, with great diligence and success, to a re-search into every thing that was fit to illustrate the matter which he was upon.

[H] And particularly against Moses.] 'Martin Luther had hardly any thing oftener in his mouth, particularly in his cups, than that the commandments of the decalogue, were the source and fountain of all the villainies in the world, as Rebenstock has related in his Colloquies, in page CCCLXIX, and in the second tome of his works of the Witemberg edition, page 112, he makes a vow to God, almost of the same nature of that of the miserable Theophilus, in the first sonnet of the satirical Parnassus; for his part, he solemnly and devoutly promises never to keep any of the ten commandments: and in fine, being in the ecstasy of his devotions, he says, Tollantur à medio omnia Dei præcepta & cessabunt omnes Hæreses. To suppress Heresies, talk not to me of disputes, nor conferences, nor war, nor the command of princes: I know a shorter expedient than all this; which is, to throw the decalogue into the fire, and there will be no more Heresies in the world (28). . . . But if you would more clearly understand and discover Luther's opinion concerning the decalogue, and the law of Moses, observe how he speaks of them in the first tome of his works of the Witemberg edition MDL, page CCXV. Vide ut sit prudens, & Moslem cum sui lege, quam longissime amoliri, & in malam rem abire jubeas; neque quicquam illius terrore ac minis movearis, sed suspectum eum habeto, ut pessimum hæreticum anatematizatam & damnatum hominem, utoque deteriorem Papa & Diabolo. that he got Amadis de Gaule translated into good French [I], to put people out of conceit with the Scripture, and all books of devotion. They observed so little measures in the calumnies they published against him, as to accuse him of having said, that he believed nothing of what he preached [K]; and that he was very glad to hear that other ministers resembled him in this. Most of these calumnies are grounded upon some words in a certain book published by Luther's friends [L]; to which they give a very malicious interpretation, and very remote from this minister's thoughts. Not but it must be confessed, that it was a very great imprudence to publish such a collection. It was the effect

he, and stand upon your guard; and when the question shall be about Moses, send him to the devil, with all his Old Testament, and not be concerned at his menaces; for as much as he is an heretical miscreant, an excommunicated wretch, and a damned soul. In a word, a wicked man more cursed than the Pope, and the devil (29). Garasse had said before (30), that Luther 'having, by his great industry, arrived to Atheism, held also the like discourse, as Rebenstock relates, in his Table-Talk. Ego non pluris facio sexcenta loca Scripturæ, quam putridam nucem, 'I value six hundred places of the Bible, if they should be urged to me no more than a rotten nut.' Lastly, he pretends (31) that Luther used to say after dinner, that he knew a good way to prevent sinning mortally against God; which is, said he, to throw the decalogue and the Bible into the fire.

[I] They go so far as to maintain, that he got Amadis de Gaule translated into good French. This egregious lie is found in the book (32) of an Italian Dominican, called Brother Angelo Paciuchelli. His book, written in the Italian tongue, has been translated into Latin by Charles de Marimont, a Lorraine Theatin. The Leipsic Journal mentions it, in which I have found the following passage. 'A veritate maxime alienum est, quod Lectiones statim prima, qua S. Scripturæ & Asceticorum librorum necessitatem & utilitatem commendat, de B. Luthero traditur: scelus scilicet illum virum, cum Germaniam execrabili hæresi contaminare decrevisset, profanis eam libris corripisse, curavisseque ut lingua Gallica liber quidam donaretur, Amadis, dictus, & quidem omni elegantia exornatus per Principum aulas spargeretur; sicque paulatim sacrarum paginarum spiritualiumque librorum nausea curiosorum aulicorum animis infillaretur. Cujus ineptissimæ calumniæ, quæ nobis quidem non indignationem sed risum movet, non poterit non cordatores ex Romano-Catholicis pudere, quos minime fugit quanto zelo ad sacræ Scripturæ, quæ, ipsi tunc clero tantum non sordebat, laicorum vero manibus extorta plane erat, frequentissimam lectionem, omne hominum genus, summos, medioximos, infimos Lutherus noster revocaverit, sacris in eum finem Bibliis (non Amadiso) in vernaculam linguam incredibili labore atque studio traductis (33). — It is very wide of truth, what in the first section concerning the necessity and usefulness of reading the holy Scriptures and mystic books is reported of Luther, viz. that this most abominable man, when he had determined to corrupt all Germany with his detestable Heresy, took care to have a book called Amadis put into new and elegant French, and brought into the courts of the princes, that by degrees he might insinuate into the minds of people of rank, a contempt for the sacred writings, and of all pious books in general, which ridiculous calumny cannot excite in us indignation but laughter, for the honest Catholics themselves must be ashamed of it. For they cannot be ignorant that by the indefatigable pains of Luther, the sacred writings were once more put not only into the hands of the clergy, but into those of the middle rank, nay, even of those of the meanest sort. He having for that purpose translated into the vulgar tongue, with incredible study and toil, not Amadis but the holy Bible.' What is not a man capable of in point of gross calumnies, and diametrically opposite to all probability, when there are those who dare affirm, that Luther desired to bring the Scriptures into discredit: Luther, I say, who had no greater reproach to bear, with all the reformers, than that of too much recommending to lay-men the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue?

[K] They . . . accuse him of having said that he believed nothing of what he preached. There are a great many Christians, who are Christians in appearance, who make an outward profession of believing in God, in a perfunctory manner, and by way of compliment, that they may not be thought Atheists. Sturmius reproached Beza with being of this class, and applied to him the saying of Socrates, Hoc unum me scire scio, quod nihil scio. — I only know this, that I know nothing; he applied it to Theodore Beza by this gentle parody, Hoc unum me credere credo, quod nil credo. — I think I only believe this, that I believe nothing. Of this humour was the fat mortal, Martin Luther, who thanked God, that he was not singular in his fraternity: for I believe nothing, said he, of what I preach; and, God be blessed, there are many who are infected with the same distemper among our ministers; as John Mathesius has written in his life: this is what I call, believing in God in appearance, and these are the Christians in appearance, who believe in God by way of compliment, Ne nihil credere videantur. — Let them should be thought to believe nothing (34). Compare this with Mathesius's Latin, cited by Henry Fitz-Simon, you will find how Garasse has amplified it. 'Joannes Mathesius in vitam Lutheri plures conciones composuit, quas tandem in lucem emisit. In earum vero duodecima sic ait: Magister Joannes Musa Prædicator Rochlitzensis narravit mihi, se quodam tempore admodum dolenter Lutero quæsum esse, quod ipsemet ea credere non posset quæ alius prædicabat. Tum respondisse Lutherum: Benedictus ergo sit Deus, cum id usque venire credidi (35). — John Mathesius composed several sermons on the Life of Luther which at last he published. In the twelfth sermon he has these words. Master John Musa, minister at Rochlitz informed me, that having once complained to Luther with great concern, that he found it impossible for him to believe what he preached to others: Luther answered, I bless God that this has fallen out to another as well as to me; for hitherto I thought that I alone had this misfortune.'

[L] A certain book published by Luther's friends. According to the present mode, it would have been called Lutheriana or Lutherana. But the title that was given it of Sermones Mensales, or Colloquia Mensalia, is better; for Luther's Table-Talk is the subject of the book. It was published in 1571, by Henry Peter Rebenstock, minister of Eislecherheim. Andrew Rivetus, if I mistake not, says somewhere, that this book is supposititious; but Gisbert Voëtius (36), at least as zealous against Popery as he, acknowledges the contrary. Mr Seckendorf has not attempted to prove this book supposititious, he only observes that these Table-Discourses were collected with indifferency, and rashly printed by a person . . . who impudently idolized Luther (37). The controversies of the other side took advantage of it, as appears by Garasse's passages above-cited, and by the notes of Feuardentius upon St Irenæus (38). They have made the same use of Luther's Letters, published with little discretion and prudence. See Mr Gaffineau's Controversial Letters, who cites several pieces from them, not very honourable to the memory of the author. See what Mr Saldenus has answered to Bellarmine, who would prove, from Luther's table-talk, that he discarded Job out of the canon of scripture. 'Impegit Lutero quod Jobi etiam Libro divinam auctoritatem detraxerit, arguendo à convivalibus ejus Sermonibus deprompto, at ludicro plane & calumnioso; cum neque Libri illius auctor unquam fuerit Lutherus, neque eo vivente vel approbante editus sit (39). — He objects to Luther, that he had detracted from the divine authority of the book of Job, citing in support of what he says, some what taken out of Luther's Table-Talk, but this is idle and scandalous, since it is well known, that Luther was not the author of that book, nor was it published in his life-time, or ever had his approbation.' effect of an inconsiderate zeal [M], or rather of an excessive prepossession, which hindered their discerning the faults of this great man. It cannot be denied, but the impetuous heat of his temper forced from him such sayings, as deserve to be condemned, as when he declared his opinion upon the Epistle of St James [N]. There were some Protestants, who maintained, that he had not spoken so harshly as was pretended; and at the

(41) Costar, Défense des Ouvr. de Voiture, pag. 10, & seq.

[M] It was the effect of an inconsiderate zeal. Voiture's apologist makes use of a thought which may be properly applied in this place: I shall recite the passage at large, as containing several curious particulars (41). 'It were to be wished, that the public had received from Mr Voiture's own hands the present that has been made it of his verses and letters. He would, doubtless, have retrenched some things to have made it perfect. . . . He would not have appeared before the world as he has done in some of his letters, in disorder, in a dishabille, in his morning-gown; he would have put on his court-cloaths, or even a ceremonial and festival habit. He would have kept up in all points to the strictest laws of Decorum; with the rules of which he thought he might lawfully dispense, in a free secret correspondence with his friends and confidants. They who have published his works . . . are fallen into a fault, which is seldom avoided on the like occasions, having chosen to employ their diligence in collecting the scattered pieces of our author, rather than the judgment in making a good choice of them. And indeed, it is no wonder, that ingenious men, of ever so fine and delicate a taste, should be mistaken in this manner. That beloved freed man of Cicero, whom he somewhere calls the reformer and rule of his writings; and who, particularly by the beauty of his wit, had merited his tenderest affections, did something still worse than this. After the death of his master, he published a collection of his jests, wherein, through an excess of passion and zeal, not having courage to leave out any thing, he inserted many so cold and insipid, that Quintilian, a supreme judge of these matters, thinks them unworthy of so famous an orator. The meaning of which, Sir, is, that as piety consecrates the vilest things, when they have touched the bodies of saints, or only their bones and ashes; so love and admiration idolize whatever bears the name of those extraordinary men, who have been snatched from their admirers; and as if every one was capable of the same devotion and worship, they propose them to the veneration of all the earth, and of all ages. The least important and most neglected billets or letters, are, by their passionate admirers, looked upon, as precious relics of these great wits, worthy to be engraved on brass and marble, and to be handed down to latest posterity. . . . For the rest these, whatever may be said of them, are not virtuous extremes (42); for, proceeding from the violence of a friendship nobly placed, this sort of excess is more to be esteemed, than the moderation of other virtues; and deserves not only excuse, but commendation. Your ridiculous curiosities are justly condemned; such as that of the Greek, who bought Epictetus's earthen lamp, which he used in his lucubrations, at the price of three thousand drachmas; or of that extravagant prince, who gave I know not how many talents for the Poet Æschylus's Table-Book; or that other who corrupted the priests of Delphi, to get Orpheus's lyre out of their hands, though he knew not how to touch it, or even to put it in tune.' I have seen in an edition of the Scaligerana (43); a preface which contains the same thoughts in fewer words. 'Ea plerumque est in istos literatorum heros præpossessione vulgi religio & quædam velut idolomania, ut ne verbum quidem illis excidere patiatur quod non avide colligat, & inter pretiosissima hæmælia sedulo condat. Pene quomodo hodierni ἀγιογράφοι divorum cineres, unguis, pilos, ossium fragmenta, vestium simbras aut laciniis, & cætera quæ reliquiarum nomine censent venerandi servant. Sic Virgili speculum, & quidem inter sacra monumenta, Dionysiani in agro Parisiensi Monachi non sine risu visendum præbent. Sic Italos Petrarachæ sui non modo tumulum ædificque, sed & utrumque & sedile, imo & domesticæ felis sceleton cadaver aliisque nescio quot ejusdem farinæ quisquilias magna pompa peregrinantibus ostentare refert Jo. Philippus Thomasinus, libro quem de divini poetæ rebus composuit. — Such for the most part, is the ridiculous veneration, and almost idolatrous regard, which the vulgar pay to those heroes in literature, that they cannot suffer so much as a word to escape them without greedily seizing it, and laying it up among their most precious curiosities. As our modern saint-servers preserve the ashes, nails, hair, pieces of bones, beads, or bits of garments; and whatever else goes under the name of relics, with the biggest reverence. So the Monks of St Dennis at Paris, shew, not without exposing themselves to just contempt, the looking-glass of Virgil, among the rest of their sacred treasures. And the Italians, as we are informed by John Philip Thomassin, in his Life of Petrarch, not only shew the house and tomb of that divine Poet, but also his pitcher and his stool, nay, the very skeleton of his cat; and I know not what besides.' These things fairly represent to you the case of the compilers of Martin Luther's discourses.

[N] His opinion upon the epistle of St James.] He called it a work of straw, in comparison of the epistles of St Paul and St Peter. The Catholic controversialists have hereupon made a thousand outcries, without being assured, by their own eyes, that ever Luther said so. Edmund Campian's adventure is remarkable; he had accused Luther of using this expression: he had the lie given him, and afterwards the confusion of not being able to make good what he had said, though he was furnished with the books he cited (44). This, which in reality was but a vain and imaginary triumph, was, however, a substantial one, on account of the shame it gave the Jesuit, and the joy it occasioned among the Protestants. The learned Whitaker, if we believe Mr Dailly (45), enjoyed a great satisfaction from it all his life long: he maintained, that Luther had not spoken in that manner, and that Campian slandered him. Let Mr Dailly speak. 'Mr Cottibey taxes Luther with saying, that this epistle is a work of straw; but he does not shew the book, nor place of Luther where these words are found; which makes me suspect, that, without having seen them, he trusted to Edmund Campian the Jesuit, or some such author, who hurried on by a furious hatred against our religion, makes no scruple to impute to us whatever comes in their head, be it ever so false or incredible. I will not undertake to read Luther's seven or eight great tomes, to know whether he writ these words, which your disciple charges upon him. I will only tell you, that reading over again what William Whitaker †, a grave and learned man, answered to your Campian, who said the same thing of Luther, I have found, that he accuses him of a great falsity; and says, that having carefully fought for the preface of Luther to this epistle, from whence Campian cited these words, he had at last found it, and that it began thus: "Tho' this epistle of St James has been rejected by the ancients, yet for my part I praise it, and look upon it to be useful and advantageous." He adds, that the same person in the book, concerning the Babylonish captivity, speaks of it farther in these words: "I omit, says he, what many affirm, with great probability, that this epistle is not the apostle St James's, nor worthy of the spirit of an apostle. But for this work of straw, of which your Father Campian, and your new disciple speak, he proffers he has no where met with it in Luther (46)." It is, nevertheless, true, that this is found in a preface of this Reformer. Let us hear farther what Mr Dailly says. "Afterwards Mr Rivet answering the Jesuit III, cap. xxiii, & Sylvester de Petra Sancta, who also advanced the same calumny, adds," that some have discovered to our people, that Luther had written in a German preface upon the first edition of the Bible, that St James's epistle, as to its worth, cannot be paralleled with those of St Paul, and St Peter, and that, in comparison of these, it is an epistle of straw. We do not approve (says Mr Rivet †) this judgment of Luther; and it is certain, that he himself afterwards condemned it. These words being not to be found in any of the editions made after the year

'year 1526 (47). To shew how authors copy one another, without consulting the originals, I will observe, that Fitz-Simon, renewing the accusation which his brother-Jesuit Campian could not prove, cites the same preface (48) which Campian had cited. Idem dico de Epistola Sancti Jacobi quam Lutherus non tantum ut dubiam, sed ut contentiosam, tumidam, aridam, stramineam, & apostolico spiritu indignam appellavit (49). The bishop of Meaux does not speak of this epithet straminea (of straw), nor cite any of these prefaces, but another book of Luther. 'The bold reformer retrenched from the canon of the scripture, whatever did not agree with his notions; and it is on occasion of this unktion, that he writes in the captivity of Babylon, without any testimony of antiquity, that this epistle does not seem to be St James's, nor worthy of the apostolic spirit (50). Fitz-Simon has said, in another place, that Luther rejected the three first evangelists. 'Judicare quoque oportet ejus (Lutheri) animum erga vetus testamentum, ex odio erga præcipuam partem novi testamenti in his verbis expressam. Non immerito igitur admonui (inquit) in prologo novi testamenti lectores, ut hanc falsam abolant opinionem, quod scilicet quatuor sint evangelia, & quatuor tantum Evangelistæ. Dixi autem Joannis evangelium esse unicum, pulchrum, verum ac principale evangelium, aliisque tribus longe ac longe præferendum, ac anteponendum: addo ut etiam Pauli ac Petri epistolæ longe præcedant tria evangelia, Matthæi, Marci, ac Lucæ. Delevit ergo Lutherus pro virili tria simul integra evangelia, ut asciitua, deformia, falsa, vilipendenda (51). 'We ought to judge of Luther's sentiments in respect of the Old Testament, by the aversion he expressed against the greatest part of the new, which I shall prove from his own words. Not without reason, therefore, says he, I have admonished my readers, in my prologue to the New Testament, that they should lay aside that false opinion, viz. that there are only four Gospels, and four Evangelists. I have said that the Gospel of St John, is a true and excellent Gospel, and therefore to be esteemed the principal, being by far superior to the other three; nay, that the Epistles of Paul, and Peter, ought likewise to be in higher esteem, than the three Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke. Thus Luther, as far as it was in his power, has abolished three entire Gospels, by representing them, as counterfeit, ill wrote, false, and of little worth.'

Since the first edition of this Dictionary, I have discovered, that Mr Daillé and Mr Rivet have not traced Campian and Whitaker's dispute, so exactly as I thought they had done. I imagined, that these two French ministers, who were both men of prodigious reading, had said all that could be said upon the subject; but I was in the wrong to think so. This we shall see in the following remark, with a small censure of the passage of the bishop of Meaux.

[O] The Protestants denied something which they ought to have granted.] Campian's accusation was contained in these words: Quid Lutherus (causæ fuit) ut Epistolam Jacobi contentiosam, tumidam, aridam, stramineam, flagitiosus Apostata nominaret, & indignam spiritu censeret Apostolico? Desperatio (52). He pretended then, that Luther said, that St James's epistle was contentious, bombastic, dry, and of straw, and unworthy of the apostolic spirit. This was one of the first points that was discussed in the verbal dispute, which Campian maintained in the Tower of London (53). He was furnished with Luther's works that he had cited; he was required to find out the words of his accusation; he did seek, and found only this, 'Affirmant nonnulli epistolam Jacobi Apostolico spiritu indignam (54) — Some affirm, that the epistle of St James is not worthy of the apostolical spirit.' He had asked leave to send to Germany for the editions, published by Luther himself: he protested, that he had read the words in question in Luther; and that before him several famous writers, some of whom he named had accused Luther of the same crime. But he was laughed at, as a man who would send to Germany or an advocate in a desperate cause (55).

Whitaker, some time after, took pen in hand against this Jesuit, and treated him as a liar, as we have seen in the preceding remark, in the first passage of Mr Daillé. But he afterwards owned, there was something of truth in the accusation; for observe his reply to John Duræus, a Scotch Jesuit, who had written in defence of Campian: 'Cum viderem accusatum à Campiano Lutherum, ut ego putabam, injuste, licuit mihi falsum crimen verbo notare. Itaque Jacobi epistolam esse his contumeliis, quas Campianus commemorat, à Luthero affectam negavi, quia, in Lutheri libris nihil tale potui reperire. Tu jam verba ipsa profers, quæ tamen nec vidi unquam, nec qui se vidisse diceret, conveni. Utique se res habet non magni refert. Nobis enim Lutheri quæque dicta minimè præstanda sunt. Quanquam mihi plane suspectam esse fidem tuam profiteor, & te aliorum scilicet auditionibus nimium tribuisse suspicio. Primum enim vidi quandam Lutheri præfationem antiquissimam, editam anno 1525 Wittembergæ, in qua Jacobi epistolam præ Petri ac Pauli epistolis stramineam vocat. Sed hoc cum tuis conferendum non est. Deinde cum alii pontificii volunt ostendere Jacobi epistolam à Luthero stramineam esse dictam, hanc ipsam præfationem, atque hæc verba proferunt, de tuis nullam mentionem faciunt. Denique cum videam in quadam præfatione hanc epistolam præ aliter stramineam dici, non exillimo in eadem præfatione ἀνδρῶς, & tumidam & aridam, & contentiosam, & stramineam, & spiritu Apostolico indignam nominari. Quare dum novam hanc editionem tuam video, ἐπὶ χεῖρῶν malo, quàm aliquid temere in alterutram partem affirmare (56). When I saw that Campian had accused Luther in a manner, which to me seemed unjust, I thought my self at liberty to take notice of that false charge. I therefore denied that Luther had treated St James's Epistle so contumeliously, as Campian has reproached him with; because in all Luther's writings, I could not find any such thing. You now produce the words themselves, with I never saw my self nor could ever meet with any man that had seen them. However it be, this matter is of no great importance, since all Luther's opinions are not of equal weight with us. However I cannot help saying, that I suspect what you affirm, and am afraid you have been deceived, by giving credit to the too bold assertions of others. For first, I have seen Luther's preface, a very ancient piece, printed in the year 1525, at Wittemberg, in which he says, that the epistle of James, compared with those of Peter and Paul, is an epistle of straw; but this is nothing to what you advance; yet when other Popish writers have attempted to prove, that the epistle of James was called by Luther an epistle of straw, they quote this very preface, and these words, but they say nothing of the words you mention. Lastly, when in a certain preface I observe, that the epistle in question is said to be an epistle of straw, in respect to others, I cannot think it should in the same preface be called, without any restriction, angry, bombastic, dry, contentious, an epistle of straw, and unworthy the apostolic spirit; therefore, till I see this new edition of yours, I will suspend my judgment, and not affirm any thing rashly on either side. Observe, he confesses, that, since the publication of his book against Campian's reasons, he had found a preface of Luther, printed at Wittemberg in 1525; in which it was said, that St James's Epistle, is an Epistle of straw, compared with the Epistles of St Peter and St Paul; but that not finding the Epithets contentiosa, tumida, arida, indigna Apostolico spiritu, alledged by Campian, and repeated by Duræus, he will not grant the truth of the citations, till the copy be produced, that contains them. He declares that, in the mean time, he will suspend his judgment betwixt the affirmative and negative. Campian's apologists got some ground by this confession of Whitaker; but, to have justified him perfectly, they should have produced to the public, a work in which the epithets of contentiosa, tumida, &c. were contained. It does not appear, that they were able to do it; and therefore Whitaker, in answering a new antagonist, maintained, that Campian still lay under the charge of a slanderer, since nothing more could be proved than the epithet straminea. Consider (56) White. in Respon. ad Rationes Campiani. Defensione contra Confutationem Duræi, pag. 21, 22. Edit. London. 1583.

Epistle, it was doubtless, before the year 1525 [P]. I shall give some reasons for it below

Consider well the following passage, in which Whitaker talks to his adversary William Rainolds: 'Cum copiosam & amplam hujus rei defensionem suscepis, quare in ea re maximè deficiis, ad quam maximè auxilio tuo opus est? Nam quod affers destramine, antea fatebamur totum illud, quod verum fuit: tuæ itaque partes fuissent copiosius confirmasse, Lutherum etiam Epistolam illam vocasse contentiosam, tumidam, aridam indignam spiritu Apostolico; quorum omnium eo in loco illum Campianus accusavit. Sed cum nihil ad hanc rem probandam afferre possis, coactus es fateri Campianum gravius Lutherum, quam meritis est, de hac Epistola accusasse: ita ut si uno aliquo verbo Jesuitæ tui, cujus causam agis, exiftimationem defenderis; pluribus tamen eum verbis condemnasti; quæ tu interim veteratorie omittis, quasi nec ea unquam dixisset Campianus, nec tua res ageretur. Fateor sanè parum referre, quid de Lutero Campianus finxerit nequiter: at qui eum defendendum suscepisti, ne putes te officio tuo satisfecisse, si ex multis, quæ ille protulit, in una aliqua re eum defenderis, & in pluribus defeceris. Quare vel define tandem de uno isto verbo litem movere, vel reliqua testimoniis confirma (57). — Since

(57) Whitaker, Reason ad Rainoldi Refutationem, pag. 105, 106.

'you undertook a full defence of this matter, why do you most fail in that wherein your aid was most wanted? For as to what you say about straw, that has been admitted and acknowledged to be true, but it is your business to prove at large that Luther has called that epistle, contentious, bombastic, dry, unworthy of the apostolic spirit; of all which Campian in the same place accuses him. But when you are able to bring nothing to support this, you are forced to confess, that Campian has censured Luther, with respect to that Epistle, more severely than he deserved. Thus though you think you have made good one, of the words cited by the Jesuit, whose cause you maintain, yet you have condemned him as to many more of which however you take no manner of notice, as if they had never been said by Campian, or you had never undertaken his defence. I do acknowledge, that it is not of very great importance, what Campian has wickedly feigned to have been said by Luther, but as you undertook his defence, you ought not to think your work done when you only support him in one part of his charge, and give him up in the rest. Therefore let us hear no more of this single word, or else come with your proofs, as to the rest of his charge.'

Let us cite another passage, in which he tells us, that he had not suppressed the discovery he had made since the publication of his answer to Campian's ten reasons. He examined, with all possible care, as many copies as he could find, whether German or Latin, of this reformer's works, and having at last met with that which concerns the epithet straminea; he published it in a preface to his answer to a tract of Sanders. 'Si Lutherus hoc scripserit, iniquè ego Campianum falsi reum peregi: si non scripserit, turpissimè Lutherum Campianus infirmulavit. Ut veritatem istius rei cognoscerem in omnibus exemplaribus, quæ comparare potui, tam Germanicis quam Latinis examinandis summam industriam collocavi: cum autem nulla verba ejusmodi, sed diversa potius, invenirem; credebam, optimâ impulsus ratione totum illud excogitatum fuisse; itaque falsissimum esse pronuntiavi. Evenit verò postea, ut in vetus Germanicum Testamentum à Lutero conversum inciderem præfixis ipsius præfationibus, in quibus inveni quiddam, quod aliqua ex parte referret illud quod objecerat Campianus. Cum autem illud legissem, non rem dissimulavi, sed fatebar in responsione mea ad Gregorium Martinum. In illa quidem præfatione scribit Lutherus, S. Jacobi Epistolam non posse dignitate certare cum Epistolis S. Petri & Pauli, sed Epistolam stramineam esse, si cum illis comparatur. Quam ejus sententiam non probo; atque in recentioribus editionibus cum omisa sint illa verba, opinor ipsum postea Lutherum hanc suam sententiam improbasse. Non profecto dubito, quin æquus lector fatebitur inter hoc, quod scribit Lutherus, atque illud, quod ei objicit Campianus, discrepantiam esse. Etenim aliud est loqui planè & ἀπλῶς, aliud uti comparatione. Lutherus, inquit Campianus, Epistolam S. Jacobi stramineam vocavit. Lutherus ait præ Pauli & Petri Epistolis stramineam esse (58).

— If Luther really wrote this, then it was wrong in me to charge Campian with falsely accusing him; but if he did not write it, then Campian most basely traduced Luther. In order to come at the truth of this matter, I diligently compared all the copies I could meet with, either in German or in Latin; but when I could find no such words, but rather things of a contrary nature in them, I, on good ground, believed the whole to be a fiction, and pronounced it false. But afterwards, when, in an old German Testament, I found a preface written by Luther, wherein something was contained of what had been objected by Campian against him, I did not dissemble this matter, but confessed it freely in my answer to Gregory Martin. In this preface Luther writes thus, The epistle of St James is by no means of equal dignity with the epistles of Peter and Paul, but is an epistle of straw, if compared with them. This opinion of his I do not approve, and as these words are omitted in later editions, I am of opinion, that Luther himself disapproved it. However, a candid reader will, I doubt not, easily discern that there is a wide difference between what Luther wrote and what is objected to him by Campian; for it is one thing to use an expression absolutely and simply, and another to apply it by comparison. Luther, says Campian, calls the epistle of St James, an epistle of straw, but Luther himself says, that it is an epistle of straw in comparison of those of Peter and Paul. By all this it appears, that Mr Dailly and Mr Rivet were ignorant of a great many things relating to this controverly. They did not know, that Whitaker retracted part of what he had advanced; nor that he himself found out the preface which informed him of Luther's bold expression. The Jesuits have not been ignorant of this; they boasted of it, and exaggerated the thing, pretending, that he owned that the whole accusation brought against Luther was well grounded. We shall cite the author of Campian's life, in the place where he gives us the history of the conference held in the tower of London. 'Is matutini certaminis ordo exitusque fuit, visque hæretici eo lætiores & certamine abscedere, quod Lutherum calumnia suo judicio exemissent: quamquam id quoque gaudium ut vanum ita non diuturnum fuit: paulo post ad inquisitionem tantæ rei omnium studiis conversis, corrupti Lutheri codices inspecti, inque is inventa ipsa, quæ carperat hominis Apostolæ Campianus verba. Et quoniam res aperta erat, ipsi hæresis magistri, inter quos Whitakerus fuit, Lutheri insanas illas voces in vetustis exemplaribus legi palam passi; personam triumphanti penè jam mendacio, vel invitui suis ipsi manibus detraxere (59). — This was the method (59) Vita Campian!, ubi supra, pag. 261, 262.

and issue of the morning dispute, and the heretics seemed to go off with joy, because they thought they had vindicated Luther from these calumnies; but as this joy was ill founded, so it continued not long, for people being now turned to the search of this point, Luther's uncorrupted copies were examined, and in them the very words were found with which Campian had charged that apostate. And as the thing was now notorious, even the arch-heretics, among whom we may reckon Whitaker, publicly acknowledged, that they had read these senseless expressions of Luther in some old copies; and thus they themselves pulled off the mask from a lie, which had like to have triumphed over truth.' The more we examine, these things, the more we find it an Herculean labour, to discover truth in the midst of so many disguises and juggles.

What I have to say against the bishop of Meaux will not detain my readers long. He assumes (60), that (60) See, above, Luther, without any testimony from antiquity, has written. (50). ten, that this epistle appears not to be St James's, nor worthy of the apostolical spirit. This observation is false; you need only compare it with these words of Mr Dailly: 'Origen †, many ages before Luther, writ, that some rejected this epistle, which Eusebius † also testifies, and says, there were but few of the ancients who had mentioned it; and St Jerome † after him says, that it was affirmed, That it was not the apostle himself, but some other person, who had writ it under his name, tho' by little and little, in tract of time, it had been received, and authorized (61).' Whitaker, in his answer to Duræus, proves at large, that St James's epistle was suspected by a great many in the ancient church.

[P] . . . it was, doubtless, before the year 1525. (62) In citot. We have seen (62), that the epithet, straminea, is found found in a preface printed that year. But it is certain he had been less circumspect some years before. We may therefore presume, that, growing moderate by degrees, he softened and tempered, in 1525, what he had advanced too shocking, the passage, for instance, which Campian, Duraus, Fitz-Simon, &c. charge him with, and which was entirely left out in the editions after the year 1525. I have observed, that Cochleus, in the year 1522, accuses him of having published injurious prefaces, with respect to some books of the canon of the scripture. 'Optimis quibusque videbatur Lutherus, nimis malitiose grassari in sacras literas novi Testamenti. E quorum Canone, audaci censura rejiciebat Epistolam ad Hæbreos, Epistolam Jacobi, Epistolam Judæ, & Apocalypsim Joannis. Quas sane & atrocibus infamabat calumniis in suis præfationibus. In præfatione vero generali, etiam in sacratissima Evangelia audacissime manum mittebat: volens in primis repudiandam esse vetustissimam hanc & omnibus Christianis notam ac receptam opinionem & sententiam, Esse scilicet Quatuor tantum Evangelia, totidemque Evangelistas (63). — Luther, in the opinion of the best of men, is thought to have treated the sacred writings of the New Testament with too malicious a boldness. Out of the canon of which, by his audacious censure, he has rejected the epistle to the Hebrews, the epistle of James, the epistle of Jude, and the revelation of John, defaming them in his prefaces. But in his general preface, he has audaciously injured even the most sacred gospels, endeavouring to destroy, and to reject that most ancient, and universally received, notion amongst Christians, that there are only four gospels, and as many evangelists.' Be pleased to remember, that this Cochleus had been one of his most violent adversaries: But, after all, since it cannot be denied but that the straminea subtilis, it is probable, that Campian's whole passage was in some ancient preface: For, in reality, the other epithets are not more, nor indeed so injurious as this. Whitaker, like a skillful man, took advantage of this Jesuit's apology, not being able to produce the edition they wanted. He made good use of this advantage, and profited by Luther's restriction, tho' it has not all the force that is imagined, and be only a palliative remedy: For whoever says, that St James's epistle is an epistle of straw, in comparison of St Paul's, really says, that it is not canonical, or the production of an inspired writer. It would be absurd to pretend, that writers, inspired by God have not an equal authority, or that some are more credible than others. Would not this be to say, that the Holy Spirit neglected some of them, and left them to their particular opinions, true or false? This cannot be admitted; and consequently there is a necessity of saying, they are all, as to us, of equal authority: so that when a man affirms, that a writing, compared with St Paul's epistles, is a writing of straw, he can consider it no otherwise than as a human writing. And upon this foot he thinks it lawful to pass such a judgment on it, as the laws of criticism require; and to take to task the style, the turn, the thoughts, as if he were judging of the works of Tertullian, or Arnobius. This, however, does not excuse Campian's not mentioning Luther's restriction, if he found it in the edition, upon which he grounded his charge; otherwise he fell into the sophism, a dicto secundum quid, ad dictum simpliciter. Still reserving a liberty to say, that on such occasions, restrictions are only an appearance of reserve; since St James's epistle still remained actually and fully degraded from its canonical character, as a work divinely inspired.

¶ Tuan, lib. xli, ad ann. 1567. Addam, quod plerisque ritu dignum mihi silentio minime pretermittendum visum est, ipsum tam inextinguibilem veneros usus fucci fuisse, ut cum uxore sola uteretur, & illa toties illum admittere non posset, vir aliquot castus quique vagis libidinibus minime oblectabatur ex ejus permisso, negotio cum Pastoribus communicato, concubinam unam superinduxerit, cujus consuetudine ardore aliquantum perdomito, parcius ac moderatius cum uxore versaretur. Tandem hoc anno, qui illi climactericus fuit, postmodum Pasche mortalitatem exiit. Inspecio à Medico corpore triorchis repertus est. . . . I will add what many thought deserved only to be laughed at, but what to me appears unfit to be passed over in silence, that he was a man so redundant in what stimulates men to venereal pleasures, that while he kept himself to his wife alone, she was unable to sustain him; and therefore he being otherwise a chaste man, not inclining to converse with various women, with her consent, and by the advice of the pastors, he took to him a concubine with whom having blunted his amorous ardor, he afterwards conversed more sparingly and moderately with his wife. At last, in this year, which was his climacteric, he, the day after Easter, departed this life. His body being opened by Physicians, he was found to have three testicles.

(2) He consented that the landgrave of Hesse should have two wives at the same time. Mr Varillas has spoken of this matter at large. 'Philip, landgrave of Hesse, was of so vigorous a constitution, that one wife was not sufficient for him; and the Surgeons, who opened him after his death, found a natural cause for it, which the modesty of our tongue will not permit me to explain. . . . He persuaded himself, that his infirmity dispensed with the gospel rigour, and permitted him to have two wives at the same time. Nothing disturbed him in the notion he had conceived of it, but the novelty of the thing: But he supposed, that the approbation of Luther, and others of the most famous divines of his sect, would justify his action. He assembled them at Wittemberg, in form of a council, in the year 1539. The affair was there examined with all the precautions that were thought necessary to prevent their decisions being turned into ridicule. They foresaw the troublesome consequences of what they were going to do; But, at last, the fear of disobliging the landgrave, carried it in Luther's opinion, and his chief disciples, against the law of Jesus Christ, conscience, reputation, and all other human and divine considerations. The result of the assembly of Wittemberg, was written with Melancthon's own hand, and signed by Luther, and by the other most famous divines of their sect. It was expressed in so strong terms, that it could leave no doubt, or ambiguity, and was sent to the landgrave in the following form (64). Mr Varillas gives the act intire in Latin and French. We there find an express permission granted to this landgrave to marry a second wife, provided, that only a few persons were made privy to it. We there also find, that in certain cases of necessity, any other man might marry again in his wife's life-time; and two of these cases of necessity are specified by these doctors, viz. I. If a man being a captive, in a foreign country, cannot preserve, or recover his health, without the use of a woman. II. If a man be married to a leprous woman. 'Certis tamen casibus locus est dispensationi, si quis apud exteras nationes captivus ad curam corporis & sanitatem inibi alteram uxorem superinduceret, vel si quis haberet leprosam; his casibus alteram ducere cum consilio sui Pastoris, non intentione novam legem inducendi, sed sue necessitati consulendi, hunc neficium, quæ ratione damnare liceret (65). Mr Varillas sets down in Latin and French the landgrave's contract of marriage with Margaret de Saal; to which marriage this prince's first wife gave her consent. This historian makes many reflexions thereupon, tending to shew, that the reasons of these Casuists open a very large door to polygamy, and observes, that the two acts, inserted in his history (66), have been faithfully transcribed and collated by the Imperial Notaries with the originals, which are preserved in the archives of Ziegenbain, belonging equally to the branch of Hesse-Cassel, and to that of Hesse-Darmstadt (67).

But after him came a more artful controversialist (68), who has drawn another piece out of the same place, and has made many subtle reflexions upon this matter. This other piece is the instruction the landgrave gave to Martin Bucer. In this we find, on one hand, the reasons which induced this prince to a second marriage; and, on the other, those by which he would induce the Divines to consent to it. He shews, that he never loved the princess, his wife; and that she was so disagreeable, and so subject to drunkenness, that he neither could, nor ever would abstain from other women, whilst he had no other wife but her; and that, nevertheless, he would not incur the penalties, which the scripture denounces to fornicators and adulterers. Cum videam quod ab hoc agendi modo penes modernam uxorem meam nec possim nec velim abstinere (69). The Physicians, adds he, know the strength of my constitution; besides, I am often obliged to assist at the diets; they last a long time, and we have rich tables there; how then can I preserve my continence? For I cannot always take my wife along with me, with her great retinue. 'Primo quod initio, quæ eam duxi, nec animo, nec desiderio eam complexus fuerim. Quali ipsa quoque complexionem, amabilitate, & odore sit, & quomodo interdum se superfluo potu gerat, hoc sciunt ipsius aulae Præfetti; & Virgines; alique plures: cumque ad ea deferenda difficultatem habeam, Bucero tamen omnia declaravi. Secundo, quia valida complexionem, ut Medici sciunt, sum, & sæpe contingit ut in fœderum & imperii comitiis diu verfer, ubi lautè vivitur & corpus curatur; quomodo me ibi gerere queam absque uxore, cum non semper magnum Gynæceum mecum ducere possim, facile est conjicere & considerare (70). He adds to all this I know not how many threats and promises, which much embarrassed his Casuists; for it is highly probable, that if a private gentleman had consulted them upon the like case, he would have obtained nothing from them. It may therefore reasonably be imagined, that they were men of little faith; they became public: the Roman Catholics exclaimed very much about it; and some ministers, have not had all the necessary prudence in answering for Luther [R]. They have advanced they had not a due confidence in the promises of Jesus Christ: They believed, that if the reformation of Germany was not maintained by the princes who professed it, it would soon be extinguished. The experience of the time past made them timorous; they saw, that the violence of persecutions, and the violence, employed by Catholic princes against those who had left the Romish communion, had ever destroyed those reformations in the birth. It was natural to fear a like fate, unless force were repelled by force. However it be, it cannot be denied, generally speaking, but Luther's book contained several things favourable to polygamy (71). Lyserus gives several instances of it (72). See the Remark [U]. I will conclude this with the words of the bishop of Meaux, 'At present, says he (73), all this mystery of iniquity is discovered by the pieces, which the elector Palatine, Charles Lewis, (who died last) (74), has caused to be printed; and whereof, the prince, Ernest of Hesse, one of Philip's descendants, has revealed a part, since he turned Catholic. The Book, which the prince Palatine caused to be printed, is intitled, Confessiones Considerations upon Marriage, with an Explication of Questions hitherto discussed, concerning Adultery, Divorce, and Polygamy. The book came out in high Dutch in 1679, under the borrowed name of Daphneus Arcuarus, under which was concealed that of Laurentius Bæger, one of this prince's counsellors.'

It must here be observed, that Thuanus was ill informed of the circumstances of this affair. The landgrave, according to him, was, on one hand, so vigorous in the conjugal exercise, that his wife could not admit his embraces as often as he desired; and, on the other, so chaste, that he did not love to take his pleasure abroad: And therefore the prince consented to the diversion which a concubine might give to the vigour of her husband. And the thing having been communicated to the ministers, they gave the landgrave a concubine, who might tame him a little, and oblige him to be more moderate towards his wife (75). This was not the case; he had never loved her; he married her against his inclination: and beginning three weeks after his marriage to make use of other women, he continued the same course till his second marriage. 'Initio quo eam duxi, nec animo nec desiderio eam complexus fuim. . . Si porro diceretur quare meam uxorem duxerim, vere imprudens homo tunc temporis fui, & ab aliquibus meorum consiliariorum, quorum potior pars defuncta est, ad id persuasus sum. Matrimonium meum ultra tres septimanas non servavi, & sic constanter perrexi (76).'

— When I first married her, I had no inclination for her. . . If it be asked, why then did I make her my wife? I own frankly, that I was at that time, an imprudent man, and that some of my counsellors, most of whom are now dead, persuaded me thereto. I did not keep my marriage above three weeks, and so I have gone on. It is very probable, that she was ignorant of his vigour, or knew it only by hear-say. Away with these foolish jesters, who might be able to criticize Thuanus, on his supposing, that the prince, finding herself unable to bear so frequent attacks, called in a concubine to her assistance. Montagne might have rallied this Historian upon it, but his authority is suspected. See here a passage of his Essays. 'We have farther read of a difference that happened in Catalonia, between a woman, complaining of the too constant efforts of her husband (not that, in my opinion, she was so much incommoded by them; for I believe no miracles, except in faith; as under this pretence, which is the fundamental action of marriage, to re-trench and bridle the authority of husbands over their wives; and to shew, that their lust and naughtiness pass beyond the nuptial-bed, and trample under foot the charms and pleasures of Venus): To which complaint, a man truly brutal, and unnatural, answered, that even on fasting days, he could not dispense with less than ten times. From whence proceeded that notable decree of the queen of Arragon; by which, after mature deliberation of the council, this good queen to give a rule and example to all ages of the moderation and modesty required in a just marriage, determined, for the legitimate and necessary bounds, fix times a day; abating and quitting much of the occasions and desires of her sex, to establish, as she said, an easy form, and by consequence permanent and immutable. Whereupon the doctors cry out, what must be a woman's appetite and concupiscence, since their reason, their reformation, and their virtue is defined at this rate (77)?'

See the remark [D] of the article GLEICHEN, and remember that abundance of authors, who relate the same thing as Montagne, and make their jests upon it, do this rather to exercise their wit, than to express their thoughts. Some of them are at least persuaded, that they have been told sincerely, that is enough.

[R] Some ministers, have not had all the necessary prudence in answering for Luther.] The only answer that should have been given the bishop of Meaux, was to say, as Mr Bafnage has prudently done (79): I. That Luther ought not to have granted the landgrave of Hesse the permission to marry a second wife, whilst his first was alive; and that the bishop of Meaux did justly condemn him upon that article. II. That the Popes have run into much more criminal excesses; from whence it follows, that Luther's fault, censured by the Papists, has no weight; for if this fault hindered him from being an instrument in the hand of God to declare the truth, and reform the church, the Roman Catholics are to blame in believing that the Popes, who have been guilty of more crying sins than this, were, however, living oracles to the church, and the vicars of Jesus Christ. It is certain, the Catholics can infer nothing from this action of the reformers, nor from any other to invalidate the reformation, without destroying a principle absolutely necessary for their own support; to wit, that the greatest crimes do not bind the Pope pronouncing ex cathedra, from declaring a truth, the belief of which is obliging on all the faithful.

Had the author of the Pastoral Letters been as judicious as Mr Bafnage, he would not have exposed his cause to objections, which he could never get over. First, he would have confessed the fact; for if it be permitted to doubt of the acts, which the elector Palatine, Charles Lewis, caused to be published, with the attestation of a Public Notary, declaring they were copied from the original, in the archives of the house of Hesse, there will be no possibility of proving facts: the most authentic declarations of sovereign courts, the privy-seal, the great-seal, and all the most valid testimonies imaginable, will be a feeble barrier against the obliquity of a disputer. Therefore prudence required, that it should not be called in question, whether the landgrave Philip obtained of Luther, and some other ministers, a dispensation to marry two wives. I say this further: the respect that is due to the most illustrious house of Hesse, and to the memory of a reformed elector, does not suffer us to doubt of it: nevertheless, the author of the Pastoral Letters has very plainly declared he doubts of it (80). But his great fault lies here, that, to extenuate the complaisance of these ministers, he displays every thing, that can shew the law of marriage, of one with one, to be subject to a thousand exceptions; he would particularly have it sacrificed to the imperious power of a lascivious constitution. 'There is no manner of comparison, says he (81), betwixt those two evils; to wit, the having recourse to the unhappy remedy of a second marriage, and the launching out into a thousand impurities; which are the necessary consequences of celibacy in persons, whose complexion is not turned to continency.' This created him adventures, both among the Catholics and Protestants. The author of the History of the Variations told him, that this principle would carry us too far. 'The perpetual indisposition of a husband or a wife, is as invincible an impediment, as absence, or captivity itself: the married couple therefore must unmercifully leave one another in these sad circumstances; but an inability of humour, one of the most incurable diseases, will be a no less necessary impediment (82).'

This minister found, in his own communion, many adversaries both lay-men and divines. The bishop of Meaux advanced principles manifestly pernicious: And the most tolerable of what they offer is of such a nature, that they had much better have said nothing [S]. Mr Claude's manner of speaking of this great reformer is very judicious [T]. He has justified him among

Meaux produces him (83) a letter from another minister, who blasphemes for his brother, on account of these necessities, alleged against the gospel, and these inevitable impurities . . . and who perceives the inconvenience of this impure doctrine, which would introduce divorce, and even polygamy, whenever either of the parties should labour under distempers, I say not, incurable, but long; or where any other impediment may be found, which should oblige them to live separately. This minister is not named; but another has openly impeached this doctrine, in order to have it censured; and has published, that it is a principle naturally productive of this conclusion, that a man, who has a sick wife, may marry a second (84). There is nothing more certain, adds he, an equal necessity gives an equal privilege; and if an husband is as much hindered from cohabiting with his wife, by having a dead palsy, as by his own captivity among Barbarians, he is equally at liberty to seek a remedy to his incontinence, in a second marriage. Mr de Beauval, among the lay-men, has urged this still more strongly (85). Another lay man has maintained, that this maxim (86) opens a gate to the strangest disorders; it authorizes an incontinent person, whose wife is long sick, to marry another; and then another and another, without end, if providence pleases to render them all unhealthy. Thus you see a Turkish polygamy breaking in by this gap, into Christianity, and filling it with its brutal lusts: besides, you see in Christianity, that which was never seen in ancient Paganism, nor is, at this day, to be seen in Mahometism; to wit, women authorized to have several husbands at the same time, when not having the gift of continency, they happen to be joined to a distempered husband: for it were ridiculous to pretend, that it is a less evil in them, to give way to promiscuous lusts, which are, according to this minister, the infallible consequence of celibacy in some constitutions, than to recur to the remedy of a second husband. We see therefore that his maxim is a source of the most scandalous and filthy licentiousness, that ever was seen in the world; and that nothing will expose our communion to more mortifying reproaches, than this doctrine of Mr Jurieu, unless our synods condemn it. All the laws which decency and the prudence of magistrates have introduced to hinder widows from marrying again, before a certain time, fall to the ground, or are only a tyrannical imposition, which makes those of a certain complexion launch into a thousand impurities. The author of the Pastoral Letters finds a hundred expedients (87) to bring himself off, with respect to some other difficulties that were proposed to him concerning divorce, and second marriages; but it was utterly impossible for him to disengage himself from this. All he could do was to calumniate his accuser; for it is a calumny for a man to complain, that he has been accused of a thing, of which he has not been accused (88). Thus you see how much it concerns those who answer a book of controversy not to be hasty; for if they give way to the impetuous rashness of their own thoughts and temper, they spoil the best cause.

What I have said of the respect due to the most illustrious house of Hesse, and to the memory of the reformed elector, would not be understood by every body, if I did not explain it. The acts of this second marriage were taken from the archives of Ziegenbain, common to the branch of Hesse-Cassel, and to that of Hesse-Darmstadt (89). Prince Ernest of Hesse Rhinfelds, having embraced the Romish religion, was glad at their being published, because he thought this would fix a blemish on the church he had quitted (90); and it is manifest, they are a great disgrace to Luther, Melancthon, Bucer, &c. There is therefore no likelihood, that the landgraves of Hesse-Cassel, and the landgraves of Hesse-Darmstadt, the former Calvinists, and the later Lutherans, would have been silent, if there had been any suspicion, that these acts were forged. These great princes could not be sufficiently blamed, if, having any suspicion of this, they had done nothing to oppose the design of the landgrave, Ernest, a Catholic profelyte. It is therefore denying them their due respect to doubt, whether these acts be genuine;

it is insinuating that they suffer under the authority of their archives, the reformers to be publickly aspersed, and most unjustly slandered, and a dishonour brought upon the Protestant church. As they are not capable of a lukewarmness, so injurious, it is most certain their silence clearly proves the validity of these acts. And as for the elector Palatine, how shameful would it be, should it be proved, that he ordered one of his counsellors to publish false acts of this nature? I know indeed, that it was his interest they should be most genuine, because he did all that was possible to legitimate his marriage with a lady he had kept, whilst his electress was alive; which occasioned this prince's leaving him, and refusing to be called his wife any longer: but, however, he had too much honour and prudence, to go about to justify himself by a supposititious fact, the falseness whereof might have easily been proved by the electress's relations (91).

[S] . . . they had much better have said nothing.] The author of the Pastoral Letters has much enlarged upon the practice of some states (92). This was giving a handle for three new objections: for, I. his adversaries (93) failed not to take the advantage of it, as if the civil laws of Protestants left a man too great a latitude in matrimonial cases; and, as if only a small number of private persons had disapproved it, whilst he had the general practice on his side. II. All the examples he produces, or could produce, are of a different kind from the matter in debate; they being not marriages of a man with two wives in the same house at the same time, as were those of the landgrave. III. Lastly, a casuist ought not to regulate himself upon a practice tolerated by princes. Who is ignorant what extreme abuses civil laws have authorized or tolerated in Christianity for many ages together, with respect to marriage (94)? The church has stood out, and by its opposition, has at last caused those things to be changed, which were not reconcilable with the gospel. What a fine case should we be in, if the casuists would approve of all that princes permit? Do they not almost every where suffer fornication to go unpunished (95)? If any suit happens betwixt a young woman and him who has got her with child, the most he has to fear, is, that the man will not be condemned to pay her a sum of money (96): as for censures or other penalties, she need not be afraid of them. The judges refer all this to her confessor, her relations, or her confidant. And are not plays not only tolerated, but even protected by the prince? Have not the Actors of operas at Paris a guard allowed them, detached from the troops of the king's household? Nevertheless, do the preachers cease to exclaim against these diversions? And if any ecclesiastical author dares to write in favour of plays, is he not immediately overwhelmed with opposite writings, and forced to recant (97)? So that a good moralist will not regulate his opinions by the practice of the civil law, in a point concerning relaxation of manners.

Whoever would see as good an answer as could be given to the bishop of Meaux, concerning the marriage of the landgrave, will do well to read Mr Seckendorf (98).

[T] Mr Claude's manner of speaking of Luther is very judicious.] These are his words. 'I confess it were to be wished, that Luther had been more temperate in his way of writing; and that with his great and invincible courage, with his ardent zeal for the truth, with that unshaken constancy he ever manifested, he could have showed a greater reserve and moderation. But these faults, which are most commonly common, prevent not our esteem of men, when, in other respects, we perceive in them a good fund of piety, and virtues perfectly heroic, such as were seen to shine in Luther. For we cannot refuse to praise the zeal of Lucifer, bishop of Cagliari, or to admire the great qualities of St Jerome, though we discover too much keenness and passion in their stile. And perhaps too, there was some particular necessity at the time of the reformation, to employ the strongest expressions, the better to awaken men from that profound slumber, in which they had lain so long. However, I grant, that Luther ought to have been more reserved in his writings; and that if the author among other things upon a point, which has given occasion to several writings; that is to say the dispute with the devil concerning private masses[U].^b Luther died the eighteenth of the Prejudices would have contented himself to complain of the acrimony of his style, we should have been content, as a full answer, to desire him, for the future, not to imitate himself what he condemned in another (99). All this is good and solid. I shall only observe, that a general method of justifying people from hence, that their temper was very proper, considering the posture of affairs, to produce good effects, is a great source of illusion. No body doubts, that providence knows how to chufe the most effectual means to arrive at it's ends: but as the ill qualities of men are, at some seasons, more proper than their brightest virtues, to execute God's decrees, it would be very ill reasoning to conclude, that violence and passion are commendable upon pretence, that the corruption of the world needs the harshest treatment. The wisdom of God, I confess, is eminent in employing such instruments; but the instruments may very well be extremely vicious. I have observed above (100), that Cardinal Palavicini has excused Julius II, upon the need the church then had of a war-like Pope.

[U] He has justified him . . . upon the dispute with the devil, concerning private masses.] There are some objections, which the great controversialists leave to the disputants of the lower forms; but there are others which are employed by all authors, great and small (101), by those who preach controverfely from a bulk in the streets, and those who dictate from the highest pulpits: the objection I speak of, is of this number. The meanest country missionary has not failed to urge it; Mr Nicolle has opposed it with a very grave air. 'Never any one, says he (102), but Luther durst boast, in a printed book, that he had had a long conference with the devil; that he had been convinced, by his reasons, that private masses were an abuse; and that this was the motive which induced him to abolish them. Bat common sense has ever made all others conclude . . . that it was an excess of extravagance, to take the devil for the master of truth, and become his disciple.' Mr Claude answered this objection very well (103). This is one of the four places of his book, to which the Janenist replied, in a book intitled, A Confutation of the Answer of a Lutheran minister, concerning the conference of Luther with the devil. And they failed not to infer this part of their reply in the second edition of the Prejudices (104). To see a complete answer to this objection, we need only read a tract, an extract whereof has been given in the News from the Republic of Letters, in the month of January 1687. This tract (105) is a solid confutation of a little book of the abbot de Cordemoi. The bishop of Meaux (106) forgot not this reproach against Luther; but see how Mr Bafnage answered him (107).

The advantages the Roman controversialists pretend to draw hence are, doubtless, imaginary; but there is no probable reason for taking this story of Martin Luther as a kind of figure or parable, as Mr Claude pretends. For Luther owns, in several places of his works, that he knows very well the devil's way of disputing; and that it had cost him many a bitter night: Multas noctes mihi satis amarulentas & acerbas reddere ille novit (108). He disputes, says he, with that force, that it is sudden death to a man; he believes this was the fate of Oecolampadius and Emserus. The only pleasure, according to him, that is found in these disputes, is, that the devil quickly dispatches them, and suffers them not to be spun out to any length, when he finds a man alone in his house. 'Diabolus sua argumenta fortiter figere & urgere novit. Voce quoque gravi & forti utitur. Nec longis & multis meditationibus disputationes ejusmodi transiguntur, sed momento uno & quellio & responso absolvitur. Sensi equidem & probe expertus sum, quam ob causam illud nonnunquam evenire soleat, ut sub auroram quidam mortui in stratis suis inveniantur. Corpus ille perimere vel jugulare potest: Nec id modò, verum & animam disputationibus suis ita urgere, & in angustum coarctare novit, ut in momento quoque illi excedendum sit, quo sanè me quoque non semel tantum non perpulsi . . . Credo equidem quod Emserus & Oecolampadius, alique horum similes, istiusmodi ignitis Satanæ telis & hastis confossi subitanè morte perierint. Nemo enim mortalium citrà singulare Dei auxilium ac robur illas sustinere & perferre potest.

VOL. III.

Jucundum equidem sese disputando præbet, scilicet. Brevibus enim transigit omnia, nec diu moras nectit, siquidem virum solitarium domi suæ invenerit (109).
— The devil knows how to urge and apply his arguments with great force. He uses a strong and grave voice: nor are such disputes transacted in long or many meditations; but in a moment the question and it's answer are dispatched. I know, and am well assured, that from this cause some have been found about break of day dead in their beds. For he is able to squeeze and strangle the body, and not so only, but in these disputes to press the soul and reduce it to such straits as in a moment to drive it out, to tobick extremity he has more than once reduced me . . . I verily believe that Emserus and Oecolampadius, and other such men struck by these fiery darts and javelins of Satan, have perished by a sudden death; for no mortal, without the singular aid and assistance of God, has strength to sustain and resist them. It is true his way of disputing is very agreeable; for it is short and not tedious, especially if he meets with a solitary man at home.' Add to this these words of Luther's seventh tome at page 230 of the Wittenberg edition. 'Urget (Satan) in immensum corda, nec desinit nisi repulsi verbo Dei: & ego plane persuasus sum, Emserum & Oecolampadium & similes, his ictibus horribilibus & quallionibus subito extinctos esse; nec enim humanum cor horrendum hunc & ineffabilem impetum, nisi Deus illi adit, perferre potest, &c. — Satan strongly urges the heart, nor desists unless repulsed by the word of God: and I am fully persuaded that Emserus and Oecolampadius and others have been suddenly destroyed by these horrible blows, neither can any human heart sustain these terrible and inexpressible attacks unless God assists it.' See the second edition of Mr Nicolle's Prejudices, page 366. It is pretended, that Luther said, that if the Sacramentarians understand not the scripture, it is because they do not dispute with the devil, the best opponent in the world: and that, without carrying him, hung about one's neck, as he had done, a man could be nothing more than a speculative Divine. 'Quod Sacramentarii (inquit Lutherus) sacram Scripturam non intelligunt, hæc causa est, quia verum opponentem, nempe diabolum non habent, qui demum bene docere eos solet. Subdit: Quando diabolum ejusmodi collo non habemus affixum, nihil nisi speculativi Theologi sumus (110). . . . Ego Diabolum intus & in cute novi, quippe quocum plus uno talis modio comederim (111). . . . Diabolus multo frequentius & propius mihi in lecto accubares solet, seu condormit, quam mea Catherina. Mecum in dormitorio deambulare solet. . . . Ego Diabolum collo meo affixum habui (112). — That the Sacramentarians, says Luther, do not understand the holy Scriptures, the true cause is this, because they have not the true antagonist, that is to say, the devil, who in the end is wont to teach them right. He adds, when we have not the devil thus hung about our neck, we are no more than speculative Divines. . . . I know the devil intimately, having eat more than one bushel of salt with him. . . . The devil much oftener sleeps with me, and lies nearer to me in bed than my Catherine. He uses to walk with me in my bed-chamber. . . . I have had the devil hung about my neck.' &c. Hence I conclude, that Mr Claude ought not to have suspected that this dispute of Luther was only a parable.

He has answered another objection of the author of the Prejudices, founded upon this, that Luther seems to have animated his self to slaughter. Mr Nicolle accuses him of it, but Mr Claude justifies him. I thought he had repelled another attack; to wit, that, founded on the famous words, Si nolit uxor, veniat ancilla; but having hastily run over his Defence of the Reformation, and the book of the Prejudices, I met with nothing relating to it. The bishop of Meaux has not omitted this reproach of the missionaries. His words are these: (113) I have always been afraid to speak of those inevitable necessities, which he discovered in the union of the two sexes, and of the scandalous sermon he preached at Wittenberg upon marriage: but since the sequel of this story has once obliged me to break through the restraint that modesty had imposed, I can no longer dissemble what is found printed in Luther's works. It is true then, that in a sermon that he preached at Wittemberg for the reformation of marriage, he was not ashamed to speak these infamous and scandalous words †: If they are so obstinate, he speaks of wives, it is fit their husbands should tell them, If you will not another will: If the mistress will not come, let the maid be called. . . . However, the husband ought first to bring his wife before the church, and admonish her two or three times; after that divorce her, and take Esther instead of Vahsti. The bishop of Meaux expresses himself thus in another place: Luther explained himself against monastic vows, in a terrible manner, so far as to say of that of continence (stop your ears, chaste souls) that it was as impossible to keep it, as to divest ones self of his sex ‡. It would put modesty out of countenance, should I repeat the words he uses, in several places upon this subject, and shew how he explains the impossibility of continence: I cannot imagine how he can reconcile this to that life, which he said he had led, without reproach, all the time of his celibacy, till he was forty five years old (114). He is accused of having preached, that it is lucky, if five maids, and as many men, be found in a whole city, who have preserved their chastity to twenty years of age; and that this would exceed the purity of the apostolic ages, and the ages of the martyrs; and that a man, who lives, without a wife, as much transcends the powers of nature, as if he lived without eating (115). These are things which we must not attempt to justify. They are excesses, and first motions, which Luther, doubtless, retracted before his death. What can be said more satirical against the laws canonical and civil, which force no body to marry, and which prohibit marrying any more than one wife? These principles of Luther are inconsistent with monogamy. I doubt not but these fallacies of his zeal, against monastic vows, gave grounds to the accusation that was formed against him. George duke of Saxony, complained, that so many adulteries had never been known, as since Luther's teaching that a woman, who conceived not by her husband, might apply to another man; and that if she happened to be pregnant, her husband was to take care of the child, whilst a husband, whose wife was barren, might use the same privilege. This prince charged this on Luther himself (116), in a letter he wrote to him in the year 1526. 'Quando tam numerosa perpetrata sunt adulteria quam postea quam tu scribere non dubitasti: si mulier è viro suo concipere nequeat, ut ad alium se transferat à quo possit concipere, & maritus prolem inde natam alere teneatur: Itidemque vir faciat (117). This was carrying the point higher than Lycurgus.

[X] A thousand fables have been invented concerning his death. Some have said, that he died a sudden death: others that he killed himself; others that the devil strangled him; others that his corps stunk so abominably, that they were forced to leave it in the way as they were carrying it to be interred. Nor are they people of mean figure and credit, who vent these calumnies, but the most famous writers; which reflects on the whole body of Popery; for such fables ought not to pass the press: the censors of books ought to expunge them, unless they saw them judicially proved. We shall see who these authors are, that have published these impertinences. Pontificii . . . asserunt mortem Lutheri fuisse malam & infelicem, sed de mortis genere non unam eandemque sœvent sententiam. Quidam contendunt, Lutherum sibi ipsi violentam manus intulisse, ita Lutheri avroxycepiay tribuit Thomas Bozius de Signis Eccles. Tom. 2. lib. 23. c. 8. Quam locum etiam adducit Cornelius à Lapide, qui ad cap. 2. post Epist. Petri scribit, Lutherum cum vespere laudæ canisset, noctu desperatione & furii Dæmonum actum sibi injecto laqueo necem intulisse, asseruit ejus famulus postea ad orthodoxam fidem conversus. Quidam calumniantur, Lutherum morte repentinâ obiisse. Ita Bellarminus, l. 4. de Eccles. c. 17. § Lutherus, ex Cochleæ de vita Lutheri hæc adducit: Lutherus morte repentinâ sublatu est. Nam cum vespere opiparam Cœnam sumisset, laetus & sanus, & facetiis suis omnes ad risum provocasset eadem nocte mortuus est. Quidam eo impudentiæ progrediuntur, ut eum à Cæcodæmone sublatum fuisse calumniantur. Ita Gulielmus Bessæus Jesuita Gallus in Concept. Theol. Sabbat. Post cineres, p. 102. de morte Lutheri disserit: Lutherus benè potus, & ci- bis distentus absque ullo Pietatis signo cubitum secidens apud inferos pernoctavit. Unde & Cœterus in venenato suo carmine de morte Lutheri ita canit:

Infelix ex alvo animam diffudit Arius:
Hunc sequeris nimio, vane Luthere, mero.

His omnibus pollicem premit Fabianus Justinianus, qui in Comment. in cap. VI. Tobie ita scribit: Ipsum Lutherum subitanè & improvisè morte à suo Cæcodæmone sublatum, peremptumque plurimi censent, quod vocati ad eum Medici morbum vel ignorare se faterentur, vel apoplexiam fingerent. . . . Extat historia de morte Lutheri à viris fide dignis, qui ipsi agonizanti adfuerunt, descripta videlicet à Justo Jona, Michaelæ Cælio, Johan. Mortuo Lutherò nondum quiescunt Pontificii, sed denuò fluctus irarum suarum evomunt, & cœno calumniæ post mortem ipsius corpus adspargunt. Fabulantur enim, corpus electi Dei organi ob intolerabilem sætorem in itinere fuisse relictum (118). — The Papists assert, that Luther died an ill and an unhappy death, but they do not agree about the manner of it. Some contend, that Luther laid violent hands upon himself; this was the opinion of Thomas Bozius, who, in support thereof, cites these words from Cornelius à Lapide. Luther, when he had supped heartily, being in the night pressed by despair, and diabolical fury, dispatched himself by the help of a rope, as is asserted by his servants, since converted to the orthodox Faith. Oberi, as Bellarmin, falsely suggests, that Luther died suddenly, for which he quotes a passage out of Cœlæus's Life of Luther, which runs thus: Luther was taken off by a sudden death, for having in the evening supped splendidly, and being merry in good health, and having made all the company laugh at his facetious stories, he the same night died. Again, some have impudently proceeded so far as to give out that he was taken away by the devil. Thus William Bessæus a French Jesuit writes, Luther having drank heartily, and being well stuffed with meat, without the least sign of piety, went to his bed, but passed the night in hell, with the devils. Hence Cœterus, in his envenomed poem, on the death of Luther, says,

As impious Arius, did his bowels void,
So Luther died with wine, and eating cloy'd.

Fabianus Justinian gives his approbation to all these stories in the following words: many are of opinion that Luther himself was taken away by a sudden and unprovided death by the agency of his own evil spirit, because the Physicians, when called to him either knew not what to make of his disease or pretended it was an apoplexy. . . . There is an account of Luther's death, by persons worthy of credit, and who were eye-witnesses thereof, such as Justus Jonas, Michael Cælius, John Aurisaber of Wiemar, who, before God, and in the presence of Christ, testify, that a true and faithful account of the death of Luther, is given in the eighth volume of his works, wherein the curious reader may be largely informed of that matter, as well as from Matthæus Sleidan, and Thuanus, a Roman Catholic. . . . All which lies of the Papists, concerning the death of Luther, may be easily disproved, and world [Z]. I have said nothing of his marriage, because I speak largely of it in another place [Z]. His greatest enemies cannot deny, but that he had eminent qualities, and history affords nothing more surprising than what he has done: for a simple Monk to be able to give Popery so rude a shock [AA], that there needed but such another intirely through down the throat of these calumniators: . . .

Even now that Luther is dead, the Papists cannot let him rest, but shew their hatred to him, and invent new lies concerning him. For they pretend, that the body of this chosen instrument of God, was left in the high way, because, of it's intolerable stench.

Some have published, that Luther died like Arius.

These are Simon Fontaine's words (119). 'Some Catholic's who had opportunities to know how the thing truly happened, have written, that, rising to ease nature, he fell down dead.' Father Maimbourg has rejected all these foolish stories, but he has been mistaken in a notable fact. 'The elector of Saxony, says he (120), caused his body to be conveyed with a most magnificent pomp to Wittemberg, where he erected for him a monument of white marble, surrounded with the statues of the twelve apostles, as if he had been the thirteenth, with respect to Germany.' Mr Seckendorf has shewn, that this monument, and these statues, are chimeras (121).

I shall here set down a passage of a Paris Divine, who reproached the Lutherans with acting contrary to their principles. 'They had always condemned, says he (122), the pomp with which the Catholics buried their dead in paying them the last honour of sepulture, blaming the sermons that were preached in honour of the deceased, and saying, that it were much better to have charitably bestowed on the poor what was thus spent in these funeral pomps and honours. On the whole, that it was all one, and equally Christian, to be buried in a dunghill and without tapers, as to be deposited in holy ground, with all this pomp. If what they said was before true, why did they employ such expence and cost to lay their Luther in his grave? Why did they not give this money to the poor, which was spent in conducting him from Illeben to Wittemberg? Which could not be done for a small sum. Why did they not bury him in a dunghill, where he might have rotted as well as at Wittemberg? In short, if this veneration is condemned by the holy scriptures (as they falsely think) why have they used it? It is certain that they who reform do not always consider, that there are some abuses, which should not be spoken against for fear of condemning themselves beforehand; these being things into which people quickly relapse.

[Y] Nor did they forbear publishing lies, upon this subject, till he had left this world.] A pamphlet was published at Naples, and in other places; the substance whereof was this. Luther, being dangerously sick, desired to communicate, and died as soon as he had received the viaticum. As he was dying, he desired that his body might be laid upon the altar to be adored; but that request being neglected, he was buried. There arose a furious tempest at his interment as if the end of the world was at hand. The terror was universal. They who lifted up their eyes to heaven, perceived, that the host, which the deceased had presumed to take, was suspended in the air. It was gathered up with great veneration, and laid in a sacred place, and the tempest ceased. It returned the night following with still greater fury, and filled all the town with consternation. The next day Luther's sepulchre was opened, and found empty, and a sulphureous stench proceeded from it, which no body could bear. The assistants fell sick of it, and many of them repented, and returned into the pale of the Catholic church (123). This pamphlet was written in Italian, and it was said in it, with an air of triumph, that it contained a miracle in honour of Jesus Christ, for the terror of the wicked, and the consolation of good people; and that this event was known by letters from the French ambassador (124). Luther, having read this pamphlet the twenty-first of March 1545, caused it to be printed, and added a postscript to it. Some Roman Catholics, being ashamed of this imposture, endeavoured to ward off the infamy, by another fraud. They endeavoured to persuade the world, that Luther, or some of his friends, were the authors of this romance; but there are very authentic proofs to the contrary. 'Fuerunt

ex adversa parte, quos protervi figmenti puduit, & ideo inventorem ejus ipsum Lutherum sublituere voluerunt, vel aliquem ex suis; impudenter utique & vene. Extant enim . . . literæ Landgravi ad electorem Saxonie d. 12. Mart. authenticæ, in quibus ei relationem istam italicam misit, significans, se eam ab Augustano quodam, cujus literas etiam adjunxit, accepisse, ex quibus percipitur typis exculam schedam illum Neapoli & multis aliis locis fuisse (125). What a scandal is it to those who understand the nature of scandal, to find such effects of a false zeal for religion?

[Z] I speak largely of Luther's marriage in another place.] To wit, in the article BORE. I have but one observation more to make, and it is designed for the correcting a fault of the famous Joseph Hall, bishop of Exeter. He says, that a malicious apostate affirms, that 'Luther had been the day before a monk, the next day betrothed, the day after a husband, and the next day after a father (126). My informer (127), continues he, maintains this last by the testimony of Erasmus +, who, in one of his letters to his friend, Daniel Mauchius of Ulm, mentions the same story more at large. Pray, reader, look over all this vast volume of Erasmus's Epistles, Refut. p. 28, 29. and if there be no such person, (as indeed there is none) nor any such letter; judge you what we are to think of the veracity of these people.' He is to blame to censure the person, who alleged Erasmus's testimony; and he would not have censured him, if he had known what is found in the 278th page of Chytraeus's annals. We there find that Luther's adversaries alleged a certain letter of Erasmus (128), not printed; wherein he makes mention of the too hally lying-in of Luther's wife (129). So that Joseph Hall ought not to have insisted on this Letter's not appearing in the vast volume of Erasmus's letters. If he had treated it as a forgery, he had been much to blame. See above (130) the same fact, in another letter of this author. That which might be very justly said, is, that Erasmus had acknowledged the falsity of this news (131). From hence we may learn how hard a task it is to confute a man on matters of fact: for we must know almost an infinite number of them to oppose with safety any thing that an adversary affirms or denies.

[AA] We cannot sufficiently admire that a simple monk should be able to give Popery so rude a shock.] How many states and nations did he induce, in a little time, to separate from the Romish communion? This was represented very happily, though in somewhat a burlesque manner on a piece of tapestry. Read this passage, taken from a letter of Coltar. 'The last time the king was at Chalons, a very rich piece of tapestry was hung in his chamber, which came from the late queen of Navarre; in which were represented Luther and Calvin, who gave the Pope a clyster, which put the good man into such commotion, that he was seen in another place taken with a great vomiting and looseness, and evacuating abundance of kingdoms and sovereignties, Denmark, Sweden, the duchy of Saxony, &c.' Wickliff, John Hufe, and several others had attempted the same thing, but did not succeed. This was, you will say, because they were not favoured with a concurrence of circumstances: they had no less merit nor abilities than Luther; but they undertook the cure of the disease before the crisis; and, as we may say, in the increase of the moon. Luther, on the contrary, attacked it at a critical time, when it was arrived to the highest pitch; when it was impossible it should grow worse; and therefore, according to the course of nature, must either cease or diminish: for when things are arrived to the highest point of their ascension, they commonly begin to decline (132). He followed in the full moon, when the wane was just drawing on: he had the same good fortune, as those remedies have which are employed last, and which carry away the glory of the cure, because applied, when to over-throw the Romish church, is what we cannot sufficiently admire. Some attribute the revolution, brought about by his ministry, to certain positions of the stars [BB]. It is not true, as some affirm, that his enterprize has inspired several people with a contempt for the Christian religion [CC]. He, who would be thoroughly acquainted with the history when the distemper has discharged its malignity. You may, if you please, add, that the concurrence of Francis I. and Charles V. was fatal in this affair. I answer, that all this notwithstanding, there must have been eminent gifts in Luther to produce such a revolution as he has done. Here is an excellent thought (137) Jovius, Hist. lib. xiii, fol. m. 239, vers.

[BB] Some attribute the revolution brought about by his ministry, to certain positions of the stars. Paul Jovius goes so much into this profane thought, as to impute to a malignant constellation, not only what happened in Germany, by means of Luther, but also the conversion of the Indians in the east and west: and when he considers, that the faith of people changed almost at the same time, in the four parts of the world, some embracing Mahometism others Christianity, and others Lutheranism, he cannot believe but the influences of the stars had brought this about by their occult and pernicious qualities. 'Nec multo post exarsit in Germania, says he (137), aethere Luthero dira hæresis, quæ populis, ut in perfide acciderat, ad insaniam versis, Christiani dogmatis placita, & veteris sacrorum ritus vehementissimè conturbavit. Ita ut facillè crediderim ab ocula cæli potestate, malignoque syderum concursu provenisse, ut religiones toto terrarum orbe enatis factionibus uno tempore scinderentur, quando non Mahometani modo Christianique, sed & remotissimæ gentes idololatræ, aut sydera aut portenta pro Diis venerantes, cum in India quæ ad Orientem vergit, tum in Novo orbe ad Occiduum plagam reperto, novas sacrorum opiniones induerint.' Florimond de Remond seems to applaud this notion: he gives it in French, and complains of a Protestant translator, who had omitted that passage. 'Almost at the same time, says Jovius, that Ismael seized upon the empire of the Persians, and changed the religion, blending it with the new Mahometan superstition, there arose in Germany, under Luther's authority, that monstrous Heresy, which endeavoured to destroy the Catholic religion, and all that antiquity had received; as the people, enraged and bigotted with their new follies and superstitions, had done in Persia: by which means, says he, I willingly admit, that, by a secret power of heaven, and a malignant influence of the stars, all the religions in the universe began to change; since not only Mahometans, but also Christians, nay idolatrous nations, the most remote, who worshipped idols, both in the East-Indies and in the new world towards the West, fell into new religions and opinions at the same time. This is what the Latin of Jovius says. But in his French translation, the reformed sincerity, the scrupulous conscience of his translator is remarkable, who passes over all that Jovius says of this change of religions, and this monstrous Lutheran Heresy sprung up in Saxony: this grieved him at the heart. With what fidelity do they handle holy and sacred books, when they thus impudently mutilate the present History

rians to suppress a sentence relating to Luther (138). The delicacy of such translators cannot be approved. If there be zeal in their conduct, it is a zeal to blind, so superstitious, so mean and childish, that it deserves to be given up to their adversaries indignation. Note, that Lipsius attributed also to the stars the fondness of the XVIth century for disputes in religion (139). Fatalis ista est ingeniorum scabies, ut omnes disputare malint, quam vivere... (140). Ita loquor, quia velut à carlo, & ut dixerim, astro aliquo est hæc pestis. Atque ut corporum quidam morbi certis temporibus interveniunt: sic nunc iste animorum. Viri, femine, senes, pueri, quæstionibus ludunt & lascivunt: eoque ventum, ut pro parum sano sit, qui non sic insanit. Myserum Theologia erat, facta est popularis oblectamentum. He pretends, that the soul is subject, as the body, to some distempers, which return from time to time; and he reckons, in the number of these diseases of the soul, the spirit of disputing, and the change of religion, which reigned at that time. He relates a passage of Nicephorus Gregoras, containing a description of the like state. All places rang with Theological disputes; even they who knew not what was to be believed, nor what they themselves pretended to believe, talked of nothing, but of Theology, in the markets and theatres (141). Vis imaginem clarum horum temporum? Nicephori Gregoræ ista lege. * Apud nos etiam opificibus effusa sunt arcana Theologiæ, atque ita omnes inhiant ratiocinationibus & sermonibus syllogisticis, ut herbæ & pascuis armenta. Et illi, qui de rebus fide ambigui sunt, & qui nec quomodo credendum sit sciunt, nec quid sit illud quod credere se dicunt; illi inquam & fora & porticus & theatra omnia Theologiæ compleverunt. Without recurring to constellations, the ordinary sanctuary of ignorance, second causes might have been discovered on earth, which God made use of to effect the change that happened in Germany in the XVIth century.

[CC] It is not true... that his enterprize has inspired several people with contempt of the Christian religion.] If Coëffeteau had said, that Luther made a

abundance of people damn themselves by the profession of Heresy, he would have spoken according to his prejudices, and we should have pardoned him; but this is not the evil he deplors. Let us hear him. 'Mean time, says he (142), instead of representing to us here the fallies of this furious spirit of Luther, whose insolence has displeased the Calvinists themselves, the Sieur du Plessis, ought to have meditated on the horror of his crime, and represented to himself the great loss of souls, with which he is chargeable before God and his angels, for having been the author of all the disputes that are arisen in Christendom. God ordained in the antient law , that if it happened, that any having a controversy with another, should strike a woman with child, so as to destroy her fruit, his life should go for the life of the child. What then will the divine justice appoint against those, who, by their ambition, and by the disputes, which they have excited in the church, have occasioned the death of so many millions of souls, who are disgusted at the Christian religion, to see those, who profess themselves ministers of it, so ill agreed upon the principal points of the holy Gospel.' We may affirm, that the number of those who were lukewarm, indifferent, or disgusted with Christianity, diminished much more than it increased by the disturbances Europe felt on occasion of Luther. Every one chose his side with warmth; some remained in the Romish communion, others embraced the Protestant: the former conceived a greater zeal for their religion than they had before; the later had an ardent zeal for their new belief. No body can show those who, as Coëffeteau says, rejected Christianity, upon account of so many disputes. Had he said, that the divisions of Christians, and their conduct towards one another, after having formed themselves into sects, are most proper to bring the gospel into discredit, and the people into unbelief, I should have agreed with him; but he must have supposed, at the same time, a thing which very few practise. He must have supposed, that there are a great many without double weights; that is, who examine history of this great man need only read Mr de Seckendorf's large volume (c). It is, in its kind, one of the best books that have appeared for a long time. I should advise him also to read the Lutherus Defensus of a Hamburg minister (d); for there all the personal reproaches are answered.

I was amazed to find, that cardinal du Perron durst say, that Luther believed the mortality of the soul [DD]. Should Francis Garasse vent a thousand such calumnies (e), I should not wonder at it; and if I had found it in Luther's life, published at Paris in 1577, by the Monk Noel Talepied (f), or in Nicole Grenier's book, of which we shall see a long passage below [EE], or in the books of such like writers, who have no reputation to lose, I should not have been surprized: but I could not but think it strange, that a cardinal, of so great a name, should be guilty of so much rashness. The curious will not be displeased to hear of a small ruffle which was given Mr Arnauld on occasion examine, without prejudice, what happens at home and abroad. But where are these to be met with? Where are those, who, by the force of custom, do not judge the same things to be most just, when they make others suffer them, and most unjust when they suffer them themselves? In such a disposition as this there is no danger that the multiplicity of sects should create many Sceptics: let what will happen, every one will stick fast by the party he has chosen. The anti-peristasis, which the new Philosophers have banished from nature, takes place in religion. Zeal cools, when we are not taken notice of, nor surrounded with another sect, and rekindles when we are. We may here apply the verses that were made upon Menelaus (143), and say, that Coëffeteau has mistaken the matter: he has taken that for a real fact, which must happen only in case men reasoned after a certain manner.

[DD] I was amazed to find that cardinal Perron durst say, that Luther believed the mortality of the soul. See in what words he affirms it (144): 'Luther denied the immortality of the soul, and said, that it died with the body; and that God afterwards raised both again: so that, in his opinion, no one enjoyed the visible presence of God; whence he drew an argument against praying to saints, shewing, that the saints hear not our prayers. The church believes that the souls of the saints, and of the blessed enjoy the presence of God as soon as they are dead; and Luther reckons this among the impieties of the Romish church, that she believes the immortality of the soul.' You see he is not charged with absolutely denying the punishments and rewards of another life, but only with deferring them, till after the final resurrection of all men. This is lessening very much the heinousness of the accusation, which others had brought against him; but this is not avoiding the crime of lying and slandering. It is a common saying, that all romances are founded upon some history: I have therefore suspected, that cardinal du Perron built this fable upon some words of Luther, ill understood, and found in quotations; and I, having not the leisure to turn over all the great volumes of this minister, have consulted a Divine of the Confession of Augsburg, and desired him to inform me if there were any pretext that could occasion this cardinal's speaking thus. The substance of the answer, he was pleased to make me, is as follows: Luther never taught that the soul died with the body, and was to rise again with the body. It can never be proved by his works that he was of this opinion; and he has very clearly shewn, that he believed quite contrary. Consult what he has written upon the eighth verse of the fourth chapter of Genesis, where he speaks of the death of Abel. The origin of the calumny is in a letter he writ to Amldorf in the year 1522; in which he appears much inclined to believe, that the souls of the just sleep to the day of judgment, without knowing where they are, &c. He does not pretend to say, that they are dead in this interval, but only lay in a profound rest and sleep; in which opinion he followed many fathers of the ancient church. He rectified his opinion, in process of time; and though he seems in his later writings to attribute rest to the souls of the predestinate, he does not mean thereby a rest which is a profound sleep, and deprives them of the vision and conversation of God and the Angels. See his commentary upon the twenty fourth chapter of Genesis, where he speaks very largely of the state of souls departed.

[EE] In Nicole Grenier's book, whereof we shall see a long passage. This book is intitled, The Shield of Faith, by way of dialogue, extracted from the holy Scriptures, and holy Fathers, and most ancient doctors of the church. The author, a regular canon of St Victor, dedicated it to Henry II. I cannot tell in what year he published it the first time. La Croix du Maine, and du Verdier Vau-Privas, mention only the edition of Paris 1566, and 1567. They say nothing of that of Avignon 1549, which I use, and which is not the first; for the title imports, that the book was revised and enlarged by the author. The edition mentioned by du Verdier Vau-Privas contains an apology against the Lutheran bound, which attempted to gnaw the Shield of Faith. I suppose he means Bartholomew Causse, minister of Geneva, author of a book intitled, The true Shield of the Christian Faith; in several dialogues, demonstrating, from holy Scripture, the errors and false allegations of a book intitled, The Shield of Faith; formerly written by a monk of St Victor at Paris, calling himself the Bienallant (well-going). My edition is of Geneva 1563, revised and very much enlarged. Let this be said in favour of Bibliographers. Let us now come to the point, and relate what the canon of St Victor says of Luther. 'Luther's ambition, and desire of glory and honour, was so great, that, tho' he was but a meer Presbyter, and an Augustine, an Apostate, and an uncowed Monk, yet he took upon him the episcopal office and dignity. For being once in the city of Lisbon (145), he presumed to ordain two presbyters in St Andrew's church, imposing hands upon them, and singing the anthem Veni Sancte Spiritus. Moreover he caused himself to be carried in a pompous chariot, or litter, as a great prince, surrounded and attended with gentlemen and guards. And, in his entry into towns, there were volleys of shot, and firing of cannons. This was not imitating Jesus Christ, his Apostles, and the holy Doctors of the church, who, by their preaching and example recommended humility and simplicity. Very different is the life of true Christians, and heretical Antichrists. The Life of the Apostles, and holy Doctors of the church was humble, sober, chaste, modest, and devout: but the life of the false Doctor and Apostate, Luther, was proud, gluttonous, lascivious, infamous, and sensual: for it is notorious and evident to all, that, having violated his religious vows, and ecclesiastical continence, he took for his wife, or whore, a nun, by whom he had three bastards and illegitimates. His gluttony was the cause of his great incontinence; for, as St Jerome says, Venter mero effluens, facile despumat in libidinem. The scum of lust easily rises in a stomach boiling with wine. And, to speak the truth, Luther ought rather to be called the prince and doctor of drunkards and gluttons, than of Saxons and Germans. He was a second Epicurus, or Sardanapalus, since it is commonly said of him, that, at every dinner and supper, he drank two gallons of luscious rich wine; and eat of the most exquisite and delicate dishes; which he continued to the last: for he died suddenly, full glutted, after having supped plentifully, and stuffed his paunch. But let us leave this wretch (146). It is for the interest of the Lutherans, and all Protestants in general, to re-publish the fabulous impertinences their adversaries published against the reformers of the XVIth century. They shew, that they were wholly conducted by a blind prejudice; a prejudice which is to their reproach and disadvantage. Here you have a canon of St Victor of so little judgment, as to employ an objection, which overthrows Pope, cardinals, and all the prelacy, whose train and pompous equipages are diametrically opposite to the life of the Apostles.

(145) The author, if I mistake not, would say Lieben, but by an inexcusable negligence, he did not well inform himself of the true names of towns, and fell into a ridiculous mistake, there being in Portugal the city of Lisbon, where Luther never was.

of a citation from Luther [FF]. It was impossible for him to verify it by the original books. This leads me to make this observation, that nothing would be more convenient for those who are accused of mis-quoting this reformer, than the liberty of the most curious library of prince Rodolphus Augustus, duke of Brunswick [GG]. Luther's life, in medals (g), published in the year 1699, contains an infinite number of particulars (b), and points out an infinite number of authors, who have spoken of this illustrious person. We find, in the Preface to the reader, a list of all those who have composed either his elegy or his history. We there likewise find a confutation of the falsehoods of an anonymous author, whose dialogues were printed in the year 1694, with the title of Lucien en belle humeur. I only mention this circumstance to have an opportunity of saying, that there is no ground to think, that Mr Fontenelle is the author of these dialogues (i). They might positively affirm, that he is not; and that he is not capable of so imperfect a performance. In the Vatican library at Rome is shewn (k) a Bible, which is said to be of Luther's translating, and written with his own Hand. But this is not probable, considering the extravagant prayer (l) at the end of it, and which appears to be of the same hand with the rest. Whilst the troops of Charles V quartered at Wittemberg in the year 1547, a foldier gave Martin Luther's effigies in the church of the castle two stabs with his dagger (m). The emperor did a very generous action at that time: He would not suffer the tomb of this pretended heresiarch to be demolished; and he forbid the attempting any thing of that nature upon pain of death [HH]. Luther had made a great progress in scholastic learning, and had even followed the sect of the Nominals; which spun the thread finest in all abstract questions; yet no one inveighed so much as he against the method of philosophizing used at that time; nor was any man more vehemently bent against the great Aristotle. You will see the proofs of this in the extracts I shall give of an invective of Father Gretser [II], where the Jesuit endeavours to make out [FF] A small ruffe was given Mr Arnould, on occasion of a citation from Luther. Mr le Fevre, doctor of Divinity, of the Faculty of Paris, has published what follows, in a book printed at the Hague (147) in 1685. Does not he remember, says he (148), speaking of Mr Arnould, that about four years ago, a minister having writ to him, that he had falsely cited some passages from Luther to shew that he denied the necessity of good works, and amongst others this; let us beware of sin; but, above all, let us beware of the law and good works, and fix only on the promise of God and faith; words which he cited as from a sermon of Luther, upon a text in the New Testament; he found himself obliged to take the trouble of searching for this passage in all the works of Luther that were to be met with at Paris, and not finding it could give no other answer to the minister, who had writ to him, than confessing he had taken, this passage from Bellarmine, and at the same time insisting on this cardinal's fidelity.

[GG] The most curious library of prince Rodolphus Augustus, duke of Brunswick. This prince, who has joined the love of letters, to all other qualities worthy his illustrious family, was not satisfied with the magnificent library of Wolfenbuttle; he set up another private one, which he stored with a very great number of scarce books. Here we find all the writings that Luther published from the year 1517 to his death: the editions, I say, which he published and corrected himself, and which are preferable to the original manuscripts, because in revising the proofs he corrected many things that had escaped him. It is a much safer way to have recourse to these editions, than to those, in which all his works have been reduced into a body; for they who collected them took the liberty to mend, and change, what they thought fit (149): and this is, doubtless, the reason why the citations from Luther, upon which any controversy arises, are so hard to be verified. We can hardly have any recourse now, except to the volumes in folio published since his death. The compleat editions of all his works have caused the particular editions of his tracts to be neglected; and hereby almost all the copies of these particular editions are lost, which is a misfortune. 'Libelli à Luthero ipso editi diligentius quam factum est, assertari debuerunt, non tantum, quod commodius legi poterant, quam in magnis, in quos, postmodum redacti sunt, voluminibus, sed & quia genuini & ab interpolatione aut incuria, quæ compilatoribus tomorum dudum imputata est, securi erant (150).' The prince I speak of, employed a Professor of Helmstadt (151) to publish an account of his library. See the book intitled, Antiqua Literarum monumenta, autographa Lutheri aliorumque celeberrimorum virorum ab an. 1517, usque ad annum 1546 reformationis ætatem & historiam egregie illustrantia, &c. The first tome of it was printed at Brunswic, in 1690 (152), and the second in 1691 (153). The overseers even of public libraries, which are the best endowed, sometimes use a blamable economy. They part with the particular tracts, when they have once all the works of an author reduced into a body: And thus it comes to pass, that there is no verifying from these great libraries, whether an author, who has cited passages, from the first editions, which differ from the latter, hath acted sincerely.

[HH] Charles V would not suffer Luther's tomb to be demolished, and forbade the attempting any thing of that nature upon pain of death. The Spaniards earnestly solicited him to pull it down, and even desired his bones should be dug up and burnt: But the Emperor very wisely answered, I have nothing farther to do with Luther; he has henceforth another judge, whose jurisdiction it is not lawful for me to usurp: Know that I make war, not with the dead, but with the living, who still make war against me. 'Violari autem sepulchrum vetuit Carolus V, Imperator, Witebergam expugnatam armis minisque ingressus, contra quam urgebant Hispani omnes, eo uique insensu, Luthero, ut & ossibus ejus invaderent quietem, eaque perinde, ut hussio factum fuerat vivo, mallet cremari; quos laudatissimus tamen Imperator gravissimo sermone castigavit, quando dixit: Nihil mihi ultra cum Luthero, alium ille judicem jam habet, cujus Jurisdictionem invadere nostrum non est, neque mihi cum mortuis bellum esse sciatis, sed cum superstitionibus in nos armatis. Cumque animadvertisset, Hispanos duci Albano & Episcopo Atrebatensi, suadentibus ejus Indignitatem facti, consentire, severe tandem atque etiam vitæ capitique periculo sanxit, inviolatum Lutheri sepulchrum ut esset (154).'

[II] The extracts I shall give of an invective of Father Gretser. I do not believe I am mistaken in ascribing to him the harangues (155) which were pronounced in the academy of Ingolstadt, the 14th of November 1606, when he presented two licentiates in Divinity for their degrees. One of them made a long declamation, intitled, Utrum Lutherus fuerit Scholasticus Theologus, wherein he undertook to prove the negative, and something more. 'Lutherum non modo non fuisse Theologum Scholasticum, sed omnium subtiliorum scientiarum hostem & calumniatorem impudentissimum. — Luther was not only no scholastic Divine, but also an outrageous enemy, and calumniator of all kinds of subtle science.' The proof of the first part of this thesis was reduced to a syllogism, which the candidate pronounced with a very audible voice; 'Utrum, scilicet de (156), rem ipsam statim, cunctis ambagibus omittis aggrediar, elata voce proclamo; Scholasticus non est, qui crassissimos, stupidissimos, & ut sic appellem, decumanos, prorsusque asinos contra Theologum & Philosophum out this proposition, Luther does not understand scholastic Divinity. One of the arguments made use of to prove this, is his teaching that one and the same doctrine is false and true at *Philosophiam, commisit errores. Lutherus tales errores commisit; non est igitur Lutherus Scholasticus. — But that without dwelling on unnecessary circumstances, I may come to the point itself, I, with a loud voice, proclaim, He is no scholastic, who commits, gross, stupid, and, if I may so call them, alike errors, against the principles of Divinity and Philosophy. Luther hath committed such errors; therefore Luther is no schoolman.' He afterwards went upon the proof of the minor, for the major was self-evident. He had already observed, that Luther boasts of a thorough knowledge of all the secrets of the nicest school-divinity; and that Melancthon hereupon has belittled great encomiums on him (157). 'Lutherus non semel testatur, omnia Scholasticæ Theologiæ mysteria sibi probè esse cognita: omnia adyta perlustrata: omnes excusos angulos. Credatis fortiter Magistrum nostrum eximium (sic loquitur Lutherus Doctores Lovanienses & Colonienfes compellens). Lutherus esse notam Philosophiam & Theologiam vestram, in qua non pessimo ingenio, nec ultima scordia versatus sit plus duodecim annis, interque Symplesitras vestros detritus. Et ne ignoraremus in quam Scholasticæ Theologiæ familiam nomen dederit, alibi nobis exponit cum dicit, se se Occami castra secutum; cujus sectatores, tempore Lutheri, vulgò TERMINISTÆ audiebant. longæque ac latè in scholis regnabant, teste ipso Lutheri: qui palam scribit: se se Occanicæ seu Modernorum sectæ placita & dogmata non tantum a limine salutasse, aut primoribus labris solummodò degustasse: sed penitus imbibita tenere; his enim verbis suam in Scholasticæ Theologia peritiam decantat Lutherus: de qua etiam perpetuus Lutheri encomiastes Melancthon: Gabrielis & Cameracensis (duos insignes ex Occami gymnasio Theologos) pœne ad verbum memoriter recitare poterat Lutherus. Diu multumque legit scripta Occami. Hujus acumen præferbat Thomæ & Scoti. — Luther has more than once affirmed, that all the mysteries of scholastic Divinity were well known to him, that he had searched its most hidden parts, and had penetrated even its obscurest corners. You may safely believe, most excellent masters, (these are the words of Luther to the doctors of Louvain and Cologne) that your Philosophy and Divinity is well known to Luther, in which, neither with the dullest wit, nor with the least pains, he, for twelve years together, contended with your champions. And that we may not be ignorant of what tribe of the scholastic Divines he was, he elsewhere informs us, that he fought under the banner of Occam, whose followers, in the time of Luther, were commonly called Terminists, who then reigned in the schools, as Luther himself witnesses, and declares, that he had not only some knowledge of the doctrine of Occam, but understood it perfectly; for these are Luther's own words, in which he sets out his great skill in scholastic Divinity. To the same purpose Melancthon, the constant panegyrist of Luther, says, that Luther could almost repeat word for word the writings of Gabriel and Cameracensis, (two famous Divines in the school of Occam) and that he had studied, with great assiduity, the works of Occam, and preferred the penetration of this doctor to that of Thomas Aquinas, and Scotus.' The first proof of the minor is taken from Luther's having maintained, that this proposition, The word was made flesh, is true in Divinity, and absolutely impossible and absurd in Philosophy. 'Omne verum vero consonat. Tamen idem non est verum in diversis professionibus. In Theologia verum est, Verbum esse carnem factum. In Philosophia simpliciter impossibile & absurdum (158).*

— Truth is always consonant to truth, but the same thing is not true in different sciences. In Theology, it is true, the word was made flesh; in Philosophy, it is impossible and absurd. The author displays here the common distinction of Divines, to maintain, that the philosophical arguments, which Luther alleges do not oppugn the mystery of the Trinity and Incarnation; and adds, 'Simili soliditate dicit (Lutherus) Syllogismus prædictus non esse malos vitio formæ syllogisticæ; sed virtute & majestate materiæ, quæ in angustias rationis seu syllogismorum includi non possit. Quasi verò nullus syllogismus & forma & materia probus formari queat de re Cœlesti & Theologica; & divinitus nobis revelata (159). — With like stupidity (159) Id. ibid. he (Luther) affirms, such syllogisms are not bad thro' any defect in the syllogistic form, but because of the excellency and majesty of the matter, which cannot be pent up within the narrow bounds of reason or syllogism. As if no syllogism, regular both in form and matter, could be framed with respect to heavenly and theological matters, or such as have been communicated to us by divine revelation. He forgets not that maxim of Luther, That Divinity clashes with the rules of Philosophy; but that Philosophy, in its turn, clashes much more with the rules of Divinity: 'Impingit Theologia in Philosophiæ regulas, inquit Lutherus, sed ipsa vicissim magis in Theologiæ regulas (160)!' He takes notice of Luther's indignation at the Sorbonne, which had defined, that what was true in Philosophy, was also true in Divinity; and he declares, he must be a beast, who disapproves this determination. 'Vehementissimè stomachatur scholasticus noster in Parisiensem Theologorum Scholam, quam Sorbonam vocant. Qua de causâ? Sorbona, mater errorum, pessimè definiit, idem esse verum in Philosophiâ & Theologia. Non tantum Sorbona optimè & sanctissimè hoc definiit; sed & Concilium Lateranense sub Leone X. Et certe tam est hoc evidens, ut fungum esse oporteat, qui dissentiat: Nam ut album est album, ubicunque ponatur; & aqua est aqua, ubicunque collocetur; ita & verum est verum ubicunque constituitur, five in Theologia, five in Philosophia (161). — Our schoolman most virulently (161) Id. ib. pag. 159.

rails against that college of Divines in Paris, called the Sorbon: For what reason? Why, this Sorbon, the mother of errors, has foolishly determined, that the same thing is true in both Philosophy and Divinity. Not only the Sorbon has wisely and religiously determined this, but also the Lateran council, under Leo X. Nay, it is so evident, that a man must be a very blockhead who denies it; for as white is white, wherever it be placed; and water is water wherever it is found; so truth is truth wherever it is established, whether in Divinity or Philosophy. What the censor affirms, concerning the doctrine itself, I think unquestionable (162); but he is to blame to look upon the contrary opinion, as stupidity of mind; for there have been very subtle and sagacious Divines (163), who maintained Luther's notion in this matter. Here follows a long scroll of reproaches against Aristotle (166). 'Nisi caro fuisset Aristoteles, inquit Lutherus (†), vere diabolus cum fuisset, non pueret asserere. Eidem Luthero est Aristoteles, Proteus, histrio, qui Græca larva Ecclesiam lufit, vaserimus ingeniorum illufor, calumniosissimus calumniator, fycophanta impiissimus, princeps tenebrarum, triceps Cerberus, tricolor Geryon, vere ἀπολλων, ‡ id est, perdens, & vassator Ecclesie; metus logodædalus, & logomachus, vassator piæ doctrinæ, bestia, caligo hominum, & quidem teterrima. Momus, imo Momus Momorum †. Bestia gentilis similis hydrae in Lerna. In quo fere nihil est Philosophiæ. Impiissimus est. Publicus veritatis, & ex professo hostis. Gentilis animarum carnifex. Hircus, vel potius hircocervus. Bis sacerimus Aristoteles. In cute perfectus Epicurus. Non mihi persuadebitis, inquit Lutherus, Philosophiam esse garrulitatem illam de materia, motu, infinito, loco, vacuo, tempore, quæ fere in Aristotele sola discimus: talia quæ nec intellectum, nec affectum, nec communes hominum mores quidquam juvent: tantum contentionibus serendis, seminandisque idonea. Quod si maxime quid valeret, tot tamen opinionibus confusa sunt, ut, quo quis certius aliquid sequi proposuerit, hoc incertior feratur, & faces Euboicas seclatur; & serò tandem cum Proteo sibi fuisset negotium, peniteat. — If Aristotle had not been flesh, says Luther, I should make no difficulty to affirm, that he was a true devil. To the same Luther, Aristotle appeared a Proteus, a Buffoon, who, in a Greek mask, deceived the church; a crafty deluder of minds, a most outrageous calumniator, a most impious fycophant, a prince of darkness, a three headed Cerberus, a three bodied Geryon, a true Apollon, that is, destroyer, and spoiler, of the church, a very juggler in words, a prater, a subverter of pious doctrine, a beast, and a most terrible deceiver of men, a Momus, yea, the Momus of Momus's, a beaaten brute, like the hydra in Lerna, in whom there is hardly any thing of Philosophy, a most impious person, a public and professed enemy of truth, a beaaten murderer of souls, a buck goat, doubly wicked Aristotle, a perfect Epicure. You shall never persuade me, says Luther, that Philosophy consists in prating about matter, motion, infinite, space, void, time, which are almost the only things we learn in Aristotle, which neither improve the understanding, nor the inclinations, or common manners of men, serving only to sow and nourish contentions: which granting them to be necessary, yet the many opinions about them are so confused, that whoever proposes to attain certainty by pursuing them, becomes but the more uncertain, following an Eubæan torch, and repenting, at last, that ever he had any thing to do with this Proteus.' It cannot be said, that he was so incensed against the head of the Peripatetics, only after he had quarelled with Popery; for it may be proved, that he was of the same mind before he had done any thing to displease the court of Rome. Read this passage of Gretser: 'Neque unquam bene erga Aristotelem affectus fuit; quod discis ex his, quæ anno Domini 1516, ad Langum Augustinianum prius scripsit, quàm aperte infaniret * : Mitto has literas ad eximium D. Jodocum Isenacensem, plenas quæstionum adversus Logicam, & Philosophiam, & Theologiam, id est, blasphemiarum, & maledictionum contra Aristotelem, Porphyrium, Sententiariorum, perditæ scilicet studii nostri saculi. Sic enim interpretabantur, quibus decretum est, non quinquennio cum Pythagorice, sed perpetuò, & in æternum cum mortuis silentium tenere, omnia credere, semper auscultare, nec unquam saltem levi præludio contra Aristotelem, & Sententias velitari, & mystificare. Quid enim non credant, qui Aristoteli crediderunt, vera esse, quæ ipse calumniosissimus calumniator aliis affingit & imponit tam absurda, ut asinus (Lutherus) & lapis non possint tacere ad illa? Nihil ita ardet animus, quàm distrionem illam (Aristotelem) qui tam vera Græca larva Ecclesiam lufit, multis revelare, ignominiamque ejus cunctis ostendere, si ocium esset. Habeo in manus commentarios in 1. Physicorum, quibus fabulam Aristei denud agere statui in meum ipsum Protea (Aristotelem). Pars crucis meæ vel maxima est, quod videre cogor fratrum optima ingenia, bonis studiis nata, in istis cænis vitam agere, & operam perdere (167). — Neither was (167) Gretser. he ever well affected to Aristotle, as you may see ibid. pag. 44. from what he wrote in the year 1516, to Langus Augustinianus, before he publicly shewed his folly. I send these letters to the illustrious Jodocus of Isenach, full of objections against Logic, Philosophy, and Divinity, that is, of blasphemies and curses against Aristotle, Porphyry, the Sententiariorum, those destructive studies of our age: for so they will determine, to whom not only a Pythagorean silence of five years, but even a perpetual and everlasting one, like that of the dead, is enjoined, and to bear, and believe, without daring so much as to whisper, or hint the least doubt of what is delivered by Aristotle, or in the sentences. What will they not believe, who believe Aristotle a most outrageous calumniator, who imposes upon others such absurdities, as an of (Luther) or a stone, would scarce bear without speaking. There is nothing I so much desire, as to expose this buffoon (Aristotle) who, in a Greek masque, deceives the church, and to make him justly odious to all, if I had but time. I have a commentary by me, on the first book of his Physics, in which the story of Aristotle shall be re-acted upon this Proteus of mine (Aristotle). My greatest vexation is, to see my brethren, who have excellent talents, and seem born for the improvement of learning, toiling at such stuff, and losing all their time.' This Jesuit produces a great many other passages, injurious to Aristotle, taken from Luther's writings.

[KK] Luther taught that one and the same doctrine is false . . . in Philosophy, and true in Divinity.] I have spoken of this in the foregoing remark: but here I add, that the most rigid followers of Luther have deserted him upon this article; and have with so much force, opposed their brethren, who revived this notion that they have obliged them to retract it (168). Let us say also, that some misunderstanding may mix in this dispute, and much controversy about words; and that Luther's doctrine would be wrongfully blamed, if he had expressed himself after this manner, the same doctrines which appear false and impossible, when we judge of them by natural light, are true and certain when we judge of them by the light of the word of God. But to pretend, that even after revelation has shewed us that a doctrine is true, it continues to be false in Philosophy, is a gross mistake. It is much more reasonable to own, that philosophical light, whose evidence hath seemed to be a sure guide to us in our judgments of things, was fallacious and illusive; and that it must be rectified by the new knowledge communicated to us by revelation. Affirm, as long as you please, according to the notions which Logic teaches us, in the chapter de oppositis, that a man is not a stone; but beware of affirming, as Aristotle would have done, that it is impossible a man should be a stone: would not Aristotle have affirmed, that it is impossible God should be born of a woman; that God should suffer cold and heat; that God should die: in a word, that God is man? And would he not be mistaken in these assertions? Now since we know that the opposition betwixt the idea of God, and the idea of man, hinders not that one of these beings may be truly affirmed of the other, ought we not to say that nothing hinders but a man and a stone may be one the subject, and the other the predicate, of an affirmative, and most true proposition? Let us say then, that the Jesuit, who exclaimed so much against Luther, perplexes himself wretchedly, and is angry without reason. One would think he affirms it absolutely impossible for two created natures to be united hypochondrially; and does he not see, that, if this be once allowed impossible, the same may be concluded against the mystery of the incarnation; for which he is so angry with Luther? Audite, says he (169), & oblitescite, vel potius execramini: non tantum ubi supra, & imperitiam, sed & intolerabilem blasphemiam. Nec 6, 7. minus, inquit Lutherus, imo magis disparata est prædicatio; Deus est homo; quam si dicas, homo est asinus. An non hæc Lutheri impia thesis totum incarnationis mysterium ex imis fundamentis evertit? Si magis disparata est illa, Deus est homo; quàm illa, against the universities, and the burlesque expressions he made use of to turn them and their doctors into ridicule [LL]. This bantering way of his, might, doubtless, be censured;

ista, Homo est asinus; tunc magis erat falsa illa, Deus est homo, quam ista, Homo est asinus; quæ simpliciter falsa est: cujus falsitas oritur ex disjunctione Prædicati à Subiecto; quia enim nullus penitus nexus est Prædicati cum Subiecto; fit, ut Prædicatum non nisi mendaciter de Subiecto affirmetur. Si igitur in illa; Deus est homo: tanta, imò major, est Subiecti à Prædicato, & vice versa, disjunctio, & ut sic loquar, disparatio; falsa erit illa propositio; Deus est homo; sic ut & hæc; Homo est asinus; quia disparata non possunt de se mutuo affirmari, quamdiu nullo communi nexu copulantur. Si autem subiectum & Prædicatum illius Propositionis, Deus est homo, vero, reali, substantiali & hypostatico vinculo colligantur; sequitur, mentiri Lutherum cum Subiectum & Prædicatum ejus æque, imò magis, ac Subiectum & Prædicatum hujus, Homo est asinus; distare & disparari pronuntiat. Qualis ergo Lutherus Scholasticus Theologus; qui stupiditate & fatuitate suam totum divini verbi æconomiam subruit & prostrernit; imò Turcice prorsus, inficiatur; & inficiari volentibus non rimam, sed ipsas fores fatissimè aperit? —

Hear, and be humned, or rather execrated not only the ignorance, but also the intolerable blasphemy. There is no less, says Luther, yea, there is greater disparity in this position, God is man, than if you should say, man is an ass. Does not this impious assertion of Luther, subvert the very foundation of the mystery of the incarnation? If there is more disparity in saying, God is man, than in affirming, man is an ass, then it is more false that God is man, than that man is an ass, which yet is simply false, which falsehood arises from the disjunction of the predicate from the subject, because there being no connection between the predicate and the subject, it follows that, without lying, the predicate cannot be affirmed of the subject. If then in that proposition, God is man; there is as great, nay, greater disjunction of the subject, from the predicate, and vice versa, then that proposition, God is man, is false, as is this man is an ass, because disparities, cannot be affirmed of one another, as long as they are not connected by a common bond. But if the subject, and predicate of this proposition, God is man, are connected by a true, real, substantial, and hypostatic bond, then it follows that Luther lied, when he affirmed that the subject and predicate of that proposition, was equally, nay, more distant, and disproportionate, than the subject and predicate in this, man is an ass. What sort of a Scholastic Divinie then was Luther? who, through his own stupidity, and fortyness, overturns and destroys the economy of the holy Scripture; nay, like a very Turk he denies it; and to all who have a mind to deny it seems not only a bore, but opens a large breach. We need only consider this passage to see the unfairness and blind passion of that writer.

[LL] The burlesque expressions he made use of to turn the universities and their doctors into ridicule.] He jested upon their titles, and the badges of their doctorships. Decanus noster almæ Facultatis, inquit levissimus ille Ludio, est Sanctus Petrus in alma Facultate. Et ipse habet tria signa, quæ cogunt eum sic sentire, ut non possit errare; quæ sunt, Registrum, Sigillum, & Almutium. Unde patet quod valde arroganter, & frontose scripsit iste hæreticus contra almam Facultatem. Communia autem signa sunt hæc. Et fit sic . . . Signum autem eorum primum, & maximum, est Liripipium, seu, ut eruditi dicunt, Relipendum, quod est evidentissimum, & notissimum signum, per quod concluditur sic: Ipse habet Liripipium, ergo est Magister noster in fide illuminatus; ergo habet Spiritum Sanctum. Aliud signum est, quod sedent in superiore cathedra, quando disputant, & legunt. Per hoc signum arguitur sic: Christus dicit; Super Cathedram Moysi sederunt quæcunque dixerint, servate. Ergo quæcunque dixerint, sunt vera. Sed illi sedent in Cathedra, & docent sic; ergo, non possunt errare. Aliud signum est quod comprehendit multa. Et sunt insignia illa Doctoralia; annulus, pyrrhetum, liber, osculum, circitheca, & pyrrheta distributa in aula Doctorali: etiam candelæ ardentes; & super omnia; Te Deum Laudamus, quod in fine canitur. Ultimo egregium convivium Doctorale. Ultimum & fortissimum signum est intrinsecus Domini Decani in Sorbona, quando Bedelli cum sceptris præcedunt, & voce magna clamant: Transeat spectabilis, & eximius Magister noster, Dominus Decanus almæ Facultatis Theologicæ cum magistris nostris eximii. Transeat ille, transeat. Et hoc signum est valde bene masticandum; quia formaliter concludit; Magistros nostros non posse errare, &c. Pudet pigetque plura referre; adeo vana, profana, & Lucianica sunt, ut quidvis istos potius fuisse suspicer, quam Scholasticos: quos, ut magis Lutherus irrui exponeret, vocabula quædam ad eorum imitationem finxit, & scriptis suis, ut scurras suos oblectaret, inseruit. Cujusmodi sunt Dissolutio †† Catharinissima & Romanissima, Thomistitates, Italitates, magisteria nostrissima, magistralissima determinatio-nes, sivestralliter, Thomistraliter, Colonialiter, Lo- vanialiter, Catharinaliter, Latomalliter. Thomist- cissime, Thomastificissime, Henricissime (170). — The doctors in the universities, according to ancient custom, have certain marks and distinctions among themselves; they have also certain titles appropriated to them as marks of honour and respect. They are called our masters, and our excellent masters. They are distinguished into certain faculties, as into tribes which have their ways of speaking, their forms and particular words. Hence Luther took an occasion of scurrilously calling the Theologic faculty, fecultas from feces, dregs; and vacultas, from vacca, a cow, &c.

Francis Garasse has diverted himself with this facetious humour of Luther. 'This fat fellow, says he (171), writing against the sacred faculty of Divinity, in the second Tome of his works, supposes certain conclusions against the faculty, and then condemns them, as in the name of the whole university, impertinently playing upon a thing of consequence. The title of the tract is this. 'Apologia Philippi Melancthonis adversus furiosum decretum Theologastorum pro Luthero, &c. The three first conclusions are these: In Libro Joannis Majoris sunt PLAUSTR A nugarum. The second, Quondam fuerunt strenui Milesii. The third, Spectabilis Domine Decane vos estis iratus. To these three propositions he answers in the name of all the Divines of France. As to the first, which says, that in Major's books, there are cart-loads of fooleries. Hæc Propositio est stultè asserta, in eo quod intendit nugas plaustris vebi: cum nugas sint res spirituales, & Plaustra res corporales. Having formed this chimera out of his own brain, he combates it, to obtain a false triumph, like that of Caligula. To the second, which says, that the French Divines were formerly as brave, as the Milesians; but that they have degenerated; he makes our Divines answer, Hæc propositio est suspecta, quia scriptura est Græca: & Græci sunt heretici: Hoc est nostrum sentimentum. To the third, which says, venerable dean of the faculty, you are angry: he makes all the Divines answer. Hæc propositio est derisorio & scandalosa in eo quod dicit, vos estis irati, est enim incongrua sicut ego currit, & à nobis olim damnata: & in eo quod dicit Decane vos estis, intendendo quod sumus ex cane nati, est consumeliosa.'

fured, but it was not unuseful at that time; and we know it has been said, that Erasmus, by his raileries, served for a fore-runner to Martin Luther (m). But if it be true, that Erasmus prepared the way, it is also true, that this way was more and more enlarged, and laid open by the wrong measures, that were taken with this reformer. Erasmus observed seven great faults in those measures [MM]. See the book of the Sieur Richard, prior of Beaulieu St Avoys (n), a Catholic author.

(n) Intitule: Sentimens d'Erasmus, par, and printed in 1688. See page 248, &c. where you will find several things curious and solid.

It is certain, that a grave and elaborate answer, would not have been so proper, as these burlesque pieces, to expose the universities of that time to the last contempt, with a great number of people. But it might be questioned, whether it became Luther and Melancthon, thus to divert and amuse themselves with jests and banter. They ought, you will say, to have been wholly taken up with the important affair they had undertaken; and if they had well weighed the great characters of their mission, they would not have had leisure for banter. They knew what persecutions their cause was exposed to in other countries: they ought therefore so to have laid it to heart, as to have no desire to make merry by humorous and burlesque compositions. I do not offer these as strong and weighty objections, and am persuaded, that they whose interest it is to find them weak, will easily answer them. For which reason I shall not stand to dispute about them. I shall only say, there are a great many persons who have not disapproved the reflexions, which they found at the end of a book of Mr Brueys.

(172) Brueys, Defense du culte exterieur de l'Eglise Catholique, pag. 340, & seq. Dutch Edit.

In truth, says he (172), I cannot believe, that the Protestants of this kingdom, who are truly pious, whatever esteem they have for Mr Jurieu's wit and learning, can approve that a minister, who has forsaken them, and fled into a foreign country, affects in all his works the character of an humourist and droller, whilst he daily hears at a distance, of the ruin and desolation of his party. Methinks if we consider the disposition which becomes a person of his character, the joy he expresses in all his writings, at his being out of the reach of the danger his sect is exposed to, is not very natural nor warrantable. It ill becomes him, in my opinion, to be merry in security, whilst those he has deserted groan under the just chastisements, which the church, as a good mother, mixes with the kindnesses and benefits she employs to bring them back into her bosom: in my opinion it is acting contrary to the gospel, to laugh with those who weep; and I think the works of this author, how fine and delicate soever in other respects, ought at least to have some taste of the bitterness of his soul if he were really more affected with the affliction of his brethren, than with the tranquillity which he himself enjoys. We may therefore say, that as the calumnies and reproaches with which this author's works are filled, may induce the Catholics to believe, that a man, whose thoughts are so remote from charity, cannot be a good Christian, though he spoke with the tongue of angels; so that ill-natured joy, which he manifests in his writings, those strokes of railery and ridicule, by which all the world immediately discovers the productions of his pen, ought to persuade all the pretended Reformed, who have any judgment, that it is impossible for him, who so mis-times his railery, whatever zeal he expresses in their defence, to be a good Protestant.

[MM] Erasmus observed seven great faults in the measures taken against Luther.] I have mentioned the book, in which there is a large account of this matter; and it is a book that may be easily had at the Bookellers; so that I shall be very short on this head, and only shew in gross the capital point of each of these faults. The first consisted in their suffering a quarrel to arise about the gatherings among the mendicant Friars, and the Thebes of indulgences, to be discussed before the people in sermons (173). The second, in their opposing to Luther only some mendicant Friars, who were no more than declaimers and organs of slander (174). The third, that they did not impose silence on the preachers of both parties, and chuse out prudent, learned, and peaceable persons, who might have instructed the people, without any contention, and inclined them to peace and the love of the gospel (175).

(173) Sentimens d'Erasmus, pag. 251.

(174) Ibid pag. 258.

(175) Ibid pag. 274.

The fourth, that they would abate nothing on either side (176). The fifth, that cruelty was exercised against the Lutherans, at the instigation of some mendicant Friars (177). The sixth, that the bishops of Germany, who were MILITARY MEN for the MOST PART, did not do their duty (178).

(176) Ibid pag. 277.

(177) Ibid pag. 285.

The seventh, that they did not take care to appease the wrath of God by public prayers, and by a conversion, truly penitent and sincere (179). The catalogue of faults of the Romish party might, perhaps, be enlarged: but that we leave to the speculative, and content ourselves with saying, that most of these, specified by Erasmus, could not well be avoided, considering the posture of affairs the church was then in. Hence it may be concluded, that Luther's design was brought forth in a favourable juncture of time. The prudence of the court of Rome plaid its part well enough; but it could not prevent the marring the affair in several instances, by a defect in its instruments; and I am certain, numbers of Protestants are convinced, that their party maintained itself by the false measures of the opposite side, as much as by the goodness of its cause. On the other hand, a great many fancy, that there were several faults committed on the part of the reformation, and that these were incidents favourable to popery. Thus great quarrels are generally fed and fomented; each party makes false steps, which reciprocally serves to balance and support the other (180).

Tiberius, by presenting him an elegy on the death of Germanicus, which had been made before for the death of Drusus, who had recovered from a distemper, which it was thought he would die of. Others believe, that he had made a satire upon Drusus. This is the opinion of Theophilus Raynaud: 'Ex ea item lege (2), says he (3), Lutorius Priscus apud Dionem, lib. 57. quod in Drusi ægrotantis mortem, famosum carmen scripsisset, mori iussus est Senatus decreto.' These two opinions I think are false, and should chuse rather to say, that Lutorius was accused of having had the audaciousness of accounting Tiberius's son as dead, and even composing verses upon it before the time. The author of the News from the Republic of Letters, from whom I borrow these words, immediately adds (4): 'It is certain, a man exposes himself to the rigour of the law, who dares declare, on some occasions, the sinister judgment which people pass upon the sickness of kings. The Physician, du Val, was sent to the galleys, because there was found in his closet a paper, in which he had predicted, that Lewis XIII would die before the dog-days, in the year 1631.' This particular is found in certain memoirs of the duke of Orleans, which came out in the year 1685. The words of Manius Lepidus do not oppose the opinion I establish, so much as is imagined: for in an age of flattery no difficulty is made of advancing, that a Poet who instead of making vows, and confiding in the fortune of the republic, whilst the presumptive heir to the crown is sick, sings the death of that prince, and communicates to his friends the black and dismal ideas of so lamentable a state, not yet arrived; that such a Poet, I say, is possessed with an execrable thought, and possesses his heavens with accused of having composed another, on the death of Drusus, while this prince was sick (a); and it was affirmed, that he kept this poem ready to be produced, with hopes of a greater recompence, in case Drusus should die (b). The prince's recovery should have obliged this Poet to suppress his work; but he could not deny himself the glory of it. He read it to some ladies; all of whom except one, durst not deny the fact (c). All his judges, except two, condemned him to death. Tiberius, who was then absent (d), practised his usual artifices [B], when he understood that the sentence was executed, and made some regulations for the time to come. Manius Lepidus, who voted only for his banishment, gave a very ingenious turn to his opinion [C]. We shall see how with the like. 'Si, patres conscripti, unum id specta-mus quam nefaria voce Lutorius Pricus mentem suum & aures hominum polluerit, neque carcer, neque laqueus, ne serviles quidem cruciatus in eum

only with how wicked a speech, Lutorius Pricus has defiled his own soul, and the ears of all men; neither prison nor halter, nor indeed the punishments peculiar to slaves are equal to his crime.*' These are the words of Manius Lepidus. Let us therefore conclude that the crime this Poet was accused of, was anticipating, in his poem, the death of Drusus, the emperor's son. There was, doubtless, more imprudence than crime in this action.

I deny not but the laws have treated those as guilty of a capital crime, who consult the future events of the prince's life: 'Capitale est de salute principis vel de summa Reip. respondere aut consulere (6).
It is a capital crime to answer or to enquire of the health of the prince, or of the fate of the government.' I know several persons have suffered death for such a curiosity. 'Valens imperator sub uno prologo iussit occidi omnes qui de suo succes-sore spiritus consuluerant, nec modo qui consulerant, sed omnes qui aliquid ea de re inaudierant, nec ad se detulerant (7). — The emperor Valens, by a single warrant, ordered all to be put to death, who had consulted spirits to know who should be his successor, and not only such as consulted, but all who had so much as heard any thing of the matter, and had not informed him.' The emperor Julianus Didius, caused all those to be burnt, who consulted the divi-ners upon the emperor's fortune (8). The canon laws have excommunicated those who engage in intrigues about the succession in a prince's life-time.

This is what the learned John Beloi represented to the leaguers in Henry the third's reign. 'By these means they seem to conspire his death, which, in effect, is revolting against nature, good manners, Christian piety, and the love we owe to our king; for whom we are constantly obliged to pray, to wish, and preface well: so that to act upon the presumption of any unluckily accident or misfortune to him, would be against all laws, civil and natural; and therefore good people cannot approve, that, against their king's desire, and in his life-time, his succession should be disputed, and called in question, which is a thing not in being as long as it pleases God to continue him in the world. Therefore, by a decree in the fifth council of Toledo in Spain, which was held in Honorius the first's time †, about the year 622, in the reigns of Heraclius the emperor, and Chintillus king of Spain, all those were excommunicated, who inquired, or presumed to be solicitous and inquisitive, who should be their king, after him who holds the scepter. "Therefore, says the text because it is contrary to piety, and dangerous for men to think of future things, of a forbidden nature, and to inform themselves about the accidents of princes, or to provide for the future, with relation to them, so far as it is written,
"it is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which God has reserved in his own power: we ordain by this decree, that if there be any enquirer about these things found, who, in the king's life-time, looks upon another from a prospect of his succeeding to the kingdom, or draws others to him on that account, he shall be expelled the society of Catholics by the sentence of excommunication †." The same decree was repeated in the sixth council, held in the same city of Toledo; to which is added a most pertinent reason, by which the authors of these discourses are blamed, as aiming at the knowledge of futurity, which God perhaps will never suffer them to arrive at (9). I have read in the French Mercury, a story I am going to relate: 'Noel Leon Morgard, an Almanack-maker affirmed in his Almanack, for the year 1614, that the state of France would change, and reflected on the person of the king, and shewed the time, the months, and places, in which he spoke of several great princes, whom he denoted, only transposing the letters of their names. This Almanack being sold the first day of the year, there was an extraordinary demand for it among the curious, who said, it was a prophecy: and that which gave vogue to it was, that Morgard, having said in the first quarter of January, that a marshal should play his son an unlucky trick, it happened, that a man, in years, in the suburbs of St Germain, and who had formerly been a soldier, killed his son, designing to kill a woman he kept. The noise that these new predictions caused among the people, coming to the ears of their majesties, and the council, Morgard was, on the eighth of January, carried to the Bastille, by the archers of the grand provost. Nine days after he was removed to the common goal; the tenth of January, he was condemned by a decree of the court, for nine years to the galleys; and the ninth of February he was put in chains, to be carried to Marseilles, where he tugs at the oar in the king's service (10).'

Every one may have read several things of this nature, but I venture to say, that this was not Lutorius's case. All the enquirers into futurity have no other end but to raise conspiracies, or disturb the public tranquillity; or, in general, they are ill-affected persons as Tertullian observes. 'Cui enim opus persequi super Cæsaris salute nisi a quo aliquid adveniret il-lum cogitatur, vel optatur, aut post illam speratur & sustinetur? non enim ea mente de caris consultiur qua de dominis (11). Now what is there like this in a Poet's impatience, who, during his prince's sickness, prepares a copy of verses to produce them in case the prince shall die? there was nothing in the conduct of Lutorius, but a great deal of indiscretion and vanity.
He ought not to have read his poem: he should not have entertained the ladies with it, to be entertained in his turn by their commendations.

[B] Tiberius . . . made use of his usual artifices.] He praised the zeal the senate had expressed in punishing severely the least offence committed against the emperor, but desired they would not be so hasty in punishing them. He praised Lepidus, and did not blame Agrippa. The latter was consul designed, and voted for death, Lepidus only for banishment. It was resolved, for the future, that the decrees of death should not be executed till the tenth day after sentence. Id. Tiberius sollis sibi ambagibus apud senatum incusavit, cum extolleret pietatem, quamvis modicas principis injurias, acriter ulciscendum; deprecaretur tam præcipientes ver-borum pœnas: Laudaret Lepidum, neque Agrippam argueret. Igitur factum S. C. ne decreta patrum ante diem decimum ad ærarium deferrentur; idque vitæ spatium damnatis prorogaretur (12). Some (13) attribute all this to Tiberius's ambition; they pretend, that he was displeased not that they had put Lutorius to death, but that they had condemned him to death without his advice. They add, that, to make himself master of all sentences of this nature, even in his absence, he got a decree passed, that the execution should be deferred.

[C] Manius Lepidus . . . gave a very ingenious turn to his opinion.] I have already recited (14) the beginning of his discourse; here is another piece of it.

His studies, as they are full of wildness, are likewise empty and perishing: neither is ought important or terrible to be apprehended from one who thus betrays his own follies, and makes his court not to the minds of men, but the imaginations of women: let him however be expelled Rome, interdicted from fire and water, and his estate be forfeited.' There is nothing to be feared, said he, by suffering Lutorius to live; nor will the taking away his life be any great example. He is an idle fellow, who spends his time in trifles; all his ambition is to get into the women's good graces: we need not fear any serious enterprize, or any thing considerable from him.

(16) Plaidois
d'Arnould, pag.
m. 57.

[D] The advocate Arnould . . . was reflected on by Father Richeome. Arnould, pleading against the Jesuits in the year 1594, amongst other things has this (16); they say, 'that they came into France for our great advantage; experience has shewn, that they have caused our ruin. What need of any longer trial? Let them go and advantage our enemies the same way: there is to this purpose an excellent passage in Tacitus, Si, patres conscripti, unum id spectamus quam nefaria voce aures hominum polluerint, neque carcer, neque laqueus sufficient: est locus sententiae, per quam neque impune illis sit, & vos severitatis simul ac clementiae non poeniteat: aqua & igni arceantur. — If, conscript fathers, we do but consider how wickedly they have defiled the ears of men, neither dungeon nor halter can punish them sufficiently: but there is room for a sentence by which neither they shall escape unpunished, nor will you have cause to repent of your severity or indulgence, let them be forbid fire and water. There you have the Jesuit's sentence.' Some years after he employed the same thought in a tract called, Le franc & véritable Discours (17): 'Gentlemen, if ye consider the horrid wicked-

NAULD (AR-
cate.

ness of these people, hanging will not be sufficient for them; but I know a means, by which you will never repent of, having been either too gentle, or too severe; banish them all.' Richeome answers (18), that these words are not so in Tacitus; and that therefore this discourser is 'a wonderful bold forger, writing to his prince . . . With these words then he condemns us, in mercy, to banishment . . . more cruel and deceitful, by half, than the Heathen who first spoke them. For in this place of Tacitus, Marcus Lepidus, a Roman general, advised the senate to clemency towards Lutorius a knight, convicted of many great crimes. Whereas this man metamorphoses his words into an exhortation to cruelty, to persuade the ruin of many innocent persons.' After this he gives a translation of the passage of Tacitus, cut off with an & cetera; and complains of Arnould's confidence in producing it egregiously disguised (19), and opposes the innocence of the Jesuits, to Lutorius's abominable crimes. He commits two faults at least; for his complaint of the pretended falsification of the passage of Tacitus is ill-grounded; and he ought not to have supposed, that Lutorius was actually a desperate criminal, guilty of abominable and numberless crimes. He should have regulated himself, not by the phrases of the senator Lepidus, but by the real nature of the fact. He might have found the quality of the offence in the very words of this senator, I mean in those he suppressed by his Et cetera.

[E] Mr Moreri has committed some faults. He has only consulted Dion, who has too much abridged the matter, not in the twenty seventh book, as Moreri affirms, but in the fifty seventh. Tacitus should have been consulted, whose narrative is larger and more exact. But Moreri's great fault lies in saying, that Lutorius was accused of having written a poem against Drusus. Would he have said this, if he had known, that this Poet was accused of designing to publish this poem, in case Drusus should die, and believing he should receive a greater reward for it, than for that he had made upon Germanicus's death.

LUXEMBURG, the capital city of the province of that name (a), was only a castle in the time of the emperor Otho the Great (b). Gilbert, son to Ricuin of Ardenne, having obtained it of the abbot of St Maximin, enlarged it, and founded the county of Luxembourg, with the consent of Bruno, duke of Lorraine, brother to the emperor Otho the Great. This county was made a duchy, by the emperor Charles IV (c), for Venceslaus, his uncle (d). The town of Luxembourg is very strong. It is not true that it was never taken by the French, before the year 1684 [A]. Hither the miraculous image of our Lady of Consolation, patroness of the duchy of Luxembourg, and county of Cbini, was brought as to a place of security; but it was carried back to her chapel the twentieth of May 1685. The public has seen the advice that was given to the Jesuits about the procession, they made that day (e). [A] It is not true that it was never taken . . . before the year 1684. When the French besieged it in 1684, I heard several persons say, that it was then a virgin, a name vulgarly given to towns that were never taken. It was not hard to undeceive them; for we find in history, that the French took Luxembourg in 1542, and that being recovered by the emperor's arms, they retook it in 1543. They lost it the year following. Note, that they blocked it up in 1682; they bombarded it in 1683; and took it in 1684 (1). They restored it by the treaty of Ryswick in 1697.

The inhabitants of the duchy of Luxembourg believe, that each planet had a particular place consecrated to it in this country; and that anciently in the town of Arlon there was an altar of the moon. Several images of the false gods have been found there, and several medals and inscriptions (2). Peter Ernest, count of Mansfeld, removed them to Luxembourg, to adorn a fountain he consecrated to the memory of his wife. He caused a magnificent house to be built near it. The inscription of this fountain will, perhaps, not be unacceptable here. It is a notable monument of conjugal affection (3). 'Porticus in

LYCOPHRON, the son of Periander, king of Corinth, had a very odd destiny. He was seventeen years old, when Melisa his mother was killed by Periander, and had a brother (a) a year elder than he. Procles, their grandfather by the mother's side, king of Epidaurus, invited them to his court, and, when he sent them back to their father, he told them they ought not to forget who it was that killed their mother.
Lycophron was so struck at this saying, that being returned to Corinth, he took up a stubborn resolution not to speak to his father, either to ask him, or to answer him a question. Periander, enraged at his carriage, expelled him his house, and understanding from his eldest son, what Procles had said to them, he forbade those, who had received Lycophron into their houses, to entertain him any longer. The young man, being forced to depart, found a reception elsewhere, for some days; but as soon as his lodgings were known, orders were sent to his landlord to turn him out of doors; at last, a decree was published, imposing a fine at discretion, to be paid to Apollo, on any who either lodged, or vouchsafed to speak to him. This order was obeyed, and Lycophron lay four days and four nights in the streets, without eating or drinking. Periander, touched with compassion, went then to speak to him, and tenderly represented, how much better it were for him to succeed to his riches and crown, than make himself miserable by a mistaken repentment. All the answer he could get from him was, that he ought to pay the fine, since he had spoken himself to his son. Periander, finding the disease incurable, sent Lycophron away to Corfou, and there left him, without ever once thinking of him, till he found old age coming on, and rendering him incapable of discharging his kingly functions. The incapacity of his other son obliged him to send and offer Lycophron the government. He slighted the proposition, and would not vouchsafe, so much as to speak to the messenger. His sister was dispatched to him, and in vain represented all the sweets of sovereign authority. At last a proposal was made, that he should come and reign at Corinth, and his father would reign at Corfou. He accepted the condition; but the inhabitants of Corfou flew him, to prevent a change, which they did not approve of. This, in my opinion, is such an abridgment as ought to be made of Herodotus's narrative (b) [A].

cap. 1, & seq.

[A] This is the abridgment I think ought to be made of Herodotus's narrative. Diogenes Laërtius (1) has mangled this narration. Mr Moreri, not content to mutilate and falsify it, has perplexed it with an obscure jargon. What he says of Lycophron's constantly refusing to return to Corinth, is expressly contradicted by Herodotus. Mr Hoffman is in the same error.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek Poet. You will find, in Moreri, what country he was of, and when he lived. The poem, which we have of his is a very obscure piece [A]; but

[A] The poem, which we have of his, is a very obscure piece. It is intitled Alexandra, and contains a long train of predictions. The author supposes, that Cassandra, daughter of Priam, is the oracle, which foretold all these things; but however, it is not she that speaks, but a man, who gives a faithful account to Priam of all Cassandra's prophecies (1). Dædion, Orus, and Theon, had written notes upon this poem, which are lost (2). Tzetzes's commentary is still in being. Amongst the modern critics, William Canterrus, and John Meursius have learnedly employed themselves on Lycophron's Alexandra. Meursius's edition is accompanied with a Latin translation, composed by Joseph Scaliger, and suited to the character of the original, as being very difficult to be understood, and thick set with barbarous terms.

The best edition of this Poet, is that which was published at Oxford, in 1697, in folio. Mr Potter who procured it, has done all that was proper to recommend it. He has corrected the Greek text; and over against each verse of Lycophron, he has set down William Canterus's Latin translation, which is in prose;

under it the commentary of Isaac Tzetzes, with the corrections and various readings. He has given Scalliger's version, which is in Iambic verse, by itself, and then the notes of Canterus, the commentary of Mensius, and his own, which is very learned. To all this are added several exact and commodious indexes. Mr de Boissieu assures us (3) that his father, who was well versed in several languages, and as famous for learning as for arms, had written a commentary on Lycophron;
but he does not tell us, whether this work was ever printed. For the rest, we must not forget, that Bernard Bertrand, native of Riez, in Provence, is the first, who translated this poem of Lycophron into Latin. He translated likewise the commentary of Tzetzes. Both these versions were printed together at Basil in 1558. Canterus (4) has mentioned this work the word Lyc- with a pretty deal of contempt. No notice is taken of it in the abridgment of Gesner's Bibliotheca, printed but, in my opinion, he must have had not only a great deal of learning, but a great deal of wit, to compose such a book. You will find in Mr le Fevre (a), a great many learned and ingenious thoughts on the obscurities of it. I know not why he should say, that Suidas has preserved the names of twelve or thirteen tragedies written by Lycophron; for we find, in Suidas, the titles of twenty. This Poet was killed by an arrow; and Ovid is the only author, who informs us of this particular [B].

only made of his translation of Eustathius on Dionysius Afer de Situ Orbis, printed at Basil by Oporin, and his version of a book of Galen de humoribus, printed at Strasburg in 1558. I would have them print the interlineary glosses and Greek notes, which Mr Nicolle wrote with his own hand on the Greek text of Lycophron (6). It is a very excellent manuscript, as the abbot Faydit assures us (7), to whom Mr de Bessat, master of accounts, and nephew of the abbot de Bourzeis, lent it.

[B] He was killed by an arrow; Ovid is the only author who informs us of this particular (8). Valerius Andreas Desilelius (9) who pretends, that Theodoret mentions it, is mistaken, as the learned Mr de Boissieu observes (10). He shews, that Theodoret does not speak of Lycophron's death, nor even of the place of his sepulture. For instead of Lycophrone, it ought to be read Leucophryne; as appears by this passage of Arnobius (11): Leucophryne monumentum in fa-

no apud Magnesium Dianæ esse, Myndius proficetur ac memorat Zeno. — Zeno, the Myndian, records, that there is a monument of Leucophryne in the temple of Diana at Magnesia. These are Mr de Boissieu's words: De obitu Lycophronis ne verbum quidem apud illum (Theodoretum) reperitur: deinde Theodoretii locus (12) ubi ex Zenone, Lycophronem in Dianæ Magnesiæ templo conditum effat refert, plane depravatus est; & pro Lycophrone, reponendum est Leucophryne, cuius monumentum erat apud Magnesium in Dianæ templo, ut ex eodem Zenone tradit Arnobius — There is not a word in Theodoret of the death of Lycophron: then the passage of Theodoret. . . in which he relates, out of Zeno, that Lycophron was buried in the temple of Diana of Magnesia is manifestly corrupted, and for Lycophrone, we must restore Leucophryne, whose monument was among the Magnesiums, in the temple of Diana, as Arnobius relates from the same Zeno. I wonder Mr le Fevre has not mentioned this passage of Ovid.

LYCORIS. It is the name Virgil gives a famous courtesan, whom other authors call Cytheris. He speaks of her in his tenth Eclogue, in order to comfort a friend [A] of his in despair on her preferring Marc Antony before him. We have spoken at large elsewhere (a) of Marc Antony's fondness for Cytheris, but have not given the history of this woman fully enough. Let us say then, that she was a famous Comedian, whom Volumnius fell in love with, and made free [B]. This was the reason of her taking the name

(6) Epist. xxvi. lib. ix, ad Famil.

[A] Virgil . . . speaks of her . . . to comfort a friend of his.] This friend, if we believe Servius (1), was the orator Caius Asinius Gallus, the son of Asinius Pollio. But, as Servius adds, that this Gallus is the first, who was made governor of Egypt, the learned suspect his commentary; for it is manifest he has confounded the Poet Cornelius Gallus with the Orator Asinius Gallus (2). The first, who obtained of Augustus the government of Egypt, immediately after the conquest of this kingdom, was the Poet Cornelius Gallus. It is probably to him, that Virgil addresses his eclogue of Consolation, on the barbarous infidelities of the courtesan Cytheris. The person, to whom the Poet inscribes it, composed four books of poems upon his own amours (3). There are some fragments of them extant, if we believe the critics.

[B] She was a Comedian . . . whom Volumnius fell in love with, and made free.] Servius says, that Virgil's Lycoris was the courtesan Cytheris, whom Volumnius had made free: Hic autem Gallus amavit Cytheridem meretricem libertam Volumnii (4). He does not say she was a Comedian; but, that we learn elsewhere. We know that the courtesan Cytheris, Marc Antony's mistress caused herself to be called Volumnia. Vehebatur in esedo Trib. plebis: lictores laureati antecedeabant, inter quos aperta læticia MIMA portabatur, quam ex oppidis municipales homines honesti obviam necessario prodeuntes, non vero illo & mimico nomine, sed VOLUMNIAM con-salutabant (5) — The tribune of the people was drawn in a chariot: laurelled Lictors went before, among whom an Actress was carried in an open litter, whom the honest burgesses of the several towns, being obliged to meet her, saluted, not by her true theatrical name, but by that of VOLUMNIA. For what reason, if not because Volumnius had made her free? Now Marc Antony's Cytheris was a Comedian; and therefore she, that Servius speaks of, must have been too. The only thing to be proved, is, that Volumnius loved her. This proof I take from one of Cicero's epistles (6): Accubueram hora nona . . . apud Volumnium Eutrapelum, & quidem supra me Atticus, infra Verrius . . . infra Eutrapelum Cytheris accubuit. In eo igitur, inquis, convivio Cicero ille quem adspicebant, cuius ob os Grajiorum obvertebant sua? nonne Hercule suspicatus sum ille iam affare: sed tamen ne Aristippus quidem ille Socraticus eruhit cum esset obiectum habere cum Laide: habeo, inquit, non habeo a Laide — I sat down to table . . . at the house of Volumnium Eutrapelus, between Atticus and Verrius . . . below Eutrapelus sat Cytheris. You will say, it did not become me to be present at such a banquet: I protest I had no suspicion that she would be present: yet Aristippus, the Socratic, did not blush, when it was objected to him, that he had Lais: I have been, says he, but she has not me. It is plain, that Cytheris is here a courtesan, whom Volumnius entertained at bed and board. This epistle of Cicero is said to be written in the 703d year of Rome. He wrote another (7) to Volumnium the same year, but without saying a word of the courtesan. Father Abram, who imagines the contrary, had not well considered it: ad hunc amorem, l. 7. ep. 32. alludit scribens, ad eundem Volumnium, Ut nihil sit tam dæmoniacum quod non alicui venustum esse videatur (8). — To this intrigue, book 7. ep. 32, he alludes, writing to the same Volumnium, nothing is so barren of wit, but it will please some body. This entirely relates to an ill relish for jests. Cicero's meaning is, that there is no jest so flat or insipid but one or other is pleased with. For the rest, we do not learn which way Cytheris came to be turned over from Volumnium to Marc Antony, whether by gift, or thro' the natural inconstancy and ingratitude of the mistress. I should rather believe the first, it being certain that Volumnium was one of Marc Antony's good friends.

This appears from the following passage of Cicero (9): Scripsi ad Antonium de legatione, ne si ad lars concerning Dolabellam solum scripsissem iracundus homo commoveretur: quod autem aditus ad eum difficillior esse dicitur, scripsi ad Eutrapelum, ut ei meas litteras redderet, legatione mihi opus esse. — I wrote to Antony concerning the lieutenantship left, if I had written only to Dolabella, the choleric gentleman might have resented it: but knowing that he was difficult of access, I wrote to Eutrapelus, to give him my letters, informing him that I stood in need of the lieutenantship. This he wrote to Atticus a few months after the death of Julius Cæsar. It is the same Volumnium, if I mistake not, that Cicero means in the thirteenth Philippic, giving a list of Marc Antony's gaming companions (10): Cornelius Nepos tells Philipp XIII, us, that Volumnium, Marc Antony's intimate friend, circa init.

name Volumnia, in her travels with Marc Antony through the towns of Italy. Marc Antony caused great honours to be paid her, carried her about in an open litter, and made his mother's equipage follow, as it were to make up the train of this courtesan (b). It was upon this occasion, that lions were yoked in Marc Antony's chariot (c). (b) See the article FULVIA, remark [2].

had a considerable post in his army. 'Familiares ejus (M. Volumnius, the prefect, in the number of the proscribed, on account of his large possessions in Africa.' This Volumnius's house was a sanctuary to Pomponius Atticus, during the rage of the triumviral proscriptions it not more probable, that this Comedian was a man made free by Volumnius, and that, like Cytheris, he took the name of his master, to whom he owed his liberty? I determine nothing. I believe Plutarch might be mistaken, for the following reasons. Volumnius, according to all appearance, gave a full swing to his rallying and jocose humour, and had no more regard to decorum, or his own quality, than a professed Comedian. This was almost unavoidable in a man, who, like him, had a talent for witty sayings, and an intimate acquaintance with Marc Antony, the most liberal man in the world to those, who knew how to divert him, and to the Comedians in particular, with whom his house was always crowded. 'Agrim Campanum, qui cum de vestigalibus eximebatur ut militibus daretur, tamen infligi magnam Reip. vulnus putabamus: hunc tu compranforibus vis & collusoribus dividebas: mimos dico & mimas P. C. in agro Campano collocatos (22). — When your Campanian farm was

(22) Idem, Philipp. II, cap. xxxix.

(13). It is impossible, I think, to determine, whether our Volumnius is the same, who was killed in cold blood by Brutus's men (14). The grounds for doubting it are, I. that Plutarch calls him, who was killed by Brutus's party, a Comedian. Ἦν δὲ τις βολεμνίου Μίμῳ καὶ Σακυλίων γελοιοποιῶν ἡλωότες, ὅς ἐν ἔδει λόγῳ τιθεμένη τῷ Βρούτῳ, προσάγοντες οἱ φίλοι κατηγοροῦν, ὡς ἐδὲ νῦν τῷ λέγειν καὶ σκώπτειν πρὸς ὕβριν αὐτῶν ἀπεχομένους. Erat quidam Volumnius mimus & Sacculio Sannio capti. Hos Brutus quum contemneret, adductos ad eum accusaverunt amici ejus ne tunc quidem a dieteris & contumeliis in ipsos jaciendis temperare

(14). — One Volumnius, and Sacculio a buffoon, were taken: these Brutus despised; but his friends brought them before him, and accused them of not restraining even then from jesting upon them. II. That he joins him to a buffoon. And III. that he observes, that Brutus despised them both. This does not agree with the Volumnius mentioned by Cornelius Nepos. But, on the other hand, the drolling humour perfectly suits him; that itch of witticism, which Plutarch's Volumnius was so over-run with, that he could not forbear jesting even on those, who kept him in a prison. One of Cicero's Epistles, which I have before-cited (16), shews, that Volumnius Eutrapelus (17) was full of witty sayings. Cicero feared no man but him in this way, and recommends two things to him; one, that he would not suffer the silly quibbles, ridiculous puns, and pitiful rebus's, which went about in his name, during his absence from Rome, to be ascribed to him; the other, that he would assert the rights of polite conversation against the fatal encroachments of uncourtly buffoonry. Is not this representing Volumnius as a wit? 'Quibus in litteris omnia mihi pericula fuerunt, praeter illud, quod parum diligenter possessionum salutarum mearum a te procuratore defenditur. Ais enim, ut ego discessem, omnia omnium, dicta, in his etiam Sestiana, in me conferri. Quid? tu id pateris? nonne defendis? non resistis? equidem sperabam, it notata me reliquisse genera dictorum meorum, ut cognosci sua sponte possent (18). — In which letter, every thing pleased me, excepting that you neglect to defend the possession of my salt-pits. For you say, that, no sooner is my back turned, but every one's sayings, even Sestius's, are ascribed to me. What! do you suffer it? do you not defend me? do you make no resistance? I thought my words might easily be distinguished from those of others.' After these words, Cicero gives him a just standard of his own sayings, and desires Volumnius to vouch even upon oath (19), that whatever would not bear such a test never came from his mind. 'Urbanitatis possessionem, amabo, quibusvis interditiis defendamus: in qua te unum metuo, contemno ceteros (20). — I beseech you, let us defend, at any rate, the possession of politeness, in which I fear you alone, and despise others.' Here is another very great eulogy: 'Opus est hinc limatulo & polito tuo judicio, & illis interioribus litteris meis quibus saepe verecundorem me in loquendo facis (21). — There is need of your exact and polite judgment, and those middle parts of my letters, in which you often make me express my self more modestly.' Can a man of this merit and character be the Comedian mentioned by Plutarch? Is

[C] Lions were yoked in Marc Antony's chariot.]

He was the first among the Romans who put them to this kind of service. 'Jugo subdidit eos primusque Romæ ad currum junxit M. Antonius, & quidem civili bello cum dimicatum esset in Pharsalicis campis, non sine quodam ostento temporum generosos spiritus jugum subire illo prodigio significante: nam quod ita vectus est cum Mima Cytheride supra monstra etiam illarum calamitatum fuit (26). — Antony was the first at Rome who yoked them to his chariot, and that during the civil war, and at the time of the battle of Pharsalia; which was looked upon as a kind of prodigy, importing, that generous spirits now submitted to the yoke; for that he was thus carried about with the Aëres; Cytheris was beyond all the prodigies of those calamitous times.' According to these words of Pliny, this fight had never been seen in Italy, till after the battle of Pharsalia: and yet Cicero seems to say the contrary in one of his epistles (27) to Atticus, before this famous battle; 'Tu Antonii

Another author says no more, than that Cytheris's train was not inferior to that of her galant's mother [D]. He would have said something more probable, had he affirmed, that they, who expected favours from Marc Antony, made their court more submissively to his mistress, than his mother. Servius would have obliged us, if he had marked with more exactness, the time when this courtesan followed Marc Antony to the army [E]. I do not think she followed him into Asia after the battle of Philippi more clearly, if Victorius's conjecture be right. This learned critic (28) will have it read leonibus, inftead of leonebus, in the paffage of the fecond Philippic, which I cite in the margin (29). His reasons are fpecious, and I could eafily believe him in the right, with Fa-

Marc Antony's progrefs through the towns of Italy,

r made war in Spain againſt Pompey's lieutenants, a

Andrew Alciatus is guilty of a grofs falshood in fuppofing Marc Antony did not harnefs a fet of

After that this dire plague of his country, by killing Cicero, had given the last blow to the Roman eloquence, he mounted his car victorious, drawn by lions, whom he compelled to bear the yoke; thus emblematically signifying his victory over great commanders.

(33) It has been remarked by the Commentators on the Emblems, and by Father Abram, ubi supra, This falsity (33) is the more inexcusable, as the author has founded on it an elogy on Cicero, and some moral reflexions. But did the follow Marc Antony, when he went to serve in Gaul (39) under Julius Cæsar, or when he retired thither, after he was beaten at Modena? I should chuse the latter opinion; otherwise Virgil applied a plaister to a very old wound; he comforted the man ten years after Lycoris had jilted him. Virgil's Bucolics were written after the death of Julius Cæsar; and consequently, if Lycoris had forsaken Gallus, to go into Gaul with Marc Antony, whilst Cæsar was making war there, Virgil must have exercised his muse on a superannuated intrigue of infidelity. But supposing the other part of the alternative, Gallus's wound must have been fresh, and Virgil's verses might come in a proper time. According to this last supposition, Marc Antony appears not to have been a man of his word. He had promised Fulvia, in the year 709, to part for ever with his dear Comedian (40). He quitted her probably for a time, and in that interval Gallus took possession of Cytheris. If he had not time for the writing his four books of verses, before the war of Modena had debauched her away, he employed the following years; for it is not necessary to suppose, that there were not a great many sharp reproaches of her peditiousness in such a number of verses. I have observed above, that the letter, in which Cicero excuses his being at an entertainment with Cytheris, is supposed to have been written in the year 703. This is an objection against those, who say, that Cytheris went into Gaul with Marc Antony, before the rupture between Cæsar and Pompey. See the marginal note. I confess, I see nothing to induce me to believe, that the date of this letter is rightly fixed. However, the opinion I follow has been established by Servius

 • courtesan Cytheris, the freed woman of Volumnii,
 • who despising him, followed Antony in his expedition

 • fort Gallus in his grief: nor ought it to move us, that

We will end with this remark of the fame Commentator: there were three famous ladies of pleasure at the same time, Cytheris, Origo, and Arbuscula. The two latter are found in Horace's verses (43) under the notion of Comedians; they therefore all three were ultimæ, lib. i. Players.

[F] I do

Philippi [F]. When Ovid observes, that the name of Lycoris was famous from East to West (c), I do not doubt, but he had in view Gallus's verses on this courtesan. Cicero mentions a piece of railery, in which Fulvia perhaps was less concerned than Lycoris [G].

(46) Thus this author calls Cytheris.

[F] I do not think she followed him into Asia after the battle of Philippi. And yet an ingenious author is of this opinion (44). * Marc Antony was bewitched to the Comedian Cytheris (it is the answer he supposes * Fulvia gave Helena to the question, whether she instigated Marc Antony to make war with Augustus) and, to be revenged on him, I would fain have had Augustus fall in love with me, but Augustus was nice in his mistresses. He neither thought me young, nor handsome enough; and tho' I let him understand, that he was like to be involved in a civil war for want of some regard for me, yet I never could drag him to one act of complaisance. I will repeat you too, if you please, some verses (45) he made upon that evasion, and which are not the most to my honour. They are these.

Parce qu'Antoine est charmé de Glaphire (46)
Fulvie à ses beaux yeux me veut assujettir.
Antoine est infidèle. Hé bien donc? est-ce à dire Que des fautes d'Antoine on me fera patir?
Qui? moi? que je serve Fulvie?
Suffit-il, qu'elle en ait envie?
A ce compte on verroit se retirer vers moi,
Mille épouses mal satisfaites.
Aime-moi, me dit-elle, ou combatons. Mais quoi?
Elle est bien laide! Allons, sonnez trompettes.

That is,

Because Antony is in love with Glaphyra, therefore Fulvia would fain captivate me. Antony's false: what then? Must I pay off Antony's scores? Must I be Fulvia's galeant, only because she desires it? At this rate every jealous wife will have recourse to me. Either love me, says she, or fight with me. She is very ugly; therefore found to arms.

Take notice that these verses relate to the year after the battle of Philippi, in which Brutus and Cassius fell. Augustus was then in Italy, and Marc Antony in Asia. We have seen, in the article of GLAPHYRA, that she was accounted a lady of pleasure, who had gained the affections of Marc Antony, and it does not appear that Cytheris was with him at that time. I believe then, the name in Augustus's Epigram is not disguised. It was not on account of Cytheris, but of Glaphyra, that Fulvia desired Augustus to revenge her. Besides, her menaces were not that she would, in case of refusal, excite Marc Antony to make war on Augustus, but that she would take up arms herself: and we have seen in her article, that she actually did so, and that, without the concurrence of her husband, she put all Italy in combustion; for which Marc Antony chid her severely the next time he saw her.

[G] Cicero mentions a piece of railery, in which Fulvia, perhaps, was less concerned than Lycoris. Marc Antony is upbraided, in the second Philippic, with a trick he served his wife. He rode into town by night, as a courier dispatched by Marc Antony; and gave Fulvia a letter, in which her husband said the tenderest things to her in the world (47). He had disguised his face, that he might not be known in presenting Fulvia the letter; but whilst she read it, he discovered himself, and threw himself on her neck. He was asked, why he would take such a method, which alarmed the whole city? He answered, He was come about an affair of his own. This gave occasion to a jest on him. Let us cite Cicero's words (48). * O hominem nequam! . . . Ergo ut te catamillum nec opinato com offensus, præter spem mulier adspiceret, idcirco urbem terrore nocturno, Italiam multorum dierum metu perturbasti? Et domi quidem causam amoris habuit, foris etiam turpiorem, ne L. Plancus prædes suos venderet. Productus in concionem à Trib. Pleb. cum respondisses, te rei tuæ causa venisse, populum etiam dicacem in te reddidisti. — Infamous man! . . . Because your wife discovered your pederastic intentions, therefore have you disturbed the quiet of Rome, and of all Italy? At home, indeed, the pretence was love; abroad, a more scandalous one, lest L. Plancus should sell his farms. When you answered before the tribune of the people, that your affairs brought you to town, you gave the populace a handle to jest upon you. Manutius hath made a note upon this, which is more indeterminate than that of Valesius the younger. * Ex ambiguo sensu, says Manutius, illorum verborum, rei tuæ causa: quod refertur etiam ad concubitus potest. — The words rei tuæ causa are equivocal, and may signify lying with a woman. But see the other note: it is in the Valesiana (49).

Custodes, lectica, Cinifiones, Parasitæ,
Ad talos stola demissa, & circumdata palla
Plurima, quæ invident pure apparere tibi rem (50).

Id est cunnum. Quod noto primus, ut apud Cicero- nem Philippica II. . . . O hominem nequam! ergo ut te catamillum, &c. (51) cum respondisses te rei tuæ causa venisse populum in te dicacem etiam reddidisti. Scilicet populus lusi in nomine rei, & quod Antonius dixerat se rei suæ, id est rerum suarum causa in urbem venisse, populus, ut est dicax, eum cunni uxoris causa venisse dixit, & dicacitatis materiam invenit in eo verbo.

The envious litter, and surrounding guards,
The flowing robe, and garment girt, conspire
From your too prying eyes to bide thy affair.

i. e. the . . . which I first remark, as in Cicero, Philipp. II. . . . Infamous man! &c. when you answered, that your affairs brought you to town, you exposed yourself to the jests of the populace. That is, the people jested upon the word affair; and, Antony saying that his affairs brought him to town, the people, who love a jest, said that he came for his wife's affair. You will find what follows in the 71st page of the same book. * Probavi alibi ex Cicero in Philippica II. de Marco Antonio, qui rei suæ causâ se venisse dicebat, populumque his verbis dicacem reddidit; & ex Horatio, plurima quæ impediunt pure apparere tibi rem, & ex aliis rem aliquando cunnum significare. Sic Martialis:

Parce tuis igitur dare mascula nomina rebus.

Id est, pedici tuo & cunno, ô uxor (52). — I have proved elsewhere, out of Cicero, Philipp. II. concerning Marc Antony, who said he came upon his affairs, and gave the people opportunity for a jest; as also from Horace, who speaks of the many things, which bide the affair; and from other authors, that the word res, (affair or thing) signifies cun . . . Martialis uses it in the same sense. Valesius indirectly censures Scaliger, qui in Priapica ex Arnobii nescio quibus locis & ex versione carminum Orphei ait mentulam rem vocari. I do not think Scaliger is mistaken: the word res had doublets as extensive a signification among the Latins, as the word affaire among the French, or the word thing in English. Now it is certain, that the word affaire sometimes signifies the natural parts of either sex. This is so true, that even they, who know but little of the French tongue, are acquainted with this signification. I have heard some young Dutch gentlemen make a great many jests on the sermon of a Monk, who preached at Spa. His subject was the importance of salvation; he shewed them, that it was the grand affaire of man, the affaire, by way of excellence; and reckoning up all the ways of sin, he shewed, that they ruined their affaire: gentlemen and ladies, said he, take heed to yourselves, if you do this, or that, you will spoil your affair. The too frequent repetition of this term led several of his hearers into the gross and burlesque sense of the word affaire; so that it became the subject of jest for a long time. We read in the Chevræana (53), 'that a gentleman, coming to wait on a prince, to thank him for his kindness in recommending his interests to a lady of great virtue, expressed himself thus: That it was happy for him, that his biggness had got his affair

'to pass thro' the channel of Madam * * *'. The whole company burst out a laughing. I have another remark to make against Valefius. In Horace's verses, quoted by him, the word res ought to signify, in general, merchandise: the Poet does not confine himself to that part which Valefius names in Latin; but extends to all the rest, which the clothes cover. The preceding and following words manifest this sense. Here are those that follow.

Altera, nil obstat: Cois tibi poene videre est
Ut nudam: ne crure malo, ne sit pede turpi:
Metiri possis oculo latus: an tibi mavis
Insidias fieri pretiumque avellier, ante
Quam MERCEM ostendi?

With Catia, 'tis not so: she stands confess'd
The filken garb permits the curious eye
To pry, and measure each minute defect.
You wou'd not, surely, buy a pig in poke,
And pay the price before you see the goods.

I believe then, that they, who gave Marc Antony's words such a malicious turn, had at least as much regard to Scaliger's sense, as to Valefius's: and as it is the nature of scandal to rub the sorest part, I do not doubt but it was meant by Marc Antony, with respect to his mistress the Comedian Cytheris, rather than his wife; for since he promises, in his letter, to part with his Comedian, it is a sign that the Roman people were still persuaded he saw her. Thus you have the whole commentary belonging to the text of this remark.

LYCURGUS, the legislator of Lacedæmon, lived I know not when. The diversity of opinions is too great and too perplexed upon this head (a), to fix upon any thing certain. He gave extraordinary proofs of his generosity, by the care he took to secure the crown to the person who had the rightful title to it, when he might have easily seized it himself, had he taken advantage of the occasions offered him (b). You will find this in Moreri's Dictionary, with several other facts, which I avoid repeating. I shall insist upon one thing, which this author has not touched. Lycurgus's regulations against luxury are most admirable. He wisely judged, that the way to prevent the degeneracy of the courage of the Lacedæmonians, was to keep them from pleasure; and that, to this end, he ought to banish from among them all thoughts of growing rich, and deprive them of all opportunities of it. His method of training up their children was very proper to make them good soldiers; but he carried it too far, since he would have the young girls perform the same exercises as the boys, and dance naked before them, ridiculing, or praising them, according as they acquitted themselves [A]. Note, that the boys danced naked before them. Was not this the way to make both sexes impudent? And is it any wonder after this, that Lacedæmonian girls had so bad a character [B]. I question whether he judged right in saying, that these practices would excite

(a) See Scaliger, Animadvers. in Eusebium, n. 1132, pag. 63.

(b) See Plutarch in the Life of Lycurgus.

[A] He would have the young girls perform the same exercises as the boys, and dance naked before them. I shall cite Plutarch's words (1). 'He (2) looked upon the education of children as the greatest and most important affair of a legislator, and therefore made an early provision for it, by regulating what ever concerned marriages and births; for we must not believe what Aristotle says, that, having endeavoured to regulate, and reform the women, he gave it over, finding it impossible to restrain their unbridled licentiousness, and the too great ascendant they had got over their husbands, who, by reason of their frequent warlike expeditions, were obliged to leave them to their own conduct, and, to prevent their abusing this liberty, were forced to flatter them, and soothe them, by calling them their ladies and mistresses. On the contrary, he took all the care of them that was possible. In effect, whilst they were maids, he hardened their bodies, by exercising them at running, wrestling, pitching the coat, and darting the javelin, that the fruit they should afterwards conceive, finding a strong and vigorous body, might take stronger root in it, and that they themselves, made robust by these exercises, might, with greater ease, strength, and courage, undergo the pains of child-birth. To re-trench all kind of delicacy, and effeminacy, he accustomed them to appear stark-naked in public, and dance in that posture at solemn feasts, singing witty songs, in which they seasonably intermixed some sharp touches of raillery on those, who had done amiss, and praise to such as had acquitted themselves worthily. By this means, they fired the youth with the love of glory and virtue, and kindled in them a noble emulation. For he, whose brave actions were so much extolled, and who saw his name celebrated by these young ladies, returned proud of the praises he had received, whilst their scoffs and raileries touched the undeserving more sensibly, than the severest remonstrances and harshest corrections; the more, as all this passed in the presence of the whole body of the people, citizens, senate, and even the kings themselves.'

[B] Is it any wonder after this, that the Lacedæmonian maids had a bad character. They were called bare-butts, and furious for a male: slanders, which, by Plutarch's own confession, were founded on the too great liberty Lycurgus allowed them. I speak thus of Plutarch, because he has made an apology for that great legislator on this head; 'H δὲ γυμναστικὴν λέγει, (3) (3) In Lycurgus, τῶν παρθένων ἰδὲν αἰσχρὸν εἶχεν αἰδῆς μὲν παρὰ τὴν φύσιν, ἀνθρώπων δὲ ἀπόψεως: ἀλλ' ἐθισμὸν ἀρετῆς καὶ ζῆλον εὐσεβίας ἐνέειχε, καὶ φρονίμους τὸ δὴ πάλιν παρὰ τὴν φύσιν ἀγνῶντας, ὥς μὲν δὲ ἦσαν αὐτῶν καὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ φιλοτιμίας μέστωσαν οὖσαν. That is, And as to those ladies, who shewed themselves thus stark naked, there was nothing shameful in it, Sparta being the throne of modesty (4), and disputation not so much as known there. This did only accustom them to a simplicity of manners, gave them a wonderful emulation, who should have the strongest and robustest constitution of body, and at the same time raise their courage, by letting them understand, that they ought to participate in glory with the men, and aspire to the same principles of honour and virtue. Plutarch, forgetting this apology, thirty pages after, confesses, that Numa Pompilius acted much wiser, in restraining maids to the decency of their sex, and that the liberties Lycurgus allowed, exposed them to poetical satires. 'Ἐπεὶ δὲ μάλλον ἢ περὶ τὰς παρθένους φυλακὴν κατέσχευε τῇ Νουμῷ παρὰ τὸ δὴ πάλιν καὶ κόσμον. ἡ δὲ τῇ ἀνδρείᾳ, παντάπασιν ἀναπεπλάμην καὶ δῆλον ἔσται, τοῖς ποινταῖς λόγον παρέσχον. Φαινομένης τε γὰρ αὐτὰς ἀποκαλῶσιν, ὥς Ἰβυκῶν καὶ ἀνδρῶν μαυεῖς λοιδόρουσιν, ὥς Εὐριπίδης. Præterea curam puellarum restrinxit ad pudorem muliebrem & severitatem Numa arctius: Lycurgi soluta proflus & fluxa in jocos incurrit poetarum. φαίνομένης enim vocant (5) Euripides, in eas, velut Ibius, quod incessu coxas reteregeant: & Andromacha, ἀνδρομαχῆς, quasi virolas & in viros infans ardentes amore, ut Euripides (5). The two verses of Euripides cited by Plutarch, do not sufficiently prove my assertion. I shall therefore set down that passage of this Poet at length, by which we shall see, that the appearing naked, and exercising promiscuously with the boys, was reckoned the true cause of the immodesty of the Lacedæmonian maids.

The readers will not be displeased to find here the translation of this passage of Plutarch. 'The carriage of maids, who were married according to the ordinance of Numa, was stricter and more becoming the honour of the sex; that of Lycurgus, being too free and licentious, occasioned satires upon them, and scandalous nick-names. Ibycus calls them Phenomeridas, that is to say, bare buttocks; and Andromenes, that is to say, mad for man; and Euripides says also of them,

*In vain the Spartan virgin would be chaste:
With flowing robe, and naked limbs expos'd,
They mix with boys in exercise robust:
And is it strange a Spartan woman's lewd?*

And indeed the skirts of their petticoats were not tucked at bottom, so that, as they walked, they shewed their naked thighs; which Sophocles very plainly declares in these verses:

You sing the masculine Hermione Whose opening coats disclose her naked thighs.

However, they say, they were daring, masculine, and stout, even to their husbands themselves in the first place (8). We need not wonder at Euripides's saying, that it was impossible for the women of Lacedæmon to be honest with such an education. Maids thus dressed, who went abroad with the young fellows, had their ears accustomed betimes to all kind of obscene language. Such conversation must needs have been a school of impudence; I leave you to judge, whether young fellows, who, left they should be thought stupid (9), imagine they must do more than custom permits, ever let their hands or tongues rest in the company of such maids. Besides that, they were allowed to discover their nakedness, only in order to get a husband; for when once they were married, they covered themselves decently. This we learn from Plutarch. Πυθαγομένη δὲ τινῶ διὰ τὸ τὰς μὲν κόρας ἀκαλύπτει, τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας ἐγκεκλυμέναις εἰς τεύχεα ἀγασσιν. Ὅτι (ἐγὼ) τὰς μὲν κόρας, ἀνδρας εὖρεῖν δεῖ, τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας, σῶζειν τὸς ἐχόντας. Quærenti cur Spartani virgines detestari, mulieres velatas in publicum emitterent? Quia, inquit, virginibus querendi sunt viri, mulieribus opera danda ad servent maritus (10). I pass over this touch of Martial,

Aut libidinosæ Lædææ Lacedæmonis palastras (11).

I have a stronger proof than the obloquy of the Poets. The Lacedæmonians being employed for ten years in a siege, and being called home by the complaints of their wives, who could not bear so long a widowhood (12), sent back to Lacedæmon the youngest of their soldiers, and gave them leave to lie indifferently with as many of their wives as they pleased. These youths were very well received; an evident sign, that the women of Lacedæmon had no virtue. The children, that sprung from these embraces, founded a colony at Tarantum. Not one of them knew who was his father. Itaque legunt juvenes ex eo genere militum, qui post jusjurandum in supplementum venerant, quibus Spartam remissis promiscuos omnium feminarum concubitus permiscere; maturiorem futuram conceptionem rati, si eam singule per plures viros experientur. Ex his nati, ob notam materni pudoris, Partheniæ vocati. Qui cum ad annos xxx pervenissent, metu inopie (nulli enim pater existerat, &c. (13). I do not take notice here of the lascivious impudence these girls might have contracted, by seeing the boys naked, because I am to speak of it in the following remark.

A father of the church, amongst other enormities, reproaches the oracle of Apollo with it's praising the Lacedæmonian women; women, adds he, who satisfied nature with whatever man they liked. Οὐτῶ καὶ τὰς Λακεδαιμονίων ἐπαίνει γυναῖκας ἀδώς οἷς ἂν ἐθέλωσι μιγνυμένας. Hic idem & Lædæas mulieres laudat, licenter se cum quibuscumque viris commiscens (14).

[C] He pretended, that these practices would excite the young folks to marry.] We learn from Plutarch that Lycurgus prescribed this kind of education, and ordered the maids to appear naked, that they might excite love in the young men. Ἦν μὲν ἔν καὶ τὰτα παρρησιαστικὰ πρὸς γάμον. λέγω δὲ τὰς πομπὰς τῶν παρθένων. καὶ τὰς ἀποδύσεις, καὶ τὸς ἀγῶνας ἐν ὧσι τῶν νέων, ἀγομένων ἢ γυμναστικαῖς, ἀλλ' ἐρατικαῖς (ὡς οἰοῖν ὁ Πλάτων) ἀνάγκαις. Et quamquam hi quoque ad nuptias erant stimuli, pompas dico virginum vestium detractioem, certamina, quæ inspectantibus adolescentibus peragebant, non geometricis sed amatoris (ut ait Plato) coactibus (15). — It was moreover, says (15) Plutarch, he, an attractive to marriage; I speak of those dances in Lycorgo, pag. 48, and wrestling, in which the young maids, thus naked, exercised themselves before the young men, who were drawn, as Plato says, not by a geometrical necessity, but by one much stronger, and which proceeds from the force of love. Lycurgus considered perhaps, that the number of beautiful women, being generally very small, in comparison of those, who are otherwise; and they, who are not handsome, very often receiving from nature a notable recompence in the parts concealed, it was thought necessary to give the girls an opportunity of displaying all their charms. Probably he believed, they, who could not kindle love by a handsome face, might happen to discover charms elsewhere to touch the heart of some young man. See, in Athenæus, the good fortune of two country-women, who caused a temple to be built (16). On the other hand, the young fellows, who were clumsy, and against whom the maids let fly their scornful raileries, might, by the help of their nakedness, prevail, and subdue the heart of a lais, without the assistance of any higher star, by Juvenal's favour.

- - - fatum est & partibus illis
Quas sinus abscondit, nam si tibi sidera cessent,
Nil faciet, &c. (17).

*Even in the parts conceal'd a fate appears,
And nothing's to be done without the stars.*

Thus they found out a counterbalance to deformity, and ordered it so, that no one should escape the darts of love, or complain of being prejudiced in his market, by not having the liberty of seeing the commodity he was to buy. But was not this to introduce into common life, where modesty ought to reign, the pretended advantage of the fews, so much celebrated by Horace?

Was it not begetting in these girls the impudence of the eye, which is worse than that of the ear? It was a means, say they, of blunting the edge of a curiosity, which is very keen. But this pretended reason has not hindered civilized nations from infilling into the sex a horror for nudities even in a picture; and here is a legislator of Lacedæmon, who permits young girls to view nudities in the original. He should be sent to the school of the Romans.

The curiosity I speak of has been delicately touched by Mr de la Bruyere: 'Every one knows that long bank, which bounds and shuts in the channel of the Seine, on that side where it enters Paris along with the Marne, which it has but newly received. Men bathe themselves here during the dog-days: people see them, at a good distance, throw themselves into the water, and see them come out again; it is an amusement; before this season's come, the women of the city never walk out that way; and when it is past, they quit that walk (20).' Dionysius Halicarnassensis praises the Romans for having constantly made the champions wear girdles: ancient Greece did the same: he proves it from some passages of Homer, and says, that the Lacedæmonians were the first, who abolished this wife custom; and he names the Lacedæmonian, who first appeared naked at the Olympic games, in the fifteenth Olympiad (21). It is a remark, which leaves a blot upon that nation. We must add, that the wrestlers appearing naked was doubtless the cause of making laws which condemned all the women, who had the curiosity or confidence to be spectators at the Olympic games, to be thrown headlong from the top of a rock (22).

[D] He would have husbands not approach their wives, but by stealth, and that they should rise from this table with an appetite. Thus Plutarch speaks. 'When they had a mind to marry, their courtship was a sort of rape upon the persons whom they had a fancy for, and those they chose were neither too little nor too young, but in the flower of their age, and full ripe for a husband: after this, she, who managed the wedding, came and shaved close the hair of 'the bride, dressed her up compleatly in man's clothes' and laid her upon a matress; this done, in came the bridegroom, in his every day cloaths, sober and composed, as having supped at his ordinary, and stole in as privately as he could into the room where the bride lay, untied her virgin zone, and took her into his embraces; and so having stayed some time together, he returned as secretly as he could to his apartment with the rest of his comrades, with whom he spent all the day and good part of the night too, unless he stole a short visit to his bride, and that with a great deal of circumspection and fear of being discovered; nor was she wanting (as may be supposed) on her part, to use her woman's wit in watching the most favourable opportunities for their meeting and making appointments, when company was most out of the way. In this manner they lived a long time inasmuch that they frequently had children by their wives, before ever they saw their faces by day-light. Their interview being thus difficult and rare, served not only for a continual exercise of their temperance, and furthered very much the ends and intention of marriage; but besides, these short absences kept their passion still alive, which flages, and decays, and dies at last by too easy access and long continuance with the beloved object; they always parted with regret, contriving when they should come together again, and thought minutes hours till the next meeting (23). Modern authors have descanted upon this order and here is what Lewis Guyon says of it (24). 'Lycurgus the legislator of Lacedæmon, willing and desiring that the married couple should receive a perfect and lasting pleasure and satisfaction in marriage, and beget robust children, forbade the husband and wife to lie together; but, if they met by day in some secret place, then to embrace; for a short pleasure, and a little at a time, is best relished; by this means the married pair are kept in heart, and even rendered more brisk and gay: whereas their lying constantly together makes the wife slighted, and other women desired, and which is commonly seen, makes the woman desirous of another man: so that intermitting their matrimonial conversation served to reinvigorate their love. And for this cause, the boys and girls, begot in these marriages, were strong and lusty; whereas they, who abuse the the female commerce, often beget maimed or weak children (25). In the mean time, he ordered, that children who disobeyed their fathers and mothers, should be put into a sack, and cast into the sea (26).'

[E] As for old men, who had young wives, he suffered them to impart them to handsome young men. Plutarch continues his narration thus (27). 'Having thus set modesty as a sentinel over the marriage-bed, he next bethought himself of a remedy for that wild and womanish passion, jealousy: and this he thought the best expedient; to allow men the freedom of imparting the use of their wives to those, whom they should think fit, that so they might have children by them; and this he would needs make a very commendable piece of liberality, and laughed at those, who think the violation of their bed such an insupportable affront, that they revenge it by murders often, and sometimes by cruel wars. Lycurgus thought a man not to be blamed, who, being advanced in years, and having a young wife, should recommend some virtuous handsome young man, that she might have a child by him, who might inherit the good qualities of such a father; and this child the good man loved as tenderly as if he had been of his own begetting: on the other side, an honest man, who had a love for a married woman upon the account of her modesty, and the well favouredness of her children, might, without formality, beg of her husband a night's lodging, that he might have a slip of so goodly a tree, which he might transplant into his own garden. And indeed, Lycurgus was persuaded, that children were not so much the property of their parents, as of the whole commonwealth. And therefore he would not have them begot by first comers, but by

‘abovementioned for its maintenance; but if they found it deformed, and of an ill complexion, they ordered it to be cast into a deep cavern in the earth, near the mountain Taygetus, as thinking it neither for the good of the child itself, nor for the public interest, that it should be brought up, since nature had denied it the means of happiness in its own particular, by not giving it health nor strength sufficient to make it serviceable to the public: upon the same account the women did not bathe the new-born children with water, as is the custom in all other countries, but with wine, to prove the temper and complexion of their bodies; for they had a conceit, that weakly children would fall into fits, or immediately faint, upon their being thus bathed: on the contrary, those who were of a strong and vigorous habit, would acquire a greater degree of firmness by it, and get a temper in proportion, like steel in the quenching [32].’

[G] He did not allow maids to marry too young.] Let us hear Plutarch. 'Now the time which both (33) ordained, either in relation to virgins or married women, were answerable to the manner of their education: for Lycurgus esteeming the procreation of children to be the principal end of marriage, would fix no set term of age, when men or women should be esteemed capable of giving their consents to each other in marriage; for he thought that nature, being the principle guide in that matter, should not be restrained with violence, which produces hatred and fear; but rather being gently indulged, when youth, and love, and kindness, move, the coition might be more satisfactory, and consequently the children be come more robust, strong, and healthful (34). But the Romans, designing, in the first place, to deliver the bodies of their daughters pure and undefiled into the embraces and possession of the husband, made it lawful for fathers to marry their daughters at twelve years of age, or under: which first way of Lycurgus seems more agreeable to the desires of nature, which only respects the procreation of children; but the other is better adapted to make a conjugal life comfortable, and calculated for the rules of moral living.'

The distinction Plutarch here makes between the two legislators does not seem just, nor obliging to the sex. This author discovers in Lycurgus's laws a physical, and in those of Numa a moral good. Is not this insinuating that, after the age of twelve, a man has reason to suspect in his consort the want of purity both in mind and in body (35)? Is not this a satire on the fair sex? He should have given all the advantage to the laws of Lacedæmon; for those of the Romans were, on one hand, very apt to spoil morality, and, on the other, prejudicial to the strength of the children, and the lives of the mothers. Aristotle gives upon this topic some well argued precepts. He would not (36) have maids marry till eighteen, nor men till thirty seven. He observes, that the inhabitants of all the towns, where marriages are contracted too early, are infirm and small of stature, and that immature marriages make the child-bed the death-bed of several women. He mentions ' a famous oracular answer ' given to the Trezenians, the meaning whereof was, ' that they died because they eat their fruits too green, ' and which was interpreted, as if the oracle had said, ' that they died because they married too young, and ' not because they gathered their fruits before they were ' ripe (37). Aristotle observes, that children, who are not much younger than those who gave them being, have but little respect for them, from whence arise innumerable domestic jars. This is one moral inconvenience: he touches on another of the same class, which concerns chastity. The banishing jealousy from a married state is doubtless delivering it from a great plague; yet Lycurgus was much to blame in healing it by a remedy worse than the disease. It is at bottom but a physical evil, which has its uses in the world (28); for it contributes more than is imagined to the preservation of modesty, and the preventing infinite scandals, whereas lewdness and adultery are moral evils. Now, according to good morality, a physical evil ought never to be remedied by a crime. Mr Dacier (29) justly blames Lycurgus for sacrificing all sort of honour and decorum to chimerical notions of the public utility, as if what was shameful could ever be useful. It may even be said, that this great legislator banished all sort of good breeding, by permitting the women to grow impudent; for it is certain, if the fair sex preserved not the modesty and honour, which is kept up in civilized nations, mankind would universally sink into a filthy and brutal lewdness.

For thereof, Plutarch pretends, that Numa Pompilius in some measure imitated Lycurgus. ' By the community of women and children, says he (30), they both designed to banish from marriage all kind of jealousy; but they did not pursue the same methods. ' For the Roman husband, who had children enough and desired no more, gave his wife to him that had none, and who desired her of him; and he was at liberty, either to leave her with this second husband or take her again. Whereas the Lacedæmonian, when any one desired his wife to have children by her, lent her without quitting her, and his marriage still continued undissolved; and very often, as we have said, if he saw a handsome man, from whom he might expect a good and generous race, he intreated him to get him children, and conducted him to his wife. Mr Dacier's marginal note deserves to be set down. This is true of Lycurgus, says he, but it no where appears, that Numa had the same design; and it were easy to prove, that this community of women began not at Rome, under Numa, but much later, and that it was not general.' To be satisfied of this, we need no other witness than Plutarch himself. See the discourse he puts into Hortensius's mouth. I have mentioned it elsewhere (31). Bodin, whom I have confuted, is ignorant of what Plutarch imputes to Numa; if he had known it, his criticisms would not have so much deserved to be criticised. It is difficult for an author, who has written so many books as Plutarch, not to contradict himself frequently.

[F] Children, who did not promise . . . to be . . . robust, Lycurgus would have them made away with.] "Nor was it in the power of the father to dispose of the child as he thought fit, but he was obliged to bring it before the examiners, who were some of the gravest men of the tribe to which the child belonged: their business was carefully to view the infant, and, if they found it lusty and well-favoured, they gave order for it's education, and allotted it one of the nine thousand shares of land to judge, that his remarks are judicious, and are not very different from the motives, which induced the Greeks not to let their women be present at assemblies, where the conversation

Befides, it conduces to temperance to marry a girl at a little more advanced age; for those, who are accustomed to venery very young, are found to be more intemperate and lustful. It is the Physicians business to reason upon these words: but without going so far, and departing out of the road of conversation, every body may affirm, that an immature marriage does not suffer modesty to take root deep enough. The respect we have for the sex, and the care we take, not to use too free discourses before them, is not half so great towards those, who, either have, or have had an husband. We look upon them as initiated persons, from whom the mysteries are not to be concealed; so that the maids, who are married very young, have not time to use themselves to a grave exterior, which has greater influence than is imagined upon the interior. The Romans were so persuaded of the ill effects of loose discourses, that they would not suffer the young maids (38) to be present at feasts (39). They supposed their ears were stopped against obscenity, till little boys came and unstopped them on their wedding-day. Pueri obsecant; verbis novæ nuptæ aures returant (40). Horace's advice ought to be a law every where, as well as in Lacedæmon. It is this.

Reasons of state oblige princes to dispense with this law: witness the conduct of Charles V towards Margaret, his natural daughter. 'She was but ten years of age when he promised her to Alexander de Medicis, in order to draw off Pope Clement VII from the interest of France; and the marriage was consummated before she was twelve (42).' By the way, I shall add, that this emperor did violence to nature in a quite contrary manner in Margaret's second marriage. 'The young widow was not re-married for a long time, because Charles, who had gained his point by her first marriage, sought a new advantage by her second. She desired in vain to be given to Cosmo de Medicis Alexander's successor, who sought her the more importunately, because thereby he would neither have dowry to pay, nor portion to restore. The match was agreeable: but Charles pretended to purchase by his daughter's second marriage the friendship of Pope Paul III, as he had by the first that of Clement VII. And he bestowed her on Octavian Farnese, who was but twelve years of age, which gave occasion to a Poet of Anjou * to make one of the finest epigrams, which has been seen in this last century (43).' There needs no great change in the epigram of the Menagiana, to make us believe it the same that Mr Varillas meant. 'I know not whole the following epigram is; but it is very elegant, and the subject finely treated.

Impubes nupti valido, nunc firmior annis,
Ex succo & molli sum facta viro.

Ille fatigavit teneram, hic ætate valentem
Intactam tota nocte jacere finit.

Dum licuit, nolui; nunc dum volo non licet uti.

O Hymen! aut annos, aut mihi redde virum (44).

*Strong was my husband, in my tender years;
Now, older grown, my bed a fumbler shares.
The first fatigued my tender frame too much;
This lets me sleep all night, nor cares to touch.
I might, when I could not; I may not, now I can;
Hymen! or give me years, or give me man.*

Mr Menage might have read in Sammarthanus (45), that James Bouju, president in the parliament of Bretagne, and native of Chateaufort in Anjou, is author of this epigram; but he ought to have corrected the fatigata in the second verse, and put it sciata, and have read in the fifth verse, dum nollem, licuit. Mr Varillas is mistaken in saying du Bois was the author. A like epigram was made in French (46). This is not my only supplement to the remark [G] of this article, in the second edition. Here is another somewhat larger and which refers to the observation I have made upon the ill effects of free discourse.

Muretus observes, that the ancient Greeks very prudently forbade women to be present at feasts: for the men being used to talk more freely there, it was hard for them to forbear now and then a smutty jest. They must therefore have offended the chaste ears of the sex, or, by being more reserved, have lost a great part of the mirth that belongs to such entertainments. For these reasons they introduced this custom. If any woman appeared at a public feast, she was reckoned thorough-paced, and declared thereby, that she was not only content to hear whatever was said, but also to suffer what they pleased. 'Neque ulla in virorum symposiis accubebat mulier, nisi quæ quidvis non audire modo, verum etiam perpeti posset (47).' Muretus cites two or three passages. He alleges the answer Thais makes in Terence to the spark, who desired that young Pamphila might be at the feast (48). He alleges what Cicero relates of Rubrius's impudence, for whom Verres had procured a lodging at Philodamus's, a burgher of Lampacus, for a lewd design. The burgher, one of the chief men of the place, would never suffer his daughter to come into the feast room, as Rubrius desired. 'Posteaquam satis celerè res Rubrio visa est: Quæso, inquit, Philodame, cur ad nos filiam tuam non intro vocari jubes? homo, qui & summa gravitate, & jam id ætatis, & parens esset, obstupuit hominis improbi dicto; inflare Rubrius; tum ille, ut aliquid responderet, negavit moris esse Græcorum, ut in convivio virorum accumberent mulieres (49). — As the guests grew warm, says Rubrius, prithee, Philodamus, why do you not order your daughter to be called in? Philodamus, who was a grave, elderly, man, and a father, was surprised at Rubrius's unreasonable request: Rubrius persisted; then the other, by way of answer, said, that it was not the custom of the Greeks to admit women to their banquets.' You see Philodamus alleges for his reason it's being contrary to the Grecian custom. Some learned men believe that this was an invented excuse. But Muretus opposes the testimony of a great Orator (50), and he might have confirmed it by the words of Cornelius Nepos, which are to be found above (51), and by those in the tenth chapter of the sixth book of Virtruvius. He might have urged, that, even at the court of Macedon, the princesses were not admitted to the feasts given to strangers, and that the complaisance shewn to the king of Persia's ambassadors had consequences, which proved that the refusal of their request had been more prudent; for when at their entreaty the ladies were introduced, they took such liberties, as it was necessary to put a stop to with the sword's point. 'Legati benigne excepti, inter epulas ebrietate crescente, rogant Amyntam, ut apparatus epularum adjiciat jus familiaritatis, adhibitis in convivium suis ac filii uxoris, id apud Persas haberi pignus ac fœdus hospitii. Quæ ut venerunt, petulantius Persas eas contrectantibus, filius Amyntæ Alexander rogat patrem, respectu ætatis ac gravitatis suæ abire convivio, pollicitus se hospitum temperatum jocos, &c (52).'

conversation was too free. I have something to observe against the author of old and new Lacedæmon [H]. He is too much a gentleman to be disturbed at it.

— The ambassadors being kindly received, and at a banquet growing warm with wine, desire Amyntas to send for his own, and his son's wives to grace the entertainment, and plead, that, among the Persians, it was looked on as a pledge of hospitality. When they were introduced, the Persians began to be too free with them; whereupon Alexander, the son of Amyntas, desired his father, in respect to his age and dignity, to leave the banquet, promising to restrain the mirth of his guests. Lastly, Muretus observes, that the Romans contented themselves with forbidding maids the liberty of going to feasts. I have in another place (53) observed with what severity they prohibited women the use of wine; but, in Seneca's time, that custom was lost: their manners were so corrupted, that they got drunk as much as the men. 'Non mutata fœminarum natura, says he (54), sed vita est. Nam cum virorum licentiam æquaverint, corporum quoque virilium vitia æquaverunt. Non minus pervigilant, non minus potant, & oleo & mero viros provocant: æque invitis ingesta viceribus per os reddunt, & vinum omne vomitu remittuntur: æque nivem roduunt, solatium stomachi æstuantis. — The nature of women is not changed, but their way of life. For, by taking the same liberties as men, they have equalled their vices. They sit up as late, drink as much, and challenge the men in luxury: they get drunk and spew, they swallow snow to cool their stomachs, no less than the men.' The change is as great in France, if we may believe travellers. They had no laws prohibiting women the use of wine; and yet, in the days of our fathers, they drank hardly any thing but water; but we are told that, for some time past, they indulge themselves with the best wines and strongest liquors, and it is to be feared they will fall by degrees, or even all at once, into the excesses of the Flemish girls (55). Read these words.

'Who would have thought that the women . . . would have added tobacco, and brandy to so many other vices they have gloried in for above thirty years past? They carry as yet but runlets of brandy at their side; who knows but that in time they will carry barrels?' This is what a Physician of Paris (56) has published in a book printed in 1606 (57). If Ovid, the easiest of Casuists, be the director these tipplers have made choice of, they ought, at least, to keep within the bounds he has prescribed; he would indeed have women drink, but not to excess. He discourages them by the threats of a punishment, which must be worse than a bare disgrace, otherwise the persons, he speaks to, would not have regarded the evil denounced as very terrible.

To drink her glass the fair one may be free:
Bacchus and Cytherea's son agree.
Yet let the nymph this caution take along:
To bear the liquor, let her head be strong;
Lest mounting fumes her giddy brain surprize,
And double objects to her swimming eyes.

Her womanhood in public to disgrace.
And suffer every leacher's foul embrace.
Nor let her, when the banquet's ta'en away,
Retire to sleeps for slumbers oft betray
TV' unbinking fair, to acts that shame the day.

I have lost sight of my subject, but I shall come up with it again by the help of a citation, proving what I have said concerning the diminution of respect to married woman. The chevalier d'Her . . . writing to one of his kinswomen, who made a scruple of marrying clandestinely, expatiates upon the advantages she may find in the condition of a wife, whilst she passes for a maid. 'You will be, Madam de la F . . . says he (59), and you will be called Mademoiselle d'Her . . . you will still be free of the charming tribe of maiden ladies, who will seem to be all like you, and perhaps really are. You may pretend not to understand some things, which indiscreet people may say, and you will be allowed to blush at them. whereas if your marriage be once declared, you must assume an air somewhat less innocent, and more knowing; in fine, you will have a right to give yourself all the little affected airs of a meek maid; and can any thing be prettier? for naturally modestly loves these little affectations; and why not? since it is believed the commonly owes her all to them. You may practise them upon Monsieur de la F . . . himself; you will be a demi-virgin even to him; and as long as you do not bear his name, you will have a right to be somewhat more coy, and more reserved in your carriage to him.' Note, that he rallies her thus (60), because she would have 'the banns thrice openly and audibly published, the contract made in form, and a wedding afterwards, where all the relations might come, and talk over their fooleries (61).

[H] I have something to observe against the author of Old and New Lacedæmon.] I have only three things to object to him.

In the first place I could wish he had not attempted to apologize for the nakedness of the Lacedæmonian maids. Mr Dacier had a much better taste: he openly declared against that custom; he saw, that Lycurgus had sacrificed the laws of decency, and the impressions of modesty, to a false notion of politics.

In the second place, I do not think the apology founded on good reasons. This I am now to examine Mr Guillet's words are these (62): 'The Spartan maids danced stark-naked in public; and few people are persuaded, that this was a modest sight. Yet I cannot but think, that the Lacedæmonians had their reasons for it, and that the thing, being very common, made no dangerous or sinful impressions on their minds. There grows a familiarity betwixt the eye and the object, which disposes to insensibility, and expels the soul desires of imagination. The emotion proceeds only from the novelty of the thing. A perpetual custom cloy the eye more than it tempts; and if you consider the integrity of that nation's morals, you will acknowledge the truth of this sentence; The maids of Sparta were not naked; the public honesty was a covering to them. I shall not say, that, generally speaking, their excuse would be any excuse among us: but in short, there are several countries in North America at this time, where the women always appear in the dress of these Spartan dancers, and yet our travellers affirm, that they are absolutely exempt from crime. But, tho' I should be ten whole years in pleading the cause of the maids of Sparta; I foresee I should never give you a good opinion of their modesty. You will rather believe the biting satires of the Athenians, and even of Aristotle himself, who, as much a Macedonian as he was, had lived too long at Athens, to be untainted with that general hate, which reigned there against the Spartans. Observe what he has said of the Lacedæmonians in the second book of his Politics. When Lycurgus undertook to introduce constancy and patience into Sparta, it is evident, that, as to the men, he did succeed; but he was more remiss as to the women; for they lived there in a general softness and dissoluteness. He adds, that Lycurgus vainly attempted to reform them; in which he is contradicted by Plutarch. What we are told of this familiarity between the eye and the object, which disposes to insensibility, is good and solid, generally speaking, and is one of Balzac's reflexions against the famous sonnet of Job.

The Author of the sonnet (63) was charged with contradicting himself (64); and thus they endeavoured to convict him: 'He is afraid his lady will not be moved by an object worthy of compassion, and immediately after, desires she would accustom herself to see this object. Consequently he desires what he fears. The custom of seeing, tending to cure his lady of all emotion, it is plain, he desires what he has declared he should be sorry were the case.

(64) In these words, Il craint Que vous n'en fûtes pas emue Accoutumes vous à la vue D'un homme qui souffre & se plaint.

Let him, if he pleases, reconcile this, and remember this old maxim, with which the universities ring: Ab assuetis non fit passio. The soul receiving the emotion only by the inlet of the eyes, when once these are hardened, all surprize ceases. When the eyes have once contracted an acquaintance and familiarity with the strangest objects, these, how terrible so ever at first, grow tractable by degrees, and, entering the soul as friends, raise no longer any disturbance, nor cause the least emotion. The custom of seeing monsters, makes them cease to be such to the eyes which are used to them. Even the sight of spectres and furies, armed with their torches and serpents, would lose its force and horror, in our imaginations, by a long acquaintance with them. By a stronger reason, &c. (65). But as solid as this doctrine may be, I question whether it can be applied in our case, since the maids of Lacedæmon appeared naked only on certain solemn days; and, at other times, wore a habit, which only shewed their thighs. This was a sure way of irritating concupiscence, and not disposing to insensibility by a perpetual custom. Besides, there is a great difference betwixt Lycurgus and those savage nations. There have ever gone naked; but Lycurgus introduced the custom into a town, where it had not been known before, and whilst all the neighbouring nations observed the rules of decency. He cannot therefore be excused. Lastly, the virtue of the Americans, if what travellers say be true, is no justification of this legislator; for the event has shewn, that Lacedæmon was not a place where such novelties could innocently be introduced. In vain is Aristotle's testimony attempted to be invalidated. Nothing is more grave and rational, than the book, in which this Philosopher speaks so ill of the Lacedæmonian women. "Οὐκ ἔστι γὰρ τὴν ψαλιν ὁ νομοθέτης εἶναι βυλόμενος κατὰ μὲν τὰς ἀνδρας φανερός ἐστὶ τοῖς ἄλλοις, ἐπὶ δὲ τῶν γυναικῶν ἐξημέλεικε. ὥστε γὰρ ἀκολάτως πρὸς ἅπαν ἀκολασίαν, καὶ τυφροῦς. Nam cum totam civitatem lator legum vellet ad tolerandos & perferendos labores esse fortem ac robustam, in viris quidem peripicue quod volebat affectus est: in mulieribus vero negligentem se præbuit. Vivunt enim intemperanter & luxuriose, ad omne scilicet intemperantiz genus solutæ atque effusæ (66).—For the lawgiver being willing the whole people should be strong, and enured to toil, gained his point with the men, but took no care of the women; for they live intemperately and luxuriously. The spirit of partiality does not appear in this work; so that, instead of saying, that the flanders of Poets made an impression on this Philosopher, we must on the contrary say, that his authority justifies their reproaches. For the rest, it is not true, that Plutarch hath contradicted Aristotle in the matter in question. It is plain, if we consider it, that this Philosopher spoke only of a custom among the Lacedæmonian wives of governing their husbands. Lycurgus would reform this abuse, and retrench their empire; but seeing no likelihood of success, he desisted from his enterprise, but however made several regulations relating to the sex, which qualified them for producing strong children. Τὰς δὲ γυναῖκας παρὶ μὲν ἀγῶν ἐπιχειρεῖσθαι τὸν Λυκῆργον ἐπὶ τὰς νόμους αἰσὶ δ' ἀνέκρουον, ἀποσπῆλαι πάλιν. Fæminas autem ajunt Lycurgum sub legum jugum adducere conatum, cum illæ reclamarent, & contra niterentur, ab incæpto desistisse (67). It is on account of these regulations, that Plutarch has contradicted Aristotle; but he is fallen into the fallacy, which they call ignoratio elenchi; he knew not the point in question. 'Lycurgus, says he, (68), at first regulated all that related to marriage and births; for we must not believe, what Aristotle says, that having attempted to regulate and reform the women, he gave it over, not being able to put a stop to their unbridled licentiousness, and the too great authority they had usurped over their husbands.' It is plain, that Plutarch reasons ill; a legislator, who gives over the attempt of bringing the wives into subjection to their husbands, does not thereby abandon all care relating to the education of maids, to their marriages, &c. and yet Plutarch here, to shew that Aristotle had no reason to say, that Lycurgus renounced the design of restraining the power of the women, alleges the regulations of Lycurgus, which tended only to the provoking of the men to marriage, and begetting lusty children. Thousands of such fallacies might be found in Plutarch, if we took the pains to trace them. He mentions, in the following page, an answer, which manifestly supposes the truth of this fact, that the Lacedæmonian husbands were governed by their wives. A sign that Lycurgus did not reform this abuse: Note, that Aristotle acknowledges, in the same place, that Lycurgus made laws relating to the multiplying of children. Βυλόμενος γὰρ ὁ νομοθέτης αἰσὶ πλείους εἶναι τὰς Σπαρτιάδας, προαγγέλλει τὰς πολίτας ὅτι πλείους ποιεῖσθαι παῖδας. Nam cum vellet lator legis quamplurimos esse Spartiatis, invitavit atque allexit civeis ad quamplurimos liberos procreandos (69).—For the lawgiver, willing to multiply the Spartans, invited, and inticed the citizens to get children.

My third remark concerns these words of Mr Guillet. 'I venture not, says he (70), to describe the habits of the maids of ancient Lacedæmon. Sophocles will acquaint you with it, if you observe how he has described that of Hermione, in a fragment cited by Plutarch; it was so short, that the Poet Ibycus, laughing at them, called them Phenomerides.' It is certain, I. That we do not find, in this fragment of Sophocles, the description of an habit; for this Poet only says, that Hermione's petticoat was slit from her hips downwards, and shewed her thighs. II. Ibycus's calling the Lacedæmonian maids Phenomerides, was not from their wearing a very short habit, but from their habits being slit on each side, and shewing their thighs. Plutarch most clearly gives us this reason of Ibycus's raillery (71). I wonder Cragius could commit the following fault. 'Eæ (mulieres) institutæ veteri vestis supra genua decurtatas deferabant. Unde φαινόμενίδες dictæ sunt ab Ibyco Poëtâ, ut testatur Plutarchus, tanquam quæ femora nuda ostenderint (72).—These women, following the old custom, wore short garments, that reached no lower than their knees. Whence they are called naked thighs by Ibycus the Poet, as Plutarch witnesses.' Can a habit which reaches only to the knees, leave the thighs naked? Do not the breeches, which men have worn for so many ages, prove the contrary in all the variations the fashion passes through? III. It is not true, generally speaking, that the Lacedæmonian habit was short. The authority of Clemens Alexandrinus is ill alleged. Cragius has not taken it by the right handle. Οὐδὲ γὰρ, says this Father (73) ὑπὲρ γόνυ καθάπερ τὰς Λακωνίαν παρὰ παρθενης ἐσολίσθαι καλόν. οὐδὲν γὰρ μὲρ ὅστιν ἀπογυμνῶσθαι γυναῖκας εὐπρεπές. That is, it is not becoming to wear such garments as reach only to the knees, as is said of those of the Lacedæmonian maids; for decency suffers not a woman to shew any part of her body naked. First, we see, Clemens Alexandrinus does not pretend that the Lacedæmonian habit exposed the thighs; he only blames them for shewing their feet and legs. Cragius ought to have stopped there. I add, that all the necessary truths may be preserved to this passage, without supposing, that Clemens Alexandrinus pretended, that the Lacedæmonian maids went always thus habited; it suffices that they were in this dress, when they went a hunting, or to wrestle, or performed any other exercise. Now this does not prove, that their habit was very short, but only that they tucked it up above the knee, that they might not be incommoded by it. This must necessarily be supposed, unless we accuse Virgil of gross ignorance; for he has given the maids of Lacedæmon a long and flowing habit, but tied up above the knee, when they hunted:

Cui mater media sese tulit obvia filva
Virginis os habitumque gerens, & virginis arma
SPARTANÆ

Namque humeris de more habilem suspenderat arcum
Venatrix, dederatque comam diffundere ventis
NUDA GENU, NODOQUE SINUS
COLLECTA PLUENTES (74).

Whom in the wood's recess his mother meets,
A Spartan virgin's mien, and dress, and arms, Dissembling.
For (buntings-like) she on her shoulders hung
A light, commodious, bow, and gave the winds
To wanton in her tresses; bare her knee,
And in a knot her flowing folds confin'd.

long; for he says, that, when they unlaced themselves to a certain point, they shewed from their feet upwards to their thighs. This is his way of expressing it. Ἐκαλεῖτο δὲ καὶ ὁ τῶν παρθένων ἄνω χιτῶνίσκος, ἢ παραλύσαντες ἀχει τινὸς τὰς πτέρυγας, ἐν τῇς κατὰ πτέρυγας παρέραινον τὰς μερὲς μάλιστα αἱ Σπαρτιάτιδες, ὥς διὰ τὸ τοιοῦτον ἵδαν ὠνύμαζον. Ita autem dicebatur etiam virginum tunicula; cujus postquam aliqui usque pinnae solvissent, à malleolo inferiore pedis femora ostendebant, maxime Spartanæ, quas idcirco phænomeridas appellabant (75). We may take it for granted then, as to the fact, that Cragius, and those who follow him, are mistaken; but something may be said in their favour, as to their reasoning, founded upon the fact. An habit might be so short, as to leave the thighs naked. See these words of Martial:

And what Dubravius observes of the modes which a king of Bohemia (77) brought from France. 'He let his hair grow very long; he wore round-toed shoes; and dressed himself in a short cloak, which reached only to his hips. Inerat ei perigrinus habitus in neutriendis comis, in calceandis pedibus rostratis calcetis, in vestiendo corpore pallioli vix dimidiata nates regentibus (78).' But still I maintain, the nakedness of the thighs, which the Lacedæmonian women were reproached with, proceeded not from the shortness of their petticoats; for if they had resembled our pages breeches, or the habits mentioned by Martial and Dubravius, it would not have been enough to have called them Phænomerides. There is no body but easily understands, that, if their petticoats, which were slit on both sides, without being sewed at the bottom, came but little lower than their breech, they had done much worse than shew their thighs in walking; so that the Poets, who took a greater liberty than they do at present, and expressed themselves more grossly, would have given them a much stronger epithet than that of Phænomerides, or naked thighs. I need not explain this thought more at large.

For the rest, the fashion of short habits was carried to a great excess in the court of France, if what we read in an Italian Author, who lived towards the end of the XVth century, be true. He supposes, that an Italian would not travel into France (§ a), as well because the French were ignorant, as because their very king wore a habit so short, as not to cover the nameless parts. 'Cur obsecro trans Alpes non profectus? Quod scirem Gallos maximè stolidos esse, corpusque curare magis quam animum colere: regemque eorum quamvis splendidissimum tam brevi tamen vestitu incedere, ut pudenda non velet, ac si Cynicorum sectator sit inilitutorum (79).'

(79) Jovian. Pontanus, in dialogo Antonini, pag. m. 1251.

[§ (a) The fashion of short habits had reigned in France, at least from the year 1346: and Gaguin, on the time of the battle of Cressy, book 8th of his History, speaks in this manner, both of this fashion, and of the inconstancy of the French nation in point of dress: 'Fuisse per id tempus per Franciam vestimentorum nimiam deformitatem, Scriptores tradunt: ita ut jocularioram vitam agere Francos à vestibus judicares. Crediderim non defuisse illis à lasciviam atque superbiam, quotidiana gentis mala. Itaque vel angustia, vel laxitate: item brevitate, seu longitudine vestimentorum, Galli semper peccant—Writers tell us, that dress was at that time too much deformed in France; inasmuch that you would judge the French lived a merry life from their garb. I suppose they were both wanton and proud, the daily evils of the nation. Therefore the French always dress in extremes: their cloaths being either too strait or too loose, too short or too long.' Probably, as Gaguin insinuates, they were soon tired of these short habits; but, however it be, they appeared again, and more than ever 120 years after, since king Charles V was obliged to banish that fashion, and others no less ridiculous, by edicts mentioned by Mezerai, in the year 1365: and yet, so true is Gaguin's remark, the same fashion of short cloaths was anew in France, and even in truth on the throne, towards the end of the XVth century; according to Jovian Pontanus, who was an eye-witness of it. REM. CRIT.]

LYCURGUS, an Athenian Orator, son of Lycophron, and grandson to another Lycurgus, whom the thirty tyrants put to death, flourished at the same time with Demosthenes. He first studied Philosophy under Plato; but afterwards betook himself to Oratory under Isocrates, and advanced himself to public employments (a). He was a severe judge, and fit to be compared with the Prætor Cassius [A]. He is spoken of pretty fully in the Supplement to Moreri, but not without some mistakes [B]. He is sometimes Plutarch observes, that it was said of this Lycurgus, that he dipped his pen in death; a thought which well enough agrees with the reproach made to Draco, that he writ his laws, not with ink, but in blood (2). 'Ἐσθ' γὰρ καὶ τὸ ἀσέβητον τὴν φυλακὴν, καὶ τὸν κακὸν ἔργον τὴν σκληρότητα, ὥς ἐξήλασεν ἀπαντας, ὥς καὶ τὸν σοφιστὴν ἐνέει λέγειν, Λυκούργον ὁ μύλων ἀλλὰ δακτύλου τρίβον ἀπὸν κάλαμον κατὰ τὸν πονηρὸν, ὥς συνέλαβεν. Urbis etiam custodia ei mandata fuit, & malefactorum comprehensio. Quis quidem omnes expulit: addit ut sospitum quidam dicerent, Lycurgum ita contra malos scribere, ut qui calamum non atramento sed morte imbueret (3). Diodorus Siculus represents him as a violent accuser (4). Add to this these words of Cicero. 'Nolmetiphi, qui Lycurgei à principio fuisse mus, quotidie demitigamur (5). — We who at first, had the severity of Lycurgus, grew milder every day.' See the following remark, at the place concerning Ibis.

VOL. III.

[B] Not without some mistakes. I. He should have said in general, that he banished all malefactors (6), and not simply all loiterers and vagabonds. II. I do not find he excelled in exercises, or was commonly victor in the public games. III. He should not have said, that, when he made himself be carried to the senate, there publicly to give an account of all his actions, they were applauded by all the people: he should not have said this, without observing, that an accuser appeared against him, whose calumnies he confuted (7); nor should he have passed over in silence, that he was several times accused (8). IV. The Athenians, if we may credit the supplement, regarding him as a person, who had something divine in him, consecrated, after his death, an Ibis to him (an Egyptian-bird much like a stork), as the owl had been consecrated to Xenophon. This is misunderstanding Plutarch's words. Amiot translated them thus: Lycurgus was surnamed Ibis, which is a Black Stork, and it was commonly said, to Lycurgus the Ibis, to Xenophon the Owl. This passage of Plutarch (9) is much corrupted; but it is easy to see, that it does not signify what is pretended in the Supplement. The learned Henry Valefius will help us to understand it. 'Unde, (10) scilicet be, etiam Ibis cognominatus esse videtur, quod scilicet ut Ibis angues, sic ipse noxios cives & peregrinos expelleret. sententiam confirmare videtur Plutarchus in Lycurgi Rhetoris vita: ubi & versum illum Aristophanis adducit, sed mendosum (11). — Whence he seems to have been surnamed Ibis, because, as the Ibis destroys serpents, so he drove out mischievous citizens, and foreigners. Aristophanes, in his birds, says: 'To Lycurgus the Ibis, to Chærephon the owl: Ibo' I am aware, that his scholiast gives another reason of that surname, to wit, either because Lycurgus was a native of Egypt, or because he had long legs. But Plutarch seems to confirm my opinion, in his life of Lycurgus the Orator: in which he alleges that verse of Aristophanes, but incorrect. A small doubt comes into my head. This Comedy of Aristophanes was acted in the second year of the XCIII Olympiad (12); and Lycurgus was not only alive, in the second year of the CXIth Olympiad, but he was one of the famous Orators whom the Athenians refused to delive up to Alexander (13). Of what an age then must he have been, when he died, if he be the same that Aristophanes spoke of in this Comedy? Did this Poet mention persons of obscure condition? V. When it is said, that, upon Demosthenes's testimony, Lycurgus's sons were presently set at liberty, it is plainly intimated, that Demosthenes asserted their innocence; but this is false. Demosthenes was then in exile, and he wrote to the Athenians, that they were blamed for the treatment they gave Lycurgus's sons (14). Hereupon they were released. It was not because, on the testimony of Demosthenes, it was believed they had been unjustly accused. VI. He ought not to have cited Herodotus, who being dead, before Lycurgus was born, could say nothing of him. The citing Pausanias is more pardonable, tho' he has said (15) but a small part of what is ascribed to him; but the not citing Plutarch, is an unpardonable omission.

[A] He published some writings . . . in which he attacked the opinions of Scaliger, and those of Aristotle. He published at London, in 1605, a treatise De variis annorum formis, in which he confutes Clavius, and the Mathematicians of the college of Rome, and Joseph Scaliger. See here a passage of the Scaligerana, which charges him with not understanding what he censures in Clavius: 'Lydiat est melancholicus, æquinoctium mirum statuit 36 diebus post solitum, & dicit à veteribus sic observatum. Reprehendit Clavius, & illum non capit (1). — Lydiat has the spleen: he makes the æquinox 36 days later than usual, and says the ancients so observed it: he finds fault with Clavius, without understanding him.' Mr König makes mention of this work of Lydiat, and of that De annis ministerii Christi, printed in the year 1613; but he does not speak of this other work of his: 'Prælectio astronomica de natura cæli & conditionibus elementorum: tum autem de causis præcipuorum motuum cæli & stellarum. Item disquisitio physiologica de origine fontium perennium frigidorum & calidorum: eaque occasione de ortu & causis plerorumque omnium subterraneorum, atque etiam æstus & fæledinis maris, nec non diluvii universalis. He maintains that this is making Divinity the sport of Atheists. 'Haudquaquam ratus oportere me contentum esse eo quod vulgo solitum esset responderi ad hujusmodi dogmata, Aristotelica sententiæ sacrarum bibliorum contraria, scilicet verum est Physicè non Theologicè, quandoquidem hoc videretur nihil aliud quam Theologiam exponere ludibrio hominum atheorum. . . . was printed at Rotterdam, in 1616, and the other at Dort, the year following. This author's other works are, Facula accensa historiae Waldensium. Novus orbis seu navigationes primae in Americam (1).

[B] James Lydius wrote several books. I do not mention several poems he published in Flanders, nor his Roomfchen Uylenspiegel (2) printed at Dort, in 1671, in 8vo; but here are two or three books, which shew he was versed in the Belles Lettres. I. Sermonum convivialium libri duo, quibus variarum gentium mores ad ritus in uxore expetenda, sponsalibus contrahendis, nuptiisque faciendis ac perficiendis enarrantur. They were printed at Dort in 1643, in 4to. They were printed afterwards in 12mo. II. Agonistia sacra. III. Florum sparsio ad historiam passionis Jesu Christi. He wrote a book also intitled Belgium Gloriosum, and a dialogue De eterna Domini.

His heirs have some works of his in their hands, which he did not publish. Mr. Van Til, minister and professor at Dort, having seen the manuscript of the Syntagma Sacrum de re militari, and that of the dissertation De Juramento, judged them worthy to be published, and advised a Bookseller to do it. This advice was followed, as appears by the volume printed at Dort, in 4to, 1698, and called, Jacobi Lydii Syntagma sacrum de re militari: nec non de Jurjurando dissertatio Philologica: Opus Posthumum & multa eruditissime incisi, quod nunc primum ex tenebris eruit, notisque illustravit Salomon Van Til Theologus Dordracenus. [C] JOHN LYDIUS published several books. He printed at Leyden, in 1610, a book of Præcolus, intitled, Concilia Ecclesiae Christianae, with his criticisms on it. Five years after he put out the lives of the Popes, written by Robert Barnes and John Bale, and continued it to his own time. He was author of that continuation. He had given an edition of Nicolas de Clemangis, in 1613, with notes, and a glossary.

LYNDE (SIR HUMPHREY) a knight, born at London (a), published there two books of controversy, one in 1628, the other in 1630. They sold very well, and were translated out of English into French by John de la Montagne. I will speak of them below [A]. Sir Humphrey Lynde had considerable employments: he was a justice of the peace, and member of parliament (b). He died the fourteenth of June 1636, aged fifty seven (c).

[A] His two books of controversy . . . were translated into French by John de la Montagne. I will speak of them below. The French translation of the first of these works, made from the sixth English edition is intitled; La Voye seure, &c. — The safe way, conducting each Christian, by the testimonies and confessions of our most learned adversaries to the true ancient Catholic faith, which is at this time professed in the church of England, and other Reformed churches (1). That of the second treatise is intitled, La Voye esgarée, &c. — The wrong way, making weak and tottering minds stumble in the dangerous paths of error, by the plausible colours of the apocryphal scriptures, unwritten traditions,

(1) I make use of the Paris edition, by Lewis Vandoine 1647, in 8vo, it is the second edition. I say the same as to the translation of the following treatise.

doubtful fathers, uncertain councils, and a pretended Catholic church. Sir Humphrey Lynde was engaged in this work by a challenge sent him by a Jesuit in these words. 'Let Sir Humphrey Lynde, or those of his party, prove, from good authors, that the Protestant church was visible in all ages, and principally in the ages before Luther (2).' He was a man of great reading; and he gave a very good turn to his answer, and quoted a great many remarkable passages. I make no question but the Jesuit, who sent him the challenge, was the same, who answered his Safe Way. He was an Englishman, and his name was Robert Jenison: his answer was printed in English at Rouen in 1631, in 8vo (3).

LYSERUS (POLYCARP), a famous Divine of the Augsburg confession, was born at Winenden, in the country of Wirtemberg, the eighteenth of March 1552. He was but two years old when his father (a) died; however his mother, marrying a second husband (b), gave him a father-in-law, who took great care of his education. The progress he made in his childhood recommended him as worthy to be educated in the college of Tubingen, at the charge of the prince of Wirtemberg. He employed his time so well, that he was ordained minister in 1573, and commenced doctor of Divinity in 1576. His reputation spread into all parts, so that Augustus, elector of Saxony, called him to be minister of the church of Wirtemberg in 1577. He had no sooner discovered his great abilities in that church, but he was added to the number of Divinity Professors. He was one of the principal directors for drawing up the book of Concord, and vigorously discharged the office of a missionary [A], in order to get it signed by

(a) Pastor and superintendent of Winenden.

(b) Luke Osiander, a famous Divine.

[A] He vigorously exercised the charge of a missionary. I make use of this term on account of the journey he was obliged to take from town to town, to exact subscriptions, and degrade the nonconformists. See the remark [C] of the article HUNNIUS, and consider these words of a German Divine: 'Incident Ministerii ipsius Wittebergenensis primitiae in illud ipsum tempus, quo ingenti cura maxime impensis Electoris Saxon. Augusti liber Christianae Concordiae Collectus, conscriptus & plurimarum Ecclesiarum calculo approbatus fuerat. In hoc ergo opere feliciter promovendo partes minime postremas sustinuit Polycarpus, dum de mandato ac voluntate Electoris, una cum reliquis ad hanc rem deputatis Nobilibus & Theologis, non Wittebergae modo sed & Torgae, Lipsiae, Misena & alibi subscriptiones ab illis exposcere necesse habuit, qui publicis docendi muneribus vel in Ecclesiis vel in Scholis tam erant praefecti. Tanto autem tamque arduo labore superato &c. (1) — He began his ministry at Wirtemberg at that very time, when the book of Christian Unity was compiled with great care, and at the great expense by all who were in employments. He assisted at all the assemblies, which were held about this book, or about the re-union of the Calvinists and Lutherans, negotiated by the agents of the king of Navarre. Christian, elector of Saxony, who succeeded (c) to the dignity of his father, but not to his rigid Lutheranism, was overjoyed at Lyserus's communicating to him the advantageous conditions offered him at Brunswic [B]. He dismissed him with all his heart, but to the great regret of his subjects. Lyserus was at first only coadjutor at Brunswic, but became afterwards intendant. He was recalled to Wirtemberg, after the death of Christian; and was made minister of the court of Dresden in 1594. He stayed there all the rest of his life, and employed his time not only in the functions of the ministry, but also in the education of the young princes, and in writing books [C]. He died the twenty second of February 1601, a father of thirteen children [D], and grand-father to three grandsons and one grand-daughter. His will was an evidence of his charity to the poor, and to necessitous students [E]. He had had a great many quarrels upon his hands (d) [F].

exence of AUGUSTUS, elector of Saxony, and received the approbation of several churches. Polycarp contributed not the least to the success of this undertaking, whilst, in obedience to the command and will of the elector, together with the rest of the nobles and Divines deputed for this purpose, he was obliged to require subscriptions, not only at Wittemberg, but at Torgau, Leipzig, Meissen, and in other places, of those, who were public teachers in the churches or schools. Having performed this great and difficult task, &c.

[B] Christian was overjoyed at Lyserus's communicating to him the advantageous conditions which were offered him at Brunswic. The accepting them was the least of his thoughts; but he believed that the proposal might gain him the advantage of being retained, with useful testimonies of the high esteem they had for him. How astonished must Lyserus be, when he heard the elector's answer: for there was no way left of handsomely refusing the gentlemen of Brunswic: he was under a necessity of accepting their offer. This was a thunder-stroke to the zealots; their reiterated remonstrances to the court were all in vain. See here the words of Melchior Adam (2):

Cum aliud agens Lyserus, conditionis optimæ occasione apud Brunswicenses sibi obtingere, datis ad aulam literis, ostendisset: responsum plane ad posterum tulit: ut frueretur, quam sibi oblatum putaret, sollicitate: ecclesiæ Wittembergensi de alio pastore prospectum iri. Hoc responso ordines consensati non literis modo, sed & legatis ad aulam Electoralem missis, causas plane fonticas, exposuerunt, ob quas de retinendo Lysero sint solliciti: verum irrito plane conatu. — Lyserus having signified to the court by letter, that he had received advantageous offers from Brunswic, was unexpectedly answered, that he might enjoy the happiness, he thought was offered him, and that the church of Wittemberg, must seek another pastor. This answer thunderstruck the assemblies, who, not only by letter, but by their agents, represented to the electoral court the just reasons they had to be solicitous to retain Lyserus; but to no purpose.

[C] He spent his time in writing books. The chief of them are: Historia passionis Dominicæ secundum IV Evangelia, at Leipzig 1605, in 4to. Historia resurrectionis & ascensionis Dominicæ, & missionis Spiritus sancti hominibus aliquot explicata, Leipzig 1610, 4to. Schola Babylonica ex cap. 1. Danielis, quam subsequuntur Colossus Babylonicus, Fornax Babylonica, Cedrus Babylonica, Epulum Babylonicum, & Aula Persica. Commentariorum in Genesim Tomi VI. the first upon Adam; the second upon Noah; the third upon Abraham; the fourth upon Isaac; the fifth upon Jacob; the sixth upon Joseph. Harmonia Evangelicæ, à Martino Chemnitio inchoatæ, continuatio, seu vitæ Jesu Christi secundum quatuor Evangelia, suas exposita libri tres. I have elsewhere observed (3), that he published a book of Hafenmullerus: this occasioned a dispute betwixt him and the Jesuit James Gretser, which he broke off after the second reply (4); he saw no end of it, if he would have gone on with his answers; he therefore chose to found a retreat. But as to the dispute between him and a Swiss minister (5), who taught that God had elected all men to eternal life, it was much more obstinate; for it lasted seventeen years. Cum isto, inquam, totis annis septendecim pugnavit (6). I pass over several books, which our Lyserus published in High-Dutch (7).

[D] He was father of thirteen children. Among others, of Polycarp and William, who lived to enjoy several ecclesiastical and academical employments, and published several books. POLYCARP LYSERUS, born at Wittemberg the twentieth of November 1586, was minister and professor at Leipzig, &c. He died the fifteenth of January 1633, leaving several children. You will find the catalogue of his books in the 452d and 453d pages of Paul Freher's Theatre. WILLIAM LYSERUS, his brother, was born at Dresden the twenty sixth of October 1592. He was professor of Divinity at Wittemberg, &c. and died the eighth of February 1649, leaving several children of both sexes. In the 542d, and 543d pages of the same Theatre, you will find the catalogue of his books. Note that his Systema Theologico-Exegeticum was not printed till 1699. In the Leipzig Journal of October, the same year, at the 473d, and 474th pages, you will find the names and qualities of some persons of this family.

[E] His will is a proof of his charity to the poor, and to necessitous students. These are Melchior Adam's words. Testamento cavit, ut quotannis in die Polycarpi & Elisabethæ, certa quædam pecuniæ summa impenderetur, in lautiores victum eorum, qui communi mensa uterentur (8). This author tells us a thing here (9) which perhaps needs some reformation. The ministers would be more respected in Germany than they are, if the students in Divinity were not often in such a condition as he speaks of.

[F] He had a great many quarrels upon his hands. Refer hither what I have said above (10), and add to it another thing not mentioned by Melchior Adam. There was a Poet called John Major, who wrote verses against the methods used to procure subscriptions to the Formulary, and which particularly abused the Divines of Wittemberg. Lyserus took this John Major to task with so much vigour, that he never let him rest till he got him expelled the university. He made himself many enemies by this victory; and, in his turn, fell under their assaults, losing all the preierments he had at Wittemberg. So true it is, that, on some occasions, it is better to be contented with a moderate advantage over an adversary, than drive things to extremities. But where are those, who can moderate themselves, when they have so prosperous a gale, and the governing faction permits them to revenge themselves? Sub initium anni 86 supra seculumillesum turbas Collegio Theologico Wittembergensi dari cepit Joannes Major Poeta, homo desperatæ levitatis, qui editis in publicum carminibus, Religionis sinceritatem, & bonorum Virorum Theologorum cum primis famam vellicare haud dubitaverat, cujus improbis conatibus, cum Polycarpus tum publicè tum privatim magno spiritu se opposuisset, tandemque effecisset, ut Poeta Wittembergensi Academia, si proferrius, dici non potest quos quantofque crabrones tunc exciderit tam in Aula quam in Academia, quantamque invidiam sibi apud multos attraxerit; quæ postea non sine gravi Ecclesiæ scandalo in nervum ita erupit, ut Polycarpus tota Ecclesiâ, & Academia reclamante functione sua exciderit (11). His retirement did not secure him from calumny (12). If we had a full account of this matter, we should find, perhaps, that our Lyserus was partly in the wrong.

(9) He had just said, Cum singulari quodam modo affectu Wittembergæ cum tenuioris conditionis fortunæ studiosos, quales plerumque esse solent, studiosi Theologos qui se mancipiant, prosequeretur; testamento cavit, &c. — Having a singular affection for Wittemberg, and for students of narrow fortune, as those who apply themselves to Divinity generally are, he provided by his will, &c.

Peleus, the prince his son is Achilles, and I am Phoenix. This was likely enough to tickle Alexander, and please king Philip: This was awakening in him great and sublime ideas. This invention made him beloved, and gave him the first place after Leonidas in the young prince's family. I have in another place (3) touched upon the distinction of a governor and a tutor; you will find it plainly enough in Plutarch's words, which I must copy, that my readers may perceive Amiot's error. *Λεωνίδας . . . μὲν ἐν εὐχρατὶ τοῦ τῆς παιδαγωγίας ὄνομα, καλὸν ἔργον ἔχουσιν καὶ λαμπρὸν, ὅσο δὲ τῶν ἄλλων, διὰ τὸ ἀξιωμα καὶ τὴν οἰκιστοῦτα, προεὖς Ἀλέξανδρον καὶ καθήκον ἐκτελέουσιν, οὐ δὲ τὸ σχῆμα τῆς παιδαγωγῆς καὶ τὴν προσηγορίαν ὑποποιτούμενος τὴν Λυσιμαχῶς, ὅτι γινέται Ἀκαρῶν. ἄλλο μὲν ἔστιν ἢ χῶρον αἰεῖον, ὅτε δ' ἑαυτὸν μὲν ἀνωμαλὴν οἰκίαν, τὸν δ' Ἀλέξανδρον, Ἀχιλλεῖα, Πηλεῖα δὲ, τὸν φιλοπαιδῶν, ἢ πατρός, καὶ δυνάτα ἐν εἰς γῶραν.
